After only one hearing of "Les Offrandes oubliees" the writer admits he does not feel competent to discuss it—whether it is in the worst tradition of he religiosity of which Goudon and Massenet were capable, or in the best tradition of Cesar Franck and Vincent d'Indy. Instead he will merely quote Roger Vinteuil, who, writing in Le Menestrel, imputes to it a mysticism ardent, lofty, reflective, expressed in a language subtle in its purity."

In the evening Mme. Frijsh regaled an exceedingly enthusiastic audience with an admirably arranged program of lyrics in German, in French, in Norwegian and in Danish. Of course, there were additional numbers, in the course of which English was honored.

Occasionally a song ran uncomfortably high for the singer. When such was not the case however, Mme. Frijsh's management of her voice was no less remarkable than her interpretation, which, as usual, was marked by intelligence, insight, feeling, musicianship, command of style and compelling magnetism.

* * *

Hard to Find Her Equal.

In subtleties of vocal nuance and coloring, in fineness of diction and in the just welding of the musical and the rhetorical phrase one would have to search far to find Mme. Frijsh's equal.

It would be a pleasure to dwell on her performance in detail, but, such being out of the question, it must suffice now to record that Faure's "Spleen," Poulenc's "1904," Fevrier's "L'Intruse," Kricka's "Die unfolgsamen Zicklein," Marx's "Nocturne," Cui's "La Foantine de Czars-oeselo, and the "Vergebliches Staendchen" of Brahms (these last two additions) were all in their several ways brief masterpieces of singing.

A feature of the occasion was the excellent playing of the piano accompaniments by Celius Dougherty.

Barbirolli Shines as a Program Maker.

In the short time of John Barbirolli's presiding as conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra he has revealed one important thing, namely, that he is a program maker of excellent merit. Other considerations aside, this particular talent wants little, if anything, and so far—despite the odiousness of comparison—it certainly stands on a shoulder-to-shoulder basis with the program making of his predecessors.

Mr. Barbirolli's gifts go beyond an effective grouping of the numbers, which, after all, is an art in itself; he is also keenly on the hunt for the new and unknown, or the old and unknown, that will add historical interest—and perhaps zest—to a symphonic bill of fare.

Yesterday afternoon's Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall again brought these points home, and with emphasis. For opening selection there was the second symphony of Schubert (B flat major). Not only was this a first performance by the society, but there seems to exist no record of its being given by any of the major American orchestras.

If this be so, then one can find no valid reason for its neglect. Completed in March, 1815, when Schubert was 18, the work is divided into four movements, successively marked Largo-Allegro vivace, Andante, Menuetto-Allegro vivace and Presto vivace. It may be, as we have been told, that the symphony is Mozartean and Beethovenish in turn—with respect to flavor, and not to actual material—but it is vigorous, forthright, amazingly adult and extremely well orchestrated.

Mr. Barbirolli and his men did grandly by the symphony.

The Prelude and "Love-Death," from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," which followed, however, lacked sustained point and meaning, although several of the passages were rendered with a breath-taking beauty.

Hulda Lashanska was again the soprano soloist in the Arioso "Dank sei dir, Herr," from the Handel "Cantata con Stromenti," and in two songs by Hugo Wolf. Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" closed the program, which was enjoyed by a large audience. R. C. B.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

NOV 23 1936

CARL BEHR 83 YEARS OLD TODAY

Boston Symphony Charter Member in No. Carolina

GREENSBORO, N C, Nov 23 (A P)—Carl Behr, who said he is one of two living charter members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and dean of the North Carolina Symphony Orchestra, was busy today arranging the program he will present tonight at his 83d birthday party.

He didn't have time to arrange the program over the week-end because he was busy with another one—at the First Lutheran Church, Sunday morning, in memory of his father, mother and wife.

A student of the Heindle Brothers who has played under the batons of Sir Arthur Sullivan, Johann Strauss, Arthur Nikisch and other famous conductors, Behr now plays the cello in the North Carolina Symphony Orchestra.

A native of Boston who came to Asheville 15 years ago for his health, the veteran musician moved here recently after participating in organization of numerous musical movements in the Carolinas.

Nov. ROCHESTER, N. Y. 22/36
SUNDAY AMERICAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the second in a series of broadcast concerts Thursday evening over an NBC network. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will wield the baton.

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

NOV 24 1936

* * *

The news that the Boston Symphony orchestra is to pay Toledo its third visit Dec. 11 cannot but thrill members of the Toledo Museum of Art, to whom this concert will be a complimentary affair. For this great ensemble has given some of the finest programs ever heard in the peristyle.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 23 1936

Boston Symphony in Novelty

'Les Offrandes Oubliees' Included in Concert —Philharmonic Plays Schubert Work.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Two orchestral concerts filled the week end with a concourse of more or less sweet sounds. The audiences wore the appearance of happiness, and most of those going out in the intermissions to smoke deifying tobacco wore smiles and emitted much cheerful talk. Despite the fact that the Philharmonic-Symphony Society under young Mr. Barbirolli produced yesterday afternoon an unknown symphony written by Schubert while a boy of 18, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon assumed the more important position.

This was not won wholly by the first performance here of a composition emanating from a new youth movement in France, but rather by the remarkable playing of older and more familiar scores by the company of virtuosi who dwell within bow shot of Harvard yard and the conducting of a cosmopolitan born in Russia, polished in France, and ultimately finished in the Athens of America.

The Gallic novelty was "Les Offrandes Oubliees," described as a "meditation symphonique," by Olivier Messaien, born at Avignon, December 10, 1908. Avignon, it will be recalled, was once the residence of the Popes, also of some swashbuckling warriors and, on occasions, of traveling troubadours such as Paulet de Marseilla. It was not of the gay science of the troubadour but of the religion of the Popes that M. Messaien essayed to sing in an orchestral sketch in three sections performed without interruption. These invited us to vision the Saviour on the cross, the sinful soul rushing violently into evil doings and finally the mercy proferred to him and by him forgotten.

This scheme disclosed itself in a gentle and reflective first section, fluent, melodious, imitative of the ancient chant, but with harmonies foreign to it and indeed to the cantus firmus itself, but withal music of texture and a well defined mood of pathos. The second section, labelled "vi, feroce, desespere, haletante," was all that the words implied, even, as the final adjective hints, out of breath. The closing measures returned to the mood of the first and included recollections of its thematic matter. The score commands that this section be played "avec une grande pitie et un grand amour," which assuredly puts an orchestra and its conductor to a remarkable test.

It has been said that M. Messaien "aims primarily to express with the utmost possible of emotion and sincerity the truths of the Catholic faith." Of the earnestness of his endeavor in the work heard Saturday there could be no doubt. It strove valiantly to convey something of the sinfulness of man and the divine love and pity, but when it was over one could but sigh for the feebleness of youth and its aspirations in the presence of such imposing matters. But youth must be served, and, since M. Messaien and his three comrades comprising the new group calling itself "Le Jeune France" intend to write compositions "as far removed from revolutionary as from academic formulas," let us give ear and due consideration. We hope we shall be moved to say more about these young emancipators. At this moment our knowledge goes no further than M. Messaien's brief exploration of divine mysteries.

We turn with comfort and greater certainty to another youth who was not of a group, but very much on his own. His name was Mozart, and Mr. Koussevitzky conducted a reduced orchestra through an exquisitely suave and lucid performance of his symphony in A major (Koechel 201). This reviewer never had heard the symphony before. It was made when the composer was 18 years of age, and its youth is of the kind that never attains age, but lives on forever young, beautiful and inspiring. Mr. Koussevitzky earned the grattitude of all music lovers by unearthing it.

There was also a gorgeous delivery of the Strauss's "Don Juan" which was passionate without being savage and splendid without being pompous. There has not been in this town a richer, more transparent or more polished reading of this tone poem. After the intermission came the fifth symphony of Sibelius, E flat minor, opus 82. The music is known to concert goers, who have come to a penetration of the profoundly introspective moods and the grand constructive lines of the symphonies of the Finnish master, the one great symphonist now living. The work was grandly conceived and grandly played Saturday. And so ended this visit of the Bostonians, leaving us with a heart full of thanksgiving for the creation founded by Col. Higginson and regret that the metropolis of the western world has to bow before its superiority.

Schubert's second symphony, B flat, written in 1815, opened Mr. Barbirolli's program yesterday afternoon. It was a pleasant relaxation to listen to this juvenile composition, so candid in its publication of Schubert's fondness for the songs and dances of the people, so straightforward in its utterance and so sprinkled with the orchestral stumblings of inexperience. The flute indeed soared triumphantly and long above the ensemble and the second violins and violas became very fussy on occasion. But melodic fluency, rhythmic life and sound harmonic basis sustained the score. The elementary variations in the slow movement were charming in their ingenuous yet appropriate methods. Mr. Barbirolli conducted the symphony with gusto, especially the first movement, which seemed to excite him unduly, and made one wish that he better understood the secret of strength without force.

There was also to his credit a sober and industrious performance of the prelude and "love death" from "Tristan und Isolde." By his gestures the conductor gave evidence of much agitation, but the music remained astonishingly calm. Perhaps Mr. Barbirolli believes the capricious Rosalind when she said, "Men have died from time to time and worms have eaten them, but not for love." Following the intermission Mme. Hulda Lashanska sang her Handel and Wolf, as she did Thursday night and Friday afternoon, and Richard Strauss's Don Quixote once more stormed his windmill and faced the embattled sheep. After these two concerts the conviction remained that the youth movements of 1774 and 1815 had more promise than that of 1935 and that the music of Strauss a la Boston sounded more human than that of Wagner a la London.

Cont.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

NOV 23 1936

CARL BEHR PLANS HIS 83RD BIRTHDAY

Is Charter Member of Boston Symphony

GREENSBORO, N. C., Nov. 23 (AP)—Carl Behr, who said he is one of two living charter members of the Boston Symphony orchestra and dean of the North Carolina Symphony orchestra, was busy today. He was arranging the program he will present tonight at his 83d birthday party.

He didn't have time to arrange the program over the week-end because he was busy with another one—at the First Lutheran Church, Sunday morning, in memory of his father, mother and wife.

A student of the Heindle brothers who has played under the batons of Sir Arthur Sullivan, Johann Strauss, Arthur Nikisch and other famous conductors, Behr now plays the 'cello in the North Carolina Symphony orchestra.

A native of Boston who came to Asheville 15 years ago for his health, the veteran musician moved here recently after participating in organization of numerous musical movements in the Carolinas.

91.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 23 1936

Music of the Day

By B. H. HAGGIN

Boston Symphony, Philharmonic and Recitals Fill Crowded Musical Weekend

Though the audience at the duet recital of David Brynely, tenor, and Norman Notley, baritone, at Town Hall last night was of fair size and very responsive, it should have been larger; for this was a concert unusual in the fact that it was what a concert should be, and what most concerts are not. We are beginning to get a little more of his sort of thing here, but it is still much less than in London, where along with the conventional vocal or instrumental concert with its conventional program there are concerts by small groups of vocalists and instrumentalists who carry over to the concert hall the amateur feeling, the love of making music together, that one encounters in many English homes, and who draw on the rich store of beautiful music that was sung and played by the amateurs of a few centuries back. The English Singers are such a group; and the recital of Messrs. Brynely and Notley last night was that of two persons whose love of music had caused them to hunt out unusual things which they now wished others to hear. That, I repeat, is what a concert should be.

They proceeded from one lovely thing to another: "Cherchons la paix," from Lully's "Phaeton"; "Heureux cent fois un coeur tendre," from Destouches' "Omphale"; "Sin le grazie nel bel volto," from Haendel's "Il Parnasso in Festa"; "O soave conforto," by Alessandro Scarlatti; "Salamandra," by Alessandro Stradella; "Ecco il petto," by Benedetto Marcello—with "Die Furcht des Herren" of Heinrich Schuetz providing contrast by its German four-squareness between the last two Italian numbers. Then came a group with startling contrasts: the humorous "I Spy Celia" of Purcell; a long, powerfully dramatic recitative of Rosenmuller, The Lament of Jeremiah, sung by Mr. Notley; the charming "Vanne vola" of G. G. Ferrari; the poignant "O Death rock me to sleep," attributed to Anne Boleyn, arranged by Dolmetsch and sung by Mr. Brynely, and a strange 14th Century madrigal of Jacobus de Bononia, transcribed for the two voices without accompaniment (hence, in part, the strangeness) by Yves Tniayre. And finally folk-songs, with Purcell's "Sound the Trumpet" in conclusion.

And contributing to the distinction of the occasion was the beautifully cultivated singing of the two artists, their unfailing taste, their perfection of style. Mr. Brynely's singing, in fact, tended a little toward over-cultivation, over-refinement; but beyond that I would have no criticism to make.

* * *

Boston Symphony

Saturday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky offered a curious succession of music. It began with the lovely Mozart Symphony in A major, Koechel No. 201, which the orchestra had played the evening before in Brooklyn. Unless my eye and ear deceived me, the symphony was played on Saturday by a larger orchestra, which resulted in greater robustness of tone and style, with a loss of some of the exquisite lightness of the first performance. It remained, nevertheless, a fine performance in the light style in which Mr. Koussevitzky conceives the symphony; and even in this style the quality of the music made itself felt. If there is in Mozart anything lovelier, more poignant in its loveliness, and withal more distinguished in manner of utterance, than the opening phrase of the Minuet, I cannot recall it now; and it is matched by the characteristically long-breathed melodies of the slow movement and certain passages in the first.

Next came "The Forgotten Sacrifice," a Symphonic Meditation by Olivier Messiaen, one of a group of four composers that calls itself "Young France," that has issued the inevitable manifesto, and that gave its first joint concert in Paris last June, at which "The Forgotten Sacrifice" was played. Messiaen, we are informed, "aims primarily to express with the utmost possible of emotion and sincerity the truths of the Catholic faith." At the first performance of the work its three sections were given the titles "The Cross," "The Sin" and "The Eucharist," and in the score the titles are amplified by words of great fervor and eloquence. This emotion, these words, however, the composer translates into music that is inadequate to them—bloodless and insipid in the first and third sections, and naively and absurdly literal in the second.

Strauss' "Don Juan" was not exactly the inevitable work to follow this one—particularly "Don Juan" as Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it. Strauss has never been accused of understatement; and the points he makes in "Don Juan" are clear enough without Saturday's overstatement. The performance did, however, offer an impressive demonstration of the orchestra's virtuosity, and this was better employed in a superb performance of Sibelius' Symphony No. 5 which concluded the program. B. H. H.

N. Y. Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra

Schubert's Second Symphony received what was probably its American premiere with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under John Barbirolli at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. This composition of Schubert's youth—it was written when he was only 18—revealed what might have been expected of it: unmistakable traces of Haydn and Beethoven; tentative, instinctively beautiful, but otherwise immature treatment of orchestral resources, and a freshness and strength of melody and harmony that promised in no uncertain terms what was realized in subsequent years. Mr. Barbirolli, as usual, infused the music with all its due in energy and vitality, if not with more.

The program continued with the contrasting Prelude and Liebestod from Wagner's "Tristan," followed by two Wolf songs with orchestral accompaniment, sung by Hulda Lashanska, the soprano soloist of the two preceding concerts. Strauss' tone poem, "Don Quixote," with Joseph Schuster and Zoltan Kurthy at the solo desks, concluded the afternoon. S. P. P.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

NOV 2 3 1936

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second of its five Providence concerts for the 1936-37 season at the Metropolitan Theater in that city tomorrow night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

NOV 23 1936

WORDS AND MUSIC

Koussevitzky Tries Out New Symphony 'Movement'

His Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Tries a Little Number That Eschews Formulas

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

LEAVE it to the eternally inquiring Dr. Koussevitzky to sense the latest "movement" in his chosen art and to be the first to set forth its fruits to his Boston Symphony customers at Carnegie Hall. Accordingly, at the visiting orchestra's matinee concert on Saturday, the doctor placed a little number in the middle of an orthodox program (which included a Mozart and Sibelius Symphony and Strauss's "Don Juan") that is the offshoot of a hitherto obscure little group-ee in Paris who call themselves, challengingly, "La Jeune France."

"La Jeune France," composed of four members, is, apparently, the successor to the once revolutionary "Le Six." The newer organization has issued, in truly Gallic fashion, a "manifesto," in which it sets forth its aims and tendencies the most important of which "proposes the dissemination of works youthful, free, as far removed from revolutionary formulas as from academic formulas." In short, "The Four" eschew formulas, whether inspired by the right or the left—a beautiful ideal, and one which should result in the creation of youthful and untrammeled masterpieces. Yet, after listening to the sample which Dr. Koussevitzky tendered us on Saturday, a something called "The Forgotten Sacrifice," by Oliver Messiaen, I am forced to disclose the melancholy fact that in this piece at least "La Jeune France" has neglected to carry out its most important plank.

For Mr. Messiaen's Symphonic Meditation adheres to both of the formulas which the society affects to despise. Its form—a slow section, a fast interlude and a return to the slow section—follows one of the most ancient formulas of music. The harmonies are a mixture of the revolutionary and academic formulas. Emotionally it cleaves to the formula on which most up-to-date creations are contrived—the absence of true passion. It may be, however, that Mr. Messiaen's work was meant to crystallize, as an ever-present example, the kind of thing the group desires to avoid, and that the other three members of the club will any moment astonish the world with quite youthful and completely formulaless scores.

The Mozart symphony was one in A major (Koechel No. 201). The orchestra played it flawlessly and the conductor treated it, I thought, overgently. It is not, to be sure, as dramatic as the "Jupiter" or the "G minor." But it is hard to believe that Mozart was as consistently sweet in any large composition as Dr. Koussevitzky made him out to be. Perhaps what it needed was an infusion of exigent rhythm. The inevitable recurring pulse beat of natural rhythm would have lent strength to its gayety and charm. Yet I must admit that Dr. Koussevitzky's way of playing Mozart coincides with the popular conception of the personality and the music of that composer.

The performance in one week of two of Strauss's tone poems may indicate that this greatest of living masters is due for a comeback. The Bostonians fairly reveled in the arrogantly passionate proclamations of "Don Juan" and in its tender, moonlit interludes. For all its swagger it is a full-blooded score, boldly imaginative and utterly sincere. The wonder is that Strauss, so obviously an offshoot of Wagner, could, even in this early work, be himself.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
NEWS

NOV 2 3 1936

Charter Member Of Boston Symphony To Give Program

Greensboro, Nov. 23.—(AP) — Carl Behr, who said he is one of two living charter members of the Boston symphony orchestra and dean of the North Carolina Symphony orchestra, was busy today. He was arranging the program he will present tonight at his 83rd birthday party.

He didn't have time to arrange the program over the week-end because he was busy with another one—at the first Lutheran church Sunday morning in memory of his father, mother, and wife.

A student of the Heindle brothers who has played under the batons of Sir Arthur Sullivan, Johann Strauss, Arthur Nikisch and other famous conductors, Behr now plays the cello in the North Carolina Symphony orchestra which travels through the state as part of a pro- musical appreci- dawn of his 83rd birthday, he said tonight's program would be "more elaborate."

NORFOLK, VA.
LEDGER DISPATCH

NOV 2 3 1936

Noted N. C. Musician To Present Program On His 83rd Birthday

Carl Behr, Who Has Played Under Batons Of Strauss and Sullivan, Will Give Musical Treat Tonight

Greensboro, N. C., Nov. 23.—(AP)—Carl Behr, who said he is one of two living charter members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and dean ~~of the~~ North Carolina Symphony Orchestra, was busy today. He was arranging the program he will present tonight at his 83d birthday party.

He didn't have time to arrange the program over the week-end because he was busy with another one—at the First Lutheran Church Sunday morning in memory of his father, mother and wife.

A student of the Heindle Brothers who has played under the batons of Sir Arthur Sullivan, Johann Strauss, Arthur Nikisch and other famous conductors, Behr now plays the 'cello in the North Carolina Symphony Orchestra, which travels through the State as part of a program for enhanced musical appreciation.

A native of Boston, who came to Asheville 15 years ago for his health, the veteran musician moved here recently after participating in organization of numerous musical movements in the Carolinas.

Sunday morning at the church he played Handel's "Largo," Aldrich's "Love and Angels" and Braga's "Angel's Serenade." And then, at the dawn of his 83d birthday, he said tonight's program would be "more eslaborate."

MARKS 83rd BIRTHDAY

GREENSBORO, N. C., Nov. 23 (AP)—Carl Behr, who said he is one of two living charter members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and dean of the North Carolina Symphony Orchestra, was busy today. He was arranging the program he will present tonight at his 83rd birthday party.

He didn't have time to arrange the program over the weekend because he was busy with another one—at First Lutheran Church Sunday morning i memory of his father, mother and wife.

A student of the Heindle brothers who had played under the batons of Sir Arthur Sullivan, Johann Strauss, Arthur Nikisch and other famous conductors, Behr now plays the 'cello in the North Carolina Symphony Orchestra.

A native of Boston who came to Asheville 15 years ago for his health, the veteran musician moved here recently after participating in organization of numerous musical movements in the Carolinas.

91

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 23 1936

Music of the Day

By B. H. HAGGIN

Boston Symphony, Philharmonic and Recitals Fill Crowded Musical Weekend

Though the audience at the duet recital of David Brynely, tenor, and Norman Notley, baritone, at Town Hall last night was of fair size and very responsive, it should have been larger; for this was a concert unusual in the fact that it was what a concert should be, and what most concerts are not. We are beginning to get a little more of his sort of thing here, but it is still much less than in London, where along with the conventional vocal or instrumental concert with its conventional program there are concerts by small groups of vocalists and instrumentalists who carry over to the concert hall the amateur feeling, the love of making music together, that one encounters in many English homes, and who draw on the rich store of beautiful music that was sung and played by the amateurs of a few centuries back. The English Singers are such a group; and the recital of Messrs. Brynely and Notley last night was that of two persons whose love of music had caused them to hunt out unusual things which they now wished others to hear. That, I repeat, is what a concert should be.

They proceeded from one lovely thing to another: "Cherchons la paix," from Lully's "Phaeton"; "Heureux cent fois un coeur tendre," from Destouches' "Omphale"; "Sin le grazie nel bel volto," from Haendel's "Il Parnasso in Festa"; "O soave conforto," by Alessandro Scarlatti; "Salamandra," by Alessandro Stradella; "Ecco il petto," by Benedetto Marcello—with "Die Furcht des Herren" of Heinrich Schuetz providing contrast by its German four-squareness between the last two Italian numbers. Then came a group with startling contrasts: the humorous "I Spy Celia" of Purcell; a long, powerfully dramatic recitative of Rosenmuller, The Lament of Jeremiah, sung by Mr. Notley; the charming "Vanne vola" of G. G. Ferrari; the poignant "O Death rock me to sleep," attributed to Anne Boleyn, arranged by Dolmetsch and sung by Mr. Brynely, and a strange 14th Century madrigal of Jacobus de Bononia, transcribed for the two voices without accompaniment (hence, in part, the strangeness) by Yves Tniayre. And finally folk-songs, with Purcell's "Sound the Trumpet" in conclusion.

And contributing to the distinction of the occasion was the beautifully cultivated singing of the two artists, their unfailing taste, their perfection of style. Mr. Brynely's singing, in fact, tended a little toward over-cultivation, over-refinement; but beyond that I would have no criticism to make.

* * *

Boston Symphony

Saturday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky offered a curious succession of music. It began with the lovely Mozart Symphony in A major, Koechel No. 201, which the orchestra had played the evening before in Brooklyn. Unless my eye and ear deceived me, the symphony was played on Saturday by a larger orchestra, which resulted in greater robustness of tone and style, with a loss of some of the exquisite lightness of the first performance. It remained, nevertheless, a fine performance in the light style in which Mr. Koussevitzky conceives the symphony; and even in this style the quality of the music made itself felt. If there is in Mozart anything lovelier, more poignant in its loveliness, and withal more distinguished in manner of utterance, than the opening phrase of the Minuet, I cannot recall it now; and it is matched by the characteristically long-breathed melodies of the slow movement and certain passages in the first.

Next came "The Forgotten Sacrifice," a Symphonic Meditation by Olivier Messiaen, one of a group of four composers that calls itself "Young France," that has issued the inevitable manifesto, and that gave its first joint concert in Paris last June, at which "The Forgotten Sacrifice" was played. Messiaen, we are informed, "aims primarily to express with the utmost possible of emotion and sincerity the truths of the Catholic faith." At the first performance of the work its three sections were given the titles "The Cross," "The Sin" and "The Eucharist," and in the score the titles are amplified by words of great fervor and eloquence. This emotion, these words, however, the composer translates into music that is inadequate to them—bloodless and insipid in the first and third sections, and naively and absurdly literal in the second.

Strauss' "Don Juan" was not exactly the inevitable work to follow this one—particularly "Don Juan" as Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it. Strauss has never been accused of understatement; and the points he makes in "Don Juan" are clear enough without Saturday's overstatement. The performance did, however, offer an impressive demonstration of the orchestra's virtuosity, and this was better employed in a superb performance of Sibelius' Symphony No. 5 which concluded the program.

B. H. H.

N. Y. Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra

Schubert's Second Symphony received what was probably its American premiere with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under John Barbirolli at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. This composition of Schubert's youth—it was written when he was only 18—revealed what might have been expected of it: unmistakable traces of Haydn and Beethoven; tentative, instinctively beautiful, but otherwise immature treatment of orchestral resources, and a freshness and strength of melody and harmony that promised in no uncertain terms what was realized in subsequent years. Mr. Barbirolli, as usual, infused the music with all its due in energy and vitality, if not with more.

The program continued with the contrasting Prelude and Liebestod from Wagner's "Tristan," followed by two Wolf songs with orchestral accompaniment, sung by Hulda Lashanska, the soprano soloist of the two preceding concerts. Strauss' tone poem, "Don Quixote," with Joseph Schuster and Zoltan Kurthy at the solo desks, concluded the afternoon.

S. P. P.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

NOV 2 3 1936

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give ~~the second~~ of its five Providence concerts for the 1936-37 season at the Metropolitan Theater in that city tomorrow night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

NOV 23 1936

WORDS AND MUSIC

Koussevitzky Tries Out New Symphony 'Movement'

His Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Tries a Little Number That Eschews Formulas

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

LEAVE it to the eternally inquiring Dr. Koussevitzky to sense the latest "movement" in his chosen art and to be the first to set forth its fruits to his Boston Symphony customers at Carnegie Hall. Accordingly, at the visiting orchestra's matinee concert on Saturday, the doctor placed a little number in the middle of an orthodox program (which included a Mozart and Sibelius Symphony and Strauss's "Don Juan") that is the offshoot of a hitherto obscure little group-ee in Paris who call themselves, challengingly, "La Jeune France."

"La Jeune France," composed of four members, is, apparently, the successor to the once revolutionary "Le Six." The newer organization has issued, in truly Gallic fashion, a "manifesto," in which it sets forth its aims and tendencies the most important of which "proposes the dissemination of works youthful, free, as far removed from revolutionary formulas as from academic formulas." In short, "The Four" eschew formulas, whether inspired by the right or the left—a beautiful ideal, and one which should result in the creation of youthful and untrammeled masterpieces. Yet, after listening to the sample which Dr. Koussevitzky tendered us on Saturday, a something called "The Forgotten Sacrifice," by Oliver Messiaen, I am forced to disclose the melancholy fact that in this piece at least "La Jeune France" has neglected to carry out its most important plank.

For Mr. Messiaen's Symphonic Meditation adheres to both of the formulas which the society affects to despise. Its form—a slow section, a fast interlude and a return to the slow section—follows one of the most ancient formulas of music. The harmonies are a mixture of the revolutionary and academic formulas. Emotionally it cleaves to the formula on which most up-to-date creations are contrived—the absence of true passion. It may be, however, that Mr. Messiaen's work was meant to crystallize, as an ever-present example, the kind of thing the group desires to avoid, and that the other three members of the club will any moment astonish the world with quite youthful and completely formulaless scores.

The Mozart symphony was one in A major (Koechel No. 201). The orchestra played it flawlessly and the conductor treated it, I thought, overgently. It is not, to be sure, as dramatic as the "Jupiter" or the "G minor." But it is hard to believe that Mozart was as consistently sweet in any large composition as Dr. Koussevitzky made him out to be. Perhaps what it needed was an infusion of exigent rhythm. The inevitable recurring pulse beat of natural rhythm would have lent strength to its gayety and charm. Yet I must admit that Dr. Koussevitzky's way of playing Mozart coincides with the popular conception of the personality and the music of that composer.

The performance in one week of two of Strauss's tone poems may indicate that this greatest of living masters is due for a comeback. The Bostonians fairly reveled in the arrogantly passionate proclamations of "Don Juan" and in its tender, moonlit interludes. For all its swagger it is a full-blooded score, boldly imaginative and utterly sincere. The wonder is that Strauss, so obviously an offshoot of Wagner, could, even in this early work, be himself.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
NEWS

NOV 2 3 1936

Charter Member Of Boston Symphony To Give Program

Greensboro, Nov. 23.—(AP) — Carl Behr, who said he is one of two living charter members of the Boston symphony orchestra and dean of the North Carolina Symphony orchestra, was busy today. He was arranging the program he will present tonight at his 83rd birthday party.

He didn't have time to arrange the program over the week-end because he was busy with another one—at the first Lutheran church Sunday morning in memory of his father, mother, and wife.

A student of the Heindle brothers who has played under the batons of Sir Arthur Sullivan, Johann Strauss, Arthur Nikisch and other famous conductors, Behr now plays the cello in the North Carolina Symphony orchestra which travels through the state as part of a program for enhanced musical appreciation.

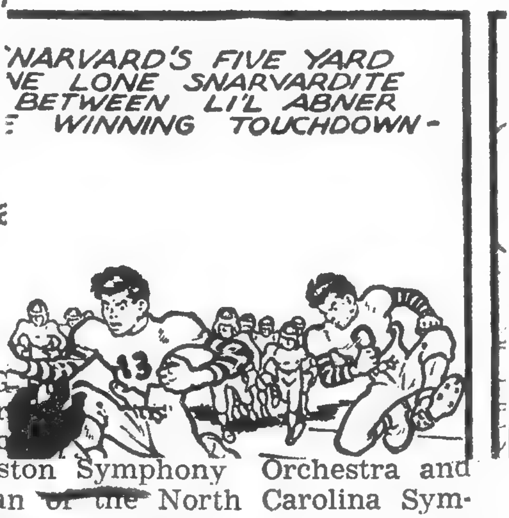
A native of Boston who came to Asheville 15 years ago for his health, the veteran musician moved here recently after participating in organization of numerous musical movements in the Carolinas.

Sunday morning at the church he played Handel's "Largo," Aldrich's "Love and Angels" and Braga's "Angel's Serenade." And then, at the dawn of his 83rd birthday, he said tonight's program would be "more elaborate."

NORFOLK, VA.
LEDGER DISPATCH

NOV 2 3 1936

THE NORFOLK LED



Ca

G

Car

two

Boston Symphony Orchestra and dean ~~of the~~ North Carolina Symphony Orchestra, was busy today. He was arranging the program he will present tonight at his 83d birthday party.

He didn't have time to arrange the program over the week-end because he was busy with another one—at the First Lutheran Church Sunday morning in memory of his father, mother and wife.

A student of the Heindle Brothers who has played under the batons of Sir Arthur Sullivan, Johann Strauss, Arthur Nikisch and other famous conductors, Behr now plays the 'cello in the North Carolina Symphony Orchestra, which travels through the State as part of a program for enhanced musical appreciation.

A native of Boston, who came to Asheville 15 years ago for his health, the veteran musician moved here recently after participating in organization of numerous musical movements in the Carolinas.

Sunday morning at the church he played Handel's "Largo," Aldrich's "Love and Angels" and Braga's "Angel's Serenade." And then, at

---

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

NOV 23 1936

SYMPHONY 'CELLIST MARKS 83rd BIRTHDAY

GREENSBORO, N. C., Nov. 23 (AP)—Carl Behr, who said he is one of two living charter members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and dean of the North Carolina Symphony Orchestra, was busy today. He was arranging the program he will present tonight at his 83rd birthday party.

He didn't have time to arrange the program over the weekend because he was busy with another one—at First Lutheran Church Sunday morning i memory of his father, mother and wife.

A student of the Heindle brothers who had played under the batons of Sir Arthur Sullivan, Johann Strauss, Arthur Nikisch and other famous conductors, Behr now plays the 'cello in the North Carolina Symphony Orchestra.

A native of Boston who came to Asheville 15 years ago for his health, the veteran musician moved here recently after participating in organization of numerous musical movements in the Carolinas.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER

NOV 23 1936

MUSIC

Sokoloff Leads Civic Symphony

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

Nicolai Sokoloff, national director of the WPA Federal Music Project and for many years conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, was guest conductor yesterday afternoon of the Civic Symphony Orchestra of this city, the concert being held in Irvine Auditorium of the University of Pennsylvania before a large audience, which was enthusiastic throughout the concert and recalled Dr. Sokoloff many times at the close.

The most ambitious number of the concert was the E minor symphony of Sibelius, that composer's initial effort at symphonic writing and still considered by many musicians to be among the very best of his eight symphonies. Dr. Sokoloff gave an excellent interpretation of the work, although it seemed as though a better selection might have been made, for the symphony is long and, to a certain extent, austere, if not abstruse, despite its many beauties. The slow movement, the finest of the symphony, was especially well done and was read by Dr. Sokoloff with sympathy and sensitivity of feeling. The scherzo with its vigorous theme and the trio, sharply contrasted as to musical content and treatment, was also given an excellent reading and the orchestra played at its best, not only in the symphony but throughout the entire program.

The most delightful work of the program, however, was "La Procession Nocturne" of Henri Rabaud, French composer and once conductor of the Boston Orchestra. Before playing it, Dr. Sokoloff gave the detailed "program" of the work, which was invaluable in an understanding of the music, for it is frankly program music throughout. It is an excellent composition and, so far as the writer knows, was given yesterday for the first time in Philadelphia, although not so announced on the program. It contains much beautiful music and in many respects is superior to Rabaud's E minor symphony, except for the scherzo of the latter work. The "Procession" has melody, some fine harmonization and is skillfully orchestrated, almost reaching the proportions of a tone poem.

Another work which had its first local performance was a minuet by Heinz Roemheld, an American composer now resident in Hollywood, being one movement from "A Small Suite for Solo Instruments." The work is pleasingly written and shows a good talent for composition, although not important musically. There were places which suggested that the orchestra used by Dr. Sokoloff yesterday was considerably larger than that which the composer had in mind.

The concert opened with a good performance of Dvorak's "Carneval" overture and closed with the vigorous if somewhat flamboyant "Marche Slav" of Tschaikovsky, the latter being received with especial enthusiasm.

Following the concert, Dr. Sokoloff was tendered a reception at the Philadelphia Art Alliance. A large number of persons attended, including several of the city's prominent musicians.

* * *

"Die Walkeure" Discussed

At the second of four lecture-recitals devoted to Wagner's "Nibelungen Ring" tetralogy, Guy Marriner, pianist, and director in charge of music at the Franklin Institute, spoke yesterday afternoon in the institute lecture hall on "Die Walkeure." The auditorium was filled to capacity, and so many were turned away that a repetition of the lecture-recital was announced for next Sunday afternoon.

Mr. Marriner summarized his remarks on "Das Rheingold" (the first in the four music-dramas which make up the "Ring") made at the first lecture, and then related the story of "Die Walkeure," playing the principal leading motives and passages from the music on the piano. A number of excellent phonographic recordings of important excerpts from the opera were also employed.

The interest of the lecture was further enhanced by the exhibition of lantern slides illustrating stage settings used in mounting the work at Bayreuth.

* * *

Song Program Given

A song recital was given last evening in the Philadelphia Music Center before a large and cordial audience, the program comprising a group of early French songs, and German lieder by Franz, Brahms, Hugo Wolf and Richard Strauss, in settings for soprano voice. According to the program, the name of recitalist was Julie Ansley who, in addition to singing commendably, prefixed each song with brief remarks on its textual content.

The recitalist showed excellent taste in her selection of songs, the list containing among its eighteen items such numbers as 'Brahms' "Die Nachtigall" and "Ewige Liebe"; Wolf's beautiful "Verborgenheit" and "Anakrean's Grab," and Strauss' "Morgen." Vocally, the recitalist revealed a voice pleasing in quality although better in some parts of its tonal range than others. Interpretatively, she did generally laudable work, and is to be congratulated for essaying a program which was musically worthwhile. Ruth Josephs, at the piano, proved a good accompanist. In the Strauss "Morgen" the accompaniment also included a violin obbligato, played by Harry Zumoff. Applause brought a repetition of "Le roi a fait battre tambour," one of the French group. W. E. S.

MECHANICSBURG, PA.
LOCAL NEWS
NOV 23 1936

POLISH PIANIST TO PLAY DEC. 1

Jan Smeterlin to be Soloist With Harrisburg Symphony in Concert

Jan Smeterlin, brilliant Polish pianist who will be the soloist with the Harrisburg Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening December 1, will play the second concerto of Chopin as his contribution to the program. The concerto which is formally listed as F. Minor, Opus 21, is known to have been preferred by the composer himself, and most often played by him.

This is Mr. Smeerlin's first appearance in Harrisburg, although this is his seventh consecutive season in the United States. He comes here with an international reputation, having played successfully in all the European countries He is welll known in Paris, London, the Hague, Berlin, Madrid and Vienna. Mr. Smeterlin made his American debut in New York seven years ago. Last February he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing in some numbers that he will play with the local organization.

Mr. Smeterlin has made a brilliant reputation as an interpreter of the works of Chopin. The artist's New York recital which will be given this coming Saturday afternoon in Town Hall will be devoted exclusively to the works of the Polish composer. In spite of his fame as a Chopin exponent Mr. Smeterlin has also won renown for his espiusa lof contemporary music. Ravel, Dukas and Albeniz owe something of their reputation to his sympathtic performance of their works.

The Chopin F Minor Concerto is styled on classic lines, and is modeled not only in firm but in general style on Hummel, a Mozart pupil who was the most brilliant virtuoso of his day. The work was composed in 1829, and its beautiful melodic passages of the second movement are said to have been inspired by his devotion at the time to a charming lady.

READING, PA.
TIMES
3 1936

Symphony Orchestra Reaches New Heights in Rajah Concert

WAGNER, Dvorak, Schubert, and von Weber were on the program with which the Reading Symphony orchestra opened its 1936-1937 season at the Rajah theatre yesterday afternoon. Vera Covert, lyric soprano, was the soloist. The audience was large.

Although Wagner devotees probably would be vigorous in their denials, Schubert won out over the others by two touchdowns and a field goal.

For the orchestra's playing of the Schubert symphony in B minor—commonly called the "Unfinished"—was as felicitous an expounding of musicianship as the men and women of the Reading Symphony orchestra ever have achieved. Dr. Hans Kindler, the conductor, avoided the two abysmal pitfalls that beset interpreters of the B minor—cloying sentimentality and cold intellectuality.

A Comparison

Through the infinite loveliness of the Schubert music Dr. Kindler led his men along the shrewd but narrow tightrope which requires absolute balance in order to avoid disaster. That he succeeded so well is a feat of no mean proportions. And incidentally, if you heard the Reading Symphony orchestra's interpretation of the "Unfinished" and have a better-than-ordinary memory for musical details, you might get considerable satisfaction from comparing the Kindler interpretation with that of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra, who recently have made a new phonographic recording of the symphony. It's the first new recording of the work, incidentally, for a number of years.

Wagner addicts got a large measure of their favorite fare from yesterday's concert. The orchestra played "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from the prologue to "Die Gotterdammerung" and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and the soloist, who appeared to please the audience immensely with a rich soprano voice that had great range and excellent quality of tone, sang the "Einsam in truben Tagen" aria from "Lohengrin."

The soloist also sang the "Ocean, thou mighty monster" aria from the von Weber opera "Oberon," and the orchestra opened the program with the Dvorak "Carneval" overture.

New High

Program notes revealed that the number of season subscriptions to the orchestra's concerts had achieved a new high this season and that a repetition of the children s concert played on November 7 would depend largely upon analysis of the probable income and expense of the orchestra's current season. The program notes, incidentally, which were added for the first time two seasons ago, are worth their weight, in gold, to the read-and-run type of concert-goer as well as to your dyed-in-the-wool patron who appreciates a few little intelectual jabs in the ribs to jog memoray.

The orchestra's next concert will find Chester Wittell, Reading pianist and composer, as the soloist, playing, for its premiere, his G minor concerto.—E. M. S.

Motion Picture Daily
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 2 1936

"Brigade" $8,300 New Haven Leader

NEW HAVEN, Nov. 24.—Opening to fine business on Armistice Day, with evening prices in effect all day, the eight-day run of "The Charge of the Light Brigade" at the Roger Sherman grossed $8,300, which was $3,600 over par.

"Craig's Wife" and "Two-Fisted Gentleman" at the College went $1,200 over the $2,800 mark.

Record crowds at the automobile show, a packed Boston Symphony Concert and the sudden drop in temperature affected grosses.

Total first run business was $24,600. Average is $19,300.

Estimated takings for the week ending Nov. 20:

"CRAIG'S WIFE" (Col.)
"TWO-FISTED GENTLEMAN" (Col.)
COLLEGE—(1,499), 25c-35c, 7 days. Gross: $4,000. (Average, $2,800)
"TWO IN A CROWD" (Univ.)
"ROSE BOWL" (Para.)
PARAMOUNT—(2,348), 35c-50c, 7 days. Gross: $4,800. (Average, $4,800)
"TARZAN ESCAPES" (M-G-M)
"UNDER YOUR SPELL" (20th-Fox)
POLI—(3,040), 35c-50c, 7 days. Gross: $7,500. (Average, $7,000)
"CHARGE OF THE LIGHT BRIGADE" (W. B.)
ROGER SHERMAN—(2,200), 35c-50c, 8 days. Gross: 8,300. (Average, $4,700)

TRENTON, N. J.
STATE GAZETTE
NOV 23 1936

CAMPUS INTEREST IN MUSIC BOOMS

Expanded Curriculum and Concert Series Boost Princeton Study

PRINCETON, Nov. 22.—Interest in music at Princeton University has reached a new high this year among students and faculty, with an expanded curriculum, a large teaching staff and an increased general support of the university concert series and Glee Club, it was revealed here yesterday by Professor Roy Dickinson Welch, head of the music department.

For 21 years chairman of the department of music at Smith College, Professor Welch was called to Princeton in the Fall of 1934 as visiting professor of music. At that time he organized two courses with a total enrollment of 36 undergraduates. Today 225 students are taking music here. Several new subjects have been added, and the teaching staff numbers five.

Among the additions to the music faculty this year is Roger H. Sessions, who has been engaged as lecturer in the freshman and sophomore harmony courses. Mr. Sessions is one of the most distinguished exponents of the modern school of composition in this country. His new violin concerto will be played by Albert Spaulding, with Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra next month.

Robert Hufstàder, formerly head of the department of music at the University of Buffalo, is also a new appointment this year. He will act as assistant professor of music and university organist, and in addition will direct the University Chapel choir.

Assistant to Professor Welch in teaching last year, James A. Giddings, '30, has been made an instructor this Fall and will also lead the University Glee Club. Edward Canby, who received his master's degree in music at Harvard University this year, completes the list of additions. He will be in charge of study periods, where phonograph records and scores are available to undergraduates for direct study.

One of the original courses, an introduction to the literature of music, is now open to sophomores and a few qualified freshmen, with about 150 undergraduates enrolled. Last year nine men took the course in elementary harmony, which requires some preliminary knowledge of the subject, while 24 men signed up this Fall. Among the additions to the curriculum is a sophomore course in advanced harmony and elementary counterpoint.

The university concert series includes nine programs for the 1936-37 season, featuring a performance of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Igor Strvinsky, on either February 18 or 19. Inaugurating a new policy of presenting more of its concerts in Princeton, the University Glee Club will sing here three times during the Winter.

QUINCY, MASS.
NEWS
NOV 24 1936

Boston Symphony In Book Sketches

"What I wouldn't give to be personally acquainted with one of the world's famous musical artists!" Who has not said that? Now comes a simple means of realizing the ambition—and not in respect to one musical celebrity, but more than a hundred

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony orchestra, which he conducts, are rated by authorities as either the greatest conductor and the greatest orchestra in the world, or as among the three greatest. Certainly that makes Koussevitsky and his men a group with whom acquaintanceship would be an enviable distinction.

And now anyone may feel on friendly footing with all of them simply by turning the pages of a very engaging book It contains sketches of Koussevitsky and his musicians made from life by a noted artist Gerome Brush. Each of the 108 members of the world-famous orchestra was sketched in action—the first time such a thing has been achieved with the Boston Symphony or any other great orchestra. With each portrait Mr. Brush also provides a word-sketch written by himself which gives intimate sidelights on the personality and career of each man

The book has been designed by a celebrated typographical designer, D. B Updike, and beautifully printed at the Merrymount Press, Boston. Yet despite all these distinctions, the volume costs but $1.50. The title is, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1936," and it may be ordered from Symphony hall, Boston

To South Shore music lovers this book should have particular appeal. Close-ups of musicians heard in this city are fascinating to see and read and hours can be spent turning the pages of one of the most informative yet entertaining books published

The biographical sketches are alphabetically arranged and Mr. Brush's charcoal drawings are an important feature If most of the musicians are Europeans by birth there are still a few who were born in Massachusetts and these make especially interesting reading.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST
2 4 1936

SYMPHONY'S FRIENDS

The Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now two thousand strong, is seeking recruits to its number. In other words, each and every one of us is invited, nay urged, to become a member of an organization composed of the socially and culturally elect, the annual dues to be set at our own figure. As a member of the Friends we may then help to sustain, even to make possible, the institution which most distinctively represents Boston to the world at large. Unfortunately, in the very nature of things, a great symphony orchestra cannot be wholly self-supporting. None ever has been.

Not only the thousands who regularly or occasionally attend its concerts or those who listen in when the orchestra is one the air, but every Bostonian or near-Bostonian jealous of the city's prestige might feel here a sense of obligation. Even a nominal sum paid yearly will discharge it. Save for the unpaid taxes on Symphony Hall, last year's budget has been balanced. It is understood that all contributions by the orchestra's "friends" will be applied to the costs of its operation.

FULTON, MO.
SUN GAZETTE
NOV 24 1936

BOSTON ORCHESTRA BUSY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is engaged upon one of the longest seasons ever played by an American orchestra. It has played every month since September, 1935, and will continue the record until August, 1937.

92.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER

NOV 23 1936

MUSIC

Sokoloff Leads Civic Symphony

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

Nicolai Sokoloff, national director of the WPA Federal Music Project and for many years conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, was guest conductor yesterday afternoon of the Civic Symphony Orchestra of this city, the concert being held in Irvine Auditorium of the University of Pennsylvania before a large audience, which was enthusiastic throughout the concert and recalled Dr. Sokoloff many times at the close.

The most ambitious number of the concert was the E minor symphony of Sibelius, that composer's initial effort at symphonic writing and still considered by many musicians to be among the very best of his eight symphonies. Dr. Sokoloff gave an excellent interpretation of the work, although it seemed as though a better selection might have been made, for the symphony is long and, to a certain extent, austere, if not abstruse, despite its many beauties. The slow movement, the finest of the symphony, was especially well done and was read by Dr. Sokoloff with sympathy and sensitivity of feeling. The scherzo with its vigorous theme and the trio, sharply contrasted as to musical content and treatment, was also given an excellent reading and the orchestra played at its best, not only in the symphony but throughout the entire program.

The most delightful work of the program, however, was "La Procession Nocturne" of Henri Rabaud, French composer and once conductor of the Boston Orchestra. Before playing it, Dr. Sokoloff gave the detailed "program" of the work, which was invaluable in an understanding of the music, for it is frankly program music throughout. It is an excellent composition and, so far as the writer knows, was given yesterday for the first time in Philadelphia, although not so announced on the program. It contains much beautiful music and in many respects is superior to Rabaud's E minor symphony, except for the scherzo of the latter work. The "Procession" has melody, some fine harmonization and is skillfully orchestrated, almost reaching the proportions of a tone poem.

Another work which had its first local performance was a minuet by Heinz Roemheld, an American composer now resident in Hollywood being one movement from "A Small Suite for Solo Instruments." The work is pleasingly written and shows a good talent for composition, although not important musically There were places which suggested that the orchestra used by Dr. Sokoloff yesterday was considerably larger than that which the composer had in mind.

The concert opened with a good performance of Dvorak's "Carneval" overture and closed with the vigorous if somewhat flamboyant "Marche Slav" of Tschaikovsky, the latter being received with especial enthusiasm.

Following the concert, Dr. Sokoloff was tendered a reception at the Philadelphia Art Alliance. A large number of persons attended, including several of the city's prominent musicians.

* * *

"Die Walkeure" Discussed

At the second of four lecture-recitals devoted to Wagner's "Nibelungen Ring" tetralogy, Guy Marriner, pianist, and director in charge of music at the Franklin Institute, spoke yesterday afternoon in the institute lecture hall on "Die Walkeure." The auditorium was filled to capacity, and so many were turned away that a repetition of the lecture-recital was announced for next Sunday afternoon.

Mr. Marriner summarized his remarks on "Das Rheingold" (the first in the four music-dramas which make up the "Ring") made at the first lecture, and then related the story of "Die Walkeure," playing the principal leading motives and passages from the music on the piano. A number of excellent phonographic recordings of important excerpts from the opera were also employed.

The interest of the lecture was further enhanced by the exhibition of lantern slides illustrating stage settings used in mounting the work at Bayreuth.

* * *

Song Program Given

A song recital was given last evening in the Philadelphia Music Center before a large and cordial audience, the program comprising a group of early French songs, and German lieder by Franz, Brahms, Hugo Wolf and Richard Strauss, in settings for soprano voice. According to the program, the name of recitalist was Julie Ansley who, in addition to singing commendably, prefixed each song with brief remarks on its textual content.

The recitalist showed excellent taste in her selection of songs, the list containing among its eighteen items such numbers as Brahms' "Die Nachtigall" and "Ewige Liebe"; Wolf's beautiful "Verborgenheit" and "Anakrean's Grab," and Strauss' "Morgen." Vocally, the recitalist revealed a voice pleasing in quality although better in some parts of its tonal range than others. Interpretatively, she did generally laudable work, and is to be congratulated for essaying a program which was musically worthwhile. Ruth Josephs, at the piano, proved a good accompanist. In the Strauss "Morgen" the accompaniment also included a violin obbligato, played by Harry Zumoff. Applause brought a repetition of "Le roi a fait battre tambour," one of the French group. W. E. S.

MECHANICSBURG, PA.
LOCAL NEWS
NOV 23 1936

POLISH PIANIST TO PLAY DEC. 1

Jan Smeterlin to be Soloist With Harrisburg Symphony in Concert

Jan Smeterlin, brilliant Polish pianist who will be the soloist with the Harrisburg Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening December 1, will play the second concerto of Chopin as his contribution to the program. The concerto which is formally listed as F. Minor, Opus 21, is known to have been preferred by the composer himself, and most often played by him.

This is Mr. Smeerlin's first appearance in Harrisburg, although this is his seventh consecutive season in the United States. He comes here with an international reputation, having played successfully in all the European countries He is welll known in Paris, London, the Hague, Berlin, Madrid and Vienna. Mr. Smeterlin made his American debut in New York seven years ago. Last February he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing in some numbers that he will play with the local organization.

Mr. Smeterlin has made a brilliant reputation as an interpreter of the works of Chopin. The artist's New York recital which will be given this coming Saturday afternoon in Town Hall will be devoted exclusively to the works of the Polish composer. In spite of his fame as a Chopin exponent Mr. Smeterlin has also won renown for his espiusa lof contemporary music. Ravel, Dukas and Albeniz owe something of their reputation to his sympathtic performance of their works.

The Chopin F Minor Concerto is styled on classic lines, and is modeled not only in firm but in general style on Hummel, a Mozart pupil who was the most brilliant virtuoso of his day. The work was composed in 1829, and its beautiful melodic passages of the second movement are said to have been inspired by his devotion at the time to a charming lady.

READING, PA.
TIMES

NOV 23 1936

Symphony Orchestra Reaches New Heights in Rajah Concert

WAGNER, Dvorak, Schubert, and von Weber were on the program with which the Reading Symphony orchestra opened its 1936-1937 season at the Rajah theatre yesterday afternoon. Vera Covert, lyric soprano, was the soloist. The audience was large.

Although Wagner devotees probably would be vigorous in their denials, Schubert won out over the others by two touchdowns and a field goal.

For the orchestra's playing of the Schubert symphony in B minor—commonly called the "Unfinished"—was as felicitous an expounding of musicianship as the men and women of the Reading Symphony orchestra ever have achieved. Dr. Hans Kindler, the conductor, avoided the two abysmal pitfalls that beset interpreters of the B minor—cloying sentimentality and cold intellectuality.

A Comparison

Through the infinite loveliness of the Schubert music Dr. Kindler led his men along the shrewd but narrow tightrope which requires absolute balance in order to avoid disaster. That he succeeded so well is a feat of no mean proportions. And incidentally, if you heard the Reading Symphony orchestra's interpretation of the "Unfinished" and have a better-than-ordinary memory for musical details, you might get considerable satisfaction from comparing the Kindler interpretation with that of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra, who recently have made a new phonographic recording of the symphony. It's the first new recording of the work, incidentally, for a number of years.

Wagner addicts got a large measure of their favorite fare from yesterday's concert. The orchestra played "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from the prologue to "Die Gotterdammerung" and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and the soloist, who appeared to please the audience immensely with a rich soprano voice that had great range and excellent quality of tone, sang the "Einsam in truben Tagen" aria from "Lohengrin."

The soloist also sang the "Ocean, thou mighty monster" aria from the von Weber opera "Oberon," and the orchestra opened the program with the Dvorak "Carneval" overture.

New High

Program notes revealed that the number of season subscriptions to the orchestra's concerts had achieved a new high this season and that a repetition of the children's concert played on November 7 would depend largely upon analysis of the probable income and expense of the orchestra's current season. The program notes, incidentally, which were added for the first time two seasons ago, are worth their weight, in gold, to the read-and-run type of concert-goer as well as to your dyed-in-the-wool patron who appreciates a few little intelectual jabs in the ribs to jog memoray.

The orchestra's next concert will find Chester Wittell, Reading pianist and composer, as the soloist, playing, for its premiere, his G minor concerto.—E. M. S.

Motion Picture Daily
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 25 1936

"Brigade" $8,300 New Haven Leader

NEW HAVEN, Nov. 24.—Opening to fine business on Armistice Day, with evening prices in effect all day, the eight-day run of "The Charge of the Light Brigade" at the Roger Sherman grossed $8,300, which was $3,600 over par.

"Craig's Wife" and "Two-Fisted Gentleman" at the College went $1,200 over the $2,800 mark.

Record crowds at the automobile show, a packed Boston Symphony Concert and the sudden drop in temperature affected grosses.

Total first run business was $24,600. Average is $19,300.

Estimated takings for the week ending Nov. 20:

"CRAIG'S WIFE" (Col.)
"TWO-FISTED GENTLEMAN" (Col.)
COLLEGE—(1,499), 25c-35c, 7 days. Gross: $4,000. (Average, $2,800)

"TWO IN A CROWD" (Univ.)
"ROSE BOWL" (Para.)
PARAMOUNT—(2,348), 35c-50c, 7 days. Gross: $4,800. (Average, $4,800)

"TARZAN ESCAPES" (M-G-M)
"UNDER YOUR SPELL" (20th-Fox)
POLI—(3,040), 35c-50c, 7 days. Gross: $7,500. (Average, $7,000)

"CHARGE OF THE LIGHT BRIGADE" (W. B.)
ROGER SHERMAN—(2,200), 35c-50c, 8 days. Gross: 8,300. (Average, $4,700)

TRENTON, N. J.
STATE GAZETTE

NOV 23 1936

CAMPUS INTEREST IN MUSIC BOOMS

Expanded Curriculum and Concert Series Boost Princeton Study

PRINCETON, Nov. 22.—Interest in music at Princeton University has reached a new high this year among students and faculty, with an expanded curriculum, a large teaching staff and an increased general support of the university concert series and Glee Club, it was revealed here yesterday by Professor Roy Dickinson Welch, head of the music department.

For 21 years chairman of the department of music at Smith College, Professor Welch was called to Princeton in the Fall of 1934 as visiting professor of music. At that time he organized two courses with a total enrollment of 36 undergraduates. Today 225 students are taking music here. Several new subjects have been added, and the teaching staff numbers five.

Among the additions to the music faculty this year is Roger H. Sessions, who has been engaged as lecturer in the freshman and sophomore harmony courses. Mr. Sessions is one of the most distinguished exponents of the modern school of composition in this country. His new violin concerto will be played by Albert Spaulding, with Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra next month.

Robert Hufstader, formerly head of the department of music at the University of Buffalo, is also a new appointment this year. He will act as assistant professor of music and university organist, and in addition will direct the University Chapel choir.

Assistant to Professor Welch in teaching last year, James A. Giddings, '30, has been made an instructor this Fall and will also lead the University Glee Club. Edward Canby, who received his master's degree in music at Harvard University this year, completes the list of additions. He will be in charge of study periods, where phonograph records and scores are available to undergraduates for direct study.

One of the original courses, an introduction to the literature of music, is now open to sophomores and a few qualified freshmen, with about 150 undergraduates enrolled. Last year nine men took the course in elementary harmony, which requires some preliminary knowledge of the subject, while 24 men signed up this Fall. Among the additions to the curriculum is a sophomore course in advanced harmony and elementary counterpoint.

The university concert series includes nine programs for the 1936-37 season, featuring a performance of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Igor Strvinsky, on either February 18 or 19. Inaugurating a new policy of presenting more of its concerts in Princeton, the University Glee Club will sing here three times during the Winter.

QUINCY, MASS.
NEWS

NOV 24 1936

Boston Symphony In Book Sketches

"What I wouldn't give to be personally acquainted with one of the world's famous musical artists!" Who has not said that? Now comes a simple means of realizing the ambition—and not in respect to one musical celebrity, but more than a hundred.

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony orchestra, which he conducts, are rated by authorities as either the greatest conductor and the greatest orchestra in the world, or as among the three greatest. Certainly that makes Kousseyitsky and his men a group with whom acquaintanceship would be an enviable distinction.

And now anyone may feel on friendly footing with all of them simply by turning the pages of a very engaging book. It contains sketches of Koussevitsky and his musicians made from life by a noted artist, Gerome Brush. Each of the 108 members of the world-famous orchestra was sketched in action—the first time such a thing has been achieved with the Boston Symphony or any other great orchestra. With each portrait Mr. Brush also provides a word-sketch written by himself, which gives intimate sidelights on the personality and career of each man.

The book has been designed by a celebrated typographical designer, D. B. Updike, and beautifully printed at the Merrymount Press, Boston. Yet, despite all these distinctions, the volume costs but $1.50. The title is, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1936," and it may be ordered from Symphony hall, Boston.

To South Shore music lovers this book should have particular appeal. Close-ups of musicians heard in this city are fascinating to see and read, and hours can be spent turning the pages of one of the most informative yet entertaining books published.

The biographical sketches are alphabetically arranged and Mr. Brush's charcoal drawings are an important feature. If most of the musicians are Europeans by birth there are still a few who were born in Massachusetts, and these make especially interesting reading.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

NOV 24 1936

SYMPHONY'S FRIENDS

The Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now two thousand strong, is seeking recruits to its number. In other words, each and every one of us is invited, nay urged, to become a member of an organization composed of the socially and culturally elect, the annual dues to be set at our own figure. As a member of the Friends we may then help to sustain, even to make possible, the institution which most distinctively represents Boston to the world at large. Unfortunately, in the very nature of things, a great symphony orchestra cannot be wholly self-supporting. None ever has been.

Not only the thousands who regularly or occasionally attend its concerts or those who listen in when the orchestra is one the air, but every Bostonian or near-Bostonian jealous of the city's prestige might feel here a sense of obligation. Even a nominal sum paid yearly will discharge it. Save for the unpaid taxes on Symphony Hall, last year's budget has been balanced. It is understood that all contributions by the orchestra's "friends" will be applied to the costs of its operation.

FULTON, MO.
SUN GAZETTE
NOV 24 1936

BOSTON ORCHESTRA BUSY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is engaged upon one of the longest seasons ever played by an American orchestra. It has played every month since September, 1935, and will continue the record until August, 1937.

93.

HARRISBURG, PA.
PATRIOT

NOV 23 1936

POLISH PIANIST TO PLAY HERE DEC. 1

Jan Smeterlin to Be Soloist With Symphony; In America for Seventh Tour

Jan Smeterlin, brilliant Polish pianist who will be the soloist with the Harrisburg Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening, December 1, will play the second concerto of Chopin as his contribution to the program. The concerto which is formally listed as F. Minor, Opus 21, is known to have been preferred by the composer himself, and most often played by him.

This is Mr. Smeterlin's first appearance in Harrisburg, although this is his seventh consecutive season in the United States. He comes here with an international reputation, having played successfully in all the European countries. He is well known in Paris, London, the Hague, Berlin, Madrid, and Vienna. Mr. Smeterlin made his American debut in New York seven years ago. Last February he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing ~~the same~~ number that he will play with the local organization.

Mr. Smeterlin has made a brilliant reputation as an interpreter of the works of Chopin. The artist's New York recital which will be given this coming Saturday afternoon in Town Hall will be devoted exclusively to the works of the Polish composer. In spite of his fame as a Chopin exponent Mr. Smeterlin has also won renown for his espousal of contemporary music. Ravel, Dukas, and Albeniz owe something of their reputation to his sympathetic performance of their works.

The Chopin F Minor Concerto is styled on classic lines, and is modeled not only in form but in general style on Hummel, a Mozart pupil who was the most brilliant virtuoso of his day. The work was composed in 1829, and its beautiful melodic passages of the second movement are said to have been inspired by his devotion at the time to a charming lady.

ERLIN

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES Nov. 25/36

Boston Orchestra in Second Concert

Albert Spalding Hailed as Soloist with Symphony Players.

With a noted and brilliant American violinist as soloist and with a program which included at least one number not familiar to the auditors, the Boston Symphony orchestra played the second of its Providence series of concerts last evening at the Metropolitan Theatre. There was a large audience of enthusiasts to brave weather conditions not usually encountered so early in the season, and the concert was in every respect successful and up to the standard of the famous orchestra's offerings. The soloist was Albert Spalding.

An added change in the usual order of events was the selection of a new conductor—new to the Providence concerts, in the absence of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who regularly directs these programs. The baton was held by Richard Burgin for the evening. Mr. Burgin, concert-master of the orchestra and a violinist of eminent ability, conducted with vigor and marked enthusiasm which was quite evidently shared by all the players of the noted organization. He was given an ovation at the close of the opening number and again at the end of the concert.

The symphony was Kalinnikov's first, in G minor, a work abounding in brilliant passages and outstanding melodies with many of the characteristics of the Russian composers whose works are better known. Mr. Burgin gave it a sympathetic and lively reading.

The principal interest of the evening perhaps was centered in the solo work of Mr. Spalding. A brilliant, able artist, one who has often been heard by a majority of last night's audience, he has now reached his maturity and his performance was a finished exhibition of the violinist's art. The Mozart concerto which he played is a work admirably suited to a real virtuoso such as he is. He played it with evident relish, producing beautiful effects to which the audience responded with repeated outbursts of applause at the close, demanding his repeated return to acknowledge the plaudits. The program in full follows:

"Toccato in C Major," Bach; "Concerto for Violin in D Major," Mozart; "Symphony in G Minor," Kalinnikov, in four movements.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
Commercial Appeal

NOV 24 1936

MEMPHIAN RECALLS WORK UNDER STRAUSS

Jacob Bloom Played for Renowned Composer

WAS AWED BY CONDUCTING

Aged Violinist Will Be Unable to Attend "The Great Waltz" Although Intensely Interested

When Johann Strauss, the younger, was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra 64 years ago, a young violinist by the name of Jacob Bloom played in the first violin section.

Mr. Bloom, now 94 years of age and a resident of Memphis for 30 years, is particularly interested in the fact that "The Great Waltz," depicting the life of Maestro Strauss and his father, will be performed at Ellis Auditorium Nov. 30-Dec. 1. The venerable musician will not be able to attend a performance, however, due to his advanced age and failing sight.

It was in the summer of 1872 that a music festival was held in Boston and Johann Strauss, the younger, was invited to serve as guest conductor for a series of concerts.

One of Three Honored

Three selected musicians from the country's outstanding conservatories were chosen to augment the Boston Symphony, enlarging it to 800 pieces. Mr. Bloom was one of the trio representing the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music where he ~~served~~ as director of the violin department for 20 years.

In the apartment at the Parkview Hotel which he shares with his wife, 10 years his junior, Mr. Bloom yesterday recalled his impressions of the master.

"It was a pleasure just to look at Herr Strauss," he said. "He conducted with his whole body, playing his violin and directing alternately—often at the same time. He had a friendly, contagious smile for everyone, in public and private. The Austrians loved him even better than their emperor."

Mr. Bloom was born near Stuttgart-on-the-Rhine, not far from Vienna, home of the Strausses.

It was shortly after the turn of the century that Mr. Bloom was brought to Memphis in concert by the old Wagner Club and later by the Beethoven Club. He was so favorably impressed by the city that he returned to make Memphis his home. A relative, Mrs. William Katzenberger, was one of the charter members of the Nineteenth Century Club.

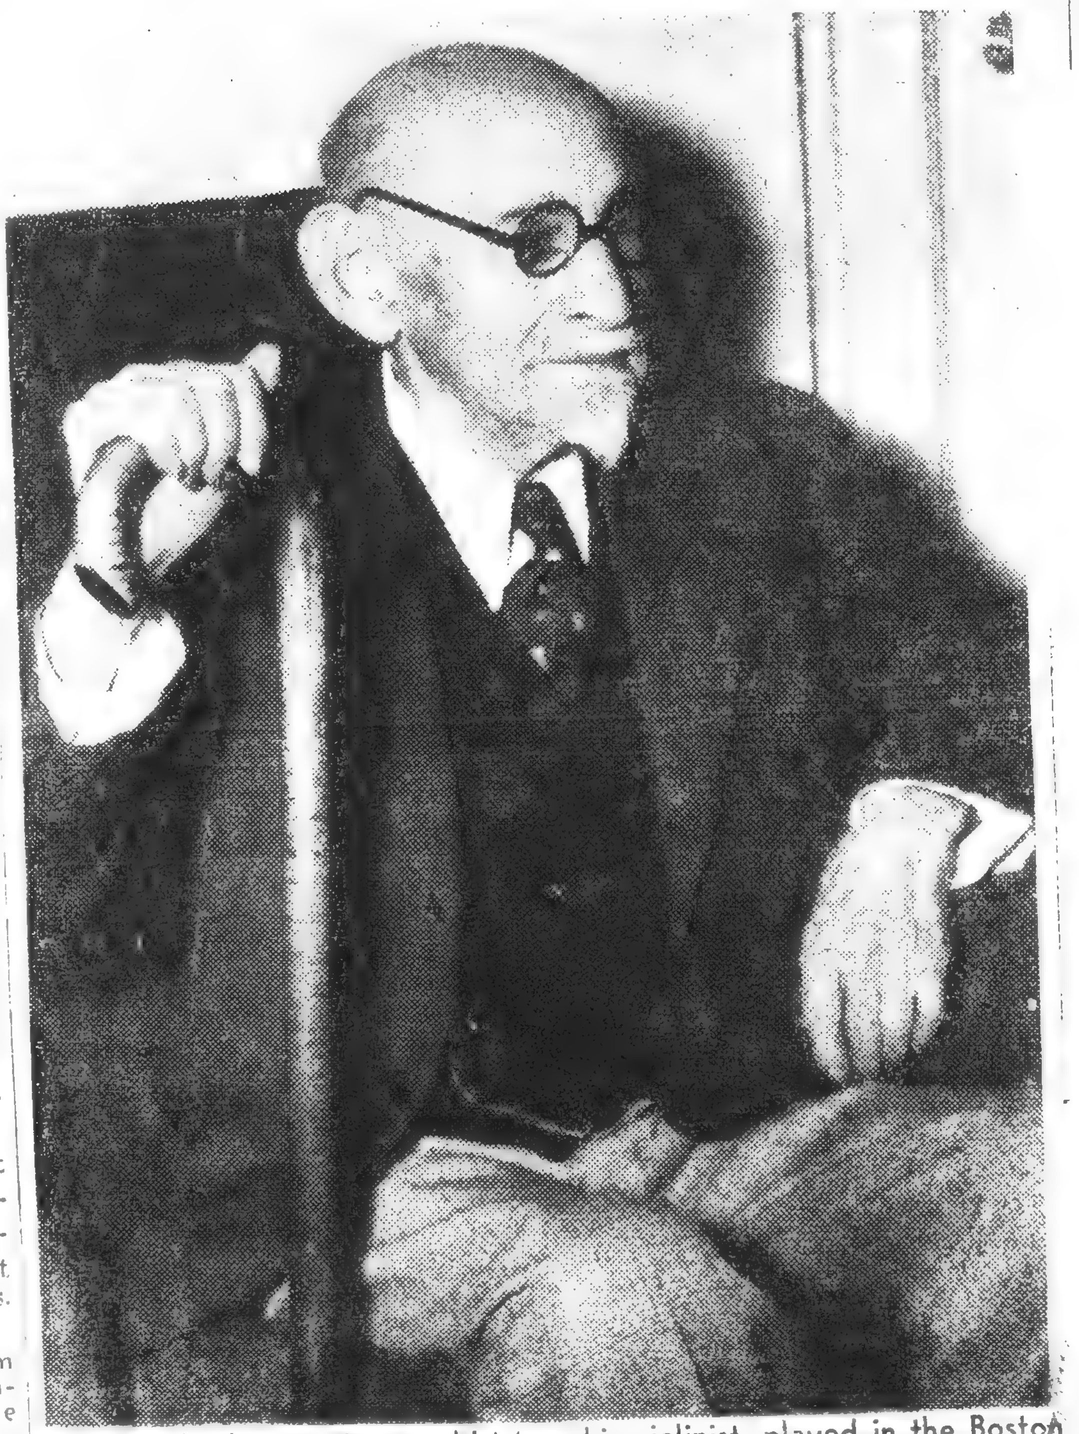
Organized Symphony

Mr. Bloom organized and for several years conducted the old Memphis Symphony Orchestra and he taught some of the most prominent violinists in the Mid-South.

Mr. Bloom deplores the absence of a permanent symphony orchestra in Memphis. "We have plenty of talent here," he said. "Many smaller cities support a symphony. Why can't we?"

Mrs. Elsa Block, his daughter, will attend "The Great Waltz," and give her parents an account of it. "That will be next best thing to going myself," said Mr. Bloom a little sadly. "I know it will be a magnificent production if it is what it is represented to be by my friends who have seen it in other cities."

Played For Strauss



Jacob Bloom, 94-year-old Memphis violinist, played in the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Johann Strauss was guest conductor 64 years ago. —Staff Photo by Day

---

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

NOV 25 1936

MUS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its second appearance of the season, here, last night in the Metropolitan theatre. The occasion marked the first scheduled time in Providence that Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor, has directed in place of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The soloist was Albert Spalding, of Chicago, celebrated violinist. Burgin applied himself ardently to the task and fulfilled his assignment with a short, satisfying program.

For an ambitious opening the conductor had Johann Sebastian Bach's Organ toccata and fugue in C major, as scored for full orchestra by Leo Weiner, Hungarian composer. A three-section work, it began forcefully and had a massive brilliance to which the orchestra readily warmed. The fugal entries were decidedly clear and there was a brief bit of splendid percussion work in the second movement.

Spalding, accompanied by a reduced orchestra, offered Mozart's Concerto in D major. It is not overstating to say he was, in a word, magnificent. He interpreted Mozart with the clarity so essential to all his compositions. The quick passages were rythmical and even the softest tones were full and voluminous. A cadenza gave him ample opportunity to display his technique.

After a lapse of 15 years, the orchestra revived the First Symphony in G minor by Basil Kalinnikov, which it presented as its major selection last night and which Boston audiences are to hear later this week. Kalinnikov and Dr. Koussevitzky were classmates in Moscow 40 years ago.

Typically Slavic in theme, the symphony has a sustaining melody and a pronounced rhythm. It possesses plenty of color and a particularly delicate second movement, andante commodamente, with captivating fifths played by the harps and several wind instruments. The

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

NOV 24 1936

Advertising

NBC to Arrange Exchange of Radio Programs with South America.

By WILLIAM BRENNAN

The National Broadcasting Co. announces plans to broadcast from the United States into South and Central America in competition with European programs now dominating the air there.

John F. Royal, NBC vice president in charge of programs, has left for an extensive tour of these Latin-American countries to arrange for exchanges of broadcasts between the two continents.

"Germany, England and other European countries have been building programs for South America for several years," Mr. Royal said. "The United States, to which our neighbors to the south naturally look for a mutual exchange of entertainment and ideas, has stood by and let Europe capture the attention of South American listeners. Now the National Broadcasting Co. is going out to take its rightful place on American radio dials below the Rio Grande.

Programs will be especially designed for consumption on the southern continent. Spanish-speaking announcers will be used as well as English. Among suggested material to broadcast were the Metropolitan Opera, Boston Symphony Orchestra, championship prize fights, football games and educational features.

* * *

ONEONTA, N. Y.
STAR Nov 2[illegible]/36

ppears in N. Y. Recital

Eric Arnio, pianist of this city, made his initial appearance before a New York audience Sunday, when he gave a recital at the Fifth Avenue auditorium in New York city jointly with Ludwig Juht, distinguished contra bass soloist of the Boston Symphony orchestra and Daniel Manso, Spanish violinist, and former concert master of the New York Philharmonic orchestra.

Mr. Arnio, playing before a capacity audience of about 1,000, devoted his program to compositions of Brahms, Chopin and Rubinstein. The audience applauded his performance with great warmth.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

93.

HARRISBURG, PA.
PATRIOT

NOV 23 1936

POLISH PIANIST TO PLAY HERE DEC. 1

Jan Smeterlin to Be Soloist With Symphony; In America for Seventh Tour

Jan Smeterlin, brilliant Polish pianist who will be the soloist with the Harrisburg Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening, December 1, will play the second concerto of Chopin as his contribution to the program. The concerto which is formally listed as F. Minor, Opus 21, is known to have been preferred by the composer himself, and most often played by him.

This is Mr. Smeterlin's first appearance in Harrisburg, although this is his seventh consecutive season in the United States. He comes here with an international reputation, having played successfully in all the European countries. He is well known in Paris, London, the Hague, Berlin, Madrid, and Vienna. Mr. Smeterlin made his American debut in New York seven years ago. Last February he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing ~~the same~~ number that he will play with the local organization.

Mr. Smeterlin has made a brilliant reputation as an interpreter of the works of Chopin. The artist's New York recital which will be given this coming Saturday afternoon in Town Hall will be devoted exclusively to the works of the Polish composer. In spite of his fame as a Chopin exponent Mr. Smeterlin has also won renown for his espousal of contemporary music. Ravel, Dukas, and Albeniz owe something of their reputation to his sympathetic performance of their works.

The Chopin F Minor Concerto is styled on classic lines, and is modeled not only in form but in general style on Hummel, a Mozart pupil who was the most brilliant virtuoso of his day. The work was composed in 1829, and its beautiful melodic passages of the second movement are said to have been inspired by his devotion at the time to a charming lady.

J ERLIN

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
Nov TIMES 25/36

Boston Orchestra in Second Concert

Albert Spalding Hailed as Soloist with Symphony Players.

With a noted and brilliant American violinist as soloist and with a program which included at least one number not familiar to the auditors, the Boston Symphony orchestra played the second of its Providence series of concerts last evening at the Metropolitan Theatre. There was a large audience of enthusiasts to brave weather conditions not usually encountered so early in the season, and the concert was in every respect successful and up to the standard of the famous orchestra's offerings. The soloist was Albert Spalding.

An added change in the usual order of events was the selection of a new conductor—new to the Providence concerts, in the absence of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who regularly directs these programs. The baton was held by Richard Burgin for the evening. Mr. Burgin, concert-master of the orchestra and a violinist of eminent ability, conducted with vigor and marked enthusiasm which was quite evidently shared by all the players of the noted organization. He was given an ovation at the close of the opening number and again at the end of the concert.

The symphony was Kalinnikov's first, in G minor, a work abounding in brilliant passages and outstanding melodies with many of the characteristics of the Russian composers whose works are better known. Mr. Burgin gave it a sympathetic and lively reading.

The principal interest of the evening perhaps was centered in the solo work of Mr. Spalding. A brilliant, able artist, one who has often been heard by a majority of last night's audience, he has now reached his maturity and his performance was a finished exhibition of the violinist's art. The Mozart concerto which he played is a work admirably suited to a real virtuoso such as he is. He played it with evident relish, producing beautiful effects to which the audience responded with repeated outbursts of applause at the close, demanding his repeated return to acknowledge the plaudits. The program in full follows:

"Toccato in C Major," Bach; "Concerto for Violin in D Major," Mozart; "Symphony in G Minor," Kalinnikov, in four movements.

MEMF
Commercia l

NOV 24 1936

MEMPHIAN RECALLS WORK UNDER STRAUSS

Jacob Bloom Played for Renowned Composer

WAS AWED BY CONDUCTING

Aged Violinist Will Be Unable to Attend "The Great Waltz" Although Intensely Interested

Played For Strauss

Jacob Bloom, 94-year-old Memphis violinist, played in the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Johann Strauss was guest conductor 64 years ago.
—Staff Photo by Day

When Johann Strauss, the younger, was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra 64 years ago, a young violinist by the name of Jacob Bloom played in the first violin section.

Mr. Bloom, now 94 years of age and a resident of Memphis for 30 years, is particularly interested in the fact that "The Great Waltz," depicting the life of Maestro Strauss and his father, will be performed at Ellis Auditorium Nov. 30-Dec. 1. The venerable musician will not be able to attend a performance, however, due to his advanced age and failing sight.

It was in the summer of 1872 that a music festival was held in Boston and Johann Strauss, the younger, was invited to serve as guest conductor for a series of concerts.

One of Three Honored

Three selected musicians from the country's outstanding conservatories were chosen to augment the Boston Symphony, enlarging it to 800 pieces. Mr. Bloom was one of the trio representing the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music where he ~~served~~ as director of the violin department for 20 years.

In the apartment at the Parkview Hotel which he shares with his wife, 10 years his junior, Mr. Bloom yesterday recalled his impressions of the master.

"It was a pleasure just to look at Herr Strauss," he said. "He conducted with his whole body, playing his violin and directing alternately—often at the same time. He had a friendly, contagious smile for everyone, in public and private. The Austrians loved him even better than their emperor."

Mr. Bloom was born near Stuttgart-on-the-Rhine, not far from Vienna, home of the Strausses.

It was shortly after the turn of the century that Mr. Bloom was brought to Memphis in concert by the old Wagner Club and later by the Beethoven Club. He was so favorably impressed by the city that he returned to make Memphis his home. A relative, Mrs. William Katzenberger, was one of the charter members of the Nineteenth Century Club.

Organized Symphony

Mr. Bloom organized and for several years conducted the old Memphis Symphony Orchestra and he taught some of the most prominent violinists in the Mid-South.

Mr. Bloom deplores the absence of a permanent symphony orchestra in Memphis. "We have plenty of talent here," he said. "Many smaller cities support a symphony. Why can't we?"

Mrs. Elsa Block, his daughter, will attend "The Great Waltz," and give her parents an account of it. "That will be next best thing to going myself," said Mr. Bloom a little sadly. "I know it will be a magnificent production if it is what it is represented to be by my friends who have seen it in other cities."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

NOV 25 1936

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its second appearance of the season, here, last night in the Metropolitan theatre. The occasion marked the first scheduled time in Providence that Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor, has directed in place of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The soloist was Albert Spalding, of Chicago, celebrated violinist. Burgin applied himself ardently to the task and fulfilled his assignment with a short, satisfying program.

For an ambitious opening the conductor had Johann Sebastian Bach's Organ toccata and fugue in C major, as scored for full orchestra by Leo Weiner, Hungarian composer. A three-section work, it began forcefully and had a massive brilliance to which the orchestra readily warmed. The fugal entries were decidedly clear and there was a brief bit of splendid percussion work in the second movement.

Spalding, accompanied by a reduced orchestra, offered Mozart's Concerto in D major. It is not overstating to say he was, in a word, magnificent. He interpreted Mozart with the clarity so essential to all his compositions. The quick passages were rythmical and even the softest tones were full and voluminous. A cadenza gave him ample opportunity to display his technique.

After a lapse of 15 years, the orchestra revived the First Symphony in G minor by Basil Kalinnikov, which it presented as its major selection last night and which Boston audiences are to hear later this week. Kalinnikov and Dr. Koussevitzky were classmates in Moscow 40 years ago.

Typically Slavic in theme, the symphony has a sustaining melody and a pronounced rhythm. It possesses plenty of color and a particularly delicate second movement, andante commodamente, with captivating fifths played by the harps and several wind instruments. The scherzo afforded the brasses some difficult passages and early in the finale the strings turned in a grand upward scale followed by swift and accentuated reiteration of former themes, all building to a sweeping finish the two continents.

W. W. Jr.

---

"Germany, England and other European countries have been building programs for South America for several years," Mr. Royal said. "The United States, to which our neighbors to the south naturally look for a mutual exchange of entertainment and ideas, has stood by and let Europe capture the attention of South American listeners. Now the National Broadcasting Co. is going out to take its rightful place on American radio dials below the Rio Grande.

Programs will be especially designed for consumption on the southern continent. Spanish-speaking announcers will be used as well as English. Among suggested material to broadcast were the Metropolitan Opera, Boston Symphony Orchestra, championship prize fights, football games and educational features.

* * *

ONEONTA, N. Y.
STAR

ppears in N. Y. Recital

Er Arnio, pianist of this city, made his initial appearance before a New York audience Sunday, when he gave a recital at the Fifth Avenue auditorium in New York city jointly with Ludwig Juht, distinguished contra bass soloist of the Boston Symphony orchestra and Daniel Manso, Spanish violinist, and former concert master of the New York Philharmonic orchestra.

Mr. Arnio, playing before a capacity audience of about 1,000, devoted his program to compositions of Brahms, Chopin and Rubinstein. The audience applauded his performance with great warmth.

94.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 25 1936

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters May Be Addressed at This Office.

A number of the members of St. Anne's choir will assist in the vesper service to be given next Sunday at 5 p. m. in Christ church, Fitchburg, where William G. Heller is now organist and choir director. It is one of the services in the so-called Crocker series, provided for from time to time by the generosity of a family there which has taken great interest in music. This time it will be notable because an ensemble of 10 skilled instrumentalists from the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Nicolas Slonimsky will share in the program.

Besides assisting in the accompaniment of some of the choral numbers, this group will play several instrumental numbers, some of which will be supplemented by the organ. The list includes the first movement of the Unfinished Symphony of Schubert; Prelude and Fugue, Bach; Largo, Handel; Overture "Fingal's Cave" Mendelssohn; string quartet, Andante Cantabile, Tschaikowsky; an Allegro and Adagietto, Bizet; Carillon, Ave Maria, Bach-Gounod.

The processional and recessional of the choir will be impressive. The Hymns for these will be "For the Beauty of the Skies" and "I Heard a Sound of Voices." The Introit will be Stoughton's "God Is a Spirit." The choir of 80 voices will also be heard in the Pax Dei of Thoman.

It is understood that a number of Lowell people are planning to attend the service.

An American Composer.

It was pleasant the other day to receive a friendly note from Samuel Richard Gaines, with a reminder of a meeting here sometime ago when one of his compositions was sung by the Glee Club of the Teachers college under the direction of Miss Inez Field Damon. He tells me that of late he has been devoting himself chiefly to composition doing much of his work in his quiet studio in Newbury street, Boston, although he lives in Wellesley Hills. Some of his more recent compositions, by the way, are to be included in a program to be given later in the season before the Middlesex Women's Club by Eleanor Steele and Hall Clovis. I am reminded to reserve his comment on these until nearer the time for the appearance of the singers here.

For the present it is sufficient to say that the Gaines compositions in the form of choral music, anthems, cantatas, operettas, and instrumental numbers have increased to a point which warranted his issuance of a special personal catalog of several pages.

Samuel Richard Gaines was born in Detroit, Mich., of Welsh-English parents, beginning his musical studies at the age of 14. His first position as organist was in Saginaw. Later he taught and conducted choral organizations in Detroit. In 1905 he was called to the old Shawmut church in Boston, since which he has lived in that vicinity. He has won a number of international prizes for composition and leading publishers issue his works. He is a member of the American Composers Society.

Discerning Praise.

The report is that the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie hall, New York, have been sold out for the season. The opening concerts of the beautiful quality of the string section of the orchestra. There was no hesitation in rating the orchestra as one of the finest in the world today. And the best of the New York critics take their responsibilities seriously. It was a tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky that he was able to [redacted] an impression, among other numbers, with a symphony of old Papa Haydn. But his interpretation clearly appealed to those who have possibly become surfeited with the stringencies of more modern musical fare. At any rate it was evident that that the old master did not suffer so much as might have been suspected by comparison with the symphony of Sibelius, which was given a thrilling performance.

These paeans of praise, hopefully, will lend force to the appeal for a larger membership in the organization known as "The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra" and for a more widely distributed support of the orchestra as an asset which Boston cannot afford to neglect.

Lowell people who enjoyed the open-air concerts on the Boston Esplanade during the summer under the direction of Arthur Fiedler may be interested to know that with the help of its friends the budget has been balanced and something remains on the right side of the ledger.

Tuesday night in Greensboro, N. C., Carl Behr, one of the charter members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a program which marked his 84th birthday anniversary. He now plays 'cello in the North Carolina Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Programs.

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct the programs on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week, in order that Dr. Koussevitzky may have a brief respite. His program includes Leo Weiner's transcription of the Bach organ toccata in C major; Hindemith's "Mathis der Maier" and the First Symphony in G minor by Kalinikoff.

On Monday evening next the second of the supplementary concerts will be conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky. The program will include the Mozart Symphony in C major; the Second Piano Concerto of Leo Sowerby with Joseph Brinkman of Ann Arbor, Mich., as the soloist; the Cesar Franck Symphony, recently played in the regular series.

Next Tuesday evening in Jordan hall Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Symphony Orchestra, with Bernard Zighera at the piano will give a notable program including a Schubert Sonata and a Respighi number that have not been hitherto played in Boston, so far as the records show.

On Wednesday of next week the Morning Musicale at the Statler will bring to Boston Lauritz Melchior, well liked tenor of the German wing of the Metropolitan Opera.

At the Boston Opera House for the rest of this week with matinees today and Saturday, the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo will continue its brief engagement there.

Mme. Schumann-Heink.

The death of Mme. Schumann-Heink moved W. J. Henderson of the New York Sun to reminiscences of her career in New York. He is authority for the statement that her last appearance on the operatic

---

WINSTON SALEM, N. C.
JOURNAL

NOV 27 1936

Zimbalist Will Come Here On 25th Anniversary Tour

Preparations were rapidly being completed here yesterday for the appearance of the renowned violinist, Efrem Zimbalist, under Civic Music Association auspices at Reynolds Memorial Auditorium, December 14.

Zimbalist will be the second artist to perform here during the 1936 season. He comes here on a coast-to-coast anniversary tour in celebration of his 25th year before American audiences.

The eminent violinist made his American debut just a quarter of a century ago, and throughout the country his thousands of admirere are uniting to do him special honor.

Zimbalist was first heard by an American audience October 27, 1911, when he appeared as guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing Glazounow Concerto in A Minor for the first time in America.

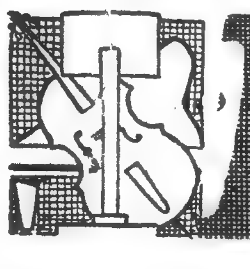
Hailed immediately upon his debut as a great artist, the 25 years which have passed have but added to the violinist's world-wide fame. He has played in practically every large city in the world.

In the period since his debut, Zimbalist has also established himself as a composer and more recently as a conductor. He is composer of the symphonic "Daphnis and Chloe" which was recently performed for the first time by the Philadelphia Orchestra with Leopold Stokowski conducting.

Two years ago he made his debut as a conductor, directing a performance of Tschaikowsky's "Eugene Onegin," which was presented by the Art of Musical Russia. More recently he conducted the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in a performance of his most recent work, "An American Rhapsody."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Nov 26/36



MUSIC

Enthusiastic Audience Greets Richard Burgin Conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Albert Spalding as Soloist

By G. Y. Loveridge

A different figure on the podium, an eminent violinist and an unfamiliar symphonic work spiced the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in the Metropolitan Theatre. The large audience gave vigorous approval.

Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor, led the orchestra, instead of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The soloist was Albert Spalding, famed American.

The rather brief program sailed along briskly, with Mozart and Kalinikoff to catch the fancy and Bach for ballast.

Mr. Burgin, who has conducted here at least once before, we believe, showed himself a capable leader. He has a pleasant, unassuming air, and is energetic to the point of violence. Where Dr. Koussevitzky is suave, Mr. Burgin is happily pugnacious. It was an interesting contrast.

* * *

Mr. Burgin opened the program with a hearty reading of the Bach toccata and fugue in C major for organ, orchestrated by Leo Weiner. The first section had clouded moments, although in general it was put forth clearly and forcibly. In the adagio, woodwind voices, with harp and other strings, produced an exquisite effect of lofty contemplation. There was, now and again, an angularity in the broad outline of this section, but the pervading sense of exaltation and majestic calm was well sustained.

It was in the fugue, we thought, that Mr. Burgin was most effective. Although a fugue may be felt to make an appeal more mathematical than emotional, this one has life and gusto. The subject ends with a snap like a line of skaters "cracking the whip," and the whole fugue bounds and tumbles. Mr. Burgin attacked it forcefully, bringing splendid sonority from the strings and brilliance from the brass. It was impossible to find here the Bach of popular misconception, cold, pedantic, hardly human. Everything danced and stamped.

The audience recalled Mr. Burgin several times. At his insistence, the whole orchestra took a bow.

* * *

Mr. Spalding performed a Mozart concerto in D major, K. 218. He is a man of graceful carriage, with smooth black hair parted somewhat left of centre. He stood reflectively while the orchestra reduced to 18th century court orchestra size, voiced the long introduction. He took a white handkerchief from his breast pocket and unobtrusively rubbed the frog of the bow and the neck of the Stradivarius, giving one the uneasy feeling that he wouldn't come in on time.

But of course he did, and the audience was quickly treated to an exhibition of virtuosity such as has not been heard or seen hereabouts for a long time. He played clearly and restrainedly, producing a tone of great beauty. Throughout he was the serious and masterly musician. The concerto abounds with chances for display—difficult bowing, harmonics, rapid passages, double-stops embellished with trills—and Mr. Spalding made the most of them. But nowhere did he exaggerate. The cadenza in the allegro was performed with such brilliance that the audience broke in at the end of the movement to applaud, and in this they were joined by the orchestra.

The songful andante cantabile showed the full beauty of tone of which the fine instrument was capable, and the rondo brought the concerto to a gay, delightful close.

Mr. Spalding was summoned to the stage half a dozen times by insistent applause. When some members of the orchestra arose for intermission somewhat too soon, they were promptly applauded back into their seats again, while Mr. Spalding was summoned forth for renewed approval.

* * *

After intermission, the Kalinnikoff Symphony No. 1 in G minor was heard through the customary haze of tobacco smoke.

The symphony was written by a man who was a fellow-student with Dr. Koussevitzky in Moscow almost 40 years ago. Although he died young, of tuberculosis, the symphony exhibits no premonitory despondency. It is melodious, and also frequently monotonous. There are curious echoes in it, of Saint-Saens and Wagner and others, so that every now and then one has the impression he has heard it before.

The movements are: Allegro moderato, andante commodamente; scherzo, allegro non troppoe troppo, and finale, allegro moderato, allegro risoluto. The finale was played with all the spirit Mr. Burgin could give it. That was a good deal, and it made a rousing finish for a stimulating evening.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 26 1936

Radio Flashes

Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the orchestra, will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert broadcast at 8:15 over WBZ. Burgin has programmed the Toccato in C-major, one of Bach's many organ compositions, to open the concert. The second and concluding number will be Kalinnikov's Symphony No. 1 in G-minor. This concert, the first in the series to come from the stage of the historic Harvard Theatre.

DALLAS, TEX.
JOURNAL

NOV 26 1936

Symphony Music in New York

BY FRANCES KRAMER,
Journal Staff Correspondent.

NEW YORK, Nov. 26.—Symphony orchestras have made the musical news in New York for the last week or so with concerts by such personalities as Spalding, Smeterlin, Novaes, Zimbalist, Rachmaninoff, Kreisler, Feuermann, Flagstad and the Don Cossacks in the immediate or near offing.

Over the week end the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, with John Barbirolli conducting, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitzky, gave concerts at Carnegie, where Stokowski also appears with the Philadelphia orchestra Tuesday night.

Saturday afternoon was the occasion of our first hearing of the Boston orchestra, and it really was an occasion. This symphonic group, more than any other we have ever heard, makes itself known not as various individually excellent groups banded together in the common cause of symphony, but as one single instrument, the various sections magnificently blended and integrated as are the voices in a perfectly balanced chorus. Add to this the austere but impassioned scholarliness of Koussevitzky, which impresses on the music nothing of the conductor's personality but everything of the composer's, and you have a symphony orchestra which has rightfully been rated one of the three greatest in these United States.

The program Saturday afternoon included Mozart's Symphony in A Major No. 29, "Les Offrandes Oubilees" of Messiaen, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Sibelius' Symphony No. 5 in E-Flat major. The Mozart symphony, written when this phenomenal composer was 18, displayed the orchestra's string choir to the fullest advantage. The Strauss and Sibelius were, of course, superlatives and all the other adjectives that one is wary of using because through overuse they have lost nearly all their meaning, but to us the most exciting number was "Les Offrandes Oubliees" (The Forgotten Sacrifice), by the contemporary French composer, Messiaen. Within the limited mode Messiaen sets for himself, and which imparts to his words an agularity like that of very early primitive paintings, he achieves a statement of the truths of religious faith as deeply moving as the prelude to Lohengrin and considerably more inventive musically.

The Philharmonic-Symphony Sunday afternoon played for the first time in this country Schubert's Second Symphony in B flat, the Prelude and [illegible] from "Tristan und Isol[illegible] to the week-end [illegible]one poem, "Don [illegible] was the

---

LAWRENCE, MASS.
SUNDAY NEWS

NOV 29 1936

MR. AIKEN MAY BE VICE PRESIDENT

NEW YORK, Nov. 28—Alfred L. Aiken, vice president of the New York Life Insurance Company, will be made president of the company early in December, succeeding Thomas A. Buckner it is reported in financial circles here. Mr. Buckner will be elevated to chairman of the board.

Mr. Aiken was born in Norwich, Conn., in 1870 and became assistant manager of the New England department of the New York Life Insurance Company in 1894. He later moved to Worcester and held successive positions of president of the Worcester County Institute for Savings and president of the Worcester National Bank.

In 1918 Mr. Aiken moved to Boston and became president of the National Shawmut Bank, a position which he held until 1923. He has been a vice president of the New Yor Life Insurance Company since 1925.

Mr. Aiken was trustee of the Worcester Art Museum from 1909 until 1934, and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1920-1924.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 25 1936

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters May Be Addressed at This Office.

A number of the members of St. Anne's choir will assist in the vesper service to be given next Sunday at 5 p. m. in Christ church, Fitchburg, where William G. Heller is now organist and choir director. It is one of the services in the so-called Crocker series, provided for from time to time by the generosity of a family there which has taken great interest in music. This time it will be notable because an ensemble of 10 skilled instrumentalists from the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Nicolas Slonimsky will share in the program.

Besides assisting in the accompaniment of some of the choral numbers, this group will play several instrumental numbers, some of which will be supplemented by the organ. The list includes the first movement of the Unfinished Symphony of Schubert; Prelude and Fugue, Bach; Largo, Handel; Overture "Fingal's Cave" Mendelssohn; string quartet, Andante Cantabile, Tschaikowsky; an Allegro and Adagietto, Bizet; Carillon, Ave Maria, Bach-Gounod.

The processional and recessional of the choir will be impressive. The Hymns for these will be "For the Beauty of the Skies" and "I Heard a Sound of Voices." The Introit will be Stoughton's "God Is a Spirit." The choir of 80 voices will also be heard in the Pax Dei of Thoman.

It is understood that a number of Lowell people are planning to attend the service.

An American Composer.

It was pleasant the other day to receive a friendly note from Samuel Richard Gaines, with a reminder of a meeting here sometime ago when one of his compositions was sung by the Glee Club of the Teachers college under the direction of Miss Inez Field Damon. He tells me that of late he has been devoting himself chiefly to composition doing much of his work in his quiet studio in Newbury street, Boston, although he lives in Wellesley Hills. Some of his more recent compositions, by the way, are to be included in a program to be given later in the season before the Middlesex Women's Club by Eleanor Steele and Hall Clovis. I am reminded to reserve his comment on these until nearer the time for the appearance of the singers here.

For the present it is sufficient to say that the Gaines compositions in the form of choral music, anthems, cantatas, operettas, and instrumental numbers have increased to a point which warranted his issuance of a special personal catalog of several pages.

Samuel Richard Gaines was born in Detroit, Mich., of Welsh-English parents, beginning his musical studies at the age of 14. His first position as organist was in Saginaw. Later he taught and conducted choral organizations in Detroit. In 1905 he was called to the old Shawmut church in Boston, since which he has lived in that vicinity. He has won a number of international prizes for composition and leading publishers issue his works. He is a member of the American Composers Society.

Discerning Praise.

The report is that the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie hall, New York, have been sold out for the season. The opening concerts of the season last week moved the music critics to uncommonly warm praise, practically without exception. There was admiration of Dr. Koussevitzky as a conductor and of the superb artistry of the musicians under his baton. Especially enthusiastic were the reviewers about the beautiful quality of the string section of the orchestra. There was no hesitation in rating the orchestra as one of the finest in the world today. And the best of the New York critics take their responsibilities seriously. It was a tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky that he was able to [redacted]able an impression, among other numbers, with a symphony of old Papa Haydn. But his interpretation clearly appealed to those who have possibly become surfeited with the stringencies of more modern musical fare. At any rate it was evident that that the old master did not suffer so much as might have been suspected by comparison with the symphony of Sibelius, which was given a thrilling performance.

These paeans of praise, hopefully, will lend force to the appeal for a larger membership in the organization known as "The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra" and for a more widely distributed support of the orchestra as an asset which Boston cannot afford to neglect.

Lowell people who enjoyed the open-air concerts on the Boston Esplanade during the summer under the direction of Arthur Fiedler may be interested to know that with the help of its friends the budget has been balanced and something remains on the right side of the ledger.

Tuesday night in Greensboro, N. C., Carl Behr, one of the charter members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a program which marked his 84th birthday anniversary. He now plays 'cello in the North Carolina Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Programs.

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct the programs on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week, in order that Dr. Koussevitzky may have a brief respite. His program includes Leo Weiner's transcription of the Bach organ toccata in C major; Hindemith's "Mathis der Maier" and the First Symphony in G minor by Kalinikoff.

On Monday evening next the second of the supplementary concerts will be conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky. The program will include the Mozart Symphony in C major; the Second Piano Concerto of Leo Sowerby with Joseph Brinkman of Ann Arbor, Mich., as the soloist; the Cesar Franck Symphony, recently played in the regular series.

Next Tuesday evening in Jordan hall Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the Symphony Orchestra, with Bernard Zighera at the piano will give a notable program including a Schubert Sonata and a Respighi number that have not been hitherto played in Boston, so far as the records show.

On Wednesday of next week the Morning Musicale at the Statler will bring to Boston Lauritz Melchior, well liked tenor of the German wing of the Metropolitan Opera.

At the Boston Opera House for the rest of this week with matinees today and Saturday, the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo will continue its brief engagement there.

Mme. Schumann-Heink.

The death of Mme. Schumann-Heink moved W. J. Henderson of the New York Sun to reminiscences of her career in New York. He is authority for the statement that her last appearance on the operatic

---

ome Here
iversary Tour

E.
As mo.
Music
Reynolds Me-
December 14.
Zi will be the second artist to perform here during the 1936 season. He comes here on a coast-to-coast anniversary tour in celebration of his 25th year before American audiences.

The eminent violinist made his American debut just a quarter of a century ago, and throughout the country his thousands of admirers are uniting to do him special honor.

Zimbalist was first heard by an American audience October 27, 1911, when he appeared as guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing Glazounow Concerto in A Minor for the first time in America.

iled immediately upon his debut great artist, the 25 years which passed have but added to the violinist's world-wide fame. He has played in practically every large city in the world.

In the period since his debut, Zimbalist has also established himself as a composer and more recently as a conductor. He is composer of the symphonic "Daphnis and Chloe" which was recently performed for the first time by the Philadelphia Orchestra with Leopold Stokowski conducting.

Two years ago he made his debut as a conductor, directing a performance of Tschaikowsky's "Eugene Onegin," which was presented by the Art of Musical Russia. More recently he conducted the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in a performance of his most recent work, "An American Rhapsody."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Nov 26/36

MUSIC

Enthusiastic Audience Greets Richard Burgin Conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Albert Spalding as Soloist

By G. Y. Loveridge

A different figure on the podium, an eminent violinist and an unfamiliar symphonic work spiced the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in the Metropolitan Theatre. The large audience gave vigorous approval.

Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor, led the orchestra, instead of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The soloist was Albert Spalding, famed American.

The rather brief program sailed along briskly, with Mozart and Kallinikoff to catch the fancy and Bach for ballast.

Mr. Burgin, who has conducted here at least once before, we believe, showed himself a capable leader. He has a pleasant, unassuming air, and is energetic to the point of violence. Where Dr. Koussevitzky is suave, Mr. Burgin is happily pugnacious. It was an interesting contrast.

* * *

Mr. Burgin opened the program with a hearty reading of the Bach toccata and fugue in C major for organ, orchestrated by Leo Weiner. The first section had clouded moments, although in general it was put forth clearly and forcibly. In the adagio, woodwind voices, with harp and other strings, produced an exquisite effect of lofty contemplation. There was, now and again, an angularity in the broad outline of this section, but the pervading sense of exaltation and majestic calm was well sustained.

It was in the fugue, we thought, that Mr. Burgin was most effective. Although a fugue may be felt to make an appeal more mathematical than emotional, this one has life and gusto. The subject ends with a snap like a line of skaters "cracking the whip," and the whole fugue bounds and tumbles. Mr. Burgin attacked it forcefully, bringing splendid sonority from the strings and brilliance from the brass. It was impossible to find here the Bach of popular misconception, cold, pedantic, hardly human. Everything danced and stamped.

The audience recalled Mr. Burgin several times. At his insistence, the whole orchestra took a bow.

* * *

Mr. Spalding performed a Mozart concerto in D major, K. 218. He is a man of graceful carriage, with smooth black hair parted somewhat left of centre. He stood reflectively while the orchestra reduced to 18th century court orchestra size, voiced the long introduction. He took a white handkerchief from his breast pocket and unobtrusively rubbed the frog of the bow and the neck of the Stradivarius, giving one the uneasy feeling that he wouldn't come in on time.

But of course he did, and the audience was quickly treated to an exhibition of virtuosity such as has not been heard or seen hereabouts for a long time. He played clearly and restrainedly, producing a tone of great beauty. Throughout he was the serious and masterly musician. The concerto abounds with chances for display—difficult bowing, harmonics, rapid passages, double-stops embellished with trills—and Mr. Spalding made the most of them. But nowhere did he exaggerate. The cadenza in the allegro was performed with such brilliance that the audience broke in at the end of the movement to applaud, and in this they were joined by the orchestra.

The songful andante cantabile showed the full beauty of tone of which the fine instrument was capable, and the rondo brought the concerto to a gay, delightful close.

Mr. Spalding was summoned to the stage half a dozen times by insistent applause. When some members of the orchestra arose for intermission somewhat too soon, they were promptly applauded back into their seats again, while Mr. Spalding was summoned forth for renewed approval.

* * *

After intermission, the Kalinnikoff Symphony No. 1 in G minor was heard through the customary haze of tobacco smoke.

The symphony was written by a man who was a fellow-student with Dr. Koussevitzky in Moscow almost 40 years ago. Although he died young, of tuberculosis, the symphony exhibits no premonitory despondency. It is melodious, and also frequently monotonous. There are curious echoes in it, of Saint-Saens and Wagner and others, so that every now and then one has the impression he has heard it before.

The movements are: Allegro moderato, andante commodamente; scherzo, allegro non troppoe troppo, and finale, allegro moderato, allegro risoluto. The finale was played with all the spirit Mr. Burgin could give it. That was a good deal, and it made a rousing finish for a stimulating evening.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 2 6 1936

Radio Flashes

Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the orchestra, will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert broadcast at 8:15 over WBZ. Burgin has programmed the Toccato in C-major, one of Bach's many organ compositions, to open the concert. The second and concluding number will be Kalinnikov's Symphony No. 1 in G-minor. This concert, the first in the series to come from the stage of the historic Harvard Theatre,.

DALLAS, TEX.
JOURNAL

NOV 2 6 1936

Symphony Music in New York

BY FRANCES KRAMER,
Journal Staff Correspondent.

NEW YORK, Nov. 26.—Symphony orchestras have made the musical news in New York for the last week or so with concerts by such personalities as Spalding, Smeterlin, Novaes, Zimbalist, Rachmaninoff, Kreisler, Feuermann, Flagstad and the Don Cossacks in the immediate or near offing.

Over the week end the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, with John Barbirolli conducting, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitsky, gave concerts at Carnegie, where Stokowski also appears with the Philadelphia orchestra Tuesday night.

Saturday afternoon was the occasion of our first hearing of the Boston orchestra, and it really was an occasion. This symphonic group, more than any other we have ever heard, makes itself known not as various individually excellent groups banded together in the common cause of symphony, but as one single instrument, the various sections magnificently blended and integrated as are the voices in a perfectly balanced chorus. Add to this the austere but impassioned scholarliness of Koussevitsky, which impresses on the music nothing of the conductor's personality but everything of the composer's, and you have a symphony orchestra which has rightfully been rated one of the three greatest in these United States.

The program Saturday afternoon included Mozart's Symphony in A Major No. 29, "Les Offrandes Oubilees" of Messiaen, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Sibelius' Symphony No. 5 in E-Flat major. The Mozart symphony, written when this phenomenal composer was 18, displayed the orchestra's string choir to the fullest advantage. The Strauss and Sibelius were, of course, superlatives and all the other adjectives that one is wary of using because through overuse they have lost nearly all their meaning, but to us the most exciting number was "Les Offrandes Oubliees" (The Forgotten Sacrifice), by the contemporary French composer, Messiaen. Within the limited mode Messiaen sets for himself, and which imparts to his words an agularity like that of very early primitive paintings, he achieves a statement of the truths of religious faith as deeply moving as the prelude to Lohengrin and considerably more inventive musically.

The Philharmonic-Symphony Sunday afternoon played for the first time in this country Schubert's Second Symphony in B flat, the Prelude and [illegible] from "Tristan und Isol[illegible] to the week-end [illegible] tone poem, "Don [illegible] a was the

---

LAWRENCE, MASS.
SUNDAY NEWS

NOV 29 1936

MR. AIKEN MAY BE VICE PRESIDENT

NEW YORK, Nov. 28—Alfred L. Aiken, vice president of the New York Life Insurance Company, will be made president of the company early in December, succeeding Thomas A. Buckner it is reported in financial circles here. Mr. Buckner will be elevated to chairman of the board.

Mr. Aiken was born in Norwich, Conn., in 1870 and became assistant manager of the New England department of the New York Life Insurance Company in 1894. He later moved to Worcester and held successive positions of president of the Worcester County Institute for Savings and president of the Worcester National Bank.

In 1918 Mr. Aiken moved to Boston and became president of the National Shawmut Bank, a position which he held until 1923. He has been a vice president of the New Yor. Life Insurance Company since 1925.

Mr. Aiken was trustee of the Worcester Art Museum from 1909 until 1934, and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1920-1924.

BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor

95.

NO [illegible]

Oriental Scenes Depicted, Old Vienna Recalled on Disks

Review of Recordings

Pacific cruises, South Sea Islands cruises and other travel activities now seasonally popular come to our mind as we think of two of the exotic items which RCA has released this month. The first, "Bali," of Henry Eicheim, is built around that East Indian island familiar to world voyagers, and the second, "Etenraku," suggests unmistakably the "Flowery Kingdom," Japan. Both are by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The two pieces are authentic, in that they depict India and the Far East in genuinely idiomatic music, and so differ from the pseudo-Oriental confections of Ketelbey.

"Bali" is one of three pieces for large orchestra and gamelang, or Javanese orchestra. The other two pieces are entitled "Java" and "Angkor" "Bali" is dedicated to Leopold Stokowski and "Angkor" has been dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky. The music of "Bali" is a series of variations, formed on Balinese music and employing Balinese percussion.

The percussion, which adds an "other world" note to the music, consists of the bonang, 12 small metal tubs; the saron, 7 heavy bronze metal bars on a resonating box; the demong, 7 bronze bars, under each one a resonator tuned to the same note; the gender, 13 metal bars strung over bamboo resonators; a wooden xylophone (marimba); and five tuned gongs. The music creates a very fascinating picture and is comparatively easy listening.

"Etenraku" is based on an eighth century ceremonial prelude, and was orchestrated by Viscount Kunoye, a Japanese peer. This is another exotic and fascinating work on account of the excellent orchestration. At times the harmony is quite acrid because of the actual dissonances and the extremely high pitch of the strings. But again it brings out the excellent qualities of the Philadelphia string section, "Etenraku" is on the fourth side of the two disks carrying the "Bali" item, and a record collector who wants two unusual items should certainly invest in them and afterwards may find himself hunting up travel folders with relish.

Henry Eicheim: Bali, and Etenraku (8th century ceremonial prelude), played by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Two 12-inch records.

Again, collectors may consider themselves fortunate in a new album of Schubert's Symphony No. 8 in B minor or "Unfinished," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.

The "Unfinished" symphony was not left so, according to some popular belief, by Schubert's passing. Rather he set it aside because he may have despaired of continuing in that vein. It was begun in 1822 and the composer is supposed to have abandoned it sometime before 1825.

Under the peerless interpretation of Dr. Koussevitzky the first movement, which has been borrowed often by popular composers, is once again heard in its poignant songfulness. The second movement is more symphonic, and it reveals Schubert's peculiar gift of melody. The familiar "Rosamunde"-ballet music, with its suggestion of the "Moment Musicale" fills the sixth side of the album.

Recorded under the new high-fidelity system, plus the sympathetic reading given by Dr. Koussevitzky, this symphony must certainly go down as a "must" in standard repertoire collections.

Orchestral

Schubert: Symphony No. 8 in B Minor (Unfinished), played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Three Victor 12-inch records in album.

Herbert: Dagger Dance, from Natoma, and Tchaikovsky: Sleeping Beauty Ballet-Waltz, played by the Boston Pops Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, conductor. Victor 12-inch record. Good interpretations of the markedly rhythmic Indian dance from Victor Herbert's only opera and one of the lovely Tchaikovsky ballet waltzes.

Chamber Music

Bela Bartok: Quartet No. 2 in A Minor, played by the Budapest String Quartet. Four Victor records in album. Couple modernity with the Hungarian idiom as this quartet does and it proves a bit of difficult listening for the inexperienced listener. It sounds like hosts of musical ideas following each other without any previous preparation. Only in the third movement does it lapse into conventionality, and then into a moody note. The Budapest quartet handles this music very well and their extraordinary ensemble spirit is well shown.

Instrumental

Chopin: Mazurka in C Sharp Minor, Op. 30, No. 3, and Étude in C Sharp Minor, Op. 10, No. 4; Étude in G Flat Major, Op. 10, No. 5, played by Vladimir Horowitz, pianist. Victor 12-inch record. Chopin seems to have undergone a revival at least in the popular mind, for we have heard it on several occasions on the air. The mazurka is a typical Polish dance and the études will undoubtedly be more familiar.

Operetta

Romberg: Forbidden Melody, by Victor Orchestra and mixed chorus. Victor 12-inch record. Some of the music from Romberg's new operetta now on Broadway. Tunes like "No Use Pretending" and "You're All I've Wanted" will remain. This is good typical Rombergiana and should be snapped up by operetta fans.

Popular

In the "Swing" division this month are Benny Goodman's "Peter Piper" and "Organ Grinder's Swing," the latter spoiled by too much "stuff" and not enough melody; also Benny Goodman's "Alexander's Ragtime Band," moderate swing, and "Riffin' at the Ritz"; lastly there is Tommy Dorsey's "A High Hat, a Piccolo and a Cane," a fast mover, coupled with "Close to Me;" a waltz.

Romberg figures again in a separate recording of "No Use Pretending" and "You're All I've Wanted" from "Forbidden Melody" and two older waltzes, "The Road to Paradise" and "Will You Remember," from "Maytime" which is being produced in Hollywood. Tommy Dorsey's "For Sentimental Reasons" tied with "Another Perfect Night Is Ending" completes the popular list.

♪ ♪ ♪

EUROPEAN RELEASES

Orchestral

Four new recordings of master-works nave been issued for November: Beethoven's Third Symphony (Eroica); Brahms Third Symphony; Sibelius First Symphony; and Schumann's Quintet is E flat major.

The "Eroica" is by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra under Felix Weingartner, finely played and conducted. Columbia. Six disks.

The Brahms third symphony is also from Vienna, but conducted by Bruno Walter, and is definitely a big improvement on the existing recordings. H. M. V.—Four disks.

The Sibelius first symphony, composed in 1899, is as popular as any of his later ones, asd is probably the best known, but it never seems to lose its freshness. It is played by Eugene Ormandy and the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. H. M. V. Five disks.

The Decca Company is keeping up its reputation for recording high-class music with three of Handel's Concerti Grossi, Op. 6. The score used by the Boyd Neel String Orchestra with harpsichord is that known as Peters Edition and is the original form in which Handel wrote them. Both playing and recording are excellent. Decca. Six disks.

Bizet: Prelude, Adagietto, and Minuet from "L'Arlesienne Suite," London Symphony Orchestra under Sir Thomas Beecham. This is charming, beautifully played, and well worth having. Columbia. Two disks.

Chamber Music

Artur Schabel, pianist, and the Pro Arte Quartet are quite excellent in Schumann's Piano Quintet in E flat major. This work is regarded as the greatest of the compositions for a quartet and piano, a combination which both Mozart and Beethoven left alone. Both playing and recording are all for which one could wish. H. M. V. Four disks.

Instrumental

Nathan Milstein, violinist, and M. Mittman, pianist, play the Sonata in D major (Vivaldi-Respighi). This shows off the wonderful quality of Mr. Milstein's playing much better than the rather dry "Chaconne" issued in October. Columbia record.

Vocal

The Decca company has the marketing in England of the German Telefunken disks, made during the 1936 Bayreuth Festival. Franz Volker's splendid tenor voice is perfectly recorded. The disks are mainly excerpts from "Lohengrin," with others from "Die Walkure" and "Siegfried."

Kirsten Flagstad, soprano, sings two songs, "O, Lovely Night," and "Lullaby." This lovely voice is at last heard at its best on the disks. The evidend difficulty experienced in recording this singer has been overcome. H. M. V. Ten-inch record.

JEFFERSON CITY, MO.
CAPITAL NEWS

NOV 28 1936

Long Lost Symphony Gets First Hearing

BOSTON, Nov. 27— (UP) —A symphonic masterpiece which vanished mysteriously more than a century ago will be given its first performance in America by the Boston Symphony orchestra next Friday, it was announced today.

The work is "Symphony in D Major" by Muzio Clementi, Italian composer who died in England in 1832 at the age of 80.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 25 1936

Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Richard Burgin Conducting and Albert Spalding as Soloist, Pleases Large Audience.—Symphony by Kallinikov Has First Hearing Here

By G. Y. Loveridge

A different figure on the podium, an eminent violinist and an unfamiliar symphonic work spiced the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in the Metropolitan Theatre. The large audience gave vigorous approval.

Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor, led the orchestra, instead of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The soloist was Albert Spalding, famed American.

The rather brief program sailed along briskly, with Mozart and Kallinikoff to catch the fancy and Bach for ballast.

Mr. Burgin, who has conducted here at least once before, we believe, showed himself a capable leader. He has a pleasant, unassuming air, and is energetic to the point of violence. Where Dr. Koussevitzky is suave, Mr. Burgin is happily ugnacious. It was an interesting contrast.

* * *

Mr. Burgin opened the program with a hearty reading of the Bach toccata and fugue in C major for organ, orchestrated by Leo Weiner. The first section had clouded moments, although in general it was put forth clearly and forcibly. In the adagio, woodwind voices, with harp and other strings, produced an exquisite effect of lofty contemplation. There was, now and again, an angularity in the broad outline of this section, but the pervading sense of exaltation and majestic calm was well sustained.

It was in the fugue, we thought, that Mr. Burgin was most effective. Although a fugue may be felt to make an appeal more mathematical than emotional, this one has life and gusto. The subject ends with a snap like a line of skaters "cracking the whip," and the whole fugue bounds and tumbles. Mr. Burgin attacked it forcefully, bringing splendid sonority from the strings and brilliance from the brass. It was impossible to find here the Bach of popular misconception, cold, pedantic, hardly human. Everything danced and stamped.

The audience recalled Mr. Burgin several times. At his insistence, the whole orchestra took a bow.

* * *

Mr. Spalding performed a Mozart concerto in D major, K. 218. He is a man of graceful carriage, with smooth black hair parted somewhat left of centre. He stood reflectively while the orchestra reduced to 18th century court orchestra size, voiced the long introduction. He took a white handkerchief from his breast pocket and unobtrusively rubbed the frog of the bow and the neck of the Stradivarius, giving one the uneasy feeling that he wouldn't come in on time.

But of course he did, and the audience was quickly treated to an exhibition of virtuosity such as has not been heard or seen hereabouts for a long time. He played clearly and restrainedly, producing a tone of great beauty. Throughout he was the serious and masterly musician. The concerto abounds with chances for display—difficult bowing, harmonics, rapid passages, double-stops embellished with trills—and Mr. Spalding made the most of them. But nowhere did he exaggerate. The cadenza in the allegro was performed with such brilliance that the audience broke in at the end of the movement to applaud, and in this they were joined by the orchestra.

The songful andante cantabile showed the full beauty of tone of which the fine instrument was capable, and the rondo brought the concerto to a gay, delightful close.

Mr. Spalding was summoned to the stage half a dozen times by insistent applause. When some members of the orchestra arose for intermission somewhat too soon, they were promptly applauded back into their seats again, while Mr. Spalding was summoned forth for renewed approval.

* * *

After intermission, the Kalinnikoff Symphony No. 1 in G minor was heard through the customary haze of tobacco smoke.

The symphony was written by a man who was a fellow-student with Dr. Koussevitzky in Moscow almost 40 years ago. Although he died young, of tuberculosis, the symphony exhibits no premonitory despondency. It is melodious, and also frequently monotonous. There are curious echoes in it, of Saint-Saens and Wagner and others, so that every now and then one has the impression he has heard it before.

The movements are: Allegro moderato, andante commodamente; scherzo, allegro non troppoe troppo, and finale, allegro moderato, allegro risoluto. The finale was played with all the spirit Mr. Burgin could give it. That was a good deal, and it made a rousing finish for a stimulating evening.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 28 1936

MUSICAL EVENTS

Orchestras, Transient and Resident—Newcomers

THE dressiest audience that Carnegie Hall harbors is the turnout for the Boston Symphony Thursday-evening meetings. It's not only a sartorially effective assembly but also an enthusiastic one. Mr. Koussevitzky receives heavy ovations—and he earns them.

For his first visit of the season, Mr. Koussevitzky gave a little lesson in how to build a program. He started with Haydn's 102nd symphony, followed with Debussy's "La Mer," and closed up the Hall with Beethoven's fifth symphony. Apparently, Mr. Koussevitzky hasn't heard that Haydn wrote only cute music, which must be played by only a third of the orchestra. He used almost all of the boys and he directed the music as if he never had seen a picture of Haydn in a white wig. Haydn became a musical event instead of an exercise in ibbety-bippety.

"La Mer" showed the virtuosity of the orchestra and its maestro, although the performance was somewhat too transparent. This set of three sketches seems to need a scrim, as it were, and Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it in full view of the crowd. It "sounded," however, and it sounded brilliant.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Arthur Fielder and the Boston Sinfonietta, composed of 50 players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be presented by the Pawtucket Civic Music Association in its second concert of the season Thursday evening at 8:30 o'clock in the auditorium of the Pawtucket senior high school.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

NOV 27 1936

Ballet Benefit

After communing with their Pilgrim ancestors the better part of the day, whole families of Bostonians drove to the Opera House last night for the ballet, their curiosities piqued by advance reports of the Symphonie Fantastique, of which Massine is the choreographer and principal dancer. And to dispel the old saying that Boston audiences are cold and difficult to interest were the rounds of applause which followed this presentation, the second on a program designed to benefit the Central New England Sanatorium, Inc., of Rutland, which has a number of distinguished people on its board and an imposing list of patrons for its benefits.

Observed in the gala throng, parading about the lobbies during the entre-actes: Mr. and Mrs. I. Tucker Burr, the latter regal in lame, with Mr. and Mrs. James Amory Sullivan, Mrs. Sullivan in good-looking black and Mr. Sullivan, at the conclusion of the ballets, wearing a very continental evening cloak. . . . Mrs. Augustus Neal Rantoul, a white wrap over her pale blue gown, with her daughter, Miss Charlotte Maud Rantoul, all in white. . . . Dr. and Mrs. Randolph K. Byers, the latter in black velvet. . . . Mrs. Jasper Whiting, emerging from her center box in black with red flowers cascading from her shoulder. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky. . . . Dr. Bayard T. Crane, superintendent of the sanatorium, and Mrs. Crane, whose gown was of gold lame. Dr. and Mrs. Michael E. Murray (Louisa McM. Hopkins). . . . Mr. and Mrs. Joseph C. Rennard, the latter in black velvet, with Mr. and Mrs. Francis A. Harding, Mrs. Harding wearing brilliant scarlet, and her mother, Mrs. Harold Wilson Read.

Still others: Mr. and Mrs. George Bingham of Cambridge, with Mrs. Bingham in luscious blue velvet, and Mr. and Mrs. Richard C. Storey, Mrs. Storey in black. . . . Mrs. George R. Agassiz. . . . Miss Joan Sagendorph, in town from Sarah Lawrence College for Miss Betty Sagendorph's debut Thanksgiving eve, beseiged by young men as she wandered about in a black gown with a tricky red cape scarf. . . . Mrs. S. White Houghton, walking up from Row 1 with an embroidered silver net veil over her face. . . . Mrs. Allan Forbes, whose husband is a member of the board of the sanatorium. . . . Mrs. Paul Drummond Rust, Jr., in a box with her mother and several other guests. . . . Miss Ellen Bottomley in blue and silver net. . . Mr. and Mrs. Harry K. Cross.

Also: Mrs. Edith Roelker Curtis in black velvet with a fox scarf. . . . Miss Polly Ehrlich with her brother, Henry Ehrlich, a mink coat over her blue net gown. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Alan R. Morse, the latter in black. . . . Miss Marion Little, selling flowers to those in the audience not already bedecked, wearing vivid green. . . .

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

ALFRED L. AIKEN TO BE PROMOTED

Former City Banker to Head Insurance Co.

Special to the Telegram

NEW YORK, Nov. 28.—Alfred L. Aiken, vice-president of the New York Life Insurance Co., will be made president of the company early in December, succeeding Thomas A. Buckner, it is reported in financial circles here. Mr. Buckner will be elevated to chairman of the board.

Mr. Aiken was born in Norwich, Conn., in 1870 and became assistant manager of the New England department of the New York Life Insurance Co. in 1894. He later moved to Worcester and held successive positions of president of the Worcester County Institution for Savings and president of the Worcester National Bank.

In 1918 Mr. Aiken moved to Boston and became president of the National Shawmut Bank, a position which he held until 1923. He has been a vice-president of the New York Life Insurance Co. since 1925.

Mr. Aiken was trustee of the Worcester Art Museum from 1909 until 1934, and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1920-1924.

BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
95.

NOV 25 1936

Oriental Scenes Depicted, Old Vienna Recalled on Disks

Review of Recordings

Pacific cruises, South Sea Islands cruises and other travel activities now seasonally popular come to our mind as we think of two of the exotic items which RCA has released this month. The first, "Bali," of Henry Eicheim, is built around that East Indian island familiar to world voyagers, and the second, "Etenraku," suggests unmistakably the "Flowery Kingdom," Japan. Both are by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The two pieces are authentic, in that they depict India and the Far East in genuinely idiomatic music, and so differ from the pseudo-Oriental confections of Ketelbey.

"Bali" is one of three pieces for large orchestra and gamelang, or Javanese orchestra. The other two pieces are entitled "Java" and "Angkor" "Bali" is dedicated to Leopold Stokowski and "Angkor" has been dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky. The music of "Bali" is a series of variations, formed on Balinese music and employing Balinese percussion.

The percussion, which adds an "other world" note to the music, consists of the bonang, 12 small metal tubs; the saron, 7 heavy bronze metal bars on a resonating box; the demong, 7 bronze bars, under each one a resonator tuned to the same note; the gender, 13 metal bars strung over bamboo resonators; a wooden xylophone (marimba); and five tuned gongs. The music creates a very fascinating picture and is comparatively easy listening.

"Etenraku" is based on an eighth century ceremonial prelude, and was orchestrated by Viscount Kunoye, a Japanese peer. This is another exotic and fascinating work on account of the excellent orchestration. At times the harmony is quite acrid because of the actual dissonances and the extremely high pitch of the strings. But again it brings out the excellent qualities of the Philadelphia string section, "Etenraku" is on the fourth side of the two disks carrying the "Bali" item, and a record collector who wants two unusual items should certainly invest in them and afterwards may find himself hunting up travel folders with relish.

Henry Eicheim: Bali, and Etenraku (8th century ceremonial prelude), played by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Two 12-inch records.

Again, collectors may consider themselves fortunate in a new album of Schubert's Symphony No. 8 in B minor or "Unfinished," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.

The "Unfinished" symphony was not left so, according to some popular belief, by Schubert's passing. Rather he set it aside because he may have despaired of continuing in that vein. It was begun in 1822 and the composer is supposed to have abandoned it sometime before 1825.

Under the peerless interpretation of Dr. Koussevitzky the first movement, which has been borrowed often by popular composers, is once again heard in its poignant songfulness. The second movement is more symphonic, and it reveals Schubert's peculiar gift of melody. The familiar "Rosamunde"-ballet music, with its suggestion of the "Moment Musicale" fills the sixth side of the album.

Recorded under the new high-fidelity system, plus the sympathetic reading given by Dr. Koussevitzky, this symphony must certainly go down as a "must" in standard repertoire collections.

Orchestral

Schubert: Symphony No. 8 in B Minor (Unfinished), played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Three Victor 12-inch records in album.

Herbert: Dagger Dance, from Natoma, and Tchaikovsky: Sleeping Beauty Ballet-Waltz, played by the Boston Pops Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, conductor. Victor 12-inch record. Good interpretations of the markedly rhythmic Indian dance from Victor Herbert's only opera and one of the lovely Tchaikovsky ballet waltzes.

Chamber Music

Bela Bartok: Quartet No. 2 in A Minor, played by the Budapest String Quartet. Four Victor records in album. Couple modernity with the Hungarian idiom as this quartet does and it proves a bit of difficult listening for the inexperienced listener. It sounds like hosts of musical ideas following each other without any previous preparation. Only in the third movement does it lapse into conventionality, and then into a moody note. The Budapest quartet handles this music very well and their extraordinary ensemble spirit is well shown.

Instrumental

Chopin: Mazurka in C Sharp Minor, Op. 50, No. 3, and Etude in C Sharp Minor, Op. 10, No. 4; Etude in G Flat Major, Op. 10, No. 5, played by Vladimir Horowitz, pianist. Victor 12-inch record. Chopin seems to have undergone a revival at least in the popular mind, for we have heard it on several occasions on the air. The mazurka is a typical Polish dance and the etudes will undoubtedly be more familiar.

Operetta

Romberg: Forbidden Melody, by Victor Orchestra and mixed chorus, Victor 12-inch record. Some of the music from Romberg's new operetta now on Broadway. Tunes like "No Use Pretending" and "You're All I've Wanted" will remain. This is good typical Rombergiana and should be snapped up by operetta fans.

Popular

In the "Swing" division this month are Benny Goodman's "Peter Piper" and "Organ Grinder's Swing," the latter spoiled by too much "stuff" and not enough melody; also Benny Goodman's "Alexander's Ragtime Band," moderate swing, and "Riffin' at the Ritz"; lastly there is Tommy Dorsey's "A High Hat, a Piccolo and a Cane," a fast mover, coupled with "Close to Me," a waltz.

Romberg figures again in a separate recording of "No Use Pretending" and "You're All I've Wanted" from "Forbidden Melody" and two older waltzes, "The Road to Paradise" and "Will You Remember," from "Maytime" which is being produced in Hollywood. Tommy Dorsey's "For Sentimental Reasons" tied with "Another Perfect Night Is Ending" completes the popular list.

* * *

EUROPEAN RELEASES

Orchestral

Four new recordings of master-works have been issued for November: Beethoven's Third Symphony (Eroica); Brahms Third Symphony; Sibelius First Symphony; and Schumann's Quintet is E flat major.

The "Eroica" is by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra under Felix Weingartner, finely played and conducted. Columbia. Six disks.

The Brahms third symphony is also from Vienna, but conducted by Bruno Walter, and is definitely a big improvement on the existing recordings. H. M. V.—Four disks.

The Sibelius first symphony, composed in 1899, is as popular as any of his later ones, and is probably the best known, but it never seems to lose its freshness. It is played by Eugene Ormandy and the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. H. M. V. Five disks.

The Decca Company is keeping up its reputation for recording high-class music with three of Handel's Concerti Grossi, Op. 6. The score used by the Boyd Neel String Orchestra with harpsichord is that known as Peters Edition and is the original form in which Handel wrote them. Both playing and recording are excellent. Decca. Six disks.

Bizet: Prelude, Adagietto, and Minuet from "L'Arlésienne Suite," London Symphony Orchestra under Sir Thomas Beecham. This is charming, beautifully played, and well worth having. Columbia. Two disks.

Chamber Music

Artur Schabel, pianist, and the Pro Arte Quartet are quite excellent in Schumann's Piano Quintet in E flat major. This work is regarded as the greatest of the compositions for a quartet and piano, a combination which both Mozart and Beethoven left alone. Both playing and recording are all for which one could wish. H. M. V. Four disks.

Instrumental

Nathan Milstein, violinist, and M. Mittman, pianist, play the Sonata in D major (Vivaldi-Respighi). This shows off the wonderful quality of Mr. Milstein's playing much better than the rather dry "Chaconne" issued in October. Columbia record.

Vocal

The Decca company has the marketing in England of the German Telefunken disks, made during the 1936 Bayreuth Festival. Franz Volker's splendid tenor voice is perfectly recorded. The disks are mainly excerpts from "Lohengrin," with others from "Die Walkure" and "Siegfried."

Kirsten Flagstad, soprano, sings two songs, "O, Lovely Night," and "Lullaby." This lovely voice is at last heard at its best on the disks. The evidend difficulty experienced in recording this singer has been overcome. H. M. V. Ten-inch record.

JEFFERSON CITY, MO.
CAPITAL NEWS

NOV 28 1936

Long Lost Symphony Gets First Hearing

BOSTON, Nov. 27— (UP) —A symphonic masterpiece which vanished mysteriously more than a century ago will be given its first performance in America by the Boston Symphony orchestra next Friday, it was announced today.

The work is "Symphony in D Major" by Muzio Clementi, Italian composer who died in England in 1832 at the age of 80.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 25 1936

Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Richard Burgin Conducting and Albert Spalding as Soloist, Pleases Large Audience.—Symphony by Kallinikov Has First Hearing Here

By G. Y. Loveridge

A different figure on the podium, an eminent violinist and an unfamiliar symphonic work spiced the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in the Metropolitan Theatre. The large audience gave vigorous approval.

Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor, led the orchestra, instead of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The soloist was Albert Spalding, famed American.

The rather brief program sailed along briskly, with Mozart and Kallinikoff to catch the fancy and Bach for ballast.

Mr. Burgin, who has conducted here at least once before, we believe, showed himself a capable leader. He has a pleasant, unassuming air, and is energetic to the point of violence. Where Dr. Koussevitzky is suave, Mr. Burgin is happily ugnacious. It was an interesting contrast.

* * *

Mr. Burgin opened the program with a hearty reading of the Bach toccata and fugue in C major for organ, orchestrated by Leo Weiner. The first section had clouded moments, although in general it was put forth clearly and forcibly. In the adagio, woodwind voices, with harp and other strings, produced an exquisite effect of lofty contemplation. There was, now and again, an angularity in the broad outline of this section, but the pervading sense of exaltation and majestic calm was well sustained.

It was in the fugue, we thought, that Mr. Burgin was most effective. Although a fugue may be felt to make an appeal more mathematical than emotional, this one has life and gusto. The subject ends with a snap like a line of skaters "cracking the whip," and the whole fugue bounds and tumbles. Mr. Burgin attacked it forcefully, bringing splendid sonority from the strings and brilliance from the brass. It was impossible to find here the Bach of popular misconception, cold, pedantic, hardly human. Everything danced and stamped.

The audience recalled Mr. Burgin several times. At his insistence, the whole orchestra took a bow.

* * *

Mr. Spalding performed a Mozart concerto in D major, K. 218. He is a man of graceful carriage, with smooth black hair parted somewhat left of centre. He stood reflectively while the orchestra reduced to 18th century court orchestra size, voiced the long introduction. He took a white handkerchief from his breast pocket and unobtrusively rubbed the frog of the bow and the neck of the Stradivarius, giving one the uneasy feeling that he wouldn't come in on time.

But of course he did, and the audience was quickly treated to an exhibition of virtuosity such as has not been heard or seen hereabouts for a long time. He played clearly and restrainedly, producing a tone of great beauty. Throughout he was the serious and masterly musician. The concerto abounds with chances for display—difficult bowing, harmonics, rapid passages, double-stops embellished with trills—and Mr. Spalding made the most of them. But nowhere did he exaggerate. The cadenza in the allegro was performed with such brilliance that the audience broke in at the end of the movement to applaud, and in this they were joined by the orchestra.

The songful andante cantabile showed the full beauty of tone of which the fine instrument was capable, and the rondo brought the concerto to a gay, delightful close.

Mr. Spalding was summoned to the stage half a dozen times by insistent applause. When some members of the orchestra arose for intermission somewhat too soon, they were promptly applauded back into their seats again, while Mr. Spalding was summoned forth for renewed approval.

* * *

After intermission, the Kalinnikoff Symphony No. 1 in G minor was heard through the customary haze of tobacco smoke.

The symphony was written by a man who was a fellow-student with Dr. Koussevitzky in Moscow almost 40 years ago. Although he died young, of tuberculosis, the symphony exhibits no premonitory despondency. It is melodious, and also frequently monotonous. There are curious echoes in it, of Saint-Saens and Wagner and others, so that every now and then one has the impression he has heard it before.

The movements are: Allegro moderato, andante commodamente; scherzo, allegro non troppoe troppo, and finale, allegro moderato, allegro risoluto. The finale was played with all the spirit Mr. Burgin could give it. That was a good deal, and it made a rousing finish for a stimulating evening.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 28 1936

MUSICAL EVENTS

Orchestras, Transient and Resident—Newcomers

THE dressiest audience that Carnegie Hall harbors is the turnout for the Boston Symphony Thursday-evening meetings. It's not only a sartorially effective assembly but also an enthusiastic one. Mr. Koussevitzky receives heavy ovations—and he earns them.

For his first visit of the season, Mr. Koussevitzky gave a little lesson in how to build a program. He started with Haydn's 102nd symphony, followed with Debussy's "La Mer," and closed up the Hall with Beethoven's fifth symphony. Apparently, Mr. Koussevitzky hasn't heard that Haydn wrote only cute music, which must be played by only a third of the orchestra. He used almost all of the boys and he directed the music as if he never had seen a picture of Haydn in a white wig. Haydn became a musical event instead of an exercise in ibbety-bippety.

"La Mer" showed the virtuosity of the orchestra and its maestro, although the performance was somewhat too transparent. This set of three sketches seems to need a scrim, as it were, and Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it in full view of the crowd. It "sounded," however, and it sounded brilliant.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 28 1936

Arthur Fielder and the Boston Sinfonietta, composed of 50 players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be presented by the Pawtucket Civic Music Association in its second concert of the season Thursday evening at 8:30 o'clock in the auditorium of the Pawtucket senior high school.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

NOV 27 1936

Ballet Benefit

After communing with their Pilgrim ancestors the better part of the day, whole families of Bostonians drove to the Opera House last night for the ballet, their curiosities piqued by advance reports of the Symphonie Fantastique, of which Massine is the choreographer and principal dancer. And to dispel the old saying that Boston audiences are cold and difficult to interest were the rounds of applause which followed this presentation, the second on a program designed to benefit the Central New England Sanatorium, Inc., of Rutland, which has a number of distinguished people on its board and an imposing list of patrons for its benefits.

Observed in the gala throng, parading about the lobbies during the entre-actes: Mr. and Mrs. I. Tucker Burr, the latter regal in lame, with Mr. and Mrs. James Amory Sullivan, Mrs. Sullivan in good-looking black and Mr. Sullivan, at the conclusion of the ballets, wearing a very continental evening cloak. . . . Mrs. Augustus Neal Rantoul, a white wrap over her pale blue gown, with her daughter, Miss Charlotte Maud Rantoul, all in white. . . . Dr. and Mrs. Randolph K. Byers, the latter in black velvet. . . . Mrs. Jasper Whiting, emerging from her center box in black with red flowers cascading from her shoulder. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky. . . . Dr. Bayard T. Crane, superintendent of the sanatorium, and Mrs. Crane, whose gown was of gold lame. . . . Dr. and Mrs. Michael E. Murray (Louisa McM. Hopkins). . . . Mr. and Mrs. Joseph C. Rennard, the latter in black velvet, with Mr. and Mrs. Francis A. Harding, Mrs. Harding wearing brilliant scarlet, and her mother, Mrs. Harold Wilson Read.

Still others: Mr. and Mrs. George Bingham of Cambridge, with Mrs. Bingham in luscious blue velvet, and Mr. and Mrs. Richard C. Storey, Mrs. Storey in black. . . . Mrs. George R. Agassiz. . . . Miss Joan Sagendorph, in town from Sarah Lawrence College for Miss Betty Sagendorph's debut Thanksgiving eve, beseiged by young men as she wandered about in a black gown with a tricky red cape scarf. . . . Mrs. S. White Houghton, walking up from Row 1 with an embroidered silver net veil over her face. . . . Mrs. Allan Forbes, whose husband is a member of the board of the sanatorium. . . . Mrs. Paul Drummond Rust, Jr., in a box with her mother and several other guests. . . . Miss Ellen Bottomley in blue and silver net. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Harry K. Cross.

Also: Mrs. Edith Roelker Curtis in black velvet with a fox scarf. . . . Miss Polly Ehrlich with her brother, Henry Ehrlich, a mink coat over her blue net gown. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Alan R. Morse, the latter in black. . . . Miss Marion Little, selling flowers to those in the audience not already bedecked, wearing vivid green. . . .

WORCESTER, MASS.
Nov TELEGRAM 29/36.

ALFRED L. AIKEN TO BE PROMOTED

Former City Banker to Head Insurance Co.

Special to the Telegram

NEW YORK, Nov. 28.—Alfred L. Aiken, vice-president of the New York Life Insurance Co., will be made president of the company early in December, succeeding Thomas A. Buckner, it is reported in financial circles here. Mr. Buckner will be elevated to chairman of the board.

Mr. Aiken was born in Norwich, Conn., in 1870 and became assistant manager of the New England department of the New York Life Insurance Co. in 1894. He later moved to Worcester and held successive positions of president of the Worcester County Institution for Savings and president of the Worcester National Bank.

In 1918 Mr. Aiken moved to Boston and became president of the National Shawmut Bank, a position which he held until 1923. He has been a vice-president of the New York Life Insurance Co. since 1925.

Mr. Aiken was trustee of the Worcester Art Museum from 1909 until 1934, and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1920-1924.

96.

SCRANTON, PA.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 24 1936

Music and Musicians

By D. E. Jon

Beacham is not only the most eminent of British musicians in the interpretive field; he is an artistic figure of unique vitality, fascination, courage, power and genius. There is no one in the least like him. His wit and his sarcasm can be devastating, but he has done more to stimulate and enrich the musical life of England than any other musician of his time. Sir Thomas is so completely without self-consciousness that he does not hesitate to express with his body what he feels about the music he is conducting.

He pays little attention to the conductor's traditional technique. An observer wrote of his compelling gestures that "they threaten and comfort by turns; they exercise, command, entreat; they conjure beauty and mysteriousness from the strings and wood-wind, and Jovian blasts from trombones and percussion by means of the most brilliant gymnastic and pugilistic display of arms and fists to be seen today outside the prize-ring." It is clear that Beacham does not care in the least if his behavior strikes the audience as funny or grotesque; he is not thinking of the audience; they can jolly well like it or not so far as he is concerned.

Conductor

John Barbirolli, a young Englishman of Franco-Italian parentage, is now conductor of the Philharmonic in New York. As a young man of 30, and despite the influence and prestige of Sir Henry Wood, Beacham, Landon Ronald, Adrian Boult and Hamilton Harty, old and seasoned conductors, he made musical London sit up and take notice. The effects he obtains are the result of complete understanding between orchestra and conductor. He does not waste time expounding questionable tenets, but sticks to the business in hand; his requests to the players are made in that simple technical language they understand. As an exstring player (he was, like Toscanini, an excellent cellist), he knows what phrasing can do for a musical work, and he insists that phrasing should conform to his conception, going over the same passage again and again until the desired effect is obtained. This, too, is what the hard-bitten professional player understands, and rehearsals with Barbirolli have always the effect of making the men determined to do their best for him.

Stokowski, fiery leader of the Philadelphia Orchestra, stands sensationally prominent before the orchestral public, is a great disciplinarian, and really cruel in rehearsals. He was born not only with the will and passion to conduct an orchestra but with the element of the personally picturesque and the inherent capacity to lead men, and to impress himself as a figure upon audiences, which means so much in any public career, and especially in that of a conductor.

His approach to an audience is famous and very effective; it cannot be said that it is merely a stage trick—it is indicative of Stokowski's nature—the sudden emergence of the blonde one from the wings, his quick advance to the platform, his masterful precipitation of the music. There is really something of electricity and genius, something of flaming youth when he steps on the rostrum with something in his face and the set of the body which indicates what he is going to do. Stokowski, showmanship and all, with his erratic ways, his sudden speeches about this and that, his experiments with lights, instruments, and heaven knows what other strange combinations, is a man and conductor of genius, made up of forces and temperament, born to step out before men and women too, and stir and sway them.

Same in Rank

Comparing Stokowski with Toscanini is wasted time. They differ in temperament certainly, but that is not a difference in rank. Toscanini may be said to be the kinder of the two, Stokowski the juster. Better to thank God that we are living in so generous an age—one that gives us two great conductors.

There is another conductor in America whose approach to an audience is decorum, dignity, polite self-possession and deference combined. He is Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony. Before coming to Boston in 1924 he had swept the musical and fashionable audiences of the great European cities before him. And since he came, the Boston Symphony began to climb with increasing rapidity out of the decline which it had fallen into since the debacle of Carl Muck and the various events attendant upon the catastrophe of the war. Koussevitzky proved no simple or easy master in rehearsals, and there were groans and rebellious and slanderous attacks from front and rear. The man from Russia smiled amiably, but there was somewhere an iron hand beneath a fashionable and soft-surfaced glove.

(To be concluded.)

WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS

NOV 27 1936

ORCHESTRAS PLAY TO GREAT CROWDS

Substitution Of 'Unknown' Directors Fails To Reduce Metropolitan Audiences

Business Proves Better And Subscription Sales Are Better Than Last Year

NEW YORK (AP)—New York hears its young-old Philharmonic-Symphony Society throughout the winter. It also hears ten concerts each per winter from Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony, and from Leopold Stokowski's Philadelphia Orchestra.

Two of these three orchestras have undergone major operations this fall. Many patrons and many observers and most managers stroked their beards in the spring, and came out with the idea that these major operations would most likely reduce audiences this winter. They were wrong.

Philadelphia's noble band "lost" Stokowski. That is, Stokowski became so enamored of the movies and their mass possibilities that he asked his directors to elect a permanent conductor for three years, leavinb him free to conduct as little as he chose.

Playing to Packed Houses

They picked Eugene Ormandy. Hitherto, the Philadelphia has played to packed houses in New York. This winter it is doing the same. And last Tuesday, when Stokowski came to town with an all-Russian program which included Sergei Rachmaninoff's brand new Third Symphony, the last minute people just didn't get into Carnegie Hall.

The Philharmonic is, however, even more astonished. Last spring Arturo Toscanini departed these shores forever, saying among other things, it is declared, that the Philharmonic is the greatest orchestra ever assembled. The Philharmonic directors at once set their sails to fit what they thought would be a period of calm—they cut down the season six weeks, and expected reduced business.

Business Is Better

But they didn't get reduced business; business is better. Subscription sales are actually ahead of last winter. John Barbirolli, the young Italian-French-English conductor, is not only doing well at the box office, he is doing well on the podium.

Partly this is musical ability, partly the public's curiosity, and (oddly enough) partly tact. No musician ever stood in hotter shoes than Barbirolli a week and three days ago when he began the first piece he ever conducted on American soil—Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture. Many thoughtless persons, even a reviewer or so, had spoken of him as an "unknown" chosen to "replace" Toscanini.

Makes Hit With Musicians

Barbirolli extracted himself from his hot spot neatly by frankly admitting wonder at being chosen, by disclaiming any intention of "replacing" anybody, by declaring that he was a young man trying to make a living. He had won the men of the orchestra. Now he seems to be winning the public.

Koussevitzky brings his Bostonese to town for the first time this season next Thursday. He always plays to packed houses, and he never yet has engineered a publicity stunt to pack them. By now he is accustomed to being pointed out as the supreme American example of what a superlative orchestra can accomplish when left to one conductor through a period of years.

Cont.

Symphony Concert Series

By WILLIAM T. CHASE, JR.

Fresh from an extremely successful visit to New York and vicinity last week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon played the seventh program of the regular series in Symphony Hall with Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, conducting. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was enjoying his customary brief vacation at this time. In his absence Mr. Burgin selected an interesting program opening with Bach's Toccata in C major for organ as orchestrated by Leo Weiner, continuing with Hindemith's symphony, "Mathis der Maler" ("Matthias the Painter") and closing with Kalinnikov's Symphony No. 1 in G minor.

Offhand this arrangement of pieces appeared to have been chosen at random. Actually, as was evident at the close of the afternoon, they were admirably suited the one to the other, contrasting and yet not swearing at each other. This was particularly so in the case of the Hindemith and the Kalinnikov. The Bach naturally made an effective opening and at the same time, in somewhat indirect fashion, established a mood suitable to the modern piece that followed it. For Paul Hindemith's polyphony drew heavily on the counterpoint of Bach, and this fact was thus cleverly emphasized by the program maker yesterday.

Cont.

The "Mathis der Maler" Symphony was first performed here in December of 1934 under the leadership of Mr. Burgin. It consisted of three excerpts from the opera of the same name written by Hindemith on the life of Matthias Gruenewald, painter of the 16th century. Another hearing of the work tended to increase our opinion of it. The clarity and conciseness of the development and the mastery of musical expression were notable evidences of Hindemith's growth as a composer. Especially fine was the third movement depicting "The Temptation of Saint Anthony." There Hindemith's imagination swept over a great range of tones, heightening now and again a crescendo passage by a dramatic silence.

Portions of the "Angelic Concert" and "Entombment" movements were of the same fine calibre, yet there were times when an overabundance of polyphony tended to interfere with the musical thought. However, the clarinet was delightfully used in the second movement, and other measures were of great beauty. Nevertheless the audience received the "Mathis de Maler" with seeming indifference, reserving a full measure of applause for the Kalinnikov Symphony.

This first Symphony in G minor of Basil Kalinnikov was played by the orchestra in 1921 and then given by the Peoples Symphony in February of 1935. It proved a rather lengthy work of considerable charm. Unquestionably easy to listen to, so to speak, the Symphony immediately caught the fancy of those present. Throughout the afternoon Mr. Burgin conducted extremely well, demonstrating a thorough knowledge of the scores before him, and maintaining excellent orchestral proportions. The concert will be repeated tonight.

'JOB' PRESENTED BY PHILHARMONIC

N. Y. Times

Dance Pantomime by Vaughan Williams Is Novelty at Carnegie Hall.

Nov. 27/36

WEBER WORK ALSO GIVEN

Robert Casadesus Is Soloist for 'Concert-Piece' and Excels in His Interpretation.

By OLIN DOWNES

The novelty of the concert given by John Barbirolli and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony last night in Carnegie Hall was the orchestral suite arranged from the music that Vaughan Williams composed for a dance pantomime in nine scenes, "Job," the scenario—after pictures by William Blake—by Geoffrey Keyens and Gwendolen Raverat. This work was performed with dancers at the Lewisohn Stadium last August. The performers were Ruth St. Denis, Ted Shawn and the Denishawn Dancers. It was Mr. Shawn's choreography. Last night was the first concert performance of the music in America.

This is music for the dance. As such, certain pages sound superfluous and somewhat conventionalized in the concert hall. Under these conditions the suite could well be shortened. But it contains magnificent pages, pages in which the composer utilizes archaic tonalities and pastoral rhythms in a way which must be singularly appropriate to the biblical spectacle. The finest pages, those which haunt the memory and carry a true impression of Blakian simplicity and grandeur, are the introduction, especially in its concluding pages, and the music for Job's reconciliation with his lot, and the adoration of the Lord God.

Here are pages of an eloquence and simplicity which are not hackneyed. At the same time this is decorative music, not symphonic commentary or romantic introspection. It is music of symbolical figures and designs. There is masterly orchestration.

Work of Master Technician

It need not be claimed that this music approaches the "Pastoral" Symphony by the same composer in depth of feeling and beauty. It is an entirely different thing, different in intention, method, design. It is the work of a master technician and artist. Yet having heard noble and moving measures, the listener was reminded of the greater Williams, the tone poet and worshiper of nature, and desired the more to hear other works by him.

The soloist at this concert was the pianist, Robert Casadesus, who played twice, and whose performance, in particular, of the Weber "Concert-Piece" was a thing to be remembered. Today there are few pianists capable of adequately interpreting this piece. The technic is somewhat old-fashioned, but very difficult. More difficult is the naïve and chivalric vein of the music.

Imagine, in the year 1936, the tale! A chatelaine, a knight off on the Crusades, forsooth! The lady's fears and longings, the return of the knight from the Holy Land, where she fancied him long dead. And now the alarums of trumpets, the joyous procession, the acclaim by the populace of the triumphant lord. Only the composer of "Freischuetz" would be capable of writing such a gallant and dashing piece for piano and orchestra on the basis of such a fantasy.

Mr. Casadesus, with the intuition and comprehension of the master interpreter, as well as the skill of the consummate virtuoso, played Weber's music with the elegance, the song, the velocity, the swank that so eminently fitted the music's style. He had everything needed to recreate this delightful old piece—first, the imaginative and stylistic response; secondly, very fleet fingers, wrists of steel, and what a glissando! He was, by turns, lyrical, showy and dramatic in bravura playing. And he had within himself the youthfulness and freshness of spirit that kindled the music into flame.

Franck Work Is Played

Mr. Casadesus's second performance was of the Cesar Franck "variations symphoniques," a performance at once lucid and brilliant. The music stems from Liszt and also Schumann, and of course its harmonic essence is Franck's chromaticism. The wonder is that one does not tire, in his treatment of his theme, of this chromaticism which may so easily become overrich and pall on the ear.

Mr. Casadesus, rightfully, played the music to a different scale and in a different manner than that of Weber. He gave the "Variations" more than a creditable performance, and would have been recognized enthusiastically for this performance alone. But it is easier to play them as he did than to give his memorable performance of Weber's music.

The other orchestral compositions of the evening were Elgar's transcription, for huge orchestra and organ, of a Handel overture in D minor, and the "Meistersinger" prelude. Elgar's transcription is overstuffed and over-orchestrated, so that Handel's piece, originally of modest proportions, appears distorted, swollen and in poor taste.

Mr. Barbirolli, interpreting the Meistersinger prelude, gave one of the best performances that thus far he has offered in this city. The score, of course, is familiar to everybody, to every conductor and every orchestra. That does not diminish the fact of the fine proportion, the admirably chosen tempi and the stirring enthusiasm of a young musician on firm ground and in love with his task.

It should also be said that the orchestral part of Weber's piece was in all respects admirable, and that, in general, some of Mr. Barbirolli's most successful moments have come with his accompaniments of soloists.

Mexico May Expropriate Bull Ring in the Capital

By The Associated Press

MEXICO, D. F., Nov. 2[illegible].—There were reliable reports tonight that the first application of the new Wealth Distribution Law would be government expropriation of the city's bull ring.

The reports were advanced after workers petitioned Congress to let them operate the amusement center under the Expropriation Law.

Legislation recently directed formation of a public beneficence society to share in profits of the bull ring and subsequent litigation over this measure has delayed start of the bull-fight season. Prospects now are that the season won't be opened before January.

The Wealth Expropriation Act was passed last week by the Mexican Legislature. Providing for government expropriation of property for the good of the State, it became law with publication yesterday in the official gazette.

NEW YORK MIRROR

NOV 29 1936

Mr. Giovanni Martinelli sang the title role in "Otello" Friday night and earned the vociferous acclaim of an exacting audience . . . A "lost" symphony by Muzio Clementi, traced down by Alfredo Casella, will be given a first American hearing by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston next Friday night.

97

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

NOV 27 1936

"Lost" Masterpiece To Be Presented By Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Nov. 27—A symphonic masterpiece which vanished mysteriously more than a century ago will be given its first performance in America by the Boston Symphony orchestra next Friday, it was announced today,

Behind the belated discovery of the long-lost orchestral score lies the story of a remarkable feat of sleuthing by a world-famous musician, Alfredo Casella, the Italian composer who formerly was conductor of the Boston Symphony "Pop" concerts.

The work is "Symphony in D Major," by Muzio Clementi, Italian composer, who died in England in 1832 at the age of 80.

At Clementi's death the musical world was astonished to learn that despite his fame as creator of 20 symphonies, contemporaneously performed and highly praised, not one was found among his effects.

In 1817 a German periodical had reported him at work on six symphonies which he intended as his greatest musical legacy. Exactly a century later, an English musicologist, Dr. William Cummings, died, leaving a large sheaf of Clementi orchestral manuscripts.

Carl Engel, chief of the music division of the Library of Congress, acquired the entire lot for his department.

The Clementi manuscripts comprised 932 pages shuffled together in such disorder that nobody seemed to find time to assemble and appraise them.

But in 1924 a French scholar went to Washington, inspected the manuscripts, and wrote an article hinting at their potential value.

It was this article which fired Casella's curiosity, though a decade elapsed before he found an opportunity to study the manuscripts.

First, he discovered four symphonies, complete except for defective first movements. Three of them he pieced together from the hodgepodge of papers. Baffled as to the oppening movement of a "Symphony in D Major," he finally recalled that the British museum possesses Clementi manuscripts, acquired in 1881 and catalogued as "sketches."

Was it possible, Casella reasoned, that they were mislabeled?

Armed with photostatic copies of the Washington manuscripts, he hastened to London where he found that one of the supposed sketches was the first movement of the "Symphony in D Major"—far from a sketch—complete in every respect."

It is this reconstituted work which will be performed here next Friday.

"This symphony has great charm and shows masterly instrumentation," Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony conductor, reported after studying its pages.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

NOV 28 1936

AT the end of April, 1937, the Boston Symphony orchestra will bring to a close the 56th season of its illustrious history, and the 13th under the conductorship of its Russian leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the conductorship of Dr. Koussevitzky, will play in Elmwood Music hall, Tuesday evening, Dec. 8, the concert being the fourth in the series sponsored by Mrs. Zorah B. Berry.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 29 1936

Paul Althouse, Metropolitan tenor, will return here next week for rehearsals at the Metropolitan Opera House. During the past month the tenor has been soloist with the Boston Symphony in a performance of "Das Lied von der Erde," and has appeared with the Cleveland Orchestra in "Tannhaeuser," and with the St. Louis Orchestra in Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 28 1936

Boston Symphony Will Present Long-Lost Italian Masterpiece

"Symphony in D Major" by Muzio Clementi, Which Vanished Century Ago, Was Traced by Alfredo Casella.—To Be Played Next Friday

Boston, Nov. 27.—(UP)—A long-lost Italian symphonic masterpiece will be given its first performance in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday, it was announced today.

The orchestral score—"Symphony in D-major" by Muzio Clementi, Italian composer who died in England in 1832 at the age of 80—vanished mysteriously more than a century ago.

Behind its belated discovery lies the story of a remarkable sleuthing feat by a world-famed musician, Alfredo Casella, the Italian composer who formerly was conductor of the Boston Symphony "pops" concerts.

At Clementi's death the musical world was astonished to learn that despite his fame as creator of 20 symphonies, contemporaneously performed and highly praised, not one was found among his effects.

In 1817 a German periodical had reported him at work on six symphonies which he intended as his greatest musical legacy. Exactly a century later, an English musicologist, Dr. William Cummings, died, leaving a large sheaf of Clementi orchestral manuscripts.

Carl Engel, chief of the Music Division of the Library of Congress, acquired the entire lot for his department.

The Clementi manuscripts comprised 932 pages shuffled together in such disorder that nobody seemed to find time to assemble and appraise them.

In 1924, however, a French scholar went to Washington, inspected the manuscripts, and wrote an article hinting at their potential value. It was this article that fired Casella's curiosity, though a decade elapsed before he found opportunity to study them.

First, he discovered four symphonies, complete except for defective first movements. Three of them he pieced together from the hodgepodge of papers. Baffled as to the opening movement of a "Symphony in D-major," he finally recalled that the British Museum possessed two Clementi manuscripts, acquired in 1881 and catalogued as "sketches".

Was it possible, Casella reasoned, that they were mislabelled?

Armed with photostatic copies of the Washington manuscripts, he hastened to London, where he found that one of the supposed sketches was the first movement of the "Symphony in D-major"—far from a sketch—complete in every respect.

It is this reconstituted work which will be performed here next Friday.

"This symphony has great charm and shows masterly instrumentation," Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony's conductor, reported after studying its pages.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

Symphony Lost for Century To Get Premiere in America

Work of Muzio Clementi, Which Disappeared With His Death in 1832, Will Be Given Its First Performance in U. S. by Boston Orchestra Next Friday

By the United Press.

BOSTON, Nov. 28.—A symphonic masterpiece which vanished mysteriously more than a century ago will be given its first performance in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday, it was announced.

The work is "Symphony in D Major," by Muzio Clementi. Italian composer, who died in England in 1832 at the age of 80.

At Clementi's death the musical world was astonished to learn that despite his fame as creator of 20 symphonies, contemporaneously performed and highly praised, not one was found among his effects. Exactly a century later, an English musicologist, Dr. William Cummings, died, leaving a large sheaf of Clementi orchestral manuscripts.

The Clementi manuscripts, comprising 932 pages, were shuffled together in such disorder that nobody seemed to find time to assemble and appraise them.

But in 1924 a French scholar went to Washington, inspected the manuscripts, and wrote an article hinting at their potential value.

It was this article which fired the curiosity of Alfredo Casella, former conductor of the Boston Symphony "Pop" Concerts. He discovered four symphonies, complete except for defetive first movements. Three of them he pieced together from the hodge-podge of papers.

Baffled as to the opening movement of a "Symphony in D Major," he finally realled that the British Museum possessed two Clementi manuscripts, acquired in 1881 and catalogued as "sketches." He hastened to London, where he found that one of the supposed sketches was the first movement of the "Symphony in D Major"—far from a sketch—complete in every respect.

DENVER, COLO.
Rocky Mountain News

NOV 29 1936

Symphony Revived After 100 Years

Boston Orchestra Will Play Work by Clementi

BOSTON, Nov. 28.—(AP)—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance next Friday afternoon when the Boston orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, plays the symphony in D major by the Americanized Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musicologists credit Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were held in high regard by Beethoven and Haydn and who as an established pianist gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Liszt, then 13 years old, was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other 14 symphonies. Yet when he died in 1832, bequeathing all his manuscripts to his widow, none but sonata scores could be found.

DANVILLE, VA.
REGISTER

NOV 29 1936

WILL REVIVE OLD SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra to Play Clementi's Symphony in D Major Next Friday

BOSTON, Nov. 28—(AP)—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance Friday afternoon when the Boston orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, plays the symphony in D major by the anglocized Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musicologists credit Alferdo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pop orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were held in high regard by Beethoven, Haydn and other masters, and who as an established pianist gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Lizi, then 13 years old, was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity, between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other fourteen symphonies.

Yet when he died in 1832, bequeathing all his manuscripts, to his widow, none but Sonata scores could be found.

Two manuscripts came into the possession of the British museum in 1871. Unconnected, they merely intensified the search for the others. In 1917, Dr. William H. Cummings, a London music scholar, died, and in in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder.

A public auction in London soon resulted in their purchase by Carl Engel, chief of the music division for the Library of Congress of the United States.

In 1924, a magazine article concerning the Washington scores picqued the curiosity of Casella who ten years later crossed the ocean to begin serious study of the scores. Putting them together was similar to reassembling several jig-saw puzzles at once. Nevertheless, hard work yielded four symphonies last year, although in each the first movement was incomplete.

Recalling the two manuscripts held in the British museum, Casella went to London, armed with photostatic copies of the Washington library scores. Careful work restored all four, and two were performed and published last year.

The first, third and fourth required some slight filling in by Casella, but the second, which will be performed Friday, was complete, and received its first performance under Casella in Rome last January.

BECKLEY, W. VA.
RALEIGH-REGISTER

NOV 29 1936

Support for Recitals

For the same reason we wanted everyone to hear the recital at the Presbyterian church Friday night, we hope everyone who is not attending another church today will go to the musical service at the Methodist Temple.

To those who do not like or enjoy music, this is not addressed. We see no reason for asking them to support something which they do not appreciate; at least, it is futile to ask it.

But those who do like music should give these programs the support of their attendance. With the ever mounting importance of the radio and the movies, the art of music is in danger of suffering the same fate that overtook baseball. The prominence given to the big leagues by the newspapers—and later by the radio—made that branch of baseball so well known and appreciated by sports fans throughout the country that the big leagues have grown wealthy; but at the same time the support of college and high school teams fell off to such extent that this branch of athletics has been abandoned by many schools. Consequently, the big leagues have more and more difficulty each year finding player recruits.

Everyone knows now the finest music may be heard at regular periods throughout the week on radio. The Philadelphia symphony, the New York Philharmonic, the Boston symphony, Pittsburgh symphony, the Chicago, Cleveland and Minneapolis symphonies—not to mention the creditable orchestras built by the broadcasting companies, themselves—give us regularly now music programs which are the equal of any the world has ever known.

But is this to be allowed to kill the interest in our musicians at home? We hope not. We overheard someone Friday night comparing one rendition to the playing of the same composition by the Philadelphia symphony. Whether the criticism was favable or unfavorable is beside the point. It was not the Philadelphia symphony playing; it was a group of our own people who, at the request of some friends, rehearsed a program of fine music and presented it merely for the enjoyment of their friends. And they did it extremely well.

The audience was larger than we had expected it would be, but it should have been larger. We hope that everyone who was there will tell all their friends how good it really was; and that they will encourage the musicians to perform again.

MONTGOMERY, ALA.
ADVERTISER

NOV 29 1936

Bostonians To Hear Symphony 100 Years Old

BOSTON, Nov. 28.—(AP)—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance Friday afternoon when the Boston Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, plays the symphony in D Major of the Amgnlicized Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musiologists credit Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist, scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pop Orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were held in high regard by Beethoven, Haydn and other masters, and who as an established pianist gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Liszt, then 13 years old, was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity, between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other 14 symphonies.

Yet when he died in 1832, bequeathing all his manuscripts to his widow, none but sonata scores could be found.

Two manuscripts came into the possession of the British Museum in 1871. Unconnected, they merely intensified the search for the others. In 1917, Dr. William H. Cummings, a London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder.

A public auction in London soon resulted in their purchase by Carl Engel, chief of the music division for the library of Congress of the United States.

In 1924, a magazine article concerning the Washington scores picqued the curiosity of Casella who 10 years later crossed the ocean to begin serious study of the scores. Putting them together was similar to reassembling several jig-saw puzzles at once. Nevertheless, hard work yielded four symphonies last year, although in each of the first movement was incomplete.

Recalling the two manuscripts held in the British Museum, Casella went to London, armed with photostatic copies of the Washington Library scores. Careful work restored all four, and two were performed and published last year.

The first, third and fourth required some slight filling in by Casella, but the second, which will be performed Friday, was complete, and received its first performance under Casella in Rome last January.

Dr. Koussevitzky first learned of the scores from Casella, and after studying them minutely the last few weeks, described the music as possessing "great charm and brilliance."

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 29 1936

BOSTON'S SUPERLATIVE SYMPHONY

Can one stand upon a peak and yet serve the people who dwell on the plain? It is not easy for any institution to achieve eminence. It is harder, still, after climbing the pinnacle, to retain hold upon a broad public—to be admired not in a passive way only but also with active appreciation, giving thousands of men and women enjoyment of a living kind, heartfelt not lip-spoken

The Boston Symphony Orchestra fulfills these two roles so rarely combined Throughout America, as in Europe, its excellence has become known Its repute has invaluable power to sustain the name of this city as a center of merit At the same time the orchestra, wherever it goes, gives vital and inspiring delight.

Fresh reports have just come of the pleasure which this Boston group offered at the first of its new season's concerts held last week in New York The critics rose to an enthusiasm alsmost electric. "Unsurpassed," said one. Another declared that after the opening B-flat unison of the Haydn symphony which began the program, the orchestra "had only to exhibit the tone of those lengendary strings in the singing phrase that followed it, to make us aware that one of the greatest companies of musicians in the world was playing again for our delight. . . . Mr. Koussevitzky and his players were at their irresistible best."

So the band which was the first great symphony orchestra ever established in America holds its place at the top, whether on occasional visits to New York or in regular concerts to the number of 60 in Boston and eight in the city of Cambridge, besides others at distant points.—From the Boston Transcript.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

NOV 29 1936

From Century's Oblivion Comes Aged Symphony

Music Detective Puts Together Pieces of Clementi Manuscript

BOSTON, Mass., Nov. 28 (AP).—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance next Friday afternoon when the Boston orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, plays the Symphony in D Major by the Americanized Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musicologists credit Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were held in high regard by Beethoven and Haydn and who as an established pianist gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Liszt, then 13 years old, was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity, between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other fourteen symphonies.

Yet when he died in 1832, bequeathing all his manuscripts to his widow, none but sonata scores could be found.

Clementi was a practical man of affairs, and his large estate was in good order. But his symphonies never had been printed and they dropped from public knowledge for the next forty years.

Two manuscripts came into the possession of the British museum in 1871, but, unconnected, they merely intensified the fruitless search for the others.

Finds Manuscripts.

Then in 1917 Dr. William H. Cummings, a London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder.

A public auction in London soon resulted in their purchase by Carl Engel, chief of the music division for the Library of Congress of the United States.

In 1924 a magazine article concerning the Washington scores figured the curiosity of Casella, who had been intensely interested in earning recognition for Clementi as a great symphonist. Ten years passed before Casella finally crossed the ocean to begin serious study of the scores.

Putting them together was similar to reassembling several jig-saw puzzles at once. Nevertheless, hard work yielded four symphonies last year, although in each the first movement was incomplete.

Recalling the two manuscripts held in the British Museum, Casella went to London, armed with photostatic copies of the Washington library scores. Careful work restored all four, and two were performed and published last year.

The first, third and fourth required some slight filling in by Casella, but the second, which will be performed Friday, was complete, and received its first performance under Casella in Rome last January.

Dr. Koussevitzky first learned of the scores from Casella, and after studying them minutely the last few weeks, described the music as possessing great charm and brilliance.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
Morning Star-Telegram

NOV 29 1936

Old Symphony To Be Played At Last

BOSTON, Nov. 28 (AP).—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance next Friday afternoon when the Boston orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, plays the Symphony in D Major by the Americanized Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musicologists credit Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-scholar and former conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

Cont.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Symphonies Popular.

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity, between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other 14 symphonies.

Yet when he died in 1832, none but sonata scores could be found.

Two manuscripts came into the possession of the British Museum in 1871, but, unconnected, they merely intensified the fruitless search for the others.

Then in 1917, Dr. William H. Cummings, a London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder.

A public auction in London soon resulted in their purchase by Carl Engel, chief of the music division for the Library of Congress of the United States.

Curiosity Piqued.

In 1924, a magazine article concerning the Washington scores piqued the curiosity of Casella, who had been intensely interested in earning recognition for Clementi as a great symphonist.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

NOV 28 1936

Radio Today

By AARON STEIN

The National Broadcasting Company has announced plans for taking an active interest in the radio listening habits of South and Central Americans. It seems that some more enterprising Europeans have been talking to South America for years, and NBC thinks that it was high time they were listening to us.

John F. Royal, NBC vice-president in charge of programs, has left for a 17,000-mile trip through Mexico, Central and South America to arrange for extensive exchanges of broadcasts between the two continents.

Bid for Attention

"We definitely are entering the competition for listeners in Latin America," Royal declared before he left. "Germany, England and other European countries have been building programs for South America for several years. The United States, to which our neighbors to the south naturally look for a mutual exchange of entertainment and ideas, has stood by and let Europe capture the attention of South American listeners. Now the National Broadcasting Company is going out to take its rightful place on American dials below the Rio Grande."

To this statement NBC adds in a rather less truculent tone the information that no propaganda in any language will be broadcast and that all the programs sent to Latin America will be typical of American ideals.

Specific Material

Among the suggested material which NBC might broadcast in the direction of the southern hemisphere are the Metropolitan Opera, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, championship prizefights, football games and educational features. We have a suspicion that our Latin neighbors might prefer Amos 'n' Andy.

Generally, however, we seem unable to catch the spirit of the thing. We cannot work up any real feeling of the vast importance of capturing all that attention away from England and Germany, even for the Boston Symphony and football games. Does NBC have the idea that we ought to be the biggest noise in this part of the world?

Domestic Radio

There comes to us an encouraging report that indicates that we are not alone in the belief that the radio audience has grown up to the point where it can absorb all four movements of a symphony, offered consecutively, without suffering any irreparable damage. A few weeks ago we had occasion to praise Alfred Wallenstein for doing on one of his WOR broadcasts all of the Brahms First Symphony instead of a single movement.

Since then we have learned that this broadcast brought Mr. Wallenstein more than a hundred letters devoted to expressing pleasure at the opportunity to hear a whole symphony. One letter writer identified himself as a bricklayer. It seems time, therefore, that we had more such performances for our sake and for the sake of the bricklayers.

---

105 BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN 29/31

The Week's Music In New York

The "New" Second Symphony Of Schubert And Some French And American Novelties

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

NEW YORK.

ONCE more it is orchestras that have occupied our musical attention, with the regular Philharmonic Symphony appearances, the special concert of the same organization for the benefit of the pension fund, and visits from both the Bostonians and the Philadelphians. There was also some new music, and a new-old novelty in Schubert's Second Symphony, which, as far as can be discovered, has never before been played in this country.

THE "NEW" SCHUBERT WORK

To begin with, the Schubert work. It was composed in 1815 when Schubert was only 18, the same year as "The Erlking," and although it was published in the middle 'eighties, was still a novelty here. The tonality is B Flat Major. It is short, in four movements, with the first and second movements, the latter an andante, the most interesting.

Schubert's fondness for tunes, especially those of a folk character, is evident, but the minuetto is rather heavy, elephants cavorting with flopping ears rather than marquises bowing with outspread fan. As a whole, the work seems uncorrelated, here and there, and material, often good, not developed to the best advantage. It has, though, a freshness and a charm that many more sophisticated orchestral works conspicuously lack.

Mr. Barbirolli also played the Prelude to "Tristan und Isolde" much too slowly, and the "Liebestod" with too much delving into subsidiary parts. It was an ungrateful reading as a whole. Hulda Lashanska was again the soloist, but we will not speak of that.

The pension-fund concert began with the "Enigma" Variations of Elgar which some people like. Bach's Concerto for four pianos, really a transcription of Vivaldi's work for four violins, was played by Mischa Levitzky, Frank Sheridan, Beveridge Webster and Eugene List. Brahm's Second Symphony was the major work, only fairly well given, then Mozart's lovely "Kleine Nachtmusik" sounding gloriously with the Philharmonic's seventy string players. The "Meistersinger" Overture was the closing work.

"YOUNG FRANCE" IN MUSIC

Mr. Koussevitzky gave us the first local performance of a work by one of the new group of French composers calling themselves "La Jeune France." Its members, so far no more than names on this side of the Atlantic, are Olivier Messiaen, the composer in question; Daniel Lesure, Yves Baudrier and Andre Jolivet. The "Group des Six," Honegger, Auric, Milhaud, Poulenc et al., have apparently become old hat.

Messiaen is a native of Avignon with memories of the Papacy in his blood probably, for the work played is entitled "Les Offrandes Oubliees," which being interpreted is "Forgotten Oblations." It is supposed "to express with the utmost possibility of emotion and sincerity the truths of the Catholic faith."

The three sections are "The Cross," "Sin" and "The Eucharist." The first section was reflective, with much of the old chant supplied with modern harmonies; the second was a headlong bit, the sinner, probably, rushing violently down a steep place into the sea. The third section is directed by the composer to be played, "avec une grande pitie et un grand amour," which is a large order in itself.

The impression as a whole was of good though not highly ponderable music composed with definite sincerity. We await what the rest of the group may bring forth.

YOUNG AMERICA, TOO

Mr. Stokowski brought out two new works, "Arizona" a tone poem by Victor Young, and "Two American Frescoes for Large Orchestra" by Bernard Rogers. Mr. Young, who has been a violinist and also written "song hits," leaned rather heavily on Wagner, but then, practically every post-Wagnerian composer has done that. There were prospectors' camps and things more or less remotely connected, musically, with that sort of thing. The work was well received.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE 98.5.

NOV 29 1936

Virginia Morgan To Play at Mills

VIRGINIA MORGAN, harpist, known throughout Europe and the United States as a soloist and also as a member of the Morgan Trio, will present a recital in the Mills College Hall for Chamber Music Wednesday evening.

Born in Providence, Rhode Island, Miss Morgan began the study of the harp at the age of nine. For a time she studied 'cello with the famous 'cellist, Josef Adamowski, while continuing her harp studies with Alfred Holy, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Then she went to Europe, and enrolled in the National Conservatory of Paris, under Tournier.

With her sisters, Marguerite, pianist, and Frances, violinist, Miss Morgan toured Europe in concert, as the Morgan Trio. At the same time she was gaining renown as a harp soloist.

As a member of the trio she has given "command" performances at Kensington Place for Princess Beatrice, three times on the Riviera for the Duke of Connaught, for Princess Louise, Duchess of Argyle. She has played concerts for Mussolini, for the Kings of Denmark and Sweden, and for President Doumergue of France, as well as at the White House in the United States.

Miss Morgan's program on Wednesday at Mills will include works of Bach, Sammartini, Respighi, Marot, Renic, Torgerson, Albeniz, Tournier, Rousseau, Debussy and Grandjany.

* * *

DURING the fortnight beginning December 3, the Mills College choir will present six programs before various groups in Metropolitan Oakland, according to announcement made by Luther Brusie Marchant, director of the choir.

Two programs are planned for December 3. The first will be given at noon before a group of women of the First Congregational Church in Oakland. During the afternoon the choir will appear at the pre-Christmas meeting of the Mills Club.

On Sunday, December 13, the choir will take part in the annual campus Christmas play, which this year will be presented in Lisser Hall at 7:30 o'clock in the evening, under the direction of Miss L. Louise Stephens, assistant professor of speech and dramatic art.

A heavy schedule, which will test the mettle of the choir as real troopers, is planned for December 14, when three programs will be presented. At noon the choir will present a program at the luncheon meeting of the Hayward Rotary Club. Returning to the campus they will give a repeated performance of the Christmas play. In the evening the choir will take part in the annual College Christmas Sing, which is held at the base of the large living tree on the campus in front of the Student Union.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the second concert of the Monday evening series in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening. The Second Pianoforte Concerto of Leo Sowerby, the composer of Chicago, will then have its first performance. The soloist will be Joseph Brinkman, a musician who also has studied in Chicago and is at present connected with the Music School of Ann Arbor. Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with Mozart's Symphony in C major No. 34, K. 338, and the Symphony of César Franck in D minor.

At the Eighth regular pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, December 4 and 5. Koussevitzky will live the first performances in America of a Symphony in D by Muzio Clementi, which after having been lost for nearly one hundred years was acquired in a London auction sale by the Congressional Library of Washington. It was revised by Alfredo Casella, and performed under his direction at Rome at the beginning of the present year. Clementi was a contemporary of Beethoven whose symphonies were much applauded and highly praised in their time. The newly discovered symphonies are considered to reveal a genius hitherto no more than suspected in their composer. The second portion of the programme will consist of three Wagnerian numbers: the Siegfried Idyll, the Overture to "Tannhauser," and excerpts from the third set of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." These include the Introduction, the Dance of the Apprentices, and the Assemblage of the Mastersingers. As an opening number, Koussevitzky will present the Sixth Concerto Grosso of Handel for string orchestra.

99.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 29 1936

Four Opera Performances Billed Here Coming Week

New England Company's Singers Coming for One Appearance, San Carlo Company for Three Presentations Following.

OPERA and then more opera has a dominant position in the musical affairs of the week. The New England Grand Opera Company makes its third annual appearance here Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Theatre and the San Carlo Opera Company comes Friday for three evening performances at the same theatre.

Of special interest is the concert for young people Saturday afternoon in the Metropolitan presented under the auspices of the Parents' League of Providence, assisted by the Rhode Island Congress of Parents and Teachers. The program will be given by Martha Baird, pianist, and the Providence Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Wassili Leps, conductor.

In Pawtucket the Civic Music Association will offer Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Sinfonietta, consisting of 50 players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as its second concert of the season Thursday night in the senior high school. The program will include the Overture to Rossini's "Barber of Seville," Brahms's First Symphony and a group of modern numbers.

As previously announced, Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" and Leoncavallo's "I Pagliacci" will be the double bill with which the New England Grand Opera Company will inaugurate its third season in the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday night at 8:15 o'clock. Under the direction of Danilo Sciotti, the following singers will appear in the Mascagni one-act opera: Mlle. Mathilde Bastulli, Mlle. Ann Manfredi, Mlle. Harriet Eden, Sig. Giuseppe Barsotti and Sig. Ciro de Ritis. Those in "I Pagliacci" will be Mlle. Alba Camillucci, Sig. Giuseppe Radaelli, Sig. Ciro de Ritis, Sig. Constante Sorvino and Sig. Luigi Delle Molle. The New England Grand Opera Choral Society will provide the choruses for both operas and the Providence Orchestra the accompaniment. Anthony Stivanello is stage director and Lillian Migliori, assistant conductor.

◇ ◇ ◇

Hizi Koyke "Butterfly"

Hizi Koyke, the noted Japanese soprano, will have the title role in "Madame Butterfly," the second of the three operas to be staged by the San Carlo Opera Company at the Metropolitan Theatre Friday, Saturday and Sunday evenings. Miss Koyke has also appeared in Providence in recital and as Yum Yum in the Aborn production of "The Mikado."

The San Carlo engagement will open with "Aida" and conclude with "Il Trovatore." In addition to the singers the company carries a ballet headed by Lydia Arlova and Lucien Prideaux. Carlo Peroni is the musical director and Luigi Raybaut, stage director.

Cast for the opening night production, Friday, of "Aida" are Bianca Saroya as Aida; Estelle Lenci, Amneris; Aroldo Lindi, Rhadames; Mostyn Thomas, Amonasro; Harold Kravitt, Ramfis; Natale Cervi, King of Egypt; Francesco Curci, Messenger; Charlotte Bruno, Priestess.

With Miss Koyke, as Cho Cho San in "Butterfly" on Saturday night, will be Florence Wylde as Suzki; Dimitri Onofrei, Pinkerton; Charlotte Bruno, Kate Pinkerton; Mario Valle, Sharpless; Francesco Curci, Goro; Natale Cervi, Yamadori and the Bonzo; Fausto Bozza, the Commissary.

The cast for "Il Trovatore," Sunday evening, is as follows: Leonora, Bianca Saroya; Azucena, Estelle Lenci; Inez, Charlotte Bruno; Manrico, Pasquale Ferrara; Count Di Luna, Mostyn Thomas; Fernando, Harold Kravitt; Ruiz, Francesco Curci; a Gipsy, Fausto Bozza.

◇ ◇ ◇

Young People's Concert

The following program is announced for the young people's concert by the Providence Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Wassili Leps, conductor, and Martha Baird, piano soloist, in the Metropolitan Theatre Saturday afternoon at 3:15 o'clock.

Prelude to the opera, "Hansel and Gretel" .... Humperdinck
"Carnival of the Animals" (excerpts) .... Saint-Saens
Air on the G-string, arr. for orchestra by Wassili Leps .... Bach
Pizzicato, from the Fourth Symphony .... Tschaikowski
Concerto in A-minor for Piano and Orchestra .... Grieg
"Entrance of the Boyars" .... Halvorsen

◇ ◇ ◇

Clavier Ensemble Pair

Members of the Clavier Ensemble announce the first of a pair of two-pianoforte concerts Monday evening, Dec. 7, in the Institute of Music, 357 Westminster street. Those who will take part are Marjorie Morgan, Stella Bishop, Dorothy Thornton, Doris Whale Johnson, Gertrude McIver and Ethel Richardson.

Glee Club Soloist

Margaret Halstead, Metropolitan Opera soprano, who wil be the soloist at the University Glee Club's first concert of the season Dec. 11, made her Metropolitan debut Nov. 26, 1932, as Venus in "Tannhauser." Two years earlier she had made her recital debut in New York but almost immediately returned to Europe for further study and experience.

Over there she had the customary struggles and disappointments in making her way in England, Italy and Germany. But with the help and advice of musical leaders she began to get "the breaks" in both opera and recital. Among her outstanding appearances outside the Metropolitan are those with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Berlin Staatsoper, Salzburg Orchestra, New York Orchestra, Chicago Symphony, Philadelphia Orchestra, Chattanooga May Festival, St. Louis Sangerfest, White House (President Hoover), Mrs. Roosevelt's All-American Concert and recitals in major cities.

◇ ◇ ◇

Don Cossack Records

The Don Cossacks, who are returning to Providence for a concert in the Metropolitan Theatre two weeks from tonight, are this year on their seventh American tour, having been introduced to this country during the season of 1930-31.

This Russian male chorus, numbering 36 and led by the comparatively small-sized Serge Jaroff, was organized in 1923 and has since then given over 3000 concerts, said to be an all-time record. The 3000th performance came last November in Carnegie Hall, New York, at which they were presented an autographed Imperial Russian flag which belonged to the late Czar, the presentation being made by Grand Duchess Marie.

These singers of today were once officers in the White Army under General Wrangel. They hailed originally from that part of southwestern Russia known as the Steppes and from the particular province through which the river Don flows to the Sea of Asov. Other Cossacks inhabited other regions from which they took their name.

Now such distinctions of locale are no more and the men themselves are exiles, travelling with "En Voyage" written on their League of Nations passports. Since they emerged from their prison camp as a singing troupe they have been continually on the go all over the world. Some indication of their activities is the 102 concerts booked for their current American tour.

◇ ◇ ◇

Memory Day Recitalist

Fernando Germani, professor of organ at the Royal Conservatory of Music and organist of the Augusteo Orchestra in Rome, is announced to give the annual Memory Day recital for Edgar John Lownes in Sayles Hall, Brown University, Thursday afternoon, Jan. 21. Mr. Germani has been concertizing in Europe during recent seasons and has not been heard in this country since 1932.

◇ ◇ ◇

Recital by John Orr

John Orr, boy pianist, will be heard in his second public recital at the Y. M. C. A. auditorium, Pawtucket, Tuesday evening, Dec. 8, at 8:15 o'clock. He is a member of the Chaminade Junior Club.

IN OPERA

Giuseppe Radaelli, tenor, will sing the role of "Canio" in "I Pagliacci" at the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday night.

WILMINGTON, N. C.
STAR NEWS

NOV 29 1936

CLEMENTI SYMPHONY, LOST FOR A CENTURY, WILL BE RENDERED

BOSTON, Nov. 28.—(AP)—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance Friday afternoon when the Boston orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, plays the Symphony in D Major by the anglicized Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musicologists credit Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pop orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were held in high regard by Beethoven, Haydn and toher masters, and who as an established pianist, gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Lizt, then 13 years old, was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other fourteen symphonies.

Yet when he died in 1832, bequeathing all his manuscripts to his widow, none but sonata scores could be found.

Two manuscripts came into the possession of the British museum in 1871. Unconnected, they merely intensified the search for the others. In 1917, Dr. William H. Cummings, a London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder.

A public auction in London soon resulted in their purchase by Carl Engel, chief of the music division for the Library of Congress of the United States.

In 1924, a magazine article concerning the Washington scores picqued the curiosity of Casella who ten years later crossed the ocean to begin serious study of the scores. Putting them together was similar to reassembling several jig-saw puzzles at once. Nevertheless, hard work yielded four symphonies last year, although in each the first movement was incomplete.

Recalling the two manuscripts held in the British museum, Casella went to London, armed with photostatic copies of the Washington library scores. Careful work restored all four, and two were performed and published last year.

The first, third and fourth required some slight filling in by Casella, but the second, which will be performed Friday, was complete, and received its first performance under Casella in Rome last January.

Dr. Koussevitzky first learned of the scores from Casella, and after studying them minutely the last few weeks, described the music as possessing "great charm and brilliance."

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS Nov 29/36

A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for 100 years will receive its first American performance Friday afternoon when the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky plays the symphony in D Major by the Italian, Muzio Clementi. Musicologists credit Alfredo Casella, Italian composer, pianist, scolar, and former conductor of the Boston Pop Orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript, which now fill a century gap in musical history.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN

NOV 29 1936

A Few Words

About the Works of Two Neglected Symphonists

Bruckner and Mahler

Important Issues Are Again Brought Forward by Chord and Discord

By WINTHROP SARGEANT

Chord and Discord, the little magazine gotten out by the Bruckner Society of America, is off the press again. I could wish that it contained more concrete information and less metaphysics than it does. But that is the way with the Bruckner Society. It is a decidedly one-track (or, if you like, two-track) association. And its fervor sometimes burns at very mystical temperatures.

And what is the Bruckner Society of America? The Bruckner Society of America is an organization devoted to furthering the performance and appreciation of works by Anton Bruckner and Gustav Mahler. Bruckner, if you don't already know, was a very important Austrian composer who was born before Beethoven died, and died when Richard Strauss was already an established figure. He wrote nine symphonies (some of which are rather long), a little chamber music and quite a number of ecclesiastical works. Gustav Mahler was a very important Bohemian (or, as we say nowadays, Czecho-Slovakian) composer who was born a generation later than Bruckner, and died in 1911 after spending a term conducting at our own Metropolitan Opera House. Mahler wrote nine and a half symphonies, some of which are also rather long, and a large number of other orchestral and vocal works.

Have Little In Common

What do the works of these two composers have in common? Very little. About as much, say, as those of Schubert and Sibelius have in common. And why should these important works need furthering at the hands of a society specially created for the purpose? That, dear reader, is a mystery without solution. But they undoubtedly do.

The fact is that of all composers, these two seem to have had the unique property of inspiring either fanatical devotion or an almost equally fanatical distaste. The "Streit Ueber Wagner" has long been laid to rest. One can now enjoy "Tristan" without feeling that one is upholding a cause. One does not feel self-righteous or "revolutionary" today even when one listens to Stravinsky or Schoenberg. But poor old Bruckner and Mahler, whose contemporaries have become established classics, and who never espoused any school or aesthetic system whatever, are still subjects for violent controversy. When someone asks you whether you like Brahms, you usually answer courteously that you do indeed. But when someone inquires, "Do you really like Mahler?" your temperature begins to rise and you clench your fists. You ransack your memory for arguments to justify your position, assuming meanwhile an attitude of defiance. It doesn't matter whether you are for or against. The symptoms are the same.

Both Receive Public Response

Yet, when you come right down to the matter of public response, both composers commonly receive their measure of it. I have yet to witness a Mahler performance that was not well attended. The people who religiously rise and leave the hall in the middle of every Bruckner symphony, are an insignificant minority, and one usually feels that they are acting on principle rather than on any spontaneous impulse. All the recent performances of either composer that I have heard have been at least reasonable successes from the standpoints of boxoffice and applause. Yet the superstition remains deeply rooted that Bruckner and Mahler must be fed to the public, if at all, in very small doses. And the large body of concertgoers has had so little chance to hear them that it retains only a hazy impression of either master.

The suggestion has been made in some quarters that a complete Bruckner cycle be held. Why not indeed? Have our symphonic audience's tastes become so stereotyped that such a prospect would lack adventure for it? I have a hunch that a complete Mahler cycle, or Mahler festival, would create even more public interest than a Bruckner series. Of the two Mahler is in many ways the more colorful and spectacular. Even for those who are hopelessly anti-Bruckner and anti-Mahler a complete hearing of their works would have one advantage. It would silence once and for all that annoyingly pertinent argument of the Bruckner-and-Mahler-ite, that you can't claim to dislike music you haven't heard.

Good Material For Festivals

Complete cycles of works by such lavish orchestrators would, no doubt, involve considerable expense. The outlay in orchestral, choral and solo resources for Mahler, in particular, would have to be considerable. Still, there ought to be enough enthusiasts scattered about the country to make such a thing feasible. And an event of the sort would be bound to draw response from many quarters. Come to think of it, the people who run such annual events as the Berkshire Festival might do well to consider such a venture. A cycle of this sort would be more appropriate as festival material than a group of miscellaneous symphony programs. It would, in fact, draw world attention to the center that sponsored it.

These, however, are speculations. The present season does not look like a particularly good one for the two neglected symphonists. In spite of a decided improvement in the Philharmonic's program under the baton of John Barbirolli, Bruckner and Mahler have not yet been announced as part of his schedule. Artur Rodzinski, who has done some Mahler conducting, may possibly surprise us with a Mahler performance. But the Cleveland conductor has not revealed any plans of the sort as yet. Serge Koussevitzky and Eugene Ormandy seem to be sole holders of the fort this season, if present announcements are indicative. The former, with the Boston Symphony, plans performances of Mahler's Fifth and "Das Lied von der Erde" and of Bruckner's Eighth. Ormandy has scheduled Bruckner's Seventh, Mahler's "Lieder eines Fahrenden Gesellen" and the Adagietto from the same composer's Fifth Symphony.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SUNDAY AMERICAN

Rochester Will Hear The Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky comes to the Eastman Theater on Monday evening, December 7, for the second consecutive season.

Although the program has not definitely been settled, it is expected that Koussevitsky will yield to several requests, and include the Haydn Symphony No. 102. The work has not been done here in many years.

This is the fifty-sixth year of the Boston orchestra, which is rated as one of the finest in the world, and the twelfth year under the reign of Koussevitsky.

The box office reports that but a few scattered orchestra, mezzanine and loge seats are available for this performance.

100.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 29 1936

THE AVANT-GARDE

New Works Commissioned by League of Composers to Be Played

By OLIN DOWNES

RECENTLY a representative of this department encountered a member of that very active and productive organization for the propagation of modern music, the League of Composers. A new work by a young American, Robert McBride, a work commissioned by the League, will be performed on Dec. 7 in Town Hall at the concert for the benefit of Bennington College scholarship fund.

The music reviewer remarked that he no longer experienced so many rich and provocative sensations at the League concerts as these events used to afford him in the past. More than once he sat through a program of an unmitigated tonal asperity which caused him to swear he'd never come again to listen to such stuff. But he came again, and yet again, and every now and then he was rewarded by a sense of illumination and even, on occasion, by a conviction of new and important music in the making.

Also, said the reviewer, he missed the exotic and wild-eyed type of atonalist who formerly constituted the picturesque majority of the League's audiences. Where now are the magnificent hissers of Haydn? Where are the rival factions, some of whom stamped and bravoed, while others whistled and catcalled, and the conductor, helpless on the platform, kept entreating, "Won't you be quiet enough to hear it again?"

It seemed that these brave companies of yesteryear were gone, extinguished by the era of tameness and sobriety. Not only this, our best people, of late, have shown an alarming tendency to support the League, despite the pressure of that element which the conservatives would doubtless describe as the lunatic fringe. Has the League, our League, gone respectable?

* * *

The rejoinder to these remarks was disarming and significant. The League emissary said: "You are wrong, so far as what we do is concerned. We continue to produce as much modern music, proportionate to the number of our concerts, as we ever did. Have you forgotten your own expostulations after 'Lady Macbeth of Mzensk?' Have you forgotten Nabokoff's 'Faust' compositions, Stravinsky's 'Mavra,' 'Chant Dissident' and 'Pieces' for string quartet? Hindemith's 'Serenaden'? Bartok's Fourth quartet?

"Dear sir, what has changed is not us, but you and the public! We don't have to break ground as we used to. The ultra-modern of yesterday is the accepted master of today. We have accustomed the public ear and taste in New York to the expressions of contemporaneous composers. That is all.

"The attitude of our audience is no longer either hostile or derivative. It is receptive. Music that provoked or alarmed a decade ago is now, thanks in considerable part to our concerts, generally accepted. Ask yourself what the position is in the repertory of such compositions as the Bloch piano quintet, the Stravinsky 'Histoire de Soldat,' de Falla's puppet show, 'El Retablo de Maese Pedro,' or Hindemith's Kammermusik, Op. 24. These have become classics."

* * *

In this explanation there is an element of logic, whether or not it represents the complete analysis of the situation. We are not sure that the radicals of yesterday have not simply become outmoded. We are not even sure as to whether the days of atonalism are unnumbered. But certainly the League has inoculated us in a way to mitigate the terrors and epidemics of contemporaneous schools of composition. It has removed superstitions and materially informed and enlightened its audiences.

It has done this at first with faint support, later with increased public and private approbation, and with many an adventure along the way. In the same year, which was the first year of its existence, 1923 the League gave the New York première of Schoenberg's "Pierrot lunaire," and experimented with jazz.

There was a jazz conference at the Anderson Galleries, when Professor Edwin Burlingame Hill of Harvard University and Gilbert Seldes lectured, and Vincent Lopez was persuaded to bring members of his band to illustrate, while the elevator boys began to tap-dance in the halls!

* * *

A certain composer came with instruments that made quarter and eighth tones. He was treated so well, and found the League so hospitable to ideas which had not flourished in other places, that between the first rehearsal and the concert he perfected a scale of 16th tones, the performance of which proved the hit of the evening! The concert was considered a worth-while experiment because, while no important music was discovered, it proved the existence of expressive means which a later musician of genius might well find useful. The attitude of the League toward new music has been that of inquiry, and of a desire to let the public know what the "avant-garde" of music was doing and thinking.

The League felt that it had taken a step toward solidifying its position when Malapiero, in 1925, made a special arrangement of his "Setti Canzone" for small stage and chamber orchestra. Several American composers, returning here from study in Europe, had first hearings at the hands of the League, as Aaron Copland's first public hearing in 1924, and first New York hearings of Roger Sessions and Roy Harris. Temperamental musicians have put in their oar from time to time, in ways which threatened to interfere with the concerts. There have been union troubles arising from unexpected sources. Thus an irate percussionist, who didn't like the music, threw down the curious instrument the composer had given him to play. It was therefore necessary to hire an extra man to play the parts. A conductor of international fame had to take off his coat and move four pianos into the proper positions for the fulfillment of his acoustical schemes.

* * *

But there is another division of the League's activities which has generally been overlooked—namely, the very substantial aid it has repeatedly given, in practical ways, to creative musicians. The League fund which made possible Mr. McBride's score has a twofold purpose. The first is "to provide commissions to American composers who are paid by the League to write works which will be produced by other organizations of this country and Europe." The second is a purpose more general in its nature and one of self-evident value to native music. It is to give direct aid to composers in need of financial assistance, to find positions in which they can be self-supporting while continuing their creative activities, and in other ways to foster their efforts. This is a large order and the fund available for it is relatively small. But the facts indicate the position of the League in the musical affairs of the community: that it is not only an organization to give highly necessary performances of new music; it is also one which aims, in realistic as well as artistic ways, to foster the musical life of the community. This applies especially to Americans. In fact, of the 493 works by living composers which the League has presented in the sixteen years of its existence, by composers of nineteen nationalities, one hundred and fifty-five works by seventy-seven Americans have been performed.

* * *

The object of the commission plan, first undertaken in 1933, is to bring living American composers before as wide a public as possible. A number of the works which have appeared in response to this stimulus have received repeated performances. Roy Harris's "Song of Occupations" after Whitman, commissioned in 1934, was sung by the Westminster Choir in many cities of America and in forty cities of Russia and Europe. The string quartet by Nicholas Berezowsky, commissioned by the League and recommended by the American chapter of the International Society for Contemporaneous Music, has been accepted by that organization. It will be performed in Paris next Summer.

Twenty-one American composers were commissioned to produce new music since this plan was put into effect, and the nineteen organizations agreeing to produce their music include the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitzky; the Chicago Orchestra, under Stock; the Cleveland Orchestra, under Rodzinski; the Cincinnati Orchestra, with Eugene Goossens; the St. Louis Orchestra, with Vladimir Golschmann; the orchestra of the National Broadcasting Company, directed by Frank Black; also the Harvard and the Princeton Glee Clubs, the Adesdi and A Cappella Choruses and the Westminster Choir; the Pro Arte, Stradivarius, Gordon and Manhattan String Quartets and Mr. Lange's Philharmonic-Symphony Chamber Orchestra.

* * *

The League has felt occasion in certain instances to apply the name "forgotten man" to the composer. Once it quadrupled the fee offered by the publisher as the composer's royalty, in recognition of the art of a modern master who was in need. It has supplied funds for the copying of music, a thing badly needed, and the lack of which sent poor Charles Tomlinson Griffes to an untimely grave. For the many practical purposes involved this fund needs enlarging and replenishing. The League has made every endeavor through the receipts of special performances to augment it.

* * *

It is good to observe that the left wing of modern music receives through this organization the representation it should have in a musical democracy, and that the organization which has proved its value and its vitality has increased rather than diminished the scope of its achievements.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

NOV 29 1936

Free Concert At 3 Today

Maurice Pederson Will Present Organ Recital

This afternoon's free concert in the Toledo Museum of Art peristyle will be an organ recital by Maurice Douglas Pederson.

The one-hour program, to begin promptly at 3, will include the following selections:

"First Symphony" Charles M. Widor
"Marche Pontificale"
"Adagio"
"Toccata in F Major" .... Johannes Sebastian Bach
"Sketch in C Minor" .... Robert Schumann
"Song of the Basket Weaver" .... Alexandre Russell
"Carillon de Westminster" .... Louis Vierne
"Sonatina," from "God's Time Is Best" .... Bach-Grace
"Prelude" .... Louis-Nicholas Clerambault
"Toccata" on "Thou Art the Rock" .... Henry Mulet

---

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

Capacity Crowd for Boston Symphony

DUE to schedule limitations, the forthcoming concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given Monday evening, Dec. 7, rather than Friday, as is customary with the Eastman Theater series concerts. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

Appearances of the orchestra so far this season have been a succession of triumphs that have transcended those of previous years. Hartford, Worcester, New York and other cities have welcomed Koussevitzky and his men with cordiality and the remainder of the season bids fair to play to sold-out houses, according to reports from Symphony Hall in Boston.

---

week, [illegible] shout from four candy-striped megaphones held by the cheerleaders the team marched into a formation that spelled "Cheer for BF," the let-

---

Symphony Conductor

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY is the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will return to the Toledo Museum of Art peristyle Dec. 11 for a concert complimentary to members of the museum.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

NOV [illegible] 1936

KOUSSEVITZKY CARRIED ORCHESTRA INTO WILDS

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Masonic Temple December 9, was born in 1874 in the small, central Russian province of Tver. There was no musical life about him, except from small visiting theatrical companies.

When his father opposed a career so remote from the experience of their own community, he ran away, and presented himself at the Philharmonic School in Moscow. The school was full—the year begun, but the authorities at once sensed the unusual qualities of the penniless young applicant, and made a place for him. There was only one possible scholarship open to him—for a student of the double-bass, and he accordingly took on this strange instrument.

In a short time he astonished every one by coaxing a lovely cello-like tone and delicate melody from his huge, cumbrous instrument, with its fist-wide bow. He was a tireless worker and ultimately became known all over Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass.

Then, coming to the end of its possibilities, Koussevitzky aspired to that richest of instruments, the hundred-fold orchestra. He made his first trials in Berlin, and then, having independent means, he assembled his own orchestra in Moscow and gave memorable series of concerts there and in St. Petersburg. Later he chartered a steamer to take his orchestra the length of the Volga, taking to the musically starved people of innumerable provincial towns their "first symphony concert."

After the revolution, Koussevitzky conducted for awhile under government subsidy, but fleeing restriction, established his famous "Concerts Koussevitzky," with his own orchestra in Paris.

Here, and by guest performances in London and other cities, he made a reputation which resulted in his invitation to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

Praise for Boston Symphony

Of a recent performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Olin Downes wrote in the New York Times: "If the opening measures of Anton Bruckner's E Major symphony, played by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, had served only to emphasize the rich and luminous tone-quality of the strings, the performance would have been worth the journey. But this was not the only page of the symphony, or the only orchestral effect, to ravish the ears. The whole composition was given tonal glory by the orchestra, which has no peer today for homogeneity and balance of tone, and distinction and finish of style. It is not only precision and technical proficiency which tell the story of what Dr. Koussevitzky has done in developing this orchestra; these things in themselves would not suffice for artistic results. The technical standards and the resonance, substance and shimmer of the tone crown the effect and make it possible for the conductor to achieve the delicate shades of sonority and the fine proportions of the climaxes."

The fourth concert in the present series sponsored by Mrs. Zorah B. Berry will take place in Elmwood Music Hall, Tuesday evening, December 8th, at which time Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Orchestra in a program of symphonic music. Tickets for this concert may be obtained at Mrs. Berry's office, 32 Court Street.

RENO, NEV.
STATE JOURNAL

NOV 29 1936

'Cellist to Appear in Reno

Gregor Piatigorski, one of the world's most noted 'cellists, will present a concert in Reno December 8 under the sponsorship of the Nevada Community Concert association. Piatigorski, 33 years old, has appeared in most of the large cities in the United States playing as a guest artist with many noted philharmonic orchestras. This will be his first appearance in Reno.

Noted 'Cellist Will Appear in Reno December 8

By MRS. WALTER F. CLARK

Gregor Piatigorsky, believed by many competent judges to be the greatest living 'cellist before the public, will give a concert before the members and guests of the Nevada community concert association Tuesday evening, December 8, at 8:15 in the civic auditorium of the Washoe county library building. This concert is part of his seventh American tour. It has been his habit since 1929 to divide his season between Europe and the United States. He has played as soloist with the Los Angeles and San Francisco orchestras, with the St. Louis, the Detroit, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Toronto, Pittsburgh and Philadelphia orchestras, four times with the Chicago symphony, four times with the New York Philharmonic, five times with the Boston symphony, whose leader, K[redacted]sky, publicly declares Piatigorsky is the "greatest living 'cellist of our day."

This artist was born 33 years ago in southern Russia, the Ukraine. At fifteen he had moved up to be the first 'cellist with the Imperial Opera orchestra of Moscow, studying the while with a pupil of Davidoff. The revolution threatened to put a period to his advance.

By a stroke of luck, he gained an opportunity to substitute as a 'cellist in the Warsaw orchestra. The greatness of quality was instantly recognized and he was offered a contract for an American tour. He did not feel that he was ready but wanted to study in Germany. An American advanced the funds to carry him to Leipzig. He requested lessons from the eminent Klengel. "My dear boy," said Klengel, "there is little anyone can teach you. From now on you must play."

In succeeding years he has become known and endeared through his art and his generous, wholesome nature to audiences throughout Europe and America, to conductors, composers and critics. Two beautiful 'celli have been presented him by admirers. All who love the best in music feel gratitude and admiration for him.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
Nov. TIMES 29/36.

Koussevitzky Is Pioneer In Musical Movements, To Lead Orchestra Here

Boston Symphony Plays in Buffalo Week From Tuesday; Margaret Reed Dooley Soloist in Mount Mercy Auditorium Tonight

By MARY M. HOWARD
Times Music Critic

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will play in Elmwood Music Hall Tuesday night, Dec. 8, has been a pioneer in musical movements since he was young.

He was one of the few musicians to become a skilled soloist on the double bass and he was one of the very first to spread the gospel of orchestral music among those who had little or no opportunity to hear such music.

In his native Russia he organized a small orchestra and, securing a boat, he toured the rivers of his land, stopping at small towns where symphonic music was never heard. It was missionary work to which he devoted his great talent whole heartedly.

By degrees, the Koussevitzky concerts in Russia, in France, in England, brought him increasing fame.

Thirteen years ago Koussevitzky came to America to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, under his guidance, has become a criterion for the world of orchestral music.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

Ancient Symphony To Get Premiere

BOSTON, Nov. 28 (AP).—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance next Friday afternoon. It is the symphony in D major by the Americanized Italian, Muzio Clementi, which the Boston Orchestra will play.

Musicologists credit Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were held in high regard by Beethoven and Haydn and who as an established pianist gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Lizt, then 13 years old, was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity, between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other 14 symphonies.

Yet, when he died in 1832, bequeathing all his manuscripts to his widow, none but sonata scores could be found.

Clementi was a practical man of affairs, and his large estate was in good order. But his symphonies never had been printed, and they dropped from public knowledge for the next 40 years.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

NOV 29 1936

A Veteran Scai

Koussevitski's Service to Musi The Smaller American Music Paintings in Rochester Homes

By STEWAR

ONE notes with special pleasure that the Boston Symphony will soon come to play again in the Eastman Theater. Serge Koussevitski comes to conduct. Statement of opinion about the man at his business of conducting is made as a matter of routine by those who make a living at writing comment for newspapers and magazines. But much less frequently is appraisal written and printed of this man as a servant in the cause of music.

He has great courage of conviction and his judgment in the main has been supported by that of an intelligent public. He determines a piece of music as either worth hearing or not; if it is worth hearing to his mind, he gives it a hearing and he suffers new composers and their works gladly. He has been influential in winning a place for more than one composer in the roster of the accepted. He has stood stoutly in Paris for music that only after a battle was given popular, even critical endorsement. To some extent he has done this in Boston.

It seems reasonable to believe that Doctor Koussevitski has honestly at heart the spreading abroad knowledge of good music, the widening of opportunity for those of today who are earnestly trying to write such music, the creation of a constantly growing company of listeners who, because they hear widely and in variety, are better able to achieve what may be deservedly called taste in music.

COLUMBUS, O.
Nov. DISPATCH 29/36

Boston Orchestra To Play Clementi Work

BOSTON, NOV. 28.—(AP).—A symphony which has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance when the Boston orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevetzky, plays the Symphony in D Major by the Americanized Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musicologists credit Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were held in high regard by Beethoven and Haydn and who as an established pianist gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Lizt, then 13 years old, was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity, between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other 14 symphonies.

Yet when he died in 1832, bequeathing all his manuscripts to his widow, none but sonata scores could be found.

* * *

CLEMENTI was a practical man of affairs, and his large estate was in good order. But his symphonies never had been printed, and they dropped from public knowledge for the next 40 years.

Two manuscripts came into possession of the British museum in 1871, but, unconnected, they merely intensified the fruitless search for the others.

Then in 1917, Dr. William H. Cummings, a London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder.

A public auction in London soon resulted in their purchase by Carl Engel, chief of the music division for the library of congress of the United States.

In 1924, a magazine article concerning the Washington scores piqued the curiosity of Casella who had been intensely interested in earning recognition for Clementi as a great symphonist. Ten years passed before Casella finally crossed the ocean to begin serious study of the scores.

* * *

PUTTING them together was similar to reassembling several jig-saw puzzles at once. Nevertheless, hard work yielded four symphonies last year, although in each the first movement was incomplete.

Recalling the two manuscripts held in the British museum, Casella went to London, armed with photostatic copies of the Washington library scores. Careful work restored all four, and two were performed and published last year.

Dr. Koussevitzky first learned of the scores from Casella, and after studying them minutely the last few weeks, described the music as possessing "great charm and brilliance."

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

HUB TO HEAR 'LOST' MUSIC

29/36

Clementi Symphony Will Be Presented Friday By Orchestra

SCORE 'PATCHED UP'

Assembled After Being In Separate Pieces For 100 Years

BOSTON, Nov. 27 (AP)—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance Friday afternoon when the Boston Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, plays the Symphony in D Major by the Anglicized Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musicologists credit Alfred Casella, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were held in high regard by Beethoven, Haydn, and other masters, and who as an established pianist gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Liszt, then 13 years old, was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity, between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other 14 symphonies.

Yet when he died in 1832, bequeathing all his manuscripts to his widow, none but Sonata scores could be found.

Clementi was a practical man of affairs, and his large estate was in good order. But his symphonies never had been printed, and they dropped from public knowledge for the next 40 years.

Manuscripts Found

Two manuscripts came into the possession of the British Museum in 1871, but, unconnected, they merely intensified the fruitless search for the others.

Then in 1917, Dr. William H. Cummings, a London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder.

A public auction in London soon resulted in their purchase by Carl Engel, chief of the Music Division for the Library of Congress of the United States.

In 1924, a magazine article concerning the Washington scores picqued the curiosity of Casella, who had been intensely interested in earning recognition for Clementi as a great symphonist and thereby gainnig for Italy eminence in that field as well as in opera. Ten years passed before Casella finally crossed the ocean to begin serious study of the scores.

Putting them together was similar to reassembling several jig-saw puzzles at once. Nevertheless, hard work yielded four symphonies last year, although in each the first movement was incomplete.

Recalling the two manuscripts held in the British Museum, Casella went to London, armed with photostatic copies of the Washingon Library scores. Careful work restored all four, and two were performed and published last year.

The first, third and fourth required some slight filling in by Casella, but the second, which will be performed Friday, was complete and received its first performance under Casella in Rome last January.

Dr. Koussevitzky first learned of the scores from Casella and after studying them minutely the last few weeks, described the music as possessing "great charm and brilliance."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

NOV 29 1936

Boston Orchestra Ready to Introduce Clementi Opus Found in Library Here

Reconstructed Patiently From Notes of Master Treasured Here.

'Symphony in D Major' Tribute to Sleuthing Work of Casella.

More than a century after its composition, a Clementi symphony, whose original score reposes in the Library of Congress archives is to be played in this country for the first time.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will feature "Symphony in D Major," by Muzio Clementi, on its program next Friday in the Hub, culminating many months of painstaking research by Alfredo Casella, the pianist-conductor whose sleuth-like investigations at the Library of Congress and the British Museum made the event possible.

Clementi died in England in 1832 at the age of 80 after having composed some 20 symphonies which were especially popular in England, Germany and France between 1813 and 1826. His admirers were amazed to learn that none of the manuscripts was found among his personal effects.

With the passing of time, Clementi and his works were practically forgotten. Even when, in 1871, the British Museum came into possession of a few of the Italian's compositions no one attached any great importance to the acquisition.

In 1917, Dr. William H. Cummings, English musicologist, died and the music world was surprised to learn that his collection included a valuable lot of incomplete Clementi manuscripts, sketches and notes. Soon afterward they were purchased by the Library of Congress.

Papers Scrambled.

Their 900-odd pages shuffled together in disorder, with identification marks lacking, the manuscripts defied attempts to collate them and salvage at least one complete symphony.

Then in 1924 a Frenchman, Georges de Saint-Foix, came to the library to study the confused remnants of Clementi's life's work and was so impressed that he wrote an article on the subject for the Revue de Musicologie. His paper was a challenge to Alfredo Casella, music scholar, pianist, composer and conductor.

Still another decade passed, however, before the Italian had an opportunity to exercise his ability as a symphony sleuth in bringing order out of the Clementi scores.

Searching through the American-owned manuscripts, he found portions of four separate symphonies. Two of them, he decided, could be reconstructed. It was only a short time until he had put one score together, save that the introduction and opening of the initial allegro was missing.

ALDREDO CASELLA.

Remembering that the British Museum had some Clementi manuscripts, Casella made photostatic copies of his Washington material and left for London. Offhand it might have seemed a futile quest, since the manuscripts in the museum had been identified as "sketches," rather than parts of symphonies.

But Casella wished to make sure.

First Portion Found.

It was a wise move. He found that the British Museum had the very thing he needed to complete the "Symphony in D Major"—the first part of the first movement.

Restoring the "Symphony in C Major" (this is known as Clementi's Second Symphony, while the one in D Major is the First) was a more difficult task. By indefatigable checking and rechecking, plus some "plugging" of his own, Casella completed the work to the satisfaction of the most fastidious authorities.

Last December the C major symphony was played in Turin, the first time it had been presented in the native land of the composer. The following month Rome heard Clementi's D major symphony for the first time.

Of the latter masterpiece, to be interpreted next Friday by the Boston symphony, Conductor Serve Koussevitzky says:

"This symphony has great charm and shows masterly instrumentation."

Casella is scheduled to appear here February 14 as guest artist with the National Symphony and it is not improbable that the orchestra will include one of the two completed symphonies on that program.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

Nov. 29/36

Appears Dec. 9

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

This autumn the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its fifty-sixth season with its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, celebrating his own thirteenth year in America.

The orchestra of 108 musicians under Koussevitzky's direction will appear in the Masonic Auditorium at 8:30 p. m., Wednesday, Dec. 9.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

NOV 29 1936

Between Leger Lines

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

Are Composers Lazy or Incapable of Creating Themes That Will Remain?—Conductors Now Becoming "Arrangers."

NOW that our visiting symphonists has paid their initial respects of the season to local audiences, it might be well to pause and, temporarily, regard what the instrumental fare offered us has indicated.

For some time it has been the practise of the Philadelphians to offer Mr. Stokowski's own conceptions of what Johann Sebastian Bach, and a few others, intended and we have had them through arrangements by this conductor.

Mr. Koussevitzki has failed to follow in the footsteps of his confrere but some of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society's directorate have not been so hesitant. Mr. Barbirolli, who has shown daring in more than one respect, however, rushed in where others had feared to step and presented himself as an arranger of some Purcell excerpts.

But Mr. Koussevitzki has given us arrangements by persons other than the original composer and the practise has taken on such large proportions that one wonders whether composers have suddenly become sterile.

THE fullness of such a conclusion is brought home by the fact that Mr. Barbirolli only last week listed as his "novelty" a work by Franz Schubert which, somehow, escaped the notice of our numerous baton-wavers. The response was so great that he is incorporating it on his programs for this week.

Schubert is primarily a singer of songs, a lyrist and his tunes have become timeless. There is no better evidence of this than the fact that this Second Symphony is being demanded again, despite its age, while there appears to be absolutely no demand for more than one hearing for all the modern music that has been offered within the last decade or so.

It is not my desire to attempt to decry the so-called modern music; its value may not be apparent to us at the moment just as many favorites of today were not hailed as masterpieces when they were born. The fact stands out, however, that what has remained from earliest times of composers has all borne one characteristic, namely, it is lyrical and tuneful.

CLEVER orchestration, skilful contrapuntal scoring and instrumental manipulation all have important places in composition; but the creation of themes that appeal, is, in the last analysis, what makes a composer remain through the centuries.

And our present-day composers either are unable or unwilling to set down beautiful themes or else they are incapable of feelings above the normal attributes of every-day existence.

Perhaps the speed of the age is such that the composers lack time to conceive such ideas, or maybe they are just lazy. What we are given however, is a plethora of arrangements and little of ultimate satisfaction.

This fact was never so evident as a cursory survey of recent programs will bring out.

IN my survey of the forthcoming Metropolitan season in Leger Lines last week, last-minute excisions had to be made, and therefore some of it is offered for consideration today.

It is apparent in General Manager Johnson's plans that native artists, who warrant it, are to receive premiere consideration, as was pointed out in the matter of the tenor contingent. Continuing into the other wings we find that of the even dozen baritones, five are Americans and among these are Messrs. John Charles Thomas, Lawrence Tibbett, Richard Bonelli, Louis D'Angelo and the newcomer, Wilfred Engelman.

With Mr. Pinza still regarded as the principal among the ten bassos, there are three natives in this contingent including Chase Baromeo, for years the principal in the Chicago Opera, and the two newcomers, Messrs. Cordon and Guerney.

With "The Henchman," "Emperor Jonas," "Merry Mount" and "Ibbetson" dropped from repertoire, Mr. Hageman's "Caponsacchi" is the lone native opus included for the season. But, the novelties proposed include "Bartered Bride" and "The Clandestine Marriage," in English, while "Gianni Schicchi" will also probably be translated.

AMERICAN opera may lag in the Johnsonian plans, but opera in English is surely receiving considerable impetus under the new director.

Other plans of the director include the retention, for another season, of the miscalled American Ballet, the Russian choreographic group of Mr. Balanchine, and the revised orchestra. Mr. Johnson took steps along these lines last season. He is evidently impressed with the fact that the "revision" was not of sufficient proportions, for a "considerable number of new members has been added with the object of improving this important feature" of the ensemble.

And so he presents what is really his own company for the first time. Last year's was, to a large extent, his inheritance. Now we are to see Johnson at work. Judging by the progress made last year, however, even greater things are in store for this season.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

NOV 30 1936

Notes and Comn

The third annual meeting of the Association of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held in Symphony Hall next Thursday afternoon. Jerome D. Greene, director of the recent Tercentenary Celebration at Harvard, will be the speaker. Dr. Koussevitzky and members of the Orchestra vill present a short musical program. In the upper foyer of the hall there will be an exhibition of seventeenth and eighteenth century paintings from the collection of Alvan T. Fuller.

The National Symphony Orchestra's tour, which was to begin immediately after its concert in Washington yesterday afternoon, takes it as near to Boston as Northampton this evening and Manchester, N. H., tomorrow night. But Boston, which first heard the orchestra under Hans Kindler last year, will not hear it this season evidently.

Dr. Thompson Stone, conductor of the Handel and Haydn Society, which will give its annual performance of Handel's "Messiah" on Sunday evening, Dec. 20, in Symphony Hall, spent the past summer, it appears, in Halle, Germany, where the composer was born.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 29 1936

Contemporary Comment

DEBUTANTE BREAKS RECORD! At the Debutante Ball this week a very attractive young woman who received at the ball led a certain young man, and a handsome one at that, to break a record, of which he was very, very proud. This attractive fellow was pleased with his record of having attended the Debutante Ball for 12 years and having been a member of the floor committee for ten. This is a record, but the fact that he had danced with every debutante for ten years is even more important. B. E., anxious to keep his record, set out Wednesday night to dance with all the members of the receiving line and did very well until he tried to cut in on M. P. At that crucial moment M. P. would not dance with him, and even refused to dance with him all evening. So now one of the most eligible of bachelors has had his pride shattered.

THE AUDIENCE AT the Boston Symphony Concert last week was entertained with a sudden and unusual interruption. After the intermission everyone was seated quietly waiting in suspense for the conductor to give the signal to start. He stood poised and ready to commence, holding the attention of the tense orchestra and interested audience, when from the rear of the opera house of the Academy of Music was heard a loud voice saying "You like music?" The conductor waited, the voice stopped and once again the baton was raised. The questioner again raised her voice apparently completely oblivious of the anxious conductor. This little episode happened four times, before the subscriber realized that the program was about to begin. M. R. M.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 29 1936

PARIS MUSIC SEASON

PARIS.

THE Paris concert calendar for the coming season, although foreshadowing a probable decrease in the number of concerts by individual soloists, gives promise, none the less, of many varied and interesting programs. Announcement is already made of a very considerable number of new works to be presented this year, and one is gratified to observe that the present concern in France as to the outcome of political and economic problems has placed no serious check upon the activities of musicians. All of the established symphonic associations have opened their series of weekly concerts. The Orchestre Symphonique de Paris, the Concerts Lamoureux, the Concerts Pasdeloup and the Concerts Colonne will continue under the same organization as last year. The Concerts Siohan and the Concerts Poulet will, however, amalgamate under the title of le Fédération Symphonique and play under the alternate direction of their respective leaders. The Orchestre Féminin de Paris will continue its interesting concerts of music for string orchestra under the able leadership of Mme. Jane Evrard. At the "Cercle Interallié" will be given a series of monthly concerts conducted by Mlle. Nadia Boulanger. The Concerts Privés d'Alfred Cortot will shortly reopen its series of orchestral concerts, to be given at the Ecole Normale de Musique, and will be conducted personally by Mr. Cortot.

* * *

An interesting feature of musical life in Paris is the existence of numerous chamber music associations. Some of these devote their energies to the presentation of great works like the St. Mathew Passion of Bach and the magnificent Requiem of Fauré, which will figure on the November programs of the Société J. S. Bach, under the direction of M. G. Bret. Other groups, such as the "Société des Violes et Clavecins" and the "Société Française de Musicologie," expend their efforts upon the production of lesser-known works from a more remote past, while still others concern themselves entirely with the presentation of new works by living composers. Significant among groups of this latter sort is the Société Nationale de Musique, which sponsors monthly programs exclusively composed of new works, and which, since its foundation by Saint-Saëns in 1871, has given some 600 concerts. Among recent organizations which provide a further outlet for the activity of contemporaneous composers one might cite "La Jeune France," whose orchestral concert of last Spring, conducted by Roger Desormières, occasioned such controversial comment and which will continue its existence this season. Four young composers make up this group: Messrs. Lesur, Baudrier, Jolivet and Messiaen, whose composition "Offrandes oubliées" will by now have been performed in America by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "La Spirale" will continue its noteworthy activity in organizing concerts devoted for the most part to works of foreign composers. The aim of this Society is to inaugurate a more widespread international exchange of new music; for instance, in return for the performance in Switzerland of a concert of modern French works, the "Spirale" organizes a concert of music by modern Swiss composers, and so on. Last Spring they performed a concert devoted to American music. The recent tragic death of P. O. Ferroud will deprive the "Triton" of one of its most influential and active members, and the society will compose the first program of its season from works by M. Ferroud.

Announcement is made by Mlle. Nadia Boulanger of a concert in January to be devoted to works of her composer-pupils. On the program will figure the names of Jean Françaix, Aaron Copland, Marcelle de Manziarly. Messrs. Bekerley and Bernard Schulé.

Production will be given in the Spring of the new oratorio by Georges Migot, "Sermon sur la Montagne" for soli, chorus, string orchestra and organ. It is a work of large dimensions and rich polyphonic treatment. The score shows a close kinship with the masters of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, and its clarity of expression and depth of feeling give promise of a musical event of exceptional significance. The oratorio will be given by the Chorale of the Oratoire du Louvre and again in March in the impressive setting of the Chapelle des Invalides.

* * *

Another important chorale work will be given its first hearing this season under the direction of its composer, Ernest Bloch, with the collaboration of the Orchestre des Concerts Colonne, the Chorale Amicitia and the Chorale Mizmorde. The work will be performed during a religious ceremony at the synagogue in the Rue de la Victoire.

Among other new works recently completed and announced for performance this season is a vocal score by Olivier Messiaen consisting of psalmodies and vocalises in the nature of plain song, alternating with subtle rhythms reminiscent of the Bali dancers. The "Nativité du Seigneur" by the same composer (nine "meditations" for organ), which occasioned very favorable comment at its first performance last year, will be heard here again this Winter. Jean Françaix will play in Berlin a first audition of his piano concerto and in London the first hearing will soon be given of his Sérénade written for the Princesse Edmond de Polignac. André Jolivet has written "Cinq Incantations" for flute solo and "Trois chants des hommes" for baritone and orchestra, destined for performance at an early concert of the "Jeune France." Mr. Albert Roussel has completed a concerto for 'cello and orchestra to be performed at the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam, with Mr. Loevensohn as soloist.

A timely initiative is announced by one of the Paris impresarii in the form of tickets at considerably reduced rates for a series of concerts by well-known virtuosi, thus hoping to parry the unfortunate circumstance that for the last year or two the number of public appearances by these artists has been, on the whole, steadily decreasing.

E. C. FOSTER.

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

NOV 29 1936

SYMPHONY BY CLEMENTI DUE FOR REVIVAL

Boston Orchestra to Play Symphony in D Major Which Has Been in Oblivion 100 Years.

By Associated Press.

Boston, Nov. 28.—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance next Friday afternoon when the Boston Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, plays the symphony in D major by the Americanized Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musicologists credit Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of the manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were held in high regard by Beethoven and Haydn and who as an established pianist gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Lizt, then 13 years old, was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

○ ○ ○

Clippings Tell Story.

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity, between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other 14 symphonies.

Yet when he died in 1832, bequeathing all his manuscripts to his widow, none but sonata scores could be found.

Clementi was a practical man of affairs, and his large estate was in good order. But his symphonies never had been printed, and they dropped from public knowledge for the next 40 years.

Two manuscripts came into the possession of the British Museum in 1871, but, unconnected, they merely intensified the fruitless search for the others.

Then in 1917, Dr. William H. Cummings, a London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder.

A public auction in London soon resulted in their purchase by Carl Engel, chief of the music division for the library of congress of the United States.

In 1924, a magazine article concerning the Washington scores piqued the curiosity of Casella, who had been intensely interested in earning recognition for Clementi as a great symphonist. Ten years passed before Casella finally crossed the ocean to begin serious study of the scores.

○ ○ ○

Put Scores Together.

Putting them together was similar to reassembling several jigsaw puzzles at once. Nevertheless, hard work yielded four symphonies last year, although in each the first movement was incomplete.

Recalling the two manuscripts held in the British museum, Casella went to London, armed with photostatic copies of the Washington library scores. Careful work restored all four, and two were performed and published last year.

The first, third and fourth required some slight filling in by Casella, but the second, which will be performed Friday, was complete, and received its first performance under Casella in Rome last January.

Doctor Koussevitzky first learned of the scores from Casella, and after studying them minutely the last few weeks, described the music as possessing "great charm and brilliance."

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 29 1936

MUSIC

Boston Orchestra Will Give Reclaimed Symphony

Boston, Nov. 27.—(AP)—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance Friday afternoon when the Boston orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, plays the symphony in D major by the angelicized Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musicologists credit Alfred Casela, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together discorded pages of manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

Started Century Ago.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were held in high regard by Beethoven, Haydn and other masters, and who as an established pianist gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Lizt; then 13 years old, was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other 14 symphonies.

Yet when he died in 1832, bequeathing all his manuscripts to his widow, none but sonata scores could be found.

Compositions Disappeared.

Clementi was a practical man of affairs, and his large estate was in good order. But his symphonies never had been printed, and they dropped from public knowledge for the next 40 years.

Two manuscripts came into the possession of the British museum in Qiuo, but, unconected, they merely intensified the fruitless search for the others.

Then, in 1917, Dr. William H. Cummings, a London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder.

America Got Manuscripts.

A public auction in London soon resulted in their purchase by Carl Engel, chief of the music division for the Library of Congress of the United States.

In 1924, a magazine article concerning the Washington scores picqued the curiosity of Casella, who had been intensely interested in earning recognition for Clementi as a great symphonist and thereby gaining for Italy eminence in that field as well as in opera. Ten years passed before Casella finally crossed the ocean to begin serious study of the scores.

Putting them together was similar to reassembling several jigsaw puzzles at once. Nevertheless, hard work yielded four symphonies last year, although in each the first movement was incomplete.

London Filled Gaps.

Recalling the two manuscripts held in the British museum, Casella went to London, armed with photostatic copies of the Washington library scores. Careful work restored all four, and two were performed and published last year.

The first, third and fourth required some slight filling in by Casella, but the second, which will be performed Friday, was complete, and received its first performance under Casella in Rome, last January.

Dr. Koussevitzky first learned of the scores from Casella, and after studying them minutely the last few weeks, described the music as possessing "great charm and brilliance."

CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

NOV 29 1936

Right Off the Recordf

BY STEWART MATTER.

BOCCHERINI—Quartet in A major, opus 33, No. 6; the Kreiner String Quartet (Shulman, Robbins, Kreiner and Shulman). The Friends of Recorded Music Society, discs No. 1 and 2.

The first pressings of the newly formed society, "The Friends of Recorded Music," which I announced two weeks ago in this column, have just reached me and the keen anticipation I felt in awaiting the discs was completely rewarded by the joy in finding lovely music beautifully played and well recorded.

As I said previously, the purpose of this society is to record works which for sundry reasons the commercial companies would not be likely to record, and at the same time to use only American talent in all of its releases. The Boccherini number has never been done before, and it is a most welcome work; perhaps he was not to be ranked among the very great composers of all time, but their are some things he wrote that must be ranked among the gems of music. The quartet at hand is certainly one of his finest works, thoroughly enjoyable.

Few music lovers need an introduction to the Kreiner Quartet for they have earned an enviable reputation through their concert and radio performances. They play the Boccherini in a remarkably fine manner. The recording was made by the Universal Recording Co.; it is perhaps not so perfect as the high fidelity recording of the two principal American companies, but I find no fault.

SCHUBERT—Symphony No. 8, in B minor (The Unfinished); the Boston Symphony Orchestra, direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Victor Musical Masterpiece 319.

Only too often do we hear this great masterpiece played with an extra amount of lush and sentiment. At these times we suffer a nausea which only too often we blame on poor Schubert, only to return to our senses when we hear it played as it is here. Koussevitzky somehow seems to instill new life into the work, recognizing the dramatic qualities of the music when they should be dramatic, and so gracefully outlining the lyric beauties when Schubert asks for it. I can wager you will find a new thrill in Koussevitzky's reading.

The recording is of the best, and, unlike several high fidelity sets which came out recently, the forte and pianissimo passages are not so terribly exaggerated, and in this manner you get a more realistic concert hall effect if you have a machine other than the very newest type.

The final side is taken up with the Ballet Music No. 2 from "Rosamunde." This is not done with quite the grace we should like, but it is beautiful music. This is about the Nth recording of the Rosamunde, so we would have been happy for some of the vast Schubert literature which has as yet been untouched. But for the symphony, only the highest praise.

MILHAUD. — L'Orestie d'Eschyle-Les Choephores: Incidental Music (a) Vociferation funebre, (b) Libation, (c) Exhortation et Conclusion, (d) Les Eumenides, Processional. The Cecilia Chorus of Antwerp, direction of L. de Vocht; soloists: Croiza, van Hertbruggen, and van Steenbergen. Columbia set X64.

The poet Paul Claudel has been especially interested in the early Greek tragedies, and particularly so those of Aeschylus, whom he considers most important in the development of Greek drama. It is from the second of the trilogy known as "Oresteia" that Milhaud selected the material translated by Claudel. The entire trilogy is just another of the many forms treating of the famous story of Aegemmnon, the murderous Clytemnestra, Elektra and Orestes. Milhaud has been noted for his leaning toward violent, bloody, horrid subjects for his settings, and it is easy to be seen that this story would appeal to him in its entirety.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
NOV 29 1936

Symphony Lost Century To Be Played Friday

Work of Muzio Clementi Gets First U. S. Presentation by Boston Orchestra

Casella Closes Music Gap

Ex-Conductor's 'Detective' Work Finds Lost Scores

By The Associated Press

BOSTON, Nov. 28.—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance next Friday afternoon when the Boston Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, plays the Symphony in D Major by the Americanized Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, is credited with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of the manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were held in high regard by Beethoven and Hayden and who as an established pianist gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Liszt, then thirteen years old, was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity, between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other fourteen symphonies. Yet when he died in 1832, bequeathing all his manuscripts, to his widow, none but sonata scores could be found.

Symphonies Were Printed

Clementi was a practical man of affairs, and his large estate was in good order. But his symphonies never had been printed, and they dropped from public knowledge for the next forty years.

Two manuscripts came into the possession of the British Museum in 1871, but, unconnected, they merely intensified the fruitless search for the others.

Then in 1917, Dr. William H. Cummings, a London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder.

A public auction in London soon resulted in their purchase by Carl Engel, chief of the music division for the Library of Congress of the United States.

In 1924, a magazine article concerning te Washington scores picqued the curiosity of Casella, who had been intensely interested in earning recognition for Clementi as a great symphonist. Ten years passed before Casella finally crossed theocean to begin serious study of the scores.

Like Jig-Saw Puzzles

Putting them together was similar to reassembling several jig-saw puzzles at once. Nevertheless, hard work yielded four symphonies last year, although in each the first movement was incomplete.

Recalling the two manuscripts held in the British Museum, Casella went to London, armed with photostatic copies of the Washington library scores. Careful work restored all four, and two were performed and published last year.

The first, third and fourth required some slight filling in by Casella, but the second, which wil be performed Friday, was complete, and received its first performance under Casella in Rome last January.

Dr. Koussevitzky first learned of the scores from Casella, and after studying them minuetly the last few weeks, described the music as possessing "great charm and brilliance."

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle
NOV 29 1936

New Leaders Win Music Lovers

By JOHN SELBY

New York —(AP)— New York hears its young-old Philharmonic Symphony Society throughout the winter. It also hears 10 concerts each per winter from Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony, and from Leopold Stokowski's Philadelphia Orchestra.

Two of these three orchestras have undergone major operations this fall. Many patrons and many observers and most managers stroked their beards in the spring, and came out with the idea that these major operations would most likely reduce audiences this winter. They were wrong.

Enamored by Movies

Philadelphia's noble band "lost" Stokowski. That is, Stokowski became so enamored of the movies and their mass possibilities that he asked his directors to elect a permanent conductor for three years, leaving him free to conduct as little as he chose.

They picked Eugene Ormandy. Hitherto, the Philadelphia has played to packed houses in New York. This winter it is doing the same. And last Tuesday, when Stokowski came to town with an all-Russian program which included Sergei Rachmaninoff's brand new third symphony, the last minute people just didn't get into Carnegie Hall.

The philharmonic is, however, even more astonished. Last spring Arturo Toscanini departed these shores forever, saying among other things, it is declared, that the Philharmonic is the greatest orchestra ever assembled. The philharmonic directors at once set their sails to fit what they thought would be a period of calm—they cut down the season six weeks, and expected reduced business.

Gets Off Hot Spot

But they didn't get reduced business; business is better. Subscription sales are actually ahead of last winter. John Barbirolli, the young Italian-French-English conductor, is not only doing well at the box office, he is doing well on the podium.

Partly this is musical ability, partly the public's curiosity, and (oddly enough) partly tact. No musician ever stood in hotter shoes than Barbirolli a week and three days ago when he began the first piece he ever conducted on American soil—Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture. Many thoughtless persons, even a reviewer or so, had spoken of him as an "unknown" chosen to "replace" Toscanini.

Barbirolli extricated himself from his hot spot neatly by frankly admitting wonder at being chosen, by disclaiming any intention of "replacing" anybody, by declaring that he was a young man trying to make a living. He had won the men of the orchestra. Now he seems to be winning the public.

Boston Symphony Impressive Here In Haydn's Music

N.Y. Am. Nov. 28

By WINTHROP SARGEANT.

A large audience turned out last night at Carnegie Hall for the opening of the Boston Symphony's fifty-first New York season. At the conductor's stand was the familiar figure of Serge Koussevitzky. Last of the major orchestras to make a local bow this Winter, the Bosotn organization exhibited its usual freshness and pliancy.

A well-chosen program began with Haydn's Symphony in B Flat, No. 102, and continued with Debussy's "La Mer."

It has been quite a week, not only for Haydn symphonies, but for those particular late Haydn symphonies that belong to the so-called "Salomon group." At the Philharmonic concerts of Wednesday evening and yesterday afternoon John Barbirolli conducted what is usually known as the first of the series which Haydn wrote for the London impresario between 1791 and 1795. Last night's Haydn was No. 9 of the same vintage.

It is a characteristically melodious, subtle and (for its time) even a daring work. The art of writing for stringed instruments as Haydn and his pupil Mozart knew it has remained a lost one since their time. The lucidity of phrasing that they inherited from the early Italians was something that got buried in the brilliancy and ponderousness of the romantic composers. The ninth of the "Salomon" symphonies is one particularly rich in effective string writing. And in the string sections of the Boston symphony Mr. Koussevitzky had an unsurpassed instrument for the delineation of its phrases. The clarity and style with which the first violins infused the final movement were of a sort uncommon in the ordinary run of symphony concerts.

Debussy's three-part, impressionistic tone poem, "La Mer," has been familiar to us in a number of interpretations. Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of it last night was cautious and objective rather than inspired. But the delicate balances of tone color and dynamics were so admirably held in hand that some allowance could be made for a lack of vigor in the climactic passages. Altogether, if not a brilliant performance, it was a revealing and solidly-knit one. The audience greeted it warmly.

The concert was brought to a close with the thrice-familiar and durable C Minor Symphony of Beethoven. The performance had the refinement and finish that usually accompany this work at the hands of the Bostonians.

Treasure Hunt, Musicological Style: Digging Into Music's Past

Trans. Nov. 28/36

Alfredo Casella Describes His Reconstruction of a Symphony to Be Heard This Week

Few post-mortem vicissitudes are as tragic as those of Clementi, the man who is identified today—by the current opinion of the world—as the author of the "Gradus ad Parnassum"; that is, as a sort of second Czerny, despite the fact that he was one of the leading composers of his era, and of a certainty the only symphonist with whom it was possible for Italy to contend against the great Germans in the whole course of the last century.

The most complete oblivion has fallen little by little upon the works of Clementi—oblivion particularly to be regretted in his own country, which, decidedly to the contrary, should have honored him as the sole Italian musician never to have yielded to the seductions of the lyric drama, in order to dedicate all his powers to nought save absolute music, or, more specifically, to its two noblest and loftiest forms, the symphony and the sonata. If, then, the most complete silence prevails over such a lofty, such an important, output, it is but just to add that in the last quarter of a century a small number of musicians and musicologists have begun to concern themselves with the symphonies of the Roman master.

For they knew that Clementi, first in his youth, and then in the period, 1813-1826, wrote twenty symphonies, which appeared on many an English, German and French program of those years. It was known, also, that the critics of that era had evidenced exceptional admiration for those symphonies, admiration which was justified by their firm construction, by masterly instrumentation, boldness of effects, novelty of form, the melodic purity of the adagi, and so forth. It even happened that while certain ones among these critics appeared to be frightened by the audacities of this art, others did not hesitate to prefer these symphonies to those of Haydn, of Mozart, and even of Beethoven. All in all, it was easy to understand—after all this documentary evidence—that Clementi not only had been a prolific and apt symphonist, but he had been able to arouse the most eager interest in England, Germany and France.

* * *

It was, then, all the more inexplicable and mysterious that all these symphonies totally disappeared on the death of their author (Clementi, born in Rome in 1752, died at Evesham, England, March 10, 1832). It was, indeed, a total disappearance, for, outside of the two juvenile symphonies in B Flat and D Major, issued by Longmann and Broderip in London in 1788, the other great symphonies remained unpublished, and the executor of the estate responsible for taking care of Clementi's papers found no orchestral manuscript among them.

However, the British Museum happened to acquire, in 1781 (1881?—translator's note), several important Clementi autographs, among them an admirable symphonic allegro in D Major, preceded by a sombre and stately introduction in the minor, a piece of music which alone would have sufficed to give a high idea of the symphonic art of Clementi. Unfortunately, this fragment seems to have been examined so superficially, that it appears in the catalogue of the British Museum as being a "sketch" (sic). Besides, there was not a sufficiently penetrating enlightenment to clear away the shadows which seemed to have enveloped forever the symphonic work of the Roman master; and the superb beauty of the piece owned by the British Museum appeared to be especially created to make more acute the regret for a loss so serious for the history of music in general, and for that of the Italian symphony in particular.

* * *

Now it so happened that in 1917, an aged English musicologist (Dr. William Cummings), upon his death left a considerable collection of manuscripts and autographs, which were sold some weeks later in London, through the firm of Sotheby. The catalogue of the sale announced the presence—among other riches—of an important lot of manuscripts of Muzio Clementi, among them the autographs of four symphonies. It has been impossible up to the present time to learn how these manuscripts became the property of Dr. Cummings, seeing that trace of them had been lost with Clementi's death. Fate willed that Dr. Carl Engel—then chief of the division of music of the Library of Congress in Washington—should guess at once the importance of these papers, and that he should decide on their acquisition for the great American national library.

The character and art of Clementi always have maintained my deepest interest. For years I longed for the moment when I might lay my hands on these mysterious symphonies. It was, then, with joy that—in October, 1934—I took advantage of a new sojourn in the United States, to betake myself to Washington where I passed an entire week in studying the symphonies, so long hidden and at last found.

The Clementi manuscripts owned by the Library of Congress comprise 154 sets of leaves, of eight pages each, and in addition a hundred pages of sketches, revisions and musical documents of all kinds. It required but a glance at these manuscripts to convince one that this impeccable and marvelous handwriting had been executed by the same hand as that of the British Museum autographs, a guarantee of their authenticity.

The symphonic manuscripts, properly speaking, comprise four symphonies: a first in G Major, a second in D Major, the Great National Symphony (which, according to contemporary chronicles, would be the master's next-to-the-last, and would have been composed in 1824), and, finally, a last symphony, again in D Major. None of them is absolutely complete, for—curious fact—a more or less important fragment is missing from each of the first movements. Nevertheless, the excited but close study to which I abandoned myself soon led me to the conviction that it was perfectly possible to reconstruct what was missing from the manuscripts, and that at least two of these symphonies plainly merited performance.

* * *

With the Second Symphony (that in D Major), I did not encounter the same difficulties (as with the First, which the author has been discussing—Ed.), for Washington possesses the manuscript complete with the exception of the beginning of the first allegro and its introduction, which are lacking. It should be noted that if the various musicologists who have concerned themselves with this Symphony had been endowed with greater perspicacity, they easily would have guessed—even after the appearance of the simple thematic catalogue arranged by Saint-Foix at the end of the article published in the Turin Review—that the pages missing from that symphony were none other than the introduction and fragment of an allegro catalogued in the British Museum under the numbers 29 and 321.

This hypothesis I had the pleasure of seeing brilliantly confirmed in the verification in which I engaged personally at the museum last May. The manuscript of this symphony, therefore, is complete to the smallest detail, and ready to be played without difficulty.

ALFREDO CASELLA

(Translated by Laning Humphrey from the French in La Revue Musicale; abridged and edited by the music editor of the Transcript.)

BLANK PAGE

Month of December

1936

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

157 DEC 1 - 1936

Either prosperity has finally rounded its corner or music appreciation has taken a sharp upturn. John M. Greene Hall at Smith College was completely sold out last night at the concert given by the National Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Hans Kindler. Smith concerts are always well attended, but there seemed to be an unusually large number of Holyoke and South Hadley faces in the audience. Dr. Kindler and his men were entirely unknown to them, except by reputation, for the orchestra had never been in this vicinity before. And the impressions they carried away were varied. One heard talk of "too brilliant tone", "unusual vigor", "in the same class with the country's leading orchestras" and, conversely, "fine, but not to be rated with the Boston, New York or Philadelphia orchestras". However that may be and whatever group is right, the concert was enjoyable beyond a doubt and interesting in its presentation of a new personality to this part of the world, Dr. Kindler. He is a fine-looking man with an artistic thatch of iron-grey hair and a sensitive face. He leads with powerful strokes of his arms and baton, belying the timid, tip-toeing manner in which he enters a stage. He uses no score whatever, emulating the greatest of all conductors, Arturo Toscanini, late of the New York Philharmonic. His gestures are more flamboyant than the conducting habits of Boston's Serge Koussevitzky, for instance, but every leader has his own methods and Dr. Kindler probably feels he must show strength to his new born orchestra. It is only about five years old and its members are unusually youthful-looking. For that reason, any criticisms must be tempered with the reservations made for things newborn, and all honor should be paid to Dr. Kindler and his men.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

DEC 1 - 1936

Add Prophets Without Honor: Katharine Cornell has had to cancel her engagement for "Wingless Victory" in her home town, Buffalo. The cast includes a six-years-old child, and a permit was refused to make possible the child's appearance. New York, unlike Buffalo, makes an exception in the case of child actors in carrying out its state laws concerning the employment of children.

A symphony which had lain in oblivion for more than a century, received its first American performance under Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra Friday afternoon. It was the D Major work of Muzio Clementi. In 1817 a German periodical reported that Clementi was at work on six symphonies. Other clippings attested their popularity between 1786 and 1824. But when Clementi died, no symphony manuscripts were found, and those played had never been printed. In 1917 a London music scholar died and left a chestful of Clementi manuscripts, some bought later by Carl Engel of the Library of Congress. Alfredo Casella heard of them and put them together like so many jigsaw puzzles, after exhausting study and work. The result was six complete symphonies.

HARRISBURG, PA.
NEWS

DEC 1 - 1936

JAN SMETERLIN PRAISES WORK OF ORCHESTRA

The Harrisburg Symphony Orchestra, which will give its second concert of the season this evening at 8.15 o'clock at the Forum, will present as guest artist, Jan Smeterlin, Polish pianist of world renown. The program will feature compositions by Chopin, fellow countryman of the artist.

Interviewed during rehearsal with the orchestra last evening, he proved to be a very agreeable and adaptable person, entirely lacking the difficult temperament of so many artists. He was pleased with the work of the orchestra, and was voluble in his praise of Conductor George King Raudenbush. Likewise he was delighted with the auditorium, approving in particular the shape and the seating arrangement.

Smeterlin opened his American tour five weeks ago when he played with the Boston Orchestra. He came here from a tour in England, and immediately prior to that, he played to European audiences in Java, Sumatra and other points in the tropics.

"There," he explained, "one has to be adaptable. The temperature averaged 95 degrees constantly, and compared with your delightful climate here, that's colossal heat."

He laughed good naturedly as he told of mosquitos dropping from the chandeliers in the auditoriums, onto the piano keys. "That's playing under strenuous circumstances," he said.

Two years ago Smeterlin gave a concert at Wilson College in Chambersburg, following which he spent two hours in Harrisburg.

Resides in London

His home is in London, but he is there only three or four months each year, due to his heavy schedules. His wife is an English woman, and they have no children, but they do have a lot of fun with Peter, their wire-haired terrier.

"Peter plays the piano, too," he said jokingly, "but the pity of it is that he plays all modernistic music."

He is fond of all sorts of sports, particularly tennis, swimming and skating. After the concert this evening he will take a train to Newark, from where he will leave by plane for Ottawa, Can.

Although he could not eliminate Chopin from his repertoire, he will not single out the composer as being his favorite. He likes to play all music, modern as well as the old classics.

Discusses Program

Mr. Raudenbush discussed the program at the meeting and tea of the Symphony Society held yesterday afternoon at the home of Mrs. Frank M. Masters. Nearly a hundred members were present.

The music which will be played tonight, he said, has been selected from a purely musical standpoint. The program is arranged to express both unity and variety. The unity lies in the fact that all the compositions to be played are of a gay nature, and not especially heavy. The variety arises from the selection of numbers dating from the fifteenth century to the modern day. Works of thirteen composers, representing about seven nationalities, will be included in this festival of music.

The conductor gave detailed accounts of the lives of the composers, and analyzed the compositions in an interesting manner.

Regarding Smeterlin, he said that the artist expresses in his playing the true gaiety, charm and loveliness, as well as the fleeting moments of sadness that are characteristic of the composer Chopin.

Mrs. Harvey F. Smith and Mrs. Carl W. Davis poured tea after the program talk. Mrs. Arthur H. Hull, president, reported the addition of 118 new members to the society.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

DEC 1 1936

Symphony Concert

Joseph Brinkman Soloist in First Performance of Leo Sowerby's Second Piano Concerto

With none of the flourish that usually precedes the presentation of a contemporary American's new composition at a symphony concert, and with, indeed, an excessively modest notice in advance, Leo Sowerby's Second Piano Concerto in E major was given its first performance by Joseph Brinkman and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at Symphony Hall last evening. "Excessively modest," because Mr. Sowerby is an honored and important name among American composers.

The concerto that we heard last night is not an important composition; that was immediately evident. But it is a pleasant one for which the composer need make no apologies in any company except that vanguard of the sophisticates who have forgotten the pleasures of reminiscence. For Sowerby's music is nothing if not reminiscent and nostalgic. It is even reminiscent in the less favorable sense: after the composer has given the bassoon its head with a tune that was our old friend "Pretty Baby" if it was anything, he called on the clarinet and accompanying instruments to give us their "impressions" of Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

Yet there seemed, somehow, nothing dishonest about the whole procedure. Sowerby writes here from the heart (which is still unfashionable) and he writes tunes that can be whistled (which is almost more unfashionable). But he manages to present a fairly individual face on the music. In the slow section—

The concerto is in a single movement, subdivided into a fast section, a slow and another fast. The piano is treated principally as an instrument of song. It must have been treated more brilliantly by the composer, though, than it sounded last night, for Mr. Brinkman, who turned out to be a most musical pianist, seemed also to be an excessively delicate one. The fault may have been in Mr. Sowerby's orchestration, or in the accompaniment under Dr. Koussevitzky, but I do not think either was the case. The orchestral portion seemed, in fact, to be reproduced with admirable conviction as well as clarity by the musicians under Dr. Koussevitzky's lead.

Returning after a week's vacation, the conductor resumed where he had left off. That is to say, it was an evening of superb orchestral playing. The opening number was the Mozart Symphony in C major (K. 338) and the closing one was Cesar Franck's Symphony—both of which had been heard at earlier week-end concerts of the orchestra this season. The playing of the strings in the slow movement was caressingly and captivatingly beautiful. The phrases were finely polished, the Mozartean sentiment was aristocratically reproduced. Never has the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky played Mozart more happily. The last movement was a little too fast, and, more important, a little too nervous; but here, too, it was possible to admire the unanimity and precision and lightness of the instruments.

The presentation of the first movement of the Symphony by Franck indicated no essential change from that given earlier in the season. Either Franck is hopelessly out of date and an over-rated composer to boot, or Dr. Koussevitzky's approach to the Symphony does not do it justice.

M. S.

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE 1/36

Orchestra Members' Portraits Published

Charcoal portraits of each member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 109 in all, have been made by Gerome Brush, noted New England artist, and published in book form.

This is probably the first time that a large symphony orchestra has ever been presented in individual portraiture. Each musician is shown in the act of playing his particular instrument. The book was published by the orchestra.

The Boston ensemble will be heard in the peristyle the evening of Dec. 11, the event being the annual concert complimentary to members of the Toledo Museum of Art.

TACOMA, WASH.
TIMES

1 - 1936

NEW YORK CITY —BY GEORGE ROSS

NEW YORK—Fifteen minutes after your favorite radio stars have said "Au Revoir" for the evening, the odds are two to one they are up at Harry Harrison's office getting the lowdown on themselves. Harry is the boy who's made a big business out of telling the ether's topnotchers where they hit that wrong note, or how to get the most of a particularly good gag.

The sign on the door of his office reads: "Radio Recording Studio." Harry's lifework is just that. When stars want to hear exactly how they sounded to the folks listening in out at Detroit or Dubuque, they call up Harry and tell him to "put them on the gelatin." In ordinary parlance that order simply means taking a recording of their radio broadcast from start to finish.

* * *

GETS SOCK ON GELATIN

Six years ago Harry Harrison was in the music publishing business. In those days radio was beginning to approach its present pinnacle in the entertainment world. And all Harry heard from morn until midnight was the complaint of every radio artists that they couldn't improve because it was impossible to sing and listen to themselves at the same time.

Impossible? Harry didn't think so. He went out and bought himself a roomful of gadgets, rented an office and mailed out a few announcements. Everyone thought he was carzy. Today his customers range from Gladys Swarthout and Eddie Cantor to the Boston Symphony Orchesta.

Peculiarly enough Harry's first client was a singer, comedian or orchestra leader. He was Jack Sharkey, the former fistic champion of these United States. Sharkey wanted the entire radio broadcast of his fight that night. He got it—plus a lovely gift to the jaw in the sixth round which finished the fight. For weeks afterwards, Harry tells me, Sharkey was worried for fear there were a couple of recordings which hadn't been delivered to him. He broke every one he bought.

Hans Kindler, conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, has a standing order every time his organization goes on the air. Next day he plays the record back to his musicians to show them where they were at fault. Rosa Ponselle and Lawrence Tibbett were customers long before they made their radio debut. They used to come up and sing in the studio which Harry has right in his office, in order to learn the proper technique for radio broadcasting. Both of them possessed such resonant voices that they had to be trained not "to blast" into the microphone. Today Harry has two autographed pictures of them which he wouldn't trade for all the bandleaders in the world.

* * *

REFUSES PLEAS

The list of artists who subscribe to Harry's service reads like a "Who's Who" of the entertainment world. But some of his people aren't illustrious. A great many of them are amateurs, who come up to the studio after a broadcast and plead with Harry to erase that awful gong-like sound. But he won't do it. Business is business—and besides it ruins the record.

His current elaborate equipment permits Harry to record four different broadcasts at the same time. The price is usually standard—$15 per hour.

At least six of the larger programs being broadcast from the coast are among Harry's list of satisfied customers. He airmails the recordings the same day. With six competitors in Los Angeles, he considers that the highest type of compliment.

"After all," Harry says, "they recognize a pioneer when they see one. No one ever bought electric lights from anyone but Edison." In that respect Harry is one of Manhattan's modest entrepreneurs.

GRAND HAVEN, MICH.
TRIBUNE

RADIO

The fourth of this season's broadcasts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast over the WJZ network Thursday at 8 o'clock. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. The "Romeo and Juliet" overture and MacDowell's "Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra" will be presented.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM

The fourth of this season's broadcasts by the Boston Symphony will be heard over KDKA at 7 p. m. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture will be broadcast.

Jack Oakie, motion picture comedian and one-time partner of Bob Burns in a black-face vaudeville act, will be the guest star at Bing Crosby's "Music Hall" show over NBC-WSMB at 9 p. m.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

DEC 1 - 1936

AMUSEMENTS

Second Symphony Concert Series

The second of the Monday evening series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, introduced a novelty to Boston and at the same time included Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 34 (Koechel No. 333) and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor. The new work was Leo Sowerby's second concerto for piano and orchestra in E major. The guest soloist was Joseph Brinkman. The Mozart and the Franck symphonies had been previously played during the regular series of concerts. For that reason, if for no other, the interest of the large audience naturally centered on the Sowerby work and the pianist.

The Sowerby concerto was performed from manuscript and, according to the program notes, was first sketched by the composer in the spring of 1932. Last evening in Symphony Hall its initial presentation anywhere proved to be interesting enough and yet lacking in many of the elements that go to make a work important. Its exhuberance was marred by the monotony of the rhythms. In the course of his musical development Mr. Sowerby is said to have explored many "modern musical methods" including jazz and that particular factor apparently influenced him considerably in the writing of his second concerto. To be perfectly truthful, however, it was not the only element represented, for he seemed to have picked up fragments from all over the place.

To all intents and purposes the pianist, Joseph Brinkman, gave the concerto a careful and intelligent reading. There were times when the piano was drowned out by the orchestra, but whether this was a fault of the soloist or of the composer it was impossible to tell at first hearing. Be that as it may, it was a pleasure to have Dr. Koussevitzky back on the conductor's stand after his brief vacation. His interpretation of the Mozart symphony was notable, the second movement especially being read with indescribable beauty. The Franck symphony, too, was superbly set forth and fully deserved the enthusiastic reception given it. The third of the Monday evening concerts will be played on Jan. 18, with Dimitri Mitropoulos as guest conductor.

Community Fund Film in Preview

"Twenty-four Hours," the sound film to be shown in preview tomorrow at the Copley-Plaza, at 1:1 o'clock, by Greater Boston's 1937 Community Fund, has been in preparation more than two months.

The scenes were "shot" in eight Boston social agencies or hopsitals and put together in the studio of Arthur P. Murray in Roxbury. The scenario was written by Ival McPeak.

All the 14 principals are amateurs and there is a crowd of "extras" including doctors and nurses, social workers, children and their elders in settlement houses or hospitals.

Lowell Thomas is the commentator.

The passage of time is indicated by occasional showings of the clock on the Custom House tower.

The incidents in variety portray the usual procedure in a typical day around the clock at a number of Boston's centers for keeping the public happy and well.

Five separate films will be ready for release immediately after the preview and the pictures doubtless will be seen in many of the cities and towns in Greater Boston whose institutions participate in the Community Fund.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

DEC 2 193

BOSTON GROUP WILL PLAY IN PAWTUCKET

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Sinfonietta, a group of 50 players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give the program for the second concert of the Pawtucket Civic Music Association tomorrow evening at 8:30 o'clock in the Pawtucket Junior high school.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

107 DEC 1 - 1936

Either prosperity has finally rounded its corner or music appreciation has taken a sharp upturn. John M. Greene Hall at Smith College was completely sold out last night at the concert given by the National Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Hans Kindler. Smith concerts are always well attended, but there seemed to be an unusually large number of Holyoke and South Hadley faces in the audience. Dr. Kindler and his men were entirely unknown to them, except by reputation, for the orchestra had never been in this vicinity before. And the impressions they carried away were varied. One heard talk of "too brilliant tone", "unusual vigor", "in the same class with the country's leading orchestras" and, conversely, "fine, but not to be rated with the Boston, New York or Philadelphia orchestras". However that may be and whatever group is right, the concert was enjoyable beyond a doubt and interesting in its presentation of a new personality to this part of the world, Dr. Kindler. He is a fine-looking man with an artistic thatch of iron-grey hair and a sensitive face. He leads with powerful strokes of his arms and baton, belying the timid, tip-toeing manner in which he enters a stage. He uses no score whatever, emulating the greatest of all conductors, Arturo Toscanini, late of the New York Philharmonic. His gestures are more flamboyant than the conducting habits of Boston's Serge Koussevitzky, for instance, but every leader has his own methods and Dr. Kindler probably feels he must show strength to his new born orchestra. It is only about five years old and its members are unusually youthful-looking. For that reason, any criticisms must be tempered with the reservations made for things new-born, and all honor should be paid to Dr. Kindler and his men.

TACOMA, WASH.
TIMES

1 - 1936

NEW YORK CITY —BY GEORGE ROSS

NEW YORK—Fifteen minutes after your favorite radio stars have said "Au Revoir" for the evening, the odds are two to one they are up at Harry Harrison's office getting the lowdown on themselves. Harry is the boy who's made a big business out of telling the ether's topnotchers where they hit that wrong note, or how to get the most of a particularly good gag.

The sign on the door of his office reads: "Radio Recording Studio." Harry's lifework is just that. When stars want to hear exactly how they sounded to the folks listening in out at Detroit or Dubuque, they call up Harry and tell him to "put them on the gelatin." In ordinary parlance that order simply means taking a recording of their radio broadcast from start to finish.

• • •

GETS SOCK ON GELATIN

Six years ago Harry Harrison was in the music publishing business. In those days radio was beginning to approach its present pinnacle in the entertainment world. And all Harry heard from morn until midnight was the complaint of every radio artists that they couldn't improve because it was impossible to sing and listen to themselves at the same time.

Impossible? Harry didn't think so. He went out and bought himself a roomful of gadgets, rented an office and mailed out a few announcements. Everyone thought he was carzy. Today his customers range from Gladys Swarthout and Eddie Cantor to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Peculiarly enough Harry's first client was a singer, comedian or orchestra leader. He was Jack Sharkey, the former fistic champion of these United States. Sharkey wanted the entire radio broadcast of his fight that night. He got it—plus a lovely gift to the jaw in the sixth round which finished the fight. For weeks afterwards, Harry tells me, Sharkey was worried for fear there were a couple of recordings which hadn't been delivered to him. He broke every one he bought.

Hans Kindler, conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, has a standing order every time his organization goes on the air. Next day he plays the record back to his musicians to show them where they were at fault. Rosa Ponselle and Lawrence Tibbett were customers long before they made their radio debut. They used to come up and sing in the studio which Harry has right in his office, in order to learn the proper technique for radio broadcasting. Both of them possessed such resonant voices that they had to be trained not "to blast" into the microphone. Today Harry has two autographed pictures of them which he wouldn't trade for all the bandleaders in the world.

• • •

REFUSES PLEAS

The list of artists who subscribe to Harry's service reads like a "Who's Who" of the entertainment world. But some of his people aren't illustrious. A great many of them are amateurs, who come up to the studio after a broadcast and plead with Harry to erase that awful gong-like sound. But he won't do it. Business is business—and besides it ruins the record.

His current elaborate equipment permits Harry to record four different broadcasts at the same time. The price is usually standard—$15 per hour.

At least six of the larger programs being broadcast from the coast are among Harry's list of satisfied customers. He airmails the recordings the same day. With six competitors in Los Angeles, he considers that the highest type of compliment.

"After all," Harry says, "they recognize a pioneer when they see one. No one ever bought electric lights from anyone but Edison." In that respect Harry is one of Manhattan's modest entrepreneurs.

GRAND HAVEN, MICH.
TRIBUNE

RADIO

The fourth of this season's broadcasts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be broadcast over the WJZ network Thursday at 8 o'clock. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. The "Romeo and Juliet" overture and MacDowell's "Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra" will be presented.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

DEC 1 - 1936

Add Prophets Without Honor: Katharine Cornell has had to cancel her engagement for "Wingless Victory" in her home town, Buffalo. The cast includes a six-years-old child, and a permit was refused to make possible the child's appearance. New York, unlike Buffalo, makes an exception in the case of child actors in carrying out its state laws concerning the employment of children.

A symphony which had lain in oblivion for more than a century, received its first American performance under Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra Friday afternoon. It was the D Major work of Muzio Clementi. In 1817 a German periodical reported that Clementi was at work on six symphonies. Other clippings attested their popularity between 1786 and 1824. But when Clementi died, no symphony manuscripts were found, and those played had never been printed. In 1917 a London music scholar died and left a chestful of Clementi manuscripts, some bought later by Carl Engel of the Library of Congress. Alfredo Casella heard of them and put them together like so many jigsaw puzzles, after exhausting study and work. The result was six complete symphonies.

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE Dec 1/36

Orchestra Members' Portraits Published

Charcoal portraits of each member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 109 in all, have been made by Gerome Brush, noted New England artist, and published in book form.

This is probably the first time that a large symphony orchestra has ever been presented in individual portraiture. Each musician is shown in the act of playing his particular instrument. The book was published by the orchestra.

The Boston ensemble will be heard in the peristyle the evening of Dec. 11, the event being the annual concert complimentary to members of the Toledo Museum of Art.

HARRISBURG, PA.
NEWS

DEC 1 - 1936

JAN SMETERLIN PRAISES WORK OF ORCHESTRA

The Harrisburg Symphony Orchestra, which will give its second concert of the season this evening at 8.15 o'clock at the Forum, will present as guest artist, Jan Smeterlin, Polish pianist of world renown. The program will feature compositions by Chopin, fellow countryman of the artist.

Interviewed during rehearsal with the orchestra last evening, he proved to be a very agreeable and adaptable person, entirely lacking the difficult temperament of so many artists. He was pleased with the work of the orchestra, and was voluble in his praise of Conductor George King Raudenbush. Likewise he was delighted with the auditorium, approving in particular the shape and the seating arrangement.

Smeterlin opened his American tour five weeks ago when he played with the Boston Orchestra. he came here from a tour in England, and immediately prior to that, he played to European audiences in Java, Sumatra and other points in the tropics.

"There," he explained, "one has to be adaptable. The temperature averaged 95 degrees constantly, and compared with your delightful climate here, that's colossal heat."

He laughed good naturedly as he told of mosquitos dropping from the chandeliers in the auditoriums, onto the piano keys. "That's playing under strenuous circumstances," he said.

Two years ago Smeterlin gave a concert at Wilson College in Chambersburg, following which he spent two hours in Harrisburg.

Resides in London

His home is in London, but he is there only three or four months each year, due to his heavy schedules. His wife is an English woman, and they have no children, but they do have a lot of fun with Peter, their wire-haired terrier.

"Peter plays the piano, too," he said jokingly, "but the pity of it is that he plays all modernistic music."

He is fond of all sorts of sports, particularly tennis, swimming and skating. After the concert this evening he will take a train to Newark, from where he will leave by plane for Ottawa, Can.

Although he could not eliminate Chopin from his repertoire, he will not single out the composer as being his favorite. He likes to play all music, modern as well as the old classics.

Discusses Program

Mr. Raudenbush discussed the program at the meeting and tea of the Symphony Society held yesterday afternoon at the home of Mrs. Frank M. Masters. Nearly a hundred members were present.

The music which will be played tonight, he said, has been selected from a purely musical standpoint. The program is arranged to express both unity and variety. The unity lies in the fact that all the compositions to be played are of a gay nature, and not especially heavy. The variety arises from the selection of numbers dating from the fifteenth century to the modern day. Works of thirteen composers, representing about seven nationalities, will be included in this festival of music.

The conductor gave detailed accounts of the lives of the composers, and analyzed the compositions in an interesting manner.

Regarding Smeterlin, he said that the artist expresses in his playing the true gaiety, charm and loveliness, as well as the fleeting moments of sadness that are characteristic of the composer Chopin.

Mrs. Harvey F. Smith and Mrs. Carl W. Davis poured tea after the program talk. Mrs. Arthur H. Hull, president, reported the addition of 118 new members to the society.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM

The fourth of this season's broadcasts by the Boston Symphony will be heard over KDKA at 7 p. m. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture will be broadcast.

Jack Oakie, motion picture comedian and one-time partner of Bob Burns in a black-face vaudeville act, will be the guest star at Bing Crosby's "Music Hall" show over NBC-WSMB at 9 p. m.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

DEC 1 1936

Symphony Concert

Joseph Brinkman Soloist in First Performance of Leo Sowerby's Second Piano Concerto

With none of the flourish that usually precedes the presentation of a contemporary American's new composition at a symphony concert, and with, indeed, an excessively modest notice in advance, Leo Sowerby's Second Piano Concerto in E major was given its first performance by Joseph Brinkman and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at Symphony Hall last evening. "Excessively modest," because Mr. Sowerby is an honored and important name among American composers.

The concerto that we heard last night is not an important composition; that was immediately evident. But it is a pleasant one for which the composer need make no apologies in any company except that vanguard of the sophisticates who have forgotten the pleasures of reminiscence. For Sowerby's music is nothing if not reminiscent and nostalgic. It is even reminiscent in the less favorable sense: after the composer has given the bassoon its head with a tune that was our old friend "Pretty Baby" if it was anything, he called on the clarinet and accompanying instruments to give us their "impressions" of Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

Yet there seemed, somehow, nothing dishonest about the whole procedure. Sowerby writes here from the heart (which is still unfashionable) and he writes tunes that can be whistled (which is almost more unfashionable). But he manages to present a fairly individual face on the music. In the slow section—after the Respighian beginnings—you begin to be sure that you are listening to Rachmaninov; but then the composer catches up with you and convinces you that nobody but an American could have written this music.

The concerto is in a single movement, subdivided into a fast section, a slow and another fast. The piano is treated principally as an instrument of song. It must have been treated more brilliantly by the composer, though, than it sounded last night, for Mr. Brinkman, who turned out to be a most musical pianist, seemed also to be an excessively delicate one. The fault may have been in Mr. Sowerby's orchestration, or in the accompaniment under Dr. Koussevitzky, but I do not think either was the case. The orchestral portion seemed, in fact, to be reproduced with admirable conviction as well as clarity by the musicians under Dr. Koussevitzky's lead.

Returning after a week's vacation, the conductor resumed where he had left off. That is to say, it was an evening of superb orchestral playing. The opening number was the Mozart Symphony in C major (K. 338) and the closing one was Cesar Franck's Symphony—both of which had been heard at earlier week-end concerts of the orchestra this season. The playing of the strings in the slow movement was caressingly and captivatingly beautiful. The phrases were finely polished, the Mozartean sentiment was aristocratically reproduced. Never has the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky played Mozart more happily. The last movement was a little too fast, and, more important, a little too nervous; but here, too, it was possible to admire the unanimity and precision and lightness of the instruments.

The presentation of the first movement of the Symphony by Franck indicated no essential change from that given earlier in the season. Either Franck is hopelessly out of date and an over-rated composer to boot, or Dr. Koussevitzky's approach to the Symphony does not do it justice.

M. S.

Second Symphony Concert Series

The second of the Monday evening series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, introduced a novelty to Boston and at the same time included Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 34 (Koechel No. 338) and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor. The new work was Leo Sowerby's second concerto for piano and orchestra in E major. The guest soloist was Joseph Brinkman. The Mozart and the Franck symphonies had been previously played during the regular series of concerts. For that reason, if for no other, the interest of the large audience naturally centered on the Sowerby work and the pianist.

The Sowerby concerto was performed from manuscript and, according to the program notes, was first sketched by the composer in the spring of 1932. Last evening in Symphony Hall its initial presentation anywhere proved to be interesting enough and yet lacking in many of the elements that go to make a work important. Its exhuberance was marred by the monotony of the rhythms. In the course of his musical development Mr. Sowerby is said to have explored many "modern musical methods" including jazz and that particular factor apparently influenced him considerably in the writing of his second concerto. To be perfectly truthful, however, it was not the only element represented, for he seemed to have picked up fragments from all over the place.

To all intents and purposes the pianist, Joseph Brinkman, gave the concerto a careful and intelligent reading. There were times when the piano was drowned out by the orchestra, but whether this was a fault of the soloist or of the composer it was impossible to tell at first hearing. Be that as it may, it was a pleasure to have Dr. Koussevitzky back on the conductor's stand after his brief vacation. His interpretation of the Mozart symphony was notable, the second movement especially being read with indescribable beauty. The Franck symphony, too, was superbly set forth and fully deserved the enthusiastic reception given it. The third of the Monday evening concerts will be played on Jan. 18, with Dimitri Mitropoulos as guest conductor.

MENTS

Community Fund Film in Preview

"Twenty-four Hours," the sound film to be shown in preview tomorrow at the Copley-Plaza, at 1:15 o'clock, by Greater Boston's 1937 Community Fund, has been in preparation more than two months.

The scenes were "shot" in eight Boston social agencies or hopsitals and put together in the studio of Arthur P. Murray in Roxbury. The scenario was written by Ival McPeak.

All the 14 principals are amateurs and there is a crowd of "extras" including doctors and nurses, social workers, children and their elders in settlement houses or hospitals.

Lowell Thomas is the commentator.

The passage of time is indicated by occasional showings of the clock on the Custom House tower.

The incidents in variety portray the usual procedure in a typical day around the clock at a number of Boston's centers for keeping the public happy and well.

Five separate films will be ready for release immediately after the preview and the pictures doubtless will be seen in many of the cities and towns in Greater Boston whose institutions participate in the Community Fund.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

DEC 2 1936

BOSTON GROUP WILL PLAY IN PAWTUCKET

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Sinfonietta, a group of 50 players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give the program for the second concert of the Pawtucket Civic Music Association tomorrow evening at 8:30 o'clock in the Pawtucket Junior high school.

108

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

DEC 1 - 1936

Symphony Lost 100 Years, to Be Played

Boston—(AP)—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance Friday afternoon when the Boston Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, plays the "Symphony in D Major" by the Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musicologists credit Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were held in high regard by Beethoven, Haydn and other masters, and who as an established pianist gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Lizt, then 13 years old, was composing six syphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Left Large Estate

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity, between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other 14 symphonies.

Yet when he died in 1832, bequeathing all his manuscripts, to his widow, none but sonata scores could be found.

Clementi was a practical man of affairs, and his large estate was in good order. But his symphonies never had been printed and they dropped from public knowledge for the next 40 years.

Two manuscripts came into the possession of the British Museum in 1871, but, unconnected, they merely intensified the fruitless search for the others.

Then in 1917, Dr. William H. Cummings, a London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder.

A public auction in London soon resulted in their purchase by Carl Engel, chief of the music division for the Library of Congress of the United States.

Casella Completes Puzzle

In 1924, a magazine article concerning the Washington scores picqued the curiosity of Casella, who had been intensely interested in earning recognition for Clementi as a great symphonist and thereby gaining for Italy eminence in that field as well as in opera. Ten years passed before Caselia finally crossed the ocean to begin serious study of the scores.

Putting them together was similar to reassembling several jigsaw puzzles at once. Nevertheless, hard work yielded four symphonies last year, although in each the first movement was incomplete.

Recalling the two manuscripts held in the British Museum, Casella went to London, armed with photostatic copies of the Washington library scores. Careful work restored all four, and two were performed and published last year.

The first, third and fourth required some slight filling in by Casella, but the second, which will be performed Friday, was complete, and received its first performance under Casella in Rome last January.

Doctor Koussevitzky first learned of the scores from Casella, and after studying them minutely the last few weeks, described the music as possessing "great charm and brilliance."

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

DEC 1 - 1936

Friends of the Symphony

Two years young and two thousand strong, the association of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is on a revolutionary mission.

Its purpose is to strengthen by broadening the financial base of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Heretofore, a limited number of patrons kept the books balanced. Now we find that the Symphony's "friends," in growing numbers, are insistent upon shouldering some of the responsibility.

This is as it should be. The orchestra is of Boston and every person with a live interest in extending its successes is eligible as a "friend."

It isn't a question of "how much," for the size of the membership fee is left to the discretion of the individual. Few will forego the privilege and honor of being enrolled among the Friends of the Symphony.

OMAHA, NEB.
EVENING BEE NEWS

DEC 1 - 1936

The World

By MARTIN W. BUSH

Jean P. Duffield, pianist, who has been an important pillar in Omaha's music structure for many a year, is presenting two of his artist students in concert at Duchesne college Tuesday night. So consistently fine has been all with which he has identified himself musically, both by word and deed, and so ably equipped have been pianists who have borne the stamp of his teaching, that musical excellence of the concert is assured.

The young pianists are to be Lillian Gill Switzer and Richard Niver. They join forces as duo-pianists in Maier's transcription of Bach's Sicilienne, Mozart's D major sonata and Lecuona's Malaguena. Mr. Niver offers as solos, Caprice by Paganini-Schumann, Chopin's F sharp Nocturne and C sharp minor Scherzo and Mrs. Switzer will play a group consisting of Saint-Saens' Allegro Apassionata, four Inventions by Bach, Toch's Juggler, Friedmann's transcription of Gluck's Ballet of the Blessed Spirits and the last of Chopin's Etudes.

The event is set for 8:15 and is open to the public.

* * *

A particularly fine broadcast came recently from Cambridge, Mass., when the Boston Symphony orchestra played ~~under~~ direction of Richard Burgin, the orchestra's assistant conductor. Programs had announced that they would play Bach's C major organ Toccata, but to the joy of many they also played the ensuing Adagio and Fugue.

It had all been orchestrated by the Hungarian, Leo Weiner, and with gorgeous result. He has been faithful to every note of the original score excepting some pardonable doubling of parts and an alteration at the end of the Fugue. The interplay of orchestral instruments illuminated its lines with kaleidoscopic effect, the Toccata assuming proportions of a Gothic cathedral, the Adagio becoming a thing of heavenly beauty, the transition to the Fugue making pygmies of most contemporary seekers for beauty with disonance, and the Fugue became electric in its vitality and grandeur. And still there live those who refer to Bach as a mere musical mathematician!

Whoever Richard Burgin May be, be it recorded that it has been many a day since a personality has so dynamically projected itself over the radio. The orchestra was assuredly "on its toes" and with that magnificent reading, Mr. Burgin deserves place with the elect.

How interesting to observe seizure of Bach's organ music for orchestral transcription in recent years and what would the cantor of Leipzig say, could he now hear them?

With a hearing of that performance one would suppose that every organist in the country would scurry to his organ bench to at least try simulation of that reading. But, they will not.

PAGE TWENTY-EIGHT

Boston Symphony Will Produce Masterpiece 'Sleuthed' by Italian

(UP)—A symphonic materpiece which vanished mysteriously more than a century ago will be given its first performance in America by the Boston Symphony orchestra next Friday, it was announced today.

Behind the belated discovery of the long-lost orchestral score lies the story of a remarkable feat of sleuthing by a world-famous musician, Alfredo Casella, the Italian composer who formerly was conductor of the Boston Symphony "pop" concerts.

The work is "symphony in D major" by Muzia Clementi, Italian composer who died in England in 1832 at the age of 80.

At Clementi's death the musical world was astonished to learn that despite his fame as creator of 20 symphonies, contemporaneously performed and highly praised, not one was found among his effects.

In 1817 a German periodical had reported him at work on six symphonies which he intended as his greatest musical legacy. Exactly a century later, an English musicologist, Dr. William Cummings, died, leaving a large sheaf of Clementi orchestral manuscripts.

Carl Engel, chief of the music division of the Library of Congress, acquired the entire lot for his department.

The Clementi manuscripts comprised 932 pages shuffled together in such disorder that nobody seemed to find time to assemble and appraise them.

But in 1924 a French scholar went to Washington, inspected the manuscripts and wrote an article hinting at their potential value.

It was this article which fired Casella's curiosity, though a decade elapsed before he found an opportunity to study the manuscripts.

First, he discovered four symphonies, complete except for defective first movements. Three of them he pieced together from the hodgepodge of papers. Baffled as to the opening movement of a "Symphony in D Major," he finally recalled that the British Museum possessed two Clementi manuscripts, acquired in 1881 and catalogued as "sketches."

Was it possible, Casella reasoned, that they were mislabeled?

Armed with photostatic copies of the Washington manuscripts, he hastened to London, where he found that one of the supposed sketches was the first movement of the "Symphony in D Major"—far from a sketch—complete in every respect.

It is this reconstituted work which will be performed here next Friday.

"This symphony has great charm and shows msaterly instrumentation," Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony's conductor, reported after studying its pages.

ALBUQUERQUE, N. M.
JOURNAL

1936

Symphony, Lost for Century, First Heard

BOSTON, Dec. 5 (AP)—Lost for a

WEST PALM BEACH, FLA.
POST

Symphony Found

BOSTON, Dec. 4—(AP)—Lost

PASADENA, CAL.
STAR-NEWS

DEC 3 - 1936

Recognized as Greatest 'Cellist

GREGOR PIATIGORSKY
Who Will Offer Third Concert in Pasadena at Playhouse Sunday

Gregor Piatigorsky, favorite exponent of the violoncello, returns to Pasadena for the third time in four years next Sunday evening.

Every city has its favorite stars of the concert stage and Piatigorsky, the sensational Russian 'cellist, surely can be classed as one of Pasadena's musical idols. His first concert here four years ago brought out a record audience for the Playhouse. His second, one year later, was equally crowded. His coming appearance Sunday evening, at 8:15 o'clock in the Playhouse is rapidly selling out. He gives the second Coleman Concert of the season and it was announced today that it may be necessary to offer seats on the stage.

In the last four years Piatigorsky has reached the musical heights. He is now conceded to be the greatest 'cellist of the age by music critics. Last year he was engaged to play a new concerto for violoncello and orchestra with the New York Philharmonic at one of the last concerts directed by the famous Italian conductor, Toscanini. This past winter he was presented with one of the finest 'cellos ever made through the admiration and friendship of the treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

During a two weeks stay in Southern California on his present tour, Piatigorsky is giving five concerts and it is predicted all of them will be sold out. His recital here, however, is the only opportunity to hear him in a moderate sized theater where the full play of his art and personality can be enjoyed to the fullest.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC 2 1936

Old French Music Played at Concert in Sharpe Home

By Gladys Van Egmond

Visions of life in the 17th and 18th centuries were stimulated among the audience that overflowed Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe's music room yesterday afternoon to hear music current in that age and played upon two ancient instruments—the harpsichord and viola da gamba.

Mrs Sharpe opened the gray-green auditorium of her Prospect street home for the chamber musicale for members of the Alliance Francaise and a few friends, about 50 in all.

Putnam C. Aldrich of Providence and Boston, and Alfred Zighera, a 'cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, began the program together. Then Mr. Zighera gave a little lecture about the viola da gamba, its history and its relation to others in the viol group, and played some passages in example.

Lectures on Harpsichord

Mr. Aldrich, who is the son of Mr. John G. Aldrich of 223 Bowen street, performed the same service with the harpsichord, playing a rondeau and other music in solo. The two wound up the program with a long number, having given more than an hour to selections of Couperin le Grand, Rameau and other composers of the period.

Mrs. Robert J. Beede, president of the Alliance Francaise this year, presented the musicians and talked briefly at the end of the concert. The hostess also gave a few words of greeting. All speech was in French, including the miniature lectures by the musicians.

The wife of the harpsichordist, who resides here with her father-in-law and little daughter, Allegra, was present as chairman of the program committee for the Alliance. Mr. Zighera's wife also came, from Boston, as special guest.

The harpsichord is a beautifully-proportioned instrument. At first glance, it looks like a smaller edition of a grand piano, made on delicate lines and of fine wood. But there is a double keyboard and seven pedals, and the sound is entirely different.

Viola Antique

While Mr. Aldrich's harpsichord is a reproduction from the old, and imported from France. Mr. Zighera's viola was fashioned in 1691 in London, and he picked up the antique in Paris, he said.

With a truck and five men and considerable uneasiness, Mr. Aldrich moved the fragile harpsichord to Providence from his studio in Boston for yesterday's concert and for another appearance with Mr. Zighera before the Providence Art Club tomorrow evening at 8:30 o'clock. It will be members' night.

In the informal gathering of members afterward, Mrs. Beede was congratulated by the others for sponsoring an unusual afternoon in place of the scheduled conference.

Wine-red and pale pink carnations, in a pair of vases, decorated the fireplace, before which the musicians played in the music room. French chocolate was served to the guests at 5 o'clock in the dining room, and there the table held a silver bowl full of yellow tea roses as a centrepiece.

Mr. Aldrich is studying for his Ph. D. at Harvard University, writing music criticisms for a Boston newspaper and giving an occasional concert or lecture. He studied the harpsichord in Paris.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

MONITOR Dec. 9/36 Page Eleven

36  184

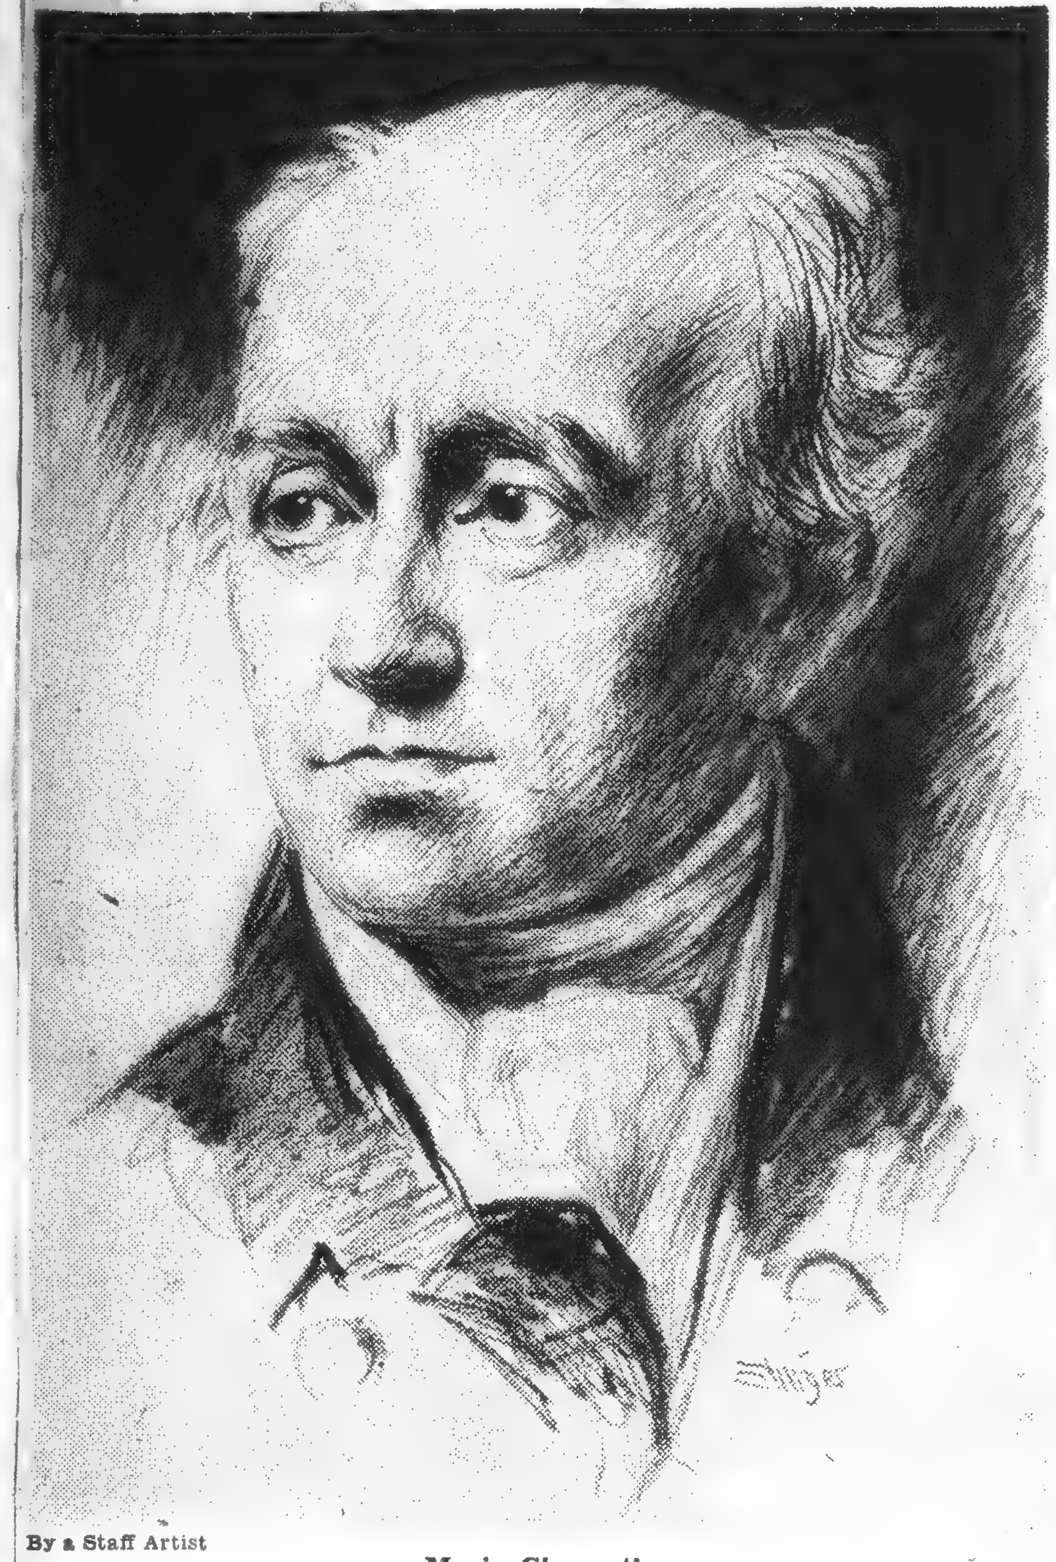
Master



By a Staff Artist

Muzio Clementi

Boston Symphony Rehearses Long-Lost Clementi Work

There is an air of climactic excitement in Symphony Hall.

Behind the great reddish curtain which separates the dim auditorium from the brightly lit stage, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky lashed his players with a thousand strokes of the baton.

For a new symphonic work is being rehearsed for the first time. A new symphonic composer has been discovered.

Now crouching beside his music stand, now half sitting on the stool-like conductor's chair, now standing tense and with arms outspread, calling for redounding climaxes, Dr. Koussevitzky interrupts his players at frequent intervals.

Play It Beautifully

"Dolce, dolcissimo," he pleads. "It is beautiful music, gentlemen. Play it beautifully. . ."

And following a mellifluous string passage.

"Non, non. It is too cold. . . . Give me the warm Italian sunshine, gentlemen." As he speaks, the inflections of his voice caress the music like the warm sun of which he speaks.

The orchestra arrives at a delicate duet passage for flute and oboe. Another halt. The background is obscuring the melody.

"As soft and fine as possible," whispers the conductor, displaying in a graceful movement of the hands the very fineness he wishes. "It must sound . . . Everything must sound."

Later still, a rapid movement fleets through the violin section.

"No, no. You are late." Using his baton to bow an imaginary violin, he asks for quicker shorter movements.

So for Two Hours

This goes on for nearly two hours. The three great shafts of light on the other side of the red curtain have moved many feet, throwing glints of light across the backs of the empty seats. Like immobile sentinels they stand. One almost expects them to be roused somehow by the excitement of the music.

Finally the break comes. With a few parting instructions, the maestro retires to his dressing room.

There, he expresses in words the intensity and enthusiasm which he has been displaying for the "new" work by a composer who wrote his last symphony more than 100 years ago.

He is Muzio Clementi, an Italian of the latter eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, whose 20 symphonies have been completely forgotten, while he is known today chiefly for his "Gradus ad Parnassum," a series of piano exercises.

Goes Into Repertoire

"You liked it?" asks Dr. Koussevitzky. "Yes, it is marvelous—and very difficult to perform, too," he remarks, and then, by way of explanation, "Well, you saw how we worked."

The distinguished conductor, who looked so tall on the stand, is rather a small man close to. But the stature of his enthusiasm, of his intensity, is undiminished. His eyes shine as he talks of the music.

"Clementi, yes, he was a master. . . . The symphony will certainly go into our repertoire and I shall try to discover some more of his works."

Dr. Koussevitzky explained further that between the eighteenth century and the post-war period there were no great Italian composers of absolute music.

Clementi an Exception

Clementi—ranked by contemporary critics with Mozart, Hayden, Beethoven—was the sole exception. But his works disappeared. Editors in those days were careless. And people became more interested in Clementi's piano exercises than in his symphonic works.

Asked whether the return to composers of an earlier period indicated a dearth of new contemporary material, Dr. Koussevitzky shrugged his shoulders.

"It is a poor time of creation," he said. "We are not in a period of creative activity. Everything lasting seems to have been done."

And then returning to Clementi, he remarked, "Yes, this man had great talents. And Casella, who arranged the work, is a master."

To be exact, Alfredo Casella is not only a master composer, but his detective exploits in rediscovering Clementi sound like something out of a first-class detective yarn.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

A.P. DEC 5 - 1936

LOST SYMPHONY HEARD

After Lapse Of More Than Century—Written By Clementi.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

DEC 2 - 1936

Fill 100-Year Gap in History With Symphony

Muzio Clementi's D Major Composition Will Be Played on Dec. 4 in Boston

By BERNARD FREEMAN

Boston, Dec. 2 (AP).—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance Friday afternoon when the Boston orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, plays the Symphony in D Major by the Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musicologists credit Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were held in high regard by Beethoven, Haydn and other masters, and who as an established pianist gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Liszt, then 13 years old, was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity, between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other 14 symphonies.

Yet when he died in 1832, bequeathing all his manuscripts to his widow, none but sonata scores could be found.

Clementi was a practical man of affairs, and his large estate was in good order. But his symphonies never had been printed and they dropped from public knowledge for the next 40 years.

Two manuscripts came into the possession of the British Museum in 1871, but, unconnected, they merely intensified the fruitless search for the others.

Then in 1917, Dr. William H. Cummings, a London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder.

A public auction in London soon resulted in their purchase by Carl Engel, chief of the music division for the Library of Congress of the United States

In 1924, a magazine article concerning the Washington scores piqued the curiosity of Casella, who had been intensely interested in earning recognition for Clementi as a great symphonist and thereby gaining for Italy eminence in that field as well as in opera.

DES MOINES, IA.
REGISTER Dec. 1

LOST RETURNS

Symphony Hidden a Century Applauded in Boston.

BOSTON, MASS. (AP)—Lost for Something of a Mystery

Clementi himself was a mystery. Hailed by critics of his day as a composer of symphonies, he left not one orchestral manuscript. In 1817, he was reported to be working on six master symphonies which were to be his crowning glory. These also disappeared.

Just 100 years later, a batch of Clementi manuscripts from the estate of Dr. William H. Cummings, the English musicologist, were sold to the Library of Congress in Washington. And in 1934, Casella went to Washington, found four symphonies with incomplete first movements. He went over 1000 pages of manuscripts, revisions and final drafts.

One of the symphonies (in D major) he found to be complete except for the beginning of the first allegro and its introduction. Eagerly he went through the manuscripts again, but failed to find anything.

Found in British Museum

At last it occurred to him that the British Museum had an introduction and fragment of an allegro acquired in 1871 and catalogued under the classification, "Sketch."

Taking photostats of the Washington manuscripts to the British Museum, he found that his hopeful expectation was fulfilled—that the British Museum manuscripts had been mislabeled and that they were the missing initial sections of the second symphony.

And this is the Symphony, which after 100 years' obscurity, will be given its first performance by an American orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

MARIETTA, OHIO
TIMES

DEC 2 - 193

Ma ettans to Hear Contralto

Katherine Meisle, famous American contralto, who opens the season of Marietta Community Concert Association in Marietta on Monday evening, December 7, is starred not only on the roster of the Metropolitan Opera Association for the third successive season but is also a recurrent feature of the opera seasons of other large cities of the country. Her concert next Monday evening will be given at the First Congregational Church.

Typical of her successes in both the concert field and on the dramatic stage is the fact that during November, 1935, her seventh season with the San Francisco Opera Company, she sang the entire Ring Cycle of Wagner and Amneris in "Aida" at the Memorial Opera House, then left to appear as Brangaene in the Chicago Symphony Orchestra's four concert performances of "Tristan and Isolde." A fortnight of recitals enroute to New York followed, leading up to her Metropolitan Opera appearances the first of which, a magnificent performance as Fricka in "Die Walkuere," took place on the second night of the season, December 18. Later in the Winter, during January, 1936, she repeated her Brangaene with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

Definitely established as "one of the world's great contraltos" Kathryn Meisle's voice is of that rare and fortunate quality known as a natural contralto. She is a thorough musician, one who can sing equally well such widely divergent types of music as Wagner and Bach, Brahms and Verdi. Besides, she has a charm of personality and sincerity of manner which make her an outstanding favorite on the recital platform.

Miss Meisle was born in Philadelphia and reared there. All of her musical training has been in this country. She made her professional debut with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra in October, 1921. Two years later the young girl was engaged by the Chicago Civic Opera to singing weighty contralto parts rarely entrusted to one of so little experience. But her debut role was Erda in "Siegfried" and as the earth goddess of ancient wisdom, covered with hoarfrost, she made an impression which an artist of twice her age might have envied.

This popular contralto has been called the "ideal festival star" and with reason. Foremost among such engagements have been appearances at the Ann Arbor Festival for three seasons, also at the Cincinnati, Worcester, North Shore (Evanston), Lindsborg, Spartanburg, Westchester, Springfield and Newark Festivals.

This distinguished artist has also been engaged time and again as soloist by the Philadelphia, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Detroit, Cleveland, Chicago, Cincinnati, Boston, St. Louis, Minneapolis, and New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestras. She has done the Bach St. Matthew Passion three times with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ossip Gabrilowitsch; two successive seasons, 1935 and 1936, with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under Frederick Stock; and twice with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.

Miss Meisle is also a great favorite during the Summer at the Hollywood Bowl, at New York's Stadium Concerts and at Philadelphia's Robin Hood Dell. In New York, under the baton of Albert Coates, she has swung the Verdi Requiem four times.

A recent distinction was conferred on the singer by the National Federation of Music Clubs which voted her an Honorary Life Members in recognition of her "outstanding work and brilliant career as an American artist." Two years ago the University of Southern California honored her with the degree of Doctor of Music.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 2 1936

FRENCH GROUP IS GUEST OF MRS. HENRY D. SHARPE

Concert of 17th and 18th Century Music Presented.

Members of the Alliance Francaise were guests of Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe at her home on Prospect street yesterday afternoon at a concert of 17th and 18th century music played by Putnam Aldrich, harpsichord, and Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba.

Music by Couperin le Grand, Rameau and others was performed. The musicians discussed the music, the composers, and the instrumental families to which the harpsichord and the viola da gamba belong. All the explanations were in French.

Mr. Aldrich described the construction and action of the harpsichord and played two solos, besides the dance suites and other pieces in which he accompanied Mr. Zighera.

Mr. Zighera spoke of the viola da gamba in relation to the others of the viol group. It resembles the violoncello, but has seven strings, tuned in fourths, with an interval of a third in the middle. It is played like a 'cello.

Mr. Zighera is a 'cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Aldrich, besides his concert work, lectures on music and writes for newspapers.

WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS

3 - 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY ~~IN~~ TWO CONCERTS

Wheeling music lovers will appreciate the news that the Boston symphony orchestra will give a Sunday matinee concert in Pittsburgh on their forthcoming visit to that city. Conductor Koussevitzky will bring his orchestra of 110 virtuoso players to Syria Mosque for a Saturday evening concert on December 12, followed by a Sunday afternoon concert the next day at three o'clock.

The Saturday program follows—Symphony in C major No. 34 (K 338)—Mozart; Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fee"—Stravinsky; Symphony in D minor—Franck; Sunday afternoon follows— Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ—Vivaldi; (edited by A. Siloti; Prelude to "Lohengrin"— Wagner; Scherzo in G minor from the Octet, op. 20—Mendelssohn; (arranged from orchestra by the composer); Daphnis and Chloe" suite No. 2—Ravel; Symphony No. 5 in C minor—Beethoven.

YPSILANT
PR
DEC 2

Boston
In Ch

Ann Arbor, Mi
oston Symphony oximately one ayers, will be h enth time in ecember 10.
This distinguis
as heard in th
mes during the termittent occ ears. Since 193 een heard annu rium. Dr. Ko
rought this orch nguished recor ishments to a ction. On the oc
g appearance, s invited Jose
e piano faculty,
, performing th
o. 2 in E major its second he an having been y Dr. Koussevits premiere in Bo
ecember date.
The program
hich Dr. Kouss
ded, is as follow
Overture, "The erlioz; Prelude agner; Scherzo e Octet, Op. 20,
nged for orche

ALBA
N

DE

Aeolia
Perf

Boston Sy Restrain

This season musical perform and Art. In sp ant weather p than usual audi hear the progr
the Aeolians, fo
Boston Sympho
no one present gret the effort r hall.
It would be a to choose for s
one or two o numbers presen ble, for each w gem-like finish
gree of perfectio
At the same nstrumentalists of restraint whic
ers the satisfying
no time were th
or their profess ng taxed. This unit.
It is seldom, heard in Alba
ent in such co hose of Miss Ne eolians. Her p enie "Legende" hing of surpass
s a vehicle calc rtist as among resses of her im
Something sim aid of the surp erformance of N t, in his solo iss Zimmer s monstration o iliar Wilhelm hubert's "Ave
d by his exhib chnical equipm te "Malaguena
On second thou umber played serving of spe

LEOMIN
ENT

DEC 5

Sym

BOSTON, D

YPSILANTI, MICH.
PRESS

DEC 2 - 1936

Boston Symphony To Play In Choral Union Program

Ann Arbor, Mich., Dec. 2— The Boston Symphony Orchestra of approximately one hundred and ten players, will be heard for the thirteenth time in Hill Auditorium, December 10.

This distinguished organization was heard in this series several times during the nineties and on intermittent occasions in later years. Since 1931, however, it has been heard annually in Hill Auditorium. Dr. Koussevitsky has brought this orchestra with its distinguished record of past accomplishments to a high state of perfection. On the occasion of its coming appearance, Dr. Koussevitsky has invited Joseph Brinkman of the piano faculty, to appear as soloist, performing the Piano Concerto No. 2 in E major, of Leo Sowerby, in its second hearing, Mr. Brinkman having been previously invited by Dr. Koussevitsky to perform at its premiere in Boston at an earlier December date.

The program in its entirety which Dr. Koussevitsky has provided, is as follows:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; Prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; Scherzo in G minor from the Octet; Op. 20, Mendelssohn (arranged for orchestra by the composer); Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra No. 2 in E major, Sowerby, Joseph Brinkman; and Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67, Beethoven.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard in the Choral Union Series, Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor, Thursday, December 10.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

DEC 3 - 1936

Aeolians Give Unsurpassed Performance at Art Institute

Boston Symphony Orchestra Ensemble Shows Restraint in Albany Appearance; Soloists Win High Praise for Work

By RAY A. MOWERS

This season's first demonstration of the value of understatement in musical performance was heard last night at the Institute of History and Art. In spite of the unpleasant weather prevailing, a larger than usual audience turned out to hear the program presented by the Aeolians, four members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and no one present had reason to regret the effort required to reach the hall.

It would be an idle waste of time to choose for special mention any one or two of the programmed numbers presented by the ensemble, for each was performed with gem-like finish and a superior degree of perfection.

At the same time, these skilled instrumentalists exercised a sense of restraint which gave their hearers the satisfying impression that at no time were their physical strength or their professional resources being taxed. This is rare in such a unit.

It is seldom, too, that the harp is heard in Albany as a solo instrument in such competent hands as those of Miss Nellie Zimmer of the Aeolians. Her presentation of the Renie "Legende" last night was a thing of surpassing beauty as well as a vehicle calculated to stamp the artist as among the topmost mistresses of her imposing instrument.

Something similar could well be said of the surpassingly competent performance of Minot Beale, violinist, in his solo appearances with Miss Zimmer accompanying. His demonstration of tone in the familiar Wilhelmj arrangement of Schubert's "Ave Maria" was equalled by his exhibition of sparkling technical equipment in the Sarasate "Malaguena."

On second thought, there was one number played by the ensemble deserving of special attention—the "Barcarole" by MacMillan. It was a superb example of what may be done to make modernistic idioms digestible for classicists when in the hands of a group touched with something akin to genius.

NASHVILLE, TENN.
TENNESSEAN

Long Lost Symphony Is Warmly Welcomed

BOSTON, Dec. 4.—(AP)—Lost

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

DEC 2 - 1936

Boston Symphony Quartet to Play

Four accomplished members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to appear in a chamber music program tonight at the Institute of History and Art.

Local instrumentalists will be interested in the program for many reasons but principally because of the scheduled solo appearances of Minot Beale, violinist, and Miss Nellis Zimmer, harpist, both members of the quartet. The other artists in the distinguished ensemble are Carl Stockbridge, cellist, and George Madsen, flutist.

Mr. Beale's violin solos are to include Adamowski's "Aid de Ballet," Wilhelmj's setting for Schubert's "Ave Maria" and "Malagueana" by Sarasate.

Bach's "Bouree" will begin the harp solo group followed by Liadow's "Music Box" and Tournier's "Etude de Concert."

The ensemble will open the program with Valentini's Sonata in G Major. The finale will be the Dance of the Comedians from Smetena' ' "The Bartered Bride.' Their other numbers embrace the intermezzo from Delibes' "Naila," "Canto Amoroso" by Sammartini, "Flight of the Bumble Bee" by Rimsky-Korsakov, "Melodie" by Gluck, two intermezzi from Bizet's "Carmen," "Barcarole" by MacMilan "Nocturne" by Soppler.

LEOMINSTER, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

DEC 5 - 1936

Symphony

BOSTON, Dec. 5 (AP)—Lost

Note on New Symphony by Werner Josten

Premiere to Be Given at the Week-End Concerts of Boston Orchestra

An important change of program for this week's Friday afternoon and Saturday evening symphony concerts replaces Cassela's edition of a Clementi Symphony with a considerably shorter work in the same form by Werner Josten, which will be conducted by its composer; and two shorter scores. One of these, the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Octet, is familiar here in Mendelssohn's own orchestration which Koussevitzky will employ; the other, Debussy's arrangement for orchestra of two of Eric Satie's static and exquisite "Gymnopedies," needs only the reminder that the scholarly and witty Satie had the celebrated festival of ancient Sparta in mind, the Gymnopaedia, named for the dances of naked youths in honor of Apollo.

Mr. Josten's "Symphony in F," only recently completed, is being performed for the first time anywhere. The Boston orchestra has previously played other music of Mr. Josten, including his symphonic movement, "Jungle," and his Concerto Sacro.

Two germinating motives, heard throughout the three movements, form a fundamental theme of the whole symphony. The first of these, by far the more important, is composed of the ascending notes F, A-flat, B-flat, C; the second rises and falls through four more notes, E-flat, F, E-flat, C. The brief, energetic first movement is based almost wholly on the theme of the mottos which are constantly varied according to well established contrapuntal practices and precepts. The Andante is a rondo in B major at the end of which an extended transitional passage—allegro moderato—swells from pianissimo to fortissimo and introduces the Finale without pause. This third movement, mainly in F major, contributes the expected affirmation —both of man's struggle and man's motto theme. Writing in a consistently contemporary idiom, Professor Josten is formally reminiscent of Beethoven, harmonically of Stravinsky. Perhaps the two are not an odd pair.

Antonio Vivaldi's "Spring" Concerto which opens the program is the first of the little symphonic poems called "The Four Seasons" by their composer, who presumably supplied the sonnets that explain them. Lettered parts of the poems appear in the score at the beginning of the passages to which they apply. Here is program-music at an early and explicit stage—also at a highly poetic one. In it Vivaldi

---

AUBURN, N. Y.
CITIZEN ADVERTISER

DEC 2 - 1936

* * *

SANS HORSES—Sometimes I turn to the music columns for a glance at the current Carnegie Hall parade, and lately what impresses me particularly are the virtues singled out by the critical clan for special commendation. In almost every case, when dealing with orchestral conductors, these seem to be things the leaders haven't got.

Thus, Serge Koussevitsky, of the Boston Symphony, has just been praised for conducting "without fireworks," and Fritz Reiner earned a local magazine's approval for conducting "without compromise." Having been praised for everything else, Jose Iturbi is now achieving recognition for conducting "without a piano."

To continue the left-handed enumeration, a leading morning paper has been patting Eugene Ormandy on the back for conducting "witthout a score." Leopold Stokowski is bowling people over because he leads without a baton. Otto Klemperer used to cause favorable comment because he conducted without a podium, and John Barbirolli, the new Philharmonic maestro, now makes everyone take notice because he conducts without his eye-glasses.

The leader has still to come along who can conduct without an orchestra.

* * *

PITTSFIELD, MASS
EAGLE

DEC 4 - 1936

Boston Symphony Friends Have Meeting

Great Increase Reported in Membership and Pledges Toward Deficit

The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra met at Symphony Hall in Boston yesterday afternoon. Edward A. Taft, chairman, reported a substantial increase this year in the society's membership and the amount of money pledged for this season's deficit of the orchestra.

The membership on Dec. 1 was 1502 and contributions already pledged total $55,000 against $36,000 at this time a year ago.

Miss Robinson Smith Attends

There were speeches by Attorney Bentley W. Warren, president of the orchestra trustees, and Jerome D. Green, director of the Harvard Tercentenary celebration. Several members from New York attended including Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc. The orchestra played for the Festival last summer.

After referring to the fact that the Boston Symphony has passed through six years during which deficits mounted and gifts decreased, without lowering of artistic standards, Mr. Warren said the last three years have been particularly difficult.

Had it not been for munificent financial assistance from two persons in particular, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, he continued, it might not have been possible to come through these three seasons without impairment of the orchestra's standards.

Mr. Warren at this point announced what he called a "super-subsidy" from Mr. and Mrs. Dane —an offer to pay personally three years' back taxes on the Symphony Hall property. These taxes are said to be between $20,000 and $30,000.

Endowment Fund, $537,000

With this debt cleared, Mr. Warren said, it will be possible to apply the $72,000 legacy from the late Belle Hunt to the Boston Symphany's endowment fund. With this addition the endowment fund is brought to $537,000.

Mr. Warren, in considering the present brilliant status of the orchestra as an artistic institution, remarked that the Friends were not asked to support a moribund institution, but one which, in the opinion of some judges, holds leading place among the orchestras of America.

Mr. Taft was chosen to serve another year as chairman. A rising vote of thanks was given Mr. and Mrs. Dane, and a further resolution was passed thanking out-of-city contributors for their gifts. It was also resolved that each member be expected to secure another member during the season.

Mr. Taft announced that pledges made last season came to within $2100 of covering that season's deficit. The remaining amount, he added, was later subscribed and accounts were balanced.

Jerome D. Green spoke on the Boston Symphony's share in the academic celebration at Harvard University last September.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted a small orchestra of Symphony men in the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, No. 102.

Tea was served in the Huntington Avenue foyer, where members of the society were privileged to preview an exhibition of paintings and tapestries loaned by former Gov. Alvan T. Fuller, a trustee of

---

Dec. 5/36

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

SALAAMS

To Critic William James Henderson, who yesterday celebrated his eighty-first birthday;

To Pianist Moriz Rosenthal, who plays in the truly "grand manner";

To Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, who is responsible for the present exalted state of the Boston Symphony Orchestra;

To Pianist Emanuel Bay, who excelled in the G major Beethoven Sonata with Jascha Heifetz;

To Pianist Webster Aitken, who gave us a surpassing performance of the twenty-fifth of the Bach "Goldberg" variations

---

PORTLAND, ME.
NEWS

110

DEC 2 - 1936

SANS HORSES—Sometimes I turn to the music columns for a glance at the current Carnegie Hall parade, and lately what impresses me particularly are the virtues singled out by the critical clan for special commendation. In almost every case, when dealing with orchestral conductors, these seem to be things the leaders haven't got.

Thus, Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony, has just been praised for conducting "without fireworks," and Fritz Reiner earned a local magazine's approval for conducting "without compromise." Having been praised for everything else, Jose Iturbi is now achieving recognition for conducting "without a piano."
conducting "without a piano."

To continue the left-handed enumeration, a leading morning paper has been patting Eugene Ormandy on the back for conducting "without a score." Leopold Stokowski is bowling people over because he leads without a baton. Otto Klemperer used to cause favorable comment because he conducted without a podium, and John Barbirolli, the new Philharmonic maestro, now makes everyone take notice because he conducts without his eyeglasses.

The leader has staill to come along who can conduct without an orchestra.

CURB MARKET—There must have been many envious hearts in Manhattan when Ambroise Vollard, the French art collector, came to town at the age of 71 for his first American visit. Vollard is the canny fellow who 40 years ago bought paintings by Cezanne, Degas, Renoir and Picasso when almost nobody else in Paris would. Today his collection is worth millions, and stuff for which he paid $20 now sells for $100,000.

Vollard did on a grand scale what many so-called collectors here do on a small. The ranks of New York "society" are dotted with supposedly wealthy art lovers who make a noisy show of supporting American art. Actually they are dealers who trail along after starving artists until one of the brush wielders begins to make a name for himself. Then they slip in and purchases canvases for a few dollars, which they hold until the rising reputation of the painter enables them to resell at a considerable profit.

During the depression this kind of trading dropped to a minimum. An infallible sign of prosperity's return is their renewed activity in recent months.

STUBBORN—Mayor La Guardia has renewed his demands that certain city departmental posts be put on a civil service status.

Despite his many years in public office, the Mayor apparently can learn nothing about politics.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

DEC 5 - 1936

SYMPHONY LOST 100 YEARS HEARD IN HUB

Clementi's Opus in D Major Played By Symphony Orchestra There

BOSTON, Dec. 4 (AP)—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Its performance by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky won warm applause from a traditionally staid Hub audience.

Written sometime between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed, was melodious, beautiful, and individual.

Beaming at friends in his quarters after the performance, Dr. Koussevitzky happily predicted the opus in D major was bound to become "an indispensable part of the standard repertoire."

"It will be played soon by everybody," he asserted enthusiastically. "I'm going to play it in New York on the next trip."

YPSILANTI, MICH.
PRESS

DEC 2 - 1936

Boston Symphony To Play In Choral Union Program

Ann Arbor, Mich., Dec. 2— The Boston Symphony Orchestra of approximately one hundred and ten players, will be heard for the thirteenth time in Hill Auditorium, December 10.

This distinguished organization was heard in this series several times during the nineties and on intermittent occasions in later years. Since 1931, however, it has been heard annually in Hill Auditorium. Dr. Koussevitsky has brought this orchestra with its distinguished record of past accomplishments to a high state of perfection. On the occasion of its coming appearance, Dr. Koussevitsky has invited Joseph Brinkman of the piano faculty, to appear as soloist, performing the Piano Concerto No. 2 in E major, of Leo Sowerby, in its second hearing, Mr. Brinkman having been previously invited by Dr. Koussevitsky to perform at its premiere in Boston at an earlier December date.

The program in its entirety which Dr. Koussevitsky has provided, is as follows:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; Prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; Scherzo in G minor from the Octet; Op. 20, Mendelssohn (arranged for orchestra by the composer); Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra No. 2 in E major, Sowerby, Joseph Brinkman; and Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67, Beethoven.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard in the Choral Union Series, Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor, Thursday, December 10.

NASHVILLE, TENN.
TENNESSEAN

Long Lost Symphony Is Warmly Welcomed

BOSTON, Dec. 4.—(AP)—Lost

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

DEC 3 - 1936

Aeolians Give Unsurpassed Performance at Art Institute

Boston Symphony Orchestra Ensemble Shows Restraint in Albany Appearance; Soloists Win High Praise for Work

By RAY A. MOWERS

This season's first demonstration of the value of understatement in musical performance was heard last night at the Institute of History and Art. In spite of the unpleasant weather prevailing, a larger than usual audience turned out to hear the program presentted by the Aeolians, four members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and no one present had reason to regret the effort required to reach the hall.

It would be an idle waste of time to choose for special mention any one or two of the programmed numbers presented by the ensemble, for each was performed with gem-like finish and a superior degree of perfection.

At the same time, these skilled instrumentalists exercised a sense of restraint which gave their hearers the satisfying impression that at no time were their physical strength or their professional resources being taxed. This is rare in such a unit.

It is seldom, too, that the harp is heard in Albany as a solo instrument in such competent hands as those of Miss Nellie Zimmer of the Aeolians. Her presentation of the Renie "Legende" last night was a thing of surpassing beauty as well as a vehicle calculated to stamp the artist as among the topmost mistresses of her imposing instrument.

Something similar could well be said of the surpassingly competent performance of Minot Beale, violinist, in his solo appearances with Miss Zimmer accompanying. His demonstration of tone in the familiar Wilhelmj arrangement of Schubert's "Ave Maria" was equaled by his exhibition of sparkling technical equipment in the Sarasate "Malaguena."

On second thought, there was one number played by the ensemble deserving of special attention—the "Barcarole" by MacMillan. It was a superb example of what may be done to make modernistic idioms digestible for classicists when in the hands of a group touched with something akin to genius.

The program, we regret to report, afforded no opportunity to hear in solo the flute of George Madsen nor the 'cello of Carl Stockbridge, both of whom in the ensemble playing gave evidence of tonal skill as well as technical achievement of a high order.

Four accomplished members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to appear in a chamber music program tonight at the Institute of History and Art.

Local instrumentalists will be interested in the program for many reasons but principally because of the scheduled solo appearances of Minot Beale, violinist, and Miss Nellis Zimmer, harpist, both members of the quartet. The other artists in the distinguished ensemble are Carl Stockbridge, cellist, and George Madsen, flutist.

Mr. Beale's violin solos are to include Adamowski's "Aid de Ballet," Wilhelmj's setting for Schubert's "Ave Maria" and "Malagueana" by Sarasate.

Bach's "Bouree" will begin the harp solo group followed by Liadow's "Music Box" and Tournier's "Etude de Concert."

The ensemble will open the program with Valentini's Sonata in G Major. The finale will be the Dance of the Comedians from Smetena' ' "The Bartered Bride.' Their other numbers embrace the intermezzo from Delibes' "Naila," "Canto Amoroso" by Sammartini, "Flight of the Bumble Bee" by Rimsky-Korsakov, "Melodie" by Gluck, two intermezzi from Bizet's "Carmen," "Barcarole" by MacMillan "Nocturne" by Soppier.

LEOMINSTER, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

DEC 5 - 1936

Symphony

BOSTON, Dec. 5 (AP)—Lost

Note on New Symphony by Werner Josten

Premiere to Be Given at the Week-End Concerts of Boston Orchestra

An important change of program for this week's Friday afternoon and Saturday evening symphony concerts replaces Cassela's edition of a Clementi Symphony with a considerably shorter work in the same form by Werner Josten, which will be conducted by its composer; and two shorter scores. One of these, the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Octet, is familiar here in Mendelssohn's own orchestration which Koussevitzky will employ; the other, Debussy's arrangement for orchestra of two of Eric Satie's static and exquisite "Gymnopedies," needs only the reminder that the scholarly and witty Satie had the celebrated festival of ancient Sparta in mind, the Gymnopaedia, named for the dances of naked youths in honor of Apollo.

Mr. Josten's "Symphony in F," only recently completed, is being performed for the first time anywhere. The Boston orchestra has previously played other music of Mr. Josten, including his symphonic movement, "Jungle," and his Concerto Sacro.

Two germinating motives, heard throughout the three movements, form a fundamental theme of the whole symphony. The first of these, by far the more important, is composed of the ascending notes F, A-flat, B-flat, C; the second rises and falls through four more notes, E-flat, F, E-flat, C. The brief, energetic first movement is based almost wholly on the theme of the mottos which are constantly varied according to well established contrapuntal practices and precepts. The Andante is a rondo in B major at the end of which an extended transitional passage—allegro moderato—swells from pianissimo to fortissimo and introduces the Finale without pause. This third movement, mainly in F major, contributes the expected affirmation —both of man's struggle and man's motto theme. Writing in a consistently contemporary idiom, Professor Josten is formally reminiscent of Beethoven, harmonically of Stravinsky. Perhaps the two are not an odd pair.

Antonio Vivaldi's "Spring" Concerto which opens the program is the first of the little symphonic poems called "The Four Seasons" by their composer, who presumably supplied the sonnets that explain them. Lettered parts of the poems appear in the score at the beginning of the passages to which they apply. Here is program-music at an early and explicit stage—also at a highly poetic one. In it Vivaldi takes his place in a field that has been cultivated by Liszt and Strauss. But his illuminating accomplishment requires only an organ, cembalo, and strings. Molinari's edition of the work will be used at the first performance in Boston.

---

clan for special commendation. In almost every case, when dealing with orchestral conductors, these seem to be things the leaders haven't got.

Thus, Serge Koussevitsky, of the Boston Symphony, has just been praised for conducting "without fireworks," and Fritz Reiner earned a local magazine's approval for conducting "without compromise." Having been praised for everything else, Jose Iturbi is now achieving recognition for conducting "without a piano."

To continue the left-handed enumeration, a leading morning paper has been patting Eugene Ormandy on the back for conducting "witthout a score." Leopold Stokowski is bowling people over because he leads without a baton. Otto Klemperer used to cause favorable comment because he conducted without a podium, and John Barbirolli, the new Philharmonic maestro, now makes everyone take notice because he conducts without his eye-glasses.

The leader has still to come along who can conduct without an orchestra.

* * *

PITTSFIELD, MASS
EAGLE

DEC 4 - 1936

Boston Symphony Friends Have Meeting

Great Increase Reported in Membership and Pledges Toward Deficit

The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra met at Symphony Hall in Boston yesterday afternoon. Edward A. Taft, chairman, reported a substantial increase this year in the society's membership and the amount of money pledged for this season's deficit of the orchestra.

The membership on Dec. 1 was 1502 and contributions already pledged total $55,000 against $36,000 at this time a year ago.

Miss Robinson Smith Attends

There were speeches by Attorney Bentley W. Warren, president of the orchestra trustees, and Jerome D. Green, director of the Harvard Tercentenary celebration. Several members from New York attended including Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc. The orchestra played for the Festival last summer.

After referring to the fact that the Boston Symphony has passed through six years during which deficits mounted and gifts decreased, without lowering of artistic standards, Mr. Warren said the last three years have been particularly difficult.

Had it not been for munificent financial assistance from two persons in particular, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, he continued, it might not have been possible to come through these three seasons without impairment of the orchestra's standards.

Mr. Warren at this point announced what he called a "super-subsidy" from Mr. and Mrs. Dane —an offer to pay personally three years' back taxes on the Symphony Hall property. These taxes are said to be between $20,000 and $30,000.

Endowment Fund, $537,000

With this debt cleared, Mr. Warren said, it will be possible to apply the $72,000 legacy from the late Belle Hunt to the Boston Symphony's endowment fund. With this addition the endowment fund is brought to $537,000.

Mr. Warren, in considering the present brilliant status of the orchestra as an artistic institution, remarked that the Friends were not asked to support a moribund institution, but one which, in the opinion of some judges, holds leading place among the orchestras of America.

Mr. Taft was chosen to serve another year as chairman. A rising vote of thanks was given Mr. and Mrs. Dane, and a further resolution was passed thanking out-of-city contributors for their gifts. It was also resolved that each member be expected to secure another member during the season.

Mr. Taft announced that pledges made last season came to within $2100 of covering that season's deficit. The remaining amount, he added, was later subscribed and accounts were balanced.

Jerome D. Green spoke on the Boston Symphony's share in the academic celebration at Harvard University last September.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted a small orchestra of Symphony men in the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, No. 102.

Tea was served in the Huntington Avenue foyer, where members of the society were privileged to preview an exhibition of paintings and tapestries loaned by former Gov. Alvan T. Fuller, a trustee of

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

SALAAMS

To Critic William James Henderson, who yesterday celebrated his eighty-first birthday;

To Pianist Moriz Rosenthal, who plays in the truly "grand manner";

To Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, who is responsible for the present exalted state of the Boston Symphony Orchestra;

To Pianist Emanuel Bay, who excelled in the G major Beethoven Sonata with Jascha Heifetz;

To Pianist Webster Aitken, who gave us a surpassing performance of the twenty-fifth of the Bach "Goldberg" variations.

PORTLAND, ME.
NEWS

DEC 2 - 1936

SANS HORSES—Sometimes I turn to the music columns for a glance at the current Carnegie Hall parade, and lately what impresses me particularly are the virtues singled out by the critical clan for special commendation. In almost every case, when dealing with orchestral conductors, these seem to be things the leaders haven't got.

Thus, Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony, has just been praised for conducting "without fireworks," and Fritz Reiner earned a local magazine's approval for conducting "without compromise." Having been praised for everything else, Jose Iturbi is now achieving recognition for conducting "without a piano."
conducting "without a piano."

To continue the left-handed enumeration, a leading morning paper has been patting Eugene Ormandy on the back for conducting "without a score." Leopold Stokowski is bowling people over because he leads without a baton. Otto Klemperer used to cause favorable comment because he conducted without a podium, and John Barbirolli, the new Philharmonic maestro, now makes everyone take notice because he conducts without his eyeglasses.

The leader has staill to come along who can conduct without an orchestra.

CURB MARKET—There must have been many envious hearts in Manhattan when Ambroise Vollard, the French art collector, came to town at the age of 71 for his first American visit. Vollard is the canny fellow who 40 years ago bought paintings by Cezanne, Degas, Renoir and Picasso when almost nobody else in Paris would. Today his collection is worth millions, and stuff for which he paid $20 now sells for $100,000.

Vollard did on a grand scale what many so-called collectors here do on a small. The ranks of New York "society" are dotted with supposedly wealthy art lovers who make a noisy show of supporting American art. Actually they are dealers who trail along after starving artists until one of the brush wielders begins to make a name for himself. Then they slip in and purchases canvases for a few dollars, which they hold until the rising reputation of the painter enables them to resell at a considerable profit.

During the depression this kind of trading dropped to a minimum. An infallible sign of prosperity's return is their renewed activity in recent months.

STUBBORN—Mayor La Guardia has renewed his demands that certain city departmental posts be put on a civil service status.

Despite his many years in public office, the Mayor apparently can learn nothing about politics.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

DEC 5 - 1936

SYMPHONY LOST 100 YEARS HEARD IN HUB

Clementi's Opus in D Major Played By Symphony Orchestra There

BOSTON, Dec. 4 (AP)—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Its performance by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky won warm applause from a traditionally staid Hub audience.

Written sometime between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed, was melodious, beautiful, and individual.

Beaming at friends in his quarters after the performance, Dr. Koussevitzky happily predicted the opus in D major was bound to become "an indispensable part of the standard repertoire."

"It will be played soon by everybody," he asserted enthusiastically. "I'm going to play it in New York on the next trip."

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

DEC 3 - 1936

Weather Unable to Deter Albany Music Lovers

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

It was to be expected that four soloists from the Boston Symphony orchestra would result in a very delightful evening of unusual chamber music, but the large audience last evening at the Albany Institute of History and Art to hear the Aeolians, owing to the weather, was quite unexpected.

The group consists of Minor Beale, violin; Carl Stockbridge, cello; George Madsen, flute, and Nellie Zimmer, harp. The proprogram opened with the Sonata in G Major by Valenti which was played with much attention to detail, fine tone ensemble and a refinement which showed the result of an association with its famous parent body.

TWO SOLOS.

A Minuet from Bizets L'Arlesienne Suite, the Conto Amoroso and an effective arrangement of the "Flight of the Bumble Bee" which constituted the first half of the concerted numbers. Gluck's lovely melody from Orpheus, two intermezzi from "Carmen," a more modern treatment of the MacMillan "Barcarole," a nocturne of Doppler and the spirited "Dance of the Comedians" from Smetana's "The Bartered Bride" completed the programmed numbers, to which were added as encores a "Gavotte" by Gossec and "To a Wild Rose" by MacDowell, the gifted American composer.

Two members of the group were heard in solo work. Miss Zimmer, a very attractive young lady played a Bach air and a very interesting Legende by Renie on the harp, displaying a great variety of color and intuitive musical concept of her offerings.

Mr. Beale, whose leadership during the evening was apparent at all times proved to be a technician of high order with a tone of unusual "human appeal" a musical ripeness and stylistic mastery evidenced by his musicianly conception of his group of solos which included the "Air de Ballet of Ademowski," the Schubert's "Ave Maria" and "Malaguena" of Sarsate. Miss Zimmer, as accompanist on the harp for Mr. Beale's group was in a great measure responsible for the concerted perfection of the two instruments.

Unusual treatment of many of the more familiar airs and the wisdom of not injecting a strident striving after tonalistic fireworks in a program that lent itself to the quiet contemplation of exquisite color effects was reflected in the interest and appreciation of the audience.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

DEC 5 - 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS 'LOST' PIECE

Clementi Composition Gets Its First Hearing

BOSTON, Dec. 4. (AP)—Lost for a century a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Its performance by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky won warm applause from a traditionally staid Hub audience.

Written between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed was melodious, beautiful, and individual.

Beaming at friends in his quarters after the performance, Dr. Koussevitzky happily predicted the opus in D major was bound to become "an indispensable part of the standard repertoire."

"It will be played soon by everybody," he asserted enthusiastically. "I'm going to play it in New York on the next trip."

"It is a beautiful work. And that third movement, the minuetto, it is not like a minuetto one would expect to have been written at that period. It is certainly individual."

The symphony helps fill in a 100-year gap in musical history. Clementi, a contemporary of Beethoven, was widely recognized for his piano sonatas, some of which were held in high esteem by the great German master.

Yet, when Clementi died near London in 1832, bequeathing his large estates and all his manuscripts to his widow, none of the symphonic scores could be found.

In 1917, Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts.

The Library of Congress of the United States purchased the manuscripts at public auction soon after.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

DEC 5 - 1936

LOST CLEMENTI SYMPHONY COMES TO LIFE IN BOSTON

BOSTON, Dec. 5 (UP).—Music lovers hailed today the long-lost Italian masterpiece, "Symphony in D Major" by Muzio Clementi, brought to life in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in a premiere cheered by 2,500.

The symphony, composed in 1817 but never published, vanished mysteriously more than a century ago. Clementi died in England in 1832 at the age of eighty.

Alfredo Casella, Italian composer, re-assembled the masterpiece two years ago. He proved that an incomplete symphony in the Library of Congress could be completed by adding as its opening movement a fragment that had lain in the British museum since 1871 without its real identity having been established.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 5 - 1936

Boston Symphony Plays 'Lost' Opus of Clementi

Koussevitzky Presents Work for First Time in America

BOSTON, Dec. 4 (AP).—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its performance by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky won warm applause from a traditionally staid Hub audience. Written some time between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed, was melodious, beautiful and individual.

Beaming at friends in his quarters after the performance, Dr. Koussevitzky predicted the Opus in D major was bound to become "an indispensable part of the standard repertoire."

"It will be played soon by everybody," he asserted enthusiastically. "I'm going to play it in New York on the next trip."

"It is a beautiful work. And that third movement, the minuetto, it is not like a minuetto one would expect to have been written at that time. It is certainly individual."

Dr. Koussevitzky described Alfredo Casella's revision as "mignificent."

During the intermission, Dr. Koussevitzky read a message expressing "good wishes," from Mrs. Cecilia Clementi Pitman, of Bronxville, N. Y., who said she was a great granddaugher of Clementi.

ALVA, OKLA .
RECORD

DEC 6 - 1936

'LOST' SYMPHONY IS PLAYED IN BOSTON

BOSTON. Dec. 5—(AP)—lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, had received its first hearing in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Written sometime between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed was melodious, beautiful and individual.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

DEC 5 - 1936

The New Records

Review of Year's Distinguished Orchestral Records—Also, an Interesting Letter.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

The dizzy pace at which symphonies, concertos, sonatas, and whole operas have been added to the record catalogues in recent years has been by no means slackened in the twelve months past; and certainly the general level of recording has never been so high. The quantity of desirable records has thus never been so great, and even the discriminating record collector may well ponder the choice of items which are outside the range of his specialized interests.

For others, who wish to contribute to a friend's growing library of records, the woods and the trees mingle in hopeless profusion. Here, then, is a listing of the year's more distinguished orchestral recordings, which satisfy a three-point evaluation: enduring musical worth, excellence of interpretation, and efficiency of recording. Recommendations in other categories will be made next week.

Orchestral Albums.

Symphonies: Beethoven No. 5, by Felix Weingartner and the London Philharmonic. (Five twelve-inch Columbia records.) Insist on Album Set 254, which replaces the earlier issue, No. 178.

Beethoven No. 7, by Arturo Toscanini and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. (Five twelve-inch Victor records.)

Berlioz "Fantastique," by Selmar Meyerowitz and the Paris Orchestra Symphonique. (Six twelve-inch Columbia records.)

Brahms No. 2, by Sir Thomas Beecham and the London Philharmonic. (Five twelve-inch Columbia records.)

Hydn No. 99, in E flat, by Beecham and the London Philharmonic. (Three twelve-inch Columbia records.)

Mendelssohn "Italian," by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. (Three twelve-inch Victor records.)

Vaughan Williams's "London," by Sir Henry Wood and the Queen's Hall Orchestra. (Five twelve-inch Decca records.)

Walton No. 1, by Sir Hamilton Harty and the London Symphony. (Six twelve-inch Decca records.)

Concertos: Beethoven Violin, by Fritz Kreisler, with John Barbirolli and the London Philharmonic. (Six twelve-inch Victor records.)

Beethoven, No. 2, for piano, by Artur Schnabel, with Malcolm Sargent conducting the London Philharmonic. (Four twelve-inch Victor records.)

Brahms, No. 2, for piano, by Schnabal, with Adrian Boult and the B. B. C. Orchestra. (Six twelve-inch Victor records.)

Prokofieff Violin, by Joseph Szigeti, with Beecham and the London Philharmonic. (Three twelve-inch Columbia records.)

Sibelius Violin, by Jascha Heifetz, with Beecham and the London Philharmonic. (Four twelve-inch Victor records.)

Bach "Brandenburg," Nos. 1 to 6, by Adolf Busch and a chamber orchestra. (Fourteen twelve-inch Columbia records.)

Miscellaneous Orchestral.

Dvorak, eight Slavonic dances, by Vaclav Talich and the Czech Philharmonic. (Four twelve-inch Victor records.)

Strauss, J., "Thunder and Lightning" Polka, by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra. (One ten-inch Victor record.)

Strauss, J., "Pizzicato" Polka, by Eugene Ormandy and the Minneapolis Orchestra. (One ten-inch Victor record.)

Rossini, "William Tell" overture, by Beecham and the London Philharmonic. (Two twelve-inch Columbia records.)

Rossini, "Italiana in Algieri," by Toscanini and the Philharmonic Symphony. (One twelve-inch Victor record, available December 16.)

Wagner, "Faust" overture, by Beecham and the London Philharmonic. (Two twelve-inch Columbia recordls.)

Wagner, "Goetterdaemmerung," and "Lohengrin" excerpts, "Siegfried Idyll," by Toscanini and the Philharmonic Symphony. (Five twelve-inch Victor records.)

Correspondence.

A recent letter writer from Mount Vernon, N. Y., voices a plaint that has a familiar ring. The subject is "sale records," and she says: "It seems unbelievable that a record listed at $2 is being sold for 75 cents, if it is really worth the $2 in the first place."

Without dabbling in the question of a record's original worth (which might invite endless discussion) it is important to realize this point: Sales are frequently the result of an effort by the manufacturing company to realize ready money on its stock of masters. By contracting to furnish a large shop with a 100,000 copies of various records, many economies can be effected. In addition, many of the titles have been superseded by more recent recording, which means that the market value of the earlier version is sharply reduced. In many cases, this original version could not be sold in competition with a technically better record costing no more.

Symphony Lost More Than 100 Years Played Here for First Time in U. S.

A symphony which has been lost for more than a century, the work of Muzio Clementi, great Italian piano virtuoso, who died in 1832, was played yesterday for the first time in America by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

A critical musical audience hailed with delighted applause the "Opus in D major," restored by Alfredo Casella, Italian composer and pianist, from long-neglected manuscript fragments found in museums and libraries, and Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, said the symphony would in future be "an indispensable part of the standard repertory."

"This symphony soon will be played by everybody," said Dr. Koussevitzky after the performance. "I am going to play it in New York on my next trip.

"It is a beautiful work, and the third movement, the minuette, is not like a minuette one would expect to have been written at that period. It is certainly individual."

"Casella's revision of the Clementi manuscripts is magnificent," he added.

During the intermission at the symphony concert, Dr. Koussevitzky read a message from Mrs. Cecelia Clementi Pitman of Bronxville, N.Y., a great-granddaughter of the composer, expressing good wishes.

Clementi, born at Rome in 1752, spent most of his life in England. He was a finished piano virtuoso, and composed 106 sonatas for the piano. His early works were the first of this type to bear the modern form. He toured Europe frequently, both as pianist and conductor and at Vienna in 1781 engaged in a contest with Mozart, in which, however, no decision was rendered.

It is known that he composed a score of symphonies, probably in the period between 1786 and 1824, but only two of these were printed. His manuscripts were bequeathed to his widow, but the symphonies dropped out of sight.

The sources from which Casella made his restoration were incomplete and tattered manuscript in the possession of the Library of Congress and the British Museum. The latter institution in 1871, obtained, in some unexplained manner a number of Clementi manuscripts which were catalogued as "sketches."

After the death in 1917 of Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar, a number of Clementi manuscripts were found in a chest in his attic. They were purchased at public auction some time later for the Library of Congress.

B. Herald Dec. 5/36

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 5 - 1936

LOST CLEMENTI ITEM HAS ITS PREMIERE

Romantic History Enhances the Charm of Century-Old Symphony by Italian.

HIDDEN IN LONDON ATTIC

Koussevitzky Presents It With Boston Orchestra in Form Prepared by Casella.

BOSTON, Dec. 4 (AP).—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famous Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in the United States today at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The performance, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, received warm applause.

Written some time between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed, was melodious, beautiful and individual. After the performance, Dr. Koussevitsky predicted that the opus in D major was bound to become "an indispensible part of the standard répertoire."

"It will be played soon by everybody," he asserted enthusiastically. "I'm going to play it in New York on the next trip. It is a beautiful work. And that third movement, the minuetto, it is not like a minuetto one would expect to have been written at that period. It is certainly individual."

The symphony helps fill in a 100-year gap in musical history. Clementi, a contemporary of Beethoven, was widely recognized for his piano sonatas, some of which were held in high esteem by the great German master. He also was known to have written about twenty symphonies, widely popular in their day.

When Clementi died, near London in 1832, bequeathing his large estate and all his manuscripts to his widow, none of the symphonic scores could be found. Only two of them had been printed, and the others dropped from public knowledge.

In 1917, Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder. How they came into Dr. Cummings's possession remains a mystery.

The Library of Congress of the United States purchased the manuscripts at public auction soon afterward and musicologists attempted to weave them together. Alfredo Casella, noted Italian composer-pianist-scholar, completed four symphonies by his own filling in and with the aid of fragmentary manuscripts that inexplicably had come into the possession of the British Museum in 1871. These had rested in dusty oblivion for years, catalogued as "sketches."

Dr. Koussevitzky described Mr. Casella's revision as "magnificent."

During the intermission, Dr. Koussevitzky read a message expressing "good wishes" from Mrs. Cecilia Clementi Pitman of Bronxville, N. Y., who said she was a great-granddaughter of the composer.

Nickerson's since the turn of the century.

Globe Dec 5

WOMAN HOPES TO HEAR GREAT-GRANDFATHER'S LONG LOST SYMPHONY

BRONXVILLE, N Y, Dec 4 (A P)—Mrs Cecilia Clementi Pitman expressed the hope tonight she might some time hear her great-grandfather's symphony, revived today by the Boston Symphony Orchestra after its score had lain lost for a century in a London trunk.

She commented that the love for music which made her ancestor, Muzio Clementi, a noted Italian pianist, apparently still ran in the family, since she played the viola, and occasionally participated in home chamber musicales.

Mrs Pitman, wife of H. Minot Pitman, editor of a New York genealogical service, said she is the daughter of Arthur Lacey-Baker, a grandson of Clementi and an internationally known English choirmaster.

She still had, she said, a comb which belonged to the composer and a memorial ring once worn by her grandmother containing a lock of Clementi's hair.

ws of the Screen

Boston Transcript

Orchestras Afield

In New York

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society, led by John Barbirolli, will play Mehul's Overture to "Les deux Aveugles de Tolede," Haydn's 'Cello Concerto in D major, the Venusberg Music from "Tannhaeuser" and Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony at its concerts this evening and tomorrow afternoon. On Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon the program will consist of Beethoven's Symphony in B-flat major, Weber's 'Cello Concerto in D major, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" by Delius, the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Octet and Respighi's "Rossiniana." At all the concerts Gaspar Cassado will be the 'cello soloist.

In Philadelphia

Eugene Ormandy will lead the Philadelphia Orchestra in its concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The program will consist of Sibelius's Third Symphony, Kodaly's "Galanta Dances," "Tod und Verklaerung" by Strauss, vocal excerpts from Wagner's "Lohengrin" and "Die Walkuere" and Verdi's "Othello." Lauritz Melchior will be the tenor soloist.

In Cleveland

The Cleveland Orchestra, Artur Rodzinski conductor, will play Arthur Shepherd's "Horizons," Prokofiev's Violin Concerto and Dvorak's "New World" Symphony at its concerts this evening and Saturday evening. Joseph Fuchs, concertmaster of the Orchestra, will be the soloist.

In Chicago

Bach's Fourth Suite in D major, Luening's Two Symphonic Variations, Shostakovitch's First Symphony and Chopin's Piano Concerto in F minor will be played by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Frederick Stock conductor, this evening and tomorrow afternoon. Jan Smeterlin will be the solo pianist.

In Cincinnati

The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Goossens conductor, will sponsor and partake in performance of "La Tosca" tomorrow and Saturday evenings. The cast will contain, among others, Lotte Lehmann and Armand Tokatyan. Wilhelm von Wymetal, Jr., is the producer and stage director.

In Detroit

Fritz Reiner will conduct the Detroit Symphony Orchestra at its concert this evening, when the program will consist of Toccata and Fugue in D minor by Bach-Leonardi, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" and "Till Eulenspiegel" by Strauss.

In St. Louis

The St. Louis Symphony Orchestra under Vladimir Golschmann will give the first performances of John Kessler's Introductions and Fugue tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The rest of the program will consist of the Glazunov Violin Concerto, Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and the Overture to "Tannhaeuser." Scipione Guidi, the Orchestra's concertmaster, will be the soloist.

"Lohengrin" and "Martha" Presented at Opera House

The San Carlo Opera Company presented Wagner's "Lohengrin" at the Opera House last night, a large audience giving evidence of considerable enjoyment. Bianca Saroya sang the part of Elsa, and Dimitri Onofrei appeared in the title role. The other principals were Harold Kravitt as King Henry, Mario Valle as Frederick and Florence Wylde as Ortrud. Carlo Peroni conducted.

In the afternoon "Martha" was the bill. It was sung in English by a cast made up of Lucille Meusel as Lady Harriet, Charlotte Bruno as Nancy, Rolf Gerard as Lionell, Stefan Kozakevich as Plunkett, Francesco Curci as the sheriff and Natale Cervi as Tristan. Mr. Peroni conducted.

Positive film in technicolor from the David O. Selznick production, "The Garden of Allah," co-starring Marlene Dietrich and Charles Boyer, has been forwarded by Selznick International to the Graphic Arts Department of Stanford University. The Palo Alto institution requested the film clips as a basis of study for students interested in motion pictures.

Symphony Concert Series

By WILLIAM T. CHASE, JR.

A musical event of rare importance—the first performance in America of a symphony that had been lost 100 years—occurred in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon at the eighth of the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The symphony was by Muzio Clementi, late 18th and 19th century Italian composer, and was the second in D major of four now in the Library of Congress at Washington. It was presented as revised by the talented Alfredo Casella. Companion pieces for the Clementi were Handel's delightful Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Opus 6, and three Wagner excerpts, "A Siegfried Idyl," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and the Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Until the past year or so, generally speaking, Clementi's fame rested on his progressive piano studies, "Gradus and Parnassum," and his perfecting of the piano form. He was known to have composed a number of symphonies and achieved a considerable success with them in London and on the Continent. But they were not printed and disappeared some time after his death. He was born in Rome in 1752 and died in England in 1832. Indications of his ability as a symphonist were found in several manuscript fragments that drifted into the possession of the British Museum, but it was not until the death of an English musicologist in 1924 that anything resembling complete symphonies came to light. The manuscripts were purchased at public auction for our Library of Congress.

And fantastic as it may seem, there they remained in Washington until Alfredo Casella began studying them in October of 1934. He revised and pieced them together industriously. The Second Symphony in D major was complete except for portions of the first movement and these Mr. Casella identified with pages in the British Museum. This symphony was given in Rome in January of this year. And, thanks entirely to Mr. Casella, we had the opportunity of hearing the work in its initial presentation in this country yesterday. It proved a delightful addition to the literature of the symphony.

Some of the advance reports declared that the Clementi discoveries were comparable to the Beethoven symphonies. In the case of the D major symphony, at least, this was slightly exaggerating the caliber of the man who was born before Mozart and outlived Beethoven. Nevertheless the piece was just as good as several of the Haydn and the Mozart symphonies that are played more or less frequently. It opened with a lively and well developed first movement. The second, larghetto cantabile, was completely charming in the Mozart manner and made use of an interesting canon toward the end. The third was a minuetto pastorale and the finale nicely combined various themes and worked to an effective climax.

Altogether the Clementi turned out to be a major contribution, fully deserving of a place in the repertoire of all major orchestras. It is to be hoped, too, after such a fine beginning, that the other "lost" symphonies will shortly be made available hereabouts. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were at their best throughout the afternoon. The strings were brilliant in the Handel and the Overture to "Tannhaeuser" was given a magnificent performance. Just after the intermission Dr. Koussevitzky read a telegram of "best wishes" from the great-granddaughter of Clementi, adding the finishing touch to an afternoon of superb achievements. The concert will be repeated tonight.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
DEC 5 - 1936

Zimbalist to Give Silver Jubilee Recital at Carnegie on Tuesday

Efrem Zimbalist's recital in Carnegie Hall Tuesday evening, Dec. 8 will represent the completion of twenty-five years since he made his American debut. Samuel Chotzinoff will be at the piano.

Zimbalist, as a young man in his 20's, was first heard by an American audience on Oct. 27, 1911 when he appeared as guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The following week he played at Carnegie Hall.

Dec. 5/36 Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Serge Koussevitzky conducted the first American performance at the Symphony concert yesterday of a century-old novelty—a Symphony in D by Muzio Clementi. This long-lost work of a musician widely known in his time, but now merely a name in reference books, was warmly received by the Friday audience. The concert began with Handel's G minor Concerto Grosso, Op 6, No. 6, and was finished with three items by Wagner, the "Siegfried Idyll," the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and the Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Public interest in Clementi's Symphony was given an added filip when, just after intermission, Dr Koussevitzky read from the stage the following telegram: "Best wishes for the Clementi. (Signed.) His great-granddaughter, Cecilia Clementi Pitman." This reviewer, who was privileged to see the telegram after the concert, observed that it had been sent from Bronxville, N Y.

The Symphony in D has had a curious history. Together with other symphonies by Clementi, it was lost for more than 100 years. Alfredo Casella, the contemporary Italian, who has revised it, inspected the manuscript score, complete except for the introduction and the beginning of the first allegro, at the Congressional Library at Washington, D C, in 1934. Through the efforts of Carl Engel, chief of the music division, the library had acquired the score in a batch of Clementi manuscripts at a London auction sale in 1917. Mr Casella, pursuing his detective work, decided that the real beginning of the symphony was a symphonic introduction and part of an allegro which had been in possession of the British Museum since 1871. He put the two together and presto! there was a complete symphonic work, as he expressed it, "—entirely ready for performance."

A Roman Transplanted

One can envy Muzio Clementi for the time in which he lived. He was four years older than Mozart and died five years after Beethoven. His 80 years covered the span from 1752 to 1832; he witnessed the beginnings of the modern symphonic school, the whole career of Beethoven, and the emergence of the romantic age.

Clementi was a Roman transplanted to England. A virtuoso pianist, he traversed Europe on concert tours. His piano works were favorably regarded by Beethoven, who took some ideas from Clementi's piano style. Clementi's fame rests today upon a portion of his piano pieces. Of his symphonies, two early ones were published while he lived, though others were performed and, according to written accounts, were well-liked.

Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven were the three giants of their own time. So great was their genius they eclipsed their highly talented contemporaries, of whom Clementi was one. For this reason it is inevitable that one speak of the Symphony in D in terms of Mozart and Beethoven, with whose music that of Clementi has points of similarity.

Melodious and Dashing

The Symphony in D is melodious, dashing, constructed after formal patterns of the 18th century, yet with episodic touches of a later period. The material is plainly individual, of a Latin ardor that neither Mozart nor Beethoven, naturally, possessed. Clementi's turns of phrases have a grace easily identified with Mozart, but that was simply a manner then common. If the scoring for orchestra calls up the epithet "Beethovenian" there is still the fact that Haydn and even Mozart in their last symphonic music employed the orchestra's resources with a boldness which heralded the middle period of Beethoven. It is likely that the elements of this orchestral style were more or less common currency. Because Beethoven carried them to furthest development we mistakenly honor him as their originator.

The minuetto of the Symphony in D is neither 18th century nor does it share the rough humor of Beethoven's scherzos. Instead, the phrases are long, flowing and demand a faster tempo than those of Mozart. This movement shows most of all the original qualities of Clementi's talent.

The orchestra and Dr Koussevitzky performed the Symphony most brilliantly. The same adverb is applicable to everything else on the program, though the conductor still forces the brass at the end of the "Tannhaeuser" Overture.

C. W. D.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

DEC 5 - 1936

LONG-LOST MUSICAL PIECE IS CHEERED

Boston—(UP)—Music lovers hail-

Phil B

Herald Dec. 5/36

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The eighth regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Handel
Concerto Grosso for strings Op. 6 no 6 in G minor.
Clementi
Symphony in D (revised by Alfred Casella)
Wagner................."A Siegfried Idyl"
Wagner
Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried"
Wagner........Overture to "Tannhaeuser"

Dr. Koussevitzky read a telegram at yesterday's concert which he had received from the great-great-granddaughter of Clementi, in which the hope was expressed that the recently discovered symphony would meet with success. The good lady need not have felt any anxiety as to the performance of her ancestor's music by this orchestra and under this conductor. Indeed the interpretation appeared to be remarkably sympathetic. Probably anxiety, if there was any, should concern only the music itself, lest it should prove to be less than the praise bestowed on it by Mr. Casella in the full flush of his discovery and the victory he obtained in restoring some of Clementi's last works.

If Casella erred at all in that enthusiastic article in La Revue Musicale, where he made known to the world at large the results of his labors, it was only in ascribing a national importance to the Clementi symphonies (judging, that is, from the work presented for the first time in America yesterday). For the music is universal and not narrowly Italian in feeling. It is perhaps fair to infer the workings of a genial and logical (therefore Latin) spirit exercising on the musical thought of the time. Mr. Casella may have wished to please Mussolini by finding a great Italian symphonist for the grandeur of Rome. Instead, and of greater importance, he has enriched the world.

Let us say at once that this symphony is singularly delightful, a real treasure that has been unearthed. There is nothing of the mature Beethoven in it, which is rather a relief. On the contrary it can stand on its own merits and has more affinity with the later works of Haydn and Mozart, as was more likely. Yet there is certainly an individuality, a style that is Clementi's own. That little chromaticism in the slow movement's main theme, the unusual minuet, the different manner of the finale—these taken together, if not alone, would set Clementi apart from either of the great Austrian masters.

Works of the classical period must be heard regularly over a long period of time to establish them in one's own mind as greater or lesser works of art. We may hazard that repetition would not injure the qualities of this symphony. At the moment its freshness, the clarity of its thought, the lyrical grace of its themes are its recommendation; and these are qualities which do not die.

Why must conductors always give Wagner in large doses? It is as if they said to themselves: "Come, the season is almost half gone and no Wagner as yet. We'll put on half a program's worth, which ought to hold them for a while." It would be idle for us to comment on the Siegfried Idyl, for it is a work for which we feel no sympathy whatever. The performance of the "Waldweben" and the overture to "Tannhaeuser" seemed particularly fine.

Next week the orchestra will tour the middle West. Yesterday's concert will be repeated tonight. The concerts of Dec. 18 and 19 will offer MacDowell's 2nd Piano Concerto (Howard Goding, soloist); Foote's Suite in E major and the third Symphony of Brahms.

112

CLEMENTI'S SYMPHONY PERFORMED

Dec. 5/36 Post

First American Hearing Offered by Dr. Koussevitzky

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An eventful afternoon at Symphony Hall brought yesterday the return of Dr. Koussevitzky, absent for two weeks; the first American performance of a symphony by Muzio Clementi, with telegraphed good wishes from the composer's great-granddaughter read by the conductor from the podium; a new news column in the programme books; exceptional performances by the Symphony Orchestra of composition by Handel and Wagner, and general enthusiasm.

A RESTORED WORK

The symphonies of Clementi, highly regarded during the first quarter of the last century, virtually disappeared, not merely from performance but from sight. Fragments brought to light in recent years have been joined by Alfredo Casella to other fragments reposing in the British Museum and with scholarly restoration made available by him for present-day consumption. Two of these symphonies have already been played in Italy, and there are two more to come.

The extravagant praise of Georges de Saint-Foix, who compared the Clementi of these symphonies to the Beethoven of the Seventh and Eighth, and enthusiasm of Mr. Casella, rejoicing in the possession of a 19th century Italian symphonist, raised hopes of this Symphony in D major, hopes not entirely fulfilled.

Orchestration Brilliant

The opening slow introduction in D minor is impressive, but the ensuing Allegro soon turns into more or less routine music-making. There are moments of escape from the general adherence to late 18th century formulae. The music hos momentum, its facture is sound. The orchestration is frequently brilliant, and the use of trombones lends it occasional solidity. There is a true classic spirit, which should rejoice all anti-romantic modernists. But the chief gain to be derived from a hearing of the symphony was an increased respect for the contemporary who succeeded in eclipsing Clementi so completely, Ludwig von Beethoven.

Clementi, a man of great ability but lacking true genius, was placed yesterday between composers who had more than their share of both. Handel was represented by his Concerto Grosso in G minor for strings, No. 6 of the famous set of 12, and Wagner by "A Siegfried Idyl" and the Siegfried "Forest Murmurs," in unusual and happy juxtaposition and, for a rotund and rousing close to a more than usually stimulating concert, the Overture to "Tannhauser."

This was the first Wagner of the current symphony season, reminding us that the thrice-familiar music still exerts its peculiar spell, especially in such finely imagined and finely realized performances as those of yesterday. The "Waldweben" has, in fact, been from the beginning one of Dr. Koussevitzky's most fortunate Wagnerian adventures, while the music itself crystallizes that which is most precious in the opera, the sense of primal freshness, the poignant recapturing of a world unspoiled, a world to which Wagner alone among composers can return us. What, after all, are the passions of "Tristan," the humanities of "Die Meistersinger," the ecstacies of "Parsifal," compared with this?

SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY,

What's Going On in

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Interest in the eighth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season (Dec. 4-5) was focused on the first hearing in America of a Symphony in D by Muzio Clementi (1752-1832). This composer is known to most people as the author of many piano works, and particularly of that "Gradus ad Parnassum" which has guided the fingers of so many young pianists. It was known that he was also the composer of symphonies, and that they had been played with success in London in the composer's lifetime. But the symphonies were never printed, and the manuscripts disappeared.

In 1917 the Library of Congress acquired some Clementi manuscripts from the estate of an English musicologist, and these were found to contain some symphonic movements, in very bad order. Recently, Alfredo Casella, indefatigable laborer for Italian music, has restored two of these symphonies. That in D, now first produced in America, he directed at the Augusteo in Rome, last January

So romantic a story would lend glamour to any score, but Clementi's Symphony in D does not depend upon its history for its interest. It is a delightful work, full of melodic charm, harmonic beauties, a rich inventiveness and rhythmic vigor. It makes one ready to believe its creator a worthy colleague in the symphonic field of Haydn and Mozart, whom indeed he actually rivaled inh is day. This symphony possesses much of the originative genius of those masters plus a definitely Italian lyricism.

The form is roughly but by no means stiltedly conventional; the musical speech is individual. The irst movement is, on a single hearing, the most appealing, but each of the others is marked by captivating phrases, engagingly flexible rhythmic patterns and fanciful de[illegible].

Mr. Casella has placed us in his debt by making available this exquisite music. And Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra placed us no less in theirs by a superb performance in which imaginative conception was matched by incomparable tone quality and unsurpassed virtuosity.

These splendors of performance were evident throughout the program, which opened with Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, op. 6, No. 6, in G minor, and ended with three Wagnerian excerpts, the "Siegfried Idyl," the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and the "Tannhäuser" Overture. One may question the wisdom of placing the first two of these Wagner items on the same program. Their juxtaposition at all events served to prove that the master's inspiration ran higher in the excerpt from the opera than in the lyric birthday present.

L. A. S.

113

Discovering a Symphony More Than a Century Old

Trans, Dec. 5/36

First American Performance of Clementi Work from Koussevitzky and Boston Orchestra

By Moses Smith

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky made a speech just after the intermission at yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was a very brief speech, acknowledging to the audience receipts of a telegram from Cecilia Clementi, great-granddaughter of Muzio Clementi, whose Second Symphony in D major had a few minutes earlier been brought to first American performance after more than a century of neglect.

Not of the breed of orator-conductors is Dr. Koussevitzky. He addresses his audiences rarely by words. When he does, his words are the more welcome, particularly because his utterance is coupled with a personal charm that easily traverses the wide spaces of Symphony Hall. And so, the little speech was the biggest event of yesterday's concert, if not the most important.

* * *

The Clementi Symphony, which was the cause for this deviation from strict routine at our symphony concerts, has an interesting history, as readers of these columns last Saturday are aware. The greater and final share of the credit for its rescue from oblivion goes to Alfredo Casella, who was also responsible for the first performance of the D major Symphony and the similarly rediscovered C major Symphony in Italy about a year ago.

These two symphonies have been "edited" by Signor Casella. He has told us what he had to do to complete the D major Symphony—joining parts that were as far from each other as London and Washington. We are in the dark as to whether he revised the instrumentation or changed any of the harmonic parts. Presumably not. Yet the Symphony has an astonishing modern face, particularly in such a section as the slow introduction to the first movement. The leading of the voices, which is often very free, results in some surprising dissonances and long-postponed resolutions. Equally striking is the free writing for the horns and trumpets. These things do not suggest eighteenth century or early nineteenth century style.

There are four movements: the first is fast, the second slow and in lyrical vein, the third a curious "pastoral minuet" and the last fast again. The third movement, which is neither a conventional minuet nor a scherzo, is the most original, if not the most striking. The whole symphony sounds in our conditioned ears like a cross between Mozart and Beethoven. (The outline of the minuet theme smacks strongly of the Mozart G minor Symphony). It is difficult to say, without knowing the actual date of composition, whether Clementi leaned on the other two or they on him.

If the Symphony had not been preceded by such a hullabaloo I think I should have enjoyed it far more. The distinguished Signor Casella's claims for the stature of Clementi as a symphonist turned out to be extravagant. The thematic content of this symphony is not especially engaging. The main theme of the first movement is almost as empty as the similar one for Beethoven's "Eroica." But Beethoven exhibited consummate mastery in the treatment of his theme; the same cannot be said unfortunately of Clementi.

This is not to say, though, that the revival was not worth while. The music often suggests the Latin sunlight in a way that neither Beethoven nor Mozart could manage. There are exceptionally and surprisingly dramatic modulations and turns of instrumentation. Again, it is impossible for this writer to say how original these were with Clementi. But no matter. They achieved their effect.

* * *

The rest of the program was allotted to familiar items in the symphonic repertory. Handel's Concerto Grosso in G minor began the proceedings. The second half of the concert was given over to three Wagnerian items—the "Siegfried Idyl," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and "Tannhaeuser."

The orchestral playing was of a high order, though of not quite uniform excellence. The Clementi Symphony seemed to have been carefully prepared. I should not venture to inquire as to how closely Dr. Koussevitzky's tempi and dynamics would have suited the composer. Judging only from the sound at first performance, one would call them just and sympathetic. The orchestra played very well here.

The performance of the Handel Concerto by the magnificent strings of the Boston Orchestra was sufficiently mannered to disturb what would otherwise have been thoroughly enjoyable. (For example, the unnecessary yet seemingly inevitable prolongation of the penultimate note of the fast movements.)

As to Wagner: Dr. Koussevitzky's version of the Tannhaeuser Overture is in the familiar contemporary vein. The Overture has now degenerated into a conductor's and orchestral showpiece, which it ought never to be. Yet the same leader and musicians produced most poetic renderings of the two preceding Wagnerian excerpts. Yesterday's playing of the 'Siegfried Idyl" and "'Forest Murmurs," in fact, was probably the most faithful Wagnerian excursion the orchestra has undertaken in Dr. Koussevitzky's thirteen seasons here.

News of Music at

A new department is evidently inaugurated in the program book for this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the beginning and end of the book, it consists of several columns of material that may be roughly classified as news about the orchestra, its concerts and its programs, as well as relative addenda. Such a department has for some time been incorporated in the program books of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

DEC 6 - 1936

Rubaiyat for a Music Devotee

Wake! for the last long-hoped-for note is sung,
The curtain down, and stilled the Wagnerian lung.
You paid your cash and slumbered well, but you
Can say you sat through Gotterdammerung!

I sometimes think that never glows so red
The rose, as some soprano who has said,
"Just listen when I take that last high C,"
Then singing, comes much nearer B instead.

They say that jazz and short-wave radios
Now keep at home the type that usually goes
To concerts; myself prefer real sound to hours
Spent with Ray Noble or with Major Bowes.

A Bach transcription underneath the Bough,
Scored for the modern orchestra—and How!—
When played to advertise tooth paste on the air,
Doesn't seem much like Paradise—somehow!

(During a very modern composition)

Ah Love! could you and I with him have sat,
And begged him to alter atonal this—and that,
And then by firm persuasion toward one key,
To remould it all in F-sharp or G-flat!

Myself when young did earnestly bemoan
The sparing use of eighth—and quarter tone,
And once with them a sonata did I make
For clarinet, a 'cello and trombone.

Think, in this crowded caravanserai,
Of those who would tell the conductor what to play—
Why you and I, for all our tolerance,
Would listen one half hour—and go away!

Yon program that bids us here next week again,
Would seem to be all modern legerdemain.
How often friends will rise to look for us
In these same seats—and look for one in vain!

On coming in, O Saki, if you note
My place still empty where my hands I smote
For Bach and Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms,
Turn down the seat and use it for your coat.

TRISTRAM LIVINGSTONE

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST GAZETTE

DEC 5 - 1936

BALLET RUSSE GIVES SECOND SHOW TONIGHT

Boston Symphony To Head Music Parade Next Week.

SIX NEW BALLETS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky To Conduct Orchestra Of 110 Players.

Continuing a spectacular array of musical events which will reach a climax tonight with the second performance of the Ballet Russe, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra will lead the musical parade to this city next week.

Six new ballets will be presented by the Monte Carlo Ballet in matinee and night performances today at Syria Mosque. The matinee will poetic dance miliar music antastic Toy de la Rose."
a, Massine, dance in the second ballet of the group.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 6 - 1936

CATHOLIC WOMEN TO HEAR HARPIST

The December meeting of the West Warwick Catholic Women's Club will be held tomorrow evening at the Odeon Theatre in Arctic at 8 o'clock, when Miss Marianne Channon will entertain with harp solos. Miss Channon is one of the youngest harp soloists of today, and is a graduate of the American School of Music at Fontainebleu, France.

Originally a pupil of Miss Frances

The Week's Recitalists: Zimbalist, Flagstad, Ernst Silberstein, McGraw, Jolas and Felts

EFREM ZIMBALIST'S recital in Carnegie Hall Tuesday evening will represent the completion of 25 years since he made his American debut. Samuel Chotzinoff, music critic of the New York Post, will be at the piano.

Mr. Zimbalist, as a young man in his twenties, was first heard by an American audience on Oct. 27, 1911, when he appeared as guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and then at Carnegie Hall.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

A.P.

DEC 5 - 1936

Boston Orchestra Performs Symphony Lost a Century

MUSIC

Glob Dec 5/36

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Serge Koussevitzky conducted the first American performance at the Symphony concert yesterday of a century-old novelty—a Symphony in D by Muzio Clementi. This long-lost work of a musician widely known in his time, but now merely a name in reference books, was warmly received by the Friday audience. The concert began with Handel's G minor Concerto Grosso, Op 6, No. 6, and was finished with three items by Wagner, the "Siegfried Idyll," the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and the Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Public interest in Clementi's Symphony was given an added filip when, just after intermission, Dr Koussevitzky read from the stage the following telegram: "Best wishes for the Clementi. (Signed.) His great-granddaughter, Cecilia Clementi Pitman." This reviewer, who was privileged to see the telegram after the concert, observed that it had been sent from Bronxville, N Y.

The Symphony in D has had a curious history. Together with other symphonies by Clementi, it was lost for more than 100 years. Alfredo Casella, the contemporary Italian, who has revised it, inspected the manuscript score, complete except for the introduction and the beginning of the first allegro, at the Congressional Library at Washington, D C, in 1934. Through the efforts of Carl Engel, chief of the music division, the library had acquired the score in a batch of Clementi manuscripts at a London auction sale in 1917. Mr Casella, pursuing his detective work, decided that the real beginning of the symphony was a symphonic introduction and part of an allegro which had been in possession of the British Museum since 1871. He put the two together and presto! there was a complete symphonic work, as he expressed it, "—entirely ready for performance."

A Roman Transplanted

One can envy Muzio Clementi for the time in which he lived. He was four years older than Mozart and died five years after Beethoven. His 80 years covered the span from 1752 to 1832; he witnessed the beginnings of the modern symphonic school, the whole career of Beethoven, and the emergence of the romantic age.

Clementi was a Roman transplanted to England. A virtuoso pianist, he traversed Europe on concert tours. His piano works were favorably regarded by Beethoven, who took some ideas from Clementi's piano style. Clementi's fame rests today upon a portion of his piano pieces. Of his symphonies, two early ones were published while he lived, though others were performed and, according to written accounts, were well-liked.

Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven were the three giants of their own time. So great was their genius they eclipsed their highly talented contemporaries, of whom Clementi was one. For this reason it is inevitable that one speak of the Symphony in D in terms of Mozart and Beethoven, with whose music that of Clementi has points of similarity.

Melodious and Dashing

The Symphony in D is melodious, dashing, constructed after formal patterns of the 18th century, yet with episodic touches of a later period. The material is plainly individual, of a Latin ardor that neither Mozart nor Beethoven, naturally, possessed. Clementi's turns of phrases have a grace easily identified with Mozart, but that was simply a manner then common. If the scoring for orchestra calls up the epithet "Beethovenian" there is still the fact that Haydn and even Mozart in their last symphonic music employed the orchestra's resources with a boldness which heralded the middle period of Beethoven. It is likely that the elements of this orchestral style were more or less common currency. Because Beethoven carried them to furthest development we mistakenly honor him as their originator.

The minuetto of the Symphony in D is neither 18th century nor does it share the rough humor of Beethoven's scherzos. Instead, the phrases are long, flowing and demand a faster tempo than those of Mozart. This movement shows most of all the original qualities of Clementi's talent.

The orchestra and Dr Koussevitzky performed the Symphony most brilliantly. The same adverb is applicable to everything else on the program, though the conductor still forces the brass at the end of the "Tannhaeuser" Overture.

C. W. D.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

Long Lost Symphony By Clementi Cheered At Boston Premiere

Boston, Dec. 5 (UP).—Music lovers

At Concert

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

Haydn ..Symphony in B-flat No. 102 (the Ninth of the London series)
- Largo: Allegro vivace
- Adagio
- Menuetto: Allegro; Trio
- Finale: Presto

Debussy .... "La Mer," Three Orchestral Sketches
- De Paube a midi sur la mer
- Jeux de vagues
- Dialogue du vent et de la mer

Intermission

Brahms ..Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68
- Un poco sostenuto: Allegro
- Andante sostenuto
- Un poco allegretto e grazioso
- Adagio: Allegro non troppo, ma con brio

By ROBERT SABIN

NEVER has the Eastman Theater witnessed a more excited and tempestuous ovation than the one accorded the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky last evening, and one may justly add, never has it witnessed a more brilliant and superb performance.

This organization possesses a superlative technique, impeccable taste, and enjoys the leadership of a masterful conductor. One doubts if a Haydn symphony ever meant quite so much to a Rochester audience as Koussevitzky made the B flat mean last evening. The majesty of the opening was sung by the strings; the phrasing of the Adagio was a joy to hear; and the trumpets in the Menuetto with its charming trio were all that trumpets can be, and that is a great deal, even in the scores of Haydn. Of the marvelous precision in the swift, darting Presto, it is scarcely necessary to speak.

Then came a musical experience of rarest order. For Koussevitzky's interpretation of La Mer is classic, unforgettable. The exquisite pianissimo, the plastic, sinuous tone, the iridescent coloring of this interpretation evade any hurried critical description. What magnificent music this is. All of the whispers of the ocean, its morning silver and its evening velvet, all of those unutterable mysteries felt by Conrad and Loti are in this music. There was the reticence of Chinese art in the playing of this poem. Where others smear, Koussevitsky adds one stroke of the brush.

Who will forget the opening chords of this masterpiece, the wave-like diminuendo and rhythm of the theme in the 'cellos and brasses, the wisps of tone in the woodwinds in the second section, or the miraculous sense of infinite distance, of wind and sun and sky, in the last? To have lived and heard this music is something. It represents the peak of Debussy's creation, perhaps his most profound utterance.

Again in the towering and

RACHMANINOFF AT THE PIANO

Symphony Hall Filled to Capacity for Recital

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is likely that there are now more good pianists than ever before, but the great ones are still and always will be scarce. When they appear it is the public, quite as much as the critics, which recognizes their greatness. All this is said as preface to the announcement that Sergei Rachmaninoff played once more at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon before what was virtually a capacity audience.

Greatness and impeccable taste, however, do not always go hand in hand. Mr. Rachmaninoff played certain pieces yesterday which some merely good pianists would not consent to play: Brassin's trumpery transcription of Wagner's "Fire Music," for example, and Liszt's saccharine Sonetto del Petracha No. 2. Some might also draw the line at the Paganini-Liszt in E major and even at Chopin's rather flimsy Rondo in E-flat. But in Mr. Rachmaninoff's hands the one had such rhythmic verve the other such beguiling grace that it was easy to overlook their essential emptiness.

In the matter of performance, too, your great pianist may do things which the merely good pianist would not do. Take, for instance, the curious inequalities of tempo in Mr. Rachmaninoff's performance yesterday of Chopin's Polonaise in C minor, a case of "rubato" carried almost to the point of distortion.

But enough of such carping and quibbling. Those who were privileged to be in Symphony Hall yesterday were treated to a performance of Beethoven's Sonata, Opus 109, which matched the sublimity of the music, a performance that will linger long in the memory. As Mr. Rachmaninoff played Liszt's transcription of Bach's organ Fantasy and Fugue in G minor there was for once no feeling that the tonal medium was either inadequate or inappropriate. And there was a rarely poetic, refreshingly unsentimentalized performance of Chopin's D-flat major Nocturne. The inevitable pieces by Rachmaninoff the composer were four of the Etudes Tableaux, all of them effective none of them especially distinctive. There were the usual extra pieces at the end.

Popula
Adv.—

Symp
Ra
By

A PROGRAM
formance of wh would utterly de tives distinguishe
Boston Symphon
noon and Saturda
As Dr. Kousse
Friday afternoon
a two weeks' abse
ence extended him
of the concert an order, an ovation w
well have shared.
The heralded f
first performance i
by Clementi.
That a master
should lay in obsc enough.
It is, however,
that the criticism w
on his own work, o
symphonies which to posterity" led hi

THE MANUSCR
until 1917 when at t
were sold at publi quently they were
Congress at Washi
It is, however,
alert for the greate
his efforts to bea
scripts, that we o
present complete a
The Symphony
fineness of craftsm
that bear the disti definitely among t
ture of all time.
Clementi the symp
in filling out the development of It
teenth century.
Its performance
approved by the a
with this spirit tha
read from a teleg
menti from his gre
menti."
If the occasion
ing it was also on well go down in hi

OF HANDEL'S

Discovering a Symphony More Than a Century Old

113

Trans. Dec. 5/36

First American Performance of Clementi Work from Koussevitzky and Boston Orchestra

By Moses Smith

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky made a speech just after the intermission at yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was a very brief speech, acknowledging to the audience receipts of a telegram from Cecilia Clementi, great-granddaughter of Muzio Clementi, whose Second Symphony in D major had a few minutes earlier been brought to first American performance after more than a century of neglect.

Not of the breed of orator-conductors is Dr. Koussevitzky. He addresses his audiences rarely by words. When he does, his words are the more welcome, particularly because his utterance is coupled with a personal charm that easily traverses the wide spaces of Symphony Hall. And so, the little speech was the biggest event of yesterday's concert, if not the most important.

* * *

The Clementi Symphony, which was the cause for this deviation from strict routine at our symphony concerts, has an interesting history, as readers of these columns last Saturday are aware. The greater and final share of the credit for its rescue from oblivion goes to Alfredo Casella, who was also responsible for the first performance of the D major Symphony and the similarly rediscovered C major Symphony in Italy about a year ago.

These two symphonies have been "edited" by Signor Casella. He has told us what he had to do to complete the D major Symphony—joining parts that were as far from each other as London and Washington. We are in the dark as to whether he revised the instrumentation or changed any of the harmonic parts. Presumably not. Yet the Symphony has an astonishing modern face, particularly in such a section as the slow introduction to the first movement. The leading of the voices, which is often very free, results in some surprising dissonances and long-postponed resolutions. Equally striking is the free writing for the horns and trumpets. These things do not suggest eighteenth century or early nineteenth century style.

There are four movements: the first is fast, the second slow and in lyrical vein, the third a curious "pastoral minuet" and the last fast again. The third movement, which is neither a conventional minuet nor a scherzo, is the most original, if not the most striking. The whole symphony sounds in our conditioned ears like a cross between Mozart and Beethoven. (The outline of the minuet theme smacks strongly of the Mozart G minor Symphony). It is difficult to say, without knowing the actual date of composition, whether Clementi leaned on the other two or they on him.

If the Symphony had not been preceded by such a hullabaloo I think I should have enjoyed it far more. The distinguished Signor Casella's claims for the stature of Clementi as a symphonist turned out to be extravagant. The thematic content of this symphony is not especially engaging. The main theme of the first movement is almost as empty as the similar one for Beethoven's "Eroica." But Beethoven exhibited consummate mastery in the treatment of his theme; the same cannot be said unfortunately of Clementi.

This is not to say, though, that the revival was not worth while. The music often suggests the Latin sunlight in a way that neither Beethoven nor Mozart could manage. There are exceptionally and surprisingly dramatic modulations and turns of instrumentation. Again, it is impossible for this writer to say how original these were with Clementi. But no matter. They achieved their effect.

* * *

The rest of the program was allotted to familiar items in the symphonic repertory. Handel's Concerto Grosso in G minor began the proceedings. The second half of the concert was given over to three Wagnerian items—the "Siegfried Idyl," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and "Tannhaeuser."

The orchestral playing was of a high order, though of not quite uniform excellence. The Clementi Symphony seemed to have been carefully prepared. I should not venture to inquire as to how closely Dr. Koussevitzky's tempi and dynamics would have suited the composer. Judging only from the sound at first performance, one would call them just and sympathetic. The orchestra played very well here.

The performance of the Handel Concerto by the magnificent strings of the Boston Orchestra was sufficiently mannered to disturb what would otherwise have been thoroughly enjoyable. (For example, the unnecessary yet seemingly inevitable prolongation of the penultimate note of the fast movements.)

As to Wagner: Dr. Koussevitzky's version of the Tannhaeuser Overture is in the familiar contemporary vein. The Overture has now degenerated into a conductor's and orchestral showpiece, which it ought never to be. Yet the same leader and musicians produced most poetic renderings of the two preceding Wagnerian excerpts. Yesterday's playing of the 'Siegfried Idyl" and "'Forest Murmurs," in fact, was probably the most faithful Wagnerian excursion the orchestra has undertaken in Dr. Koussevitzky's thirteen seasons here.

Rubaiyat for a Music Devotee

Wake! for the last long-hoped-for note is sung,
The curtain down, and stilled the Wagnerian lung.
You paid your cash and slumbered well, but you
Can say you sat through Gotterdammerung!

I sometimes think that never glows so red
The rose, as some soprano who has said,
"Just listen when I take that last high C,"
Then singing, comes much nearer B instead.

They say that jazz and short-wave radios
Now keep at home the type that usually goes
To concerts; myself prefer real sound to hours
Spent with Ray Noble or with Major Bowes.

A Bach transcription underneath the Bough,
Scored for the modern orchestra—and How!—
When played to advertise tooth paste on the air,
Doesn't seem much like Paradise—somehow!

(During a very modern composition)

Ah Love! could you and I with him have sat,
And begged him to alter atonal this—and that,
And then by firm persuasion toward one key,
To remould it all in F-sharp or G-flat!

Myself when young did earnestly bemoan
The sparing use of eighth—and quarter tone,
And once with them a sonata did I make
For clarinet, a 'cello and trombone.

Think, in this crowded caravanseral,
Of those who would tell the conductor what to play—
Why you and I, for all our tolerance,
Would listen one half hour—and go away!

Yon program that bids us here next week again,
Would seem to be all modern legerdemain.
How often friends will rise to look for us
In these same seats—and look for one in vain!

On coming in, O Saki, if you note
My place still empty where my hands I smote
For Bach and Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms,
Turn down the seat and use it for your coat.

TRISTRAM LIVINGSTONE

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST GAZETTE

DEC 5 - 1936

BALLET RUSSE GIVES SECOND SHOW TONIGHT

Boston Symphony To Head Music Parade Next Week.

SIX NEW BALLETS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky To Conduct Orchestra Of 110 Players.

Continuing a spectacular array of musical events which will reach a climax tonight with the second performance of the Ballet Russe, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra will lead ~~the musical~~ parade to this city next week.

Six new ballets will be presented by the Monte Carlo Ballet in matinee and night performances today at Syria Mosque. The matinee will feature "Papillon," a poetic dance interpretation of the familiar music by Schumann, "The Fantastic Toy Shop," and "Spectre de la Rose." Danilova, Toumanova, Massine, and Shabelevsky will dance in the second ballet of the group.

Glob MUSIC Dec 5/36

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Serge Koussevitzky conducted the first American performance at the Symphony concert yesterday of a century-old novelty—a Symphony in D by Muzio Clementi. This long-lost work of a musician widely known in his time, but now merely a name in reference books, was warmly received by the Friday audience. The concert began with Handel's G minor Concerto Grosso, Op 6, No. 6, and was finished with three items by Wagner, the "Siegfried Idyll," the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and the Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Public interest in Clementi's Symphony was given an added filip when, just after intermission, Dr Koussevitzky read from the stage the following telegram: "Best wishes for the Clementi. (Signed.) His great-granddaughter, Cecilia Clementi Pitman." This reviewer, who was privileged to see the telegram after the concert, observed that it had been sent from Bronxville, N Y.

The Symphony in D has had a curious history. Together with other symphonies by Clementi, it was lost for more than 100 years. Alfredo Casella, the contemporary Italian, who has revised it, inspected the manuscript score, complete except for the introduction and the beginning of the first allegro, at the Congressional Library at Washington, D C, in 1934. Through the efforts of Carl Engel, chief of the music division, the library had acquired the score in a batch of Clementi manuscripts at a London auction sale in 1917. Mr Casella, pursuing his detective work, decided that the real beginning of the symphony was a symphonic introduction and part of an allegro which had been in possession of the British Museum since 1871. He put the two together and presto! there was a complete symphonic work, as he expressed it, "—entirely ready for performance."

A Roman Transplanted

One can envy Muzio Clementi for the time in which he lived. He was four years older than Mozart and died five years after Beethoven. His 80 years covered the span from 1752 to 1832; he witnessed the beginnings of the modern symphonic school, the whole career of Beethoven, and the emergence of the romantic age.

Clementi was a Roman transplanted to England. A virtuoso pianist, he traversed Europe on concert tours. His piano works were favorably regarded by Beethoven, who took some ideas from Clementi's piano style. Clementi's fame rests today upon a portion of his piano pieces. Of his symphonies, two early ones were published while he lived, though others were performed and, according to written accounts, were well-liked.

Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven were the three giants of their own time. So great was their genius they eclipsed their highly talented contemporaries, of whom Clementi was one. For this reason it is inevitable that one speak of the Symphony in D in terms of Mozart and Beethoven, with whose music that of Clementi has points of similarity.

Melodious and Dashing

The Symphony in D is melodious, dashing, constructed after formal patterns of the 18th century, yet with episodic touches of a later period. The material is plainly individual, of a Latin ardor that neither Mozart nor Beethoven, naturally, possessed. Clementi's turns of phrases have a grace easily identified with Mozart, but that was simply a manner then common. If the scoring for orchestra calls up the epithet "Beethovenian" there is still the fact that Haydn and even Mozart in their last symphonic music employed the orchestra's resources with a boldness which heralded the middle period of Beethoven. It is likely that the elements of the orchestral style were more or less common currency. Because Beethoven carried them to furthest development we mistakenly honor him as their originator.

The minuetto of the Symphony in D is neither 18th century nor does it share the rough humor of Beethoven's scherzos. Instead, the phrases are long, flowing and demand a faster tempo than those of Mozart. This movement shows most of all the original qualities of Clementi's talent.

The orchestra and Dr Koussevitzky performed the Symphony most brilliantly. The same adverb is applicable to everything else on the program, though the conductor still forces the brass at the end of the "Tannhaeuser" Overture.

C. W. D.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

Long Lost Symphony By Clementi Cheered At Boston Premiere

Boston, Dec. 5 (UP).—Music lovers

At Concert

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

Haydn ..Symphony in B-flat No. 102 (the Ninth of the London series)
Largo: Allegro vivace
Adagio
Menuetto: Allegro; Trio
Finale: Presto
Debussy .... "La Mer,"
Three Orchestral Sketches
De l'aube a midi sur la mer
Jeux de vagues
Dialogue du vent et de la mer

Intermission

Brahms ..Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68
Un poco sostenuto: Allegro
Andante sostenuto
Un poco allegretto e grazioso
Adagio: Allegro non troppo, ma con brio

By ROBERT SABIN

NEVER has the Eastman Theater witnessed a more excited and tempestuous ovation than the one accorded the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky last evening, and one may justly add, never has it witnessed a more brilliant and superb performance.

This organization possesses a superlative technique, impeccable taste, and enjoys the leadership of a masterful conductor. One doubts if a Haydn symphony ever meant quite so much to a Rochester audience as Koussevitsky made the B flat mean last evening. The majesty of the opening was sung by the strings; the phrasing of the Adagio was a joy to hear; and the trumpets in the Menuetto with its charming trio were all that trumpets can be, and that is a great deal, even in the scores of Haydn. Of the marvelous precision in the swift, darting Presto, it is scarcely necessary to speak.

Then came a musical experience of rarest order. For Koussevitsky's interpretation of La Mer is classic, unforgettable. The exquisite pianissimo, the plastic, sinuous tone, the iridescent coloring of this interpretation evade any hurried critical description. What magnificent music this is. All of the whispers of the ocean, its morning silver and its evening velvet, all of those unutterable mysteries felt by Conrad and Loti are in this music. There was the reticence of Chinese art in the playing of this poem. Where others smear, Koussevitsky adds one stroke of the brush.

Who will forget the opening chords of this masterpiece, the wave-like diminuendo and rhythm of the theme in the 'cellos and brasses, the wisps of tone in the woodwinds in the second section, or the miraculous sense of infinite distance, of wind and sun and sky, in the last? To have lived and heard this music is something. It represents the peak of Debussy's creation, perhaps his most profound utterance.

Again in the towering and

RACHMANINOFF AT THE PIANO

Dec

Symphony Hall Filled to Capacity for Recital

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is likely that there are now more good pianists than ever before, but the great ones are still and always will be scarce. When they appear it is the public, quite as much as the critics, which recognizes their greatness. All this is said as preface to the announcement that Sergei Rachmaninoff played once more at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon before what was virtually a capacity audience.

Greatness and impeccable taste, however, do not always go hand in hand. Mr. Rachmaninoff played certain pieces yesterday which some merely good pianists would not consent to play: Brassin's trumpery transcription of Wagner's "Fire Music," for example, and Liszt's saccharine Sonetto del Petracha No. 2. Some might also draw the line at the Paganini-Liszt in E major and even at Chopin's rather flimsy Rondo in E-flat. But in Mr. Rachmaninoff's hands the one had such rhythmic verve the other such beguiling grace that it was easy to overlook their essential emptiness.

In the matter of performance, too, your great pianist may do things which the merely good pianist would not do. Take, for instance, the curious inequalities of tempo in Mr. Rachmaninoff's performance yesterday of Chopin's Polonaise in C minor, a case of "rubato" carried almost to the point of distortion.

But enough of such carping and quibbling. Those who were privileged to be in Symphony Hall yesterday were treated to a performance of Beethoven's Sonata, Opus 109, which matched the sublimity of the music, a performance that will linger long in the memory. As Mr. Rachmaninoff played Liszt's transcription of Bach's organ Fantasy and Fugue in G minor there was for once no feeling that the tonal medium was either inadequate or inappropriate. And there was a rarely poetic, refreshingly unsentimentalized performance of Chopin's D-flat major Nocturne. The inevitable pieces by Rachmaninoff the composer were four of the Etudes Tableaux, all of them effective none of them especially distinctive. There were the usual extra pieces at the end.

Popula

Symp

Ra

By

A PROGRAM
formance of whi would utterly dep
tives distinguishe
Boston Symphony
noon and Saturda

As Dr. Koussev
Friday afternoon t a two weeks' absen
ence extended him
of the concert an order, an ovation w
well have shared.

The heralded fe first performance in by Clementi.

That a master should lay in obscu enough.

It is, however,
that the criticism w on his own work, o
symphonies which to posterity" led hi

THE MANUSCR
until 1917 when at t
were sold at publi quently they were
Congress at Washi

It is, however,
alert for the greater
his efforts to bea
scripts, that we o
present complete a

The Symphony
fineness of craftsm
that bear the distin definitely among th
ture of all time.
Clementi the symph
in filling out the development of It
teenth century.

Its performance
approved by the a
with this spirit tha
read from a telegr
menti from his gre
menti."

If the occasion
ing it was also one well go down in his

OF HANDEL'S

News of Music at

A new department is evidently inaugurated in the program book for this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the beginning and end of the book, it consists of several columns of material that may be roughly classified as news about the orchestra, its concerts and its programs, as well as relative addenda. Such a department has for some time been incorporated in the program books of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

DEC 6 - 1936

recent years the Metropolitan O
Association, Inc., will begin its ing season on Dec. 21 with a Wa music drama, "Die Walkuere," i been announced by General M ager Edward Johnson. Acco

EFREM ZIMBALIST'S recital in Carnegie Hall Tuesday evening will represent the completion of 25 years since he made his American debut. Samuel Chotzinoff, music critic of the New York Post, will be at the piano.

Mr. Zimbalist, as a young man in his twenties, was first heard by an American audience on Oct. 27, 1911, when he appeared as guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and then at Carnegie Hall.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 6 - 1936

CATHOLIC WOMEN TO HEAR HARPIST

The December meeting of the West Warwick Catholic Women's Club will be held tomorrow evening at the Odeon Theatre in Arctic at 8 o'clock, when Miss Marianne Channon will entertain with harp solos. Miss Channon is one of the youngest harp soloists of today, and is a graduate of the American School of Music at Fontainebleu, France.

Originally a pupil of Miss Frances Calder here, she is now an artist pupil of Bernard Zighera of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Her program will range from classics to semi-classics.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

A.P.

DEC 5 - 1936

Boston Orchestra Performs Symphony Lost a Century

Popular Prices, A

Adv: Dec. 6/36

Symphony in Rarest Mood

By Ruth Marsters

Music Editor

A PROGRAM of singular import, the performance of which if adequately described would utterly deplete one's stock of superlatives distinguished the eighth regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

As Dr. Koussevitzky, came upon the stage on Friday afternoon to conduct the orchestra after a two weeks' absence from this series, the audience extended him a cordial welcome. At the end of the concert an ovation would have been in order, an ovation which the orchestra itself might well have shared.

The heralded feature of the occasion was the first performance in America of a Symphony in D by Clementi.

That a master work, for such it proved to be, should lay in obscurity for a century is strange enough.

It is, however, partially explained by the fact that the criticism which Clementi brought to bear on his own work, overly severe in the case of the symphonies which he intended as his "testament to posterity" led him to keep them from publication.

* * *

THE MANUSCRIPTS did not come to light until 1917 when at the death of a musicologist they were sold at public auction in London. Subsequently they were acquired by the Library of Congress at Washington, D. C.

It is, however, to Alfredo Casella, who, ever alert for the greater glory of Italian music brought his efforts to bear upon the disordered manuscripts, that we owe the symphony in D in its present complete and rejuvenated form.

The Symphony is distinguished by a chiseled fineness of craftsmanship, a vitality of substance that bear the distinct mark of genius and place it definitely among the important symphonic literature of all time. Moreover, the discovery of Clementi the symphonist goes a considerable way in filling out the gap which has existed in the development of Italian music during the nineteenth century.

Its performance was apparently unanimously approved by the audience. It was in accordance with this spirit that Dr. Koussevitzky turned and read from a telegram, "Best wishes for the Clementi from his great-granddaughter, Caecilia Clementi."

If the occasion was one of music history making it was also one of music making that might well go down in history.

* * *

OF HANDEL'S Sixth Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, which opened the program, we can add little to the much which has already been better written. Of the performance given it by the Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzy's inspired leadership, we are at a loss for words. That the Boston Symphony at its best always seems better than ever before has undoubtedly something to do with this.

The "suppleness of pace and fluidity of expression" which Philip Hale cites Volbach as recommending for the performance of Handel were ever present, Dr. Koussevitzky bringing to bear on its performance the same vitalizing force, which in complete disregard of the dust of centuries, customarily goes beneath formal traditions and reaches the core of the present day significance of the music.

* * *

THE WAGNER which followed the intermission was sheerly breathtaking. "Siegfried Idyl"; and "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" were instilled in Dr. Koussevitzky's hands with sheerest poetry. The Overture to "Tannhauser" was brought to a climax none other than stupendous,

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 8 - 1936

Music Notes

Zimbalist Recital Tonight

Efrem Zimbalist will celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of his first American tour with a recital tonight in Carnegie Hall, playing Kreisler's arrangement of Corelli's "La Folia," Eugene Ysaye's sonata in D minor for violin alone, Bruch's Scotch Fantasy, Arthur Loesser's "California" and shorter pieces by Schubert and Paganini. Samuel Chotzinoff, music critic of "The New York Post," will accompany. The violinist made his first appearance in this country on October 27, 1911, as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing the Glazounoff concerto under Max Fiedler's direction.

AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL

DEC 5 - 1936

Symphony Lost A Hundred Years Played in Boston

Opus Written by Italian Contemporary of Beethoven Acclaimed by Staid Hub Audience

See Wide Popularity

Boston, Dec. 4—(AP)—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Its performance by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky won warm applause from a traditionally staid Hub audience.

Written sometime between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed, was melodious, beautiful, and individual.

Beaming at friends in his quarters after the performance, Dr. Koussevitzky happily predicted the Opus in D Major was bound to become "an indispensable part of the standard repertoire."

"It will be played soon by everybody," he asserted enthusiastically. "I'm going to play it in New York on the next trip.

"It is a beautiful work. And that third movement, the minuetto! It is not like a minuetto one would expect to have been written at that period. It is certainly individual."

The symphony helps fill in a 100-year gap in musical hisotry. Clementi, a contemporary of Beethoven, was widely recognized for his piano sonatas, some of which were held in high esteem by the great German master.

But he also was known through yellowed newspaper and magazine clippings to have written about 20 symphonies, widely popular in their day.

Yet, when Clementi died near London in 1832, bequeathing his large estates and all his manuscripts to his widow, none of the symphonic scores could be found. Only two of them had been printed, and the others dropped from public knowledge.

(Continued on Page 8—Col. 4)

In 1917, Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar, died and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder. How they came into Dr. Cummings' possession still remains a mystery.

The Library of Congress of the United States purchased the manuscripts at public auction soon after, and musicologists attempted to weave them together. Alfredo Casella, noted Italian composer-pianist-scholar, completed four symphonies by his own filling-in, and with the aid of fragmentary manuscripts that inexplicably had come into the possession of the British Museum in 1871. These had lain in dusty oblivion for years, catalogued as "sketches."

Dr. Koussevitzky described Casella's revision as "magnificent."

During the intermission, Dr. Kousevitzy read a message expressing "good wishes," from Mrs. Cecelia Clementi Pitman of Bronxville, N. Y., who said she was a great-granddaughter of Clementi's.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

DEC 5 - 1936

CLEMENTI SYMPHONY, LAST CENTURY, HEARD

BOSTON, Dec. 4.—(AP) Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America today at the heands of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Its performance by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky won warm applause from a traditionally staid Hub audience.

Written sometime between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed was melodious, beautiful, and individual.

Beaming at friends in his quarters after the performance, Dr. Koussevitzky happily predicted the opus in D major was bound to become "an indispensable part of the standard repertoire."

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS

DEC 5 - 1936

SYMPHONY LOST FOR A CENTURY PLAYED IN HUB

Work of Muzio Clementi Given First Hearing in America

BOSTON, Dec. 4—(AP)—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Its performance by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky won warm applause from a traditionally staid Hub audience.

Written sometime between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed, was molodious, beautiful, and individual.

Beaming at friends in his quarters after the performance, Dr. Koussevitzky happily predicted the Opus in D Major was bound to become "an indispensable part of the standard repertoire."

"It will be played soon by everybody," he asserted enthusiastically. "I'm going to play it in New York on the next trip."

"It is a beautiful work. And that third movement, the Minuetto! It is not like a Minuetto one would expect to have been written at that period. It is certainly individual."

The symphony helps fill in a 100-year gap in musical history. Clementi, a contemporary of Beethoven, was widely recognized for his piano sonatas, some of which were held in high esteem by the great German master.

But he also was known through yellowed newspaper and magazine clippings to have written about 20 symphonies, widely popular in their day.

Yet, when Clementi died near London in 1832, bequeathing his large estates and all his manuscripts to his widow, none of the symphonic scores could be found. Only two of them had been printed, and others dropped from public knowledge.

In 1917, Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder. How they came into Dr. Cummings' possession still remains a mystery.

The Library of Congress of the United States purchased the manuscripts at public auction soon after, and musicologists attempted to weave them together. Alfredo Casella, noted Italian composer-pianist-scholar, completed four symphonies by his own filling-in, and with the aid of fragmentary manuscripts that inexplicably had come into the possession of the British Museum in 1871. These had lain in dusty oblivion for years, catalogued as "sketches."

Dr. Koussevitzky described Casella's revision as "magnificent."

During the intermission, Dr. Koussevitzky read a message expressing "good wishes", from Mrs. Cecelia Clementi Pitman, of Bronxville, N. Y., who said she was a great granddaughter of Clementi's.

TUCSON, ARIZ.
STAR

DEC 5 - 1936 114

LOST SYMPHONY GIVEN HEARING

Staid Boston Applauds Clementi Opus In D Major At Concert

BOSTON, Dec. 4.—(AP)—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Its performance by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky won warm applause from a traditionally staid Hub audience.

Written sometime between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed was melodious, beautiful and individual.

Beaming at friends after the performance, Dr. Koussevitzky happily predicted the opus in D major was bound to become "an indispensible part of the standard repertoire."

"It will be played soon by everybody," he asserted enthusiastically. "I'm going to play it in New York on the next trip."

"It is a beautiful work. And that third movement, the minuetto, it it not like a minuetto one would expect to have been written at that period. It is certainly individual."

The symphony helps fill in a 100-year gap in musical history. Clementi, a contemporary of Beethoven, was widely recognized for his piano sonatas, some of which were held in high esteem by the great German master.

But he also was known through yellowed newspaper and magazine clippings to have written about 20 symphonies, widely popular in their day.

NEWBURGH, N. Y.
NEWS

DEC 5 - 1936

Symphony, Long Lost, Is Finally Heard

Boston —(UP)— Music lovers hailed today the long-lost Italian masterpiece, "Symphony in D Major" by Muzio Clementi, brought to life in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in a premiere cheered by 2,500 listeners.

The symphony, composed in 1817 but never published, vanished mysteriously more than a century ago. Clementi died in England in 1832 at the age of 80.

Alfredo Caella, Italian composer, reassembled the masterpiece two years ago. He proved that an incomplete symphony in the Library of Congress could be completed by adding as its opening movement a fragment that had lain in the British Museum since 1871 without its real identity having been established.

BERNARD ZIGHERA
Conductor of the New Chamber Orchestra in Three Concerts at Jordan Hall on Dec. 15, Jan. 12 and Feb 9

Guest Symphony Wins Ovation At Concert

Rochester N.Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

Haydn ..Symphony in B-flat No. 102
(the Ninth of the London series)
Largo: Allegro vivace
Adagio
Menuetto: Allegro; Trio
Finale: Presto
Debussy .... "La Mer,"
Three Orchestral Sketches
De Paube a midi sur la mer
Jeux de vagues
Dialogue du vent et de la mer

Intermission

Brahms ..Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68
Un poco sostenuto: Allegro
Andante sostenuto
Un poco allegretto e grazioso
Adagio: Allegro non troppo, ma con brio

Dec. 8/36

By ROBERT SABIN

NEVER has the Eastman Theater witnessed a more excited and tempestuous ovation than the one accorded the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky last evening, and one may justly add, never has it witnessed a more brilliant and superb performance.

This organization possesses a superlative technique, impeccable taste, and enjoys the leadership of a masterful conductor. One doubts if a Haydn symphony ever meant quite so much to a Rochester audience as Koussevitsky made the B flat mean last evening. The majesty of the opening was sung by the strings; the phrasing of the Adagio was a joy to hear; and the trumpets in the Menuetto with its charming trio were all that trumpets can be, and that is a great deal, even in the scores of Haydn. Of the marvelous precision in the swift, darting Presto, it is scarcely necessary to speak.

Then came a musical experience of rarest order. For Koussevitsky's interpretation of La Mer is classic, unforgettable. The exquisite pianissimo, the plastic, sinuous tone, the iridescent coloring of this interpretation evade any hurried critical description. What magnificent music this is. All of the whispers of the occan, its morning silver and its evening velvet, all of those unutterable mysteries felt by Conrad and Loti are in this music. There was the reticence of Chinese art in the playing of this poem. Where others smear, Koussevitsky adds one stroke of the brush.

Who will forget the opening chords of this masterpiece, the wave-like diminuendo and rhythm of the theme in the 'cellos and brasses, the wisps of tone in the woodwinds in the second section, or the miraculous sense of infinite distance, of wind and sun and sky, in the last? To have lived and heard this music is something. It represents the peak of Debussey's creation, perhaps his most profound utterance.

Again in the towering and austere Brahms First Symphony the orchestra built up a breathless magnificence and a broad, flowing line which made the music seem like a new revelation. One might disagree with some things in Kousevitsky's interpretation, the horn passage in the last movement, for instance, but one was swept away by the whole. The writer has never heard the detail of the Allegretto so beautifully emphasized, nor the surging finale so fearlessly proclaimed. It was a bold, declamatory Brahms that Koussevitsky brought to us, yet with lyric interludes of hushed quiet.

Long after the concert was over, people stood in the aisles still applauding. A musical experience of major importanuce had exercised its spell.

MONTGOMERY, ALA.
ADVERTISER

DEC 5 - 1936

Century Old Opera Praised By Audience

BOSTON, Dec. 4.—(AP)—Lost for a cen-

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Post Dec. 8/36

Reflections on the Critical Art

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

IT IS interesting to speculate on what the situation would have been had the Nazi ban on criticism fallen 75 or 100 years earlier and embraced Austria as well as Germany. Edouard Hanslick, that dreaded enemy of what was then musical modernism, could not then have made his ferocious attacks on Wagner, Liszt, Bruckner and Tchaikovsky. The Russian composer would not have had his sensitive nature outraged by the assertion that the Finale of his Violin Concerto was music which stuck in the ear, the long-suffering Bruckner would not have endured persecution because he allied himself with Wagner and because he wrote symphonies which were not easy to understand.

Wagner, of course, fought back by putting Hanslick in "Die Meistersinger" in the guise of the ridiculous and pedantic Beckmesser. And later Richard Strauss took his revenge on what Herr Goebbels has called the "cultural gadflies" in the "Adversaries"—that is, the critics—section of his tone poem, "A Hero's Life." Here they are, both the venomous and the uncomprehending ones, drawn to the life.

Perhaps Herr Goebbels is right. And Vincent d'Indy, who once wrote that, outside of banking and politics, he knew of no sorrier or more useless profession than criticism, would agree with him. But is it not also possible that criticism may be classed with vaccination or vivisection as something which has occasioned some misery but which on the whole has worked for the general good? An uncriticized art is a pampered art. And pampering never helped anything or anybody.

* * * *

In Cecil Gray's most recent book, "Predicaments, or Music and the Future," he remarks of opera that "it satisfies some imperious esthetic need of humanity which no other form of art can satisfy." New operas worthy of production would be altogether desirable, but when they are not forthcoming the public must needs turn back to the standbys of the last century. And so it is that Fortune Gallo and his San Carlo Opera Company will offer, and will unquestionably find audience for, eight tried and true operatic favorites at the Boston Opera House this week: "Carmen" on Monday evening; "Aida" Tuesday evening; "Martha," in English, followed by a ballet, at the Wednesday matinee and "Lohengrin" that evening; "Madame Butterfly" Thursday evening; "Rigoletto" Friday evening; and "Faust" for the matinee and "Il Trovatore" for the evening of Saturday. The casts include familiar names: Bianca Sarova, Anna Leskaya, Hizi Koyke and Coe Glade, Aroldo Lindi, Dimitri Onofrei, Mostyn Thomas and Mario Valle, among them.

RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD

DEC 3 - 1936

RECITAL IS GIVEN BY HARPSICHORDIST

MIDDLEBURY, Dec. 2.—Ralph Kirkpatrick carried a Middlebury audience back two centuries in musical history tonight when he gave a masterful harpsichord recital in the college chapel. Kirkpatrick has recently returned from Europe where he spent a year as a Guggenheim fellow perfecting his interpretation of 18th century keyboard music. Since his appearance in Germany, Austria and Italy as well as soloist with the New York and Boston Symphony orchestras he has been recognized as one of the few outstanding harpsichordists in this country.

Two years ago, during the summer language session, he gave a recital at Middlebury which was a brilliant success, but his advancement in artistry since that time was noted here tonight.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE

DEC 5 - 1936

Fritz Kreisler, beloved violinist, will give a concert in Rochester on Dec. 11 at the Eastman theater.

The Boston Symphony is scheduled to appear under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky in Buffalo on Dec. 8 at Elmwood Music Hall.

BARBIROLLI GETS 3-YEAR CONTRACT

N.Y. Times

Philharmonic Engages Young British Conductor, Who Will Be Also Music Director.

Dec 11/36

BOARD PREDICTS NEW ERA

Former 'Cellist Will Be First Full Time, Permanent Head of Orchestra Since 1921.

John Barbirolli, 37-year-old British conductor, has been engaged to lead the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra for the next three seasons, it was announced yesterday by the board of directors. Mr. Barbirolli, besides becoming the first full-time permanent conductor that the Philharmonic has had in sixteen years, will be the music director.

The statement of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society designated this engagement as "a significant decision, marking a new era in the history of the society."

"It is the solution, the board feels," it went on, "of several major issues which have confronted the Philharmonic for some time: the need for a young conductor of artistic integrity who could build toward the orchestra's future as well as enhance its present; for a director whose talents are recognized in such specific terms as increased audiences; for a man strong and vietal enough to mold the orchestra into a consistent personality and technical unity.

Public Enthusiasm Welcomed

"In Mr. Barbirolli the society believes this three-fold problem can be solved. Next year will be the first time since 1920-21 that the Philharmonic has had a permanent conductor for the entire season.

"Particularly encouraging has been the public's enthusiasm, evident in an amazing growth in attendance, especially at the Sunday afternoon concerts. A proportion of the augmented ticket sale could be accounted for by the general improvement in business conditions but a large part of it is obviously due to the hold Mr. Barbirolli has gained on the music lovers of this city in eighteen concerts he has conducted here since his début program last Nov. 5."

Mr. Barbirolli was born on Dec. 2, 1899, in London. His father was Italian and his mother French. On his father's side there had been a long line of musicians. His father and grandfather took part in the world première of Verdi's "Otello" as members of the orchestra.

Studied Violin and 'Cello

As a boy, Mr. Barbirolli studied the violin, then the 'cello. At the age of 11 he made his first public appearance as a 'cellist. He remained a 'cellist, playing alone and in ensembles, until 1925, when he turnedt o conditioning. At that time he founded the Barbirolli Chamber Orchestra. The next year he conducted performances of the British National Opera Company.

He branched out into engagements with the London Symphony Orchestra, with the Royal Philharmonic and the Covent Garden Opera. He conducted virtually all the important orchestras in England, finally accepting the post of permanent conductor of the Scottish Orchestra in Glasgow and the Leeds Symphony.

The board of directors of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society is headed by Clarence H. Mackay, chairman; Marshall Field, president; Frederic A. Juilliard, first vice president; Paul D. Cravath, vice president; Charles Triller, treasurer; Edwin T. Rice, assistant treasurer; Richard W. G. Welling, secretary, and Arthur Judson, executive secretary.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

DEC 5 - 1936

PROVIDENCE HARPIST WILL GIVE MUSICALE

Miss Marianne Channon, Providence harpist, will give a musicale at the meeting of the West Warwick Catholic Women's Club on Monday evening in the Odeon Theatre, Arctic.

Miss Channon, graduate of the American School of Music at Fountainbleau, France, was formerly a pupil of Miss Frances Calder of Providence, and is at present an artist pupil of Bernard Zighera of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS

DEC 4 - 1936

CENTURY OLD SYMPHONY SCORES

Musicologists Give Credit To Casella For Weaving Disordered Manuscript

Composition By Clementi, Now Fills 100 Year Gap In Musical History

BOSTON (AP)—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century received its first American performance recently when the Boston Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussecitzky, played the symphony in D Major by the Americanized Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musicologists credit Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pops Ochestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were held in high regard by Beethoven and Haydn and who as an established pianist gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Lizt, then 13 years old, was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Popularity Attested

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity, between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other symphonies.

Yet when he died in 1832, bequeathing all his manscripts, to his widow, none but sonata scores could be found.

Clementi was a practical man of affairs, and his large estate was in good order. But his symphonies never had been printed, and they dropped from public knowledge for the next 40 years.

Two manuscripts came into the possession of the British Museum in 1871, but, unconnected, they merely intensified the fruitless search for the others.

Found in Old Chest

Then in 1917, Dr. William H. Cummings, a London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder.

A public auction in London soon resulted in their purchase by Carl Engel, chief of the music division for the library of Congress of the United States.

In 1924, a magazine article concerning the Washington scores piqued the curiosity of Casella, who had been intensely interested in earning recognition for Clementi as a great symphonist. Ten years passed before Casella finally crossed the ocean to begin serious study of the scores.

Putting them together was similar to reassembling several jigsaw puzzles at once. Nevertheless, hard work yielded four symphonies last year, although in each the first movement was incomplete.

Two Published Last Year

Recalling the two manuscripts held in the British museum, Casella went to London, armed with phostostatic copies of the Washington Library scores. Careful work restored all four, and two were performed and published last year.

The first, third and fourth required some slight filling in by Casella, but the second, which will be performed Friday, was complete, and received its first performance under Casella in Rome last January.

Dr. Koussevitzky first learned of the scores from Casella, and after studying them minutely the last few weeks, described the music as possessing "great charm and brilliance."

SPARTANSBURG, S. C.
JOURNAL

DEC 5 - 1936

LOST SYMPHONY WINS APPROVAL

Staid Bostonians Clap for Clementi Opus

Boston, Mass., Dec. 5 (AP).—

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

DEC 2 - 1936

Mayfair to Attend Boston Symphony

A WEEK from this evening in Masonic Auditorium.... the Boston Symphony Orchestra....will appear under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky....

Among those who will be present are:

Frank Donovan....Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Webber....Mr. and Mrs. Vaughan Reid....Mr. and Mrs. Charles T. Fisher....

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Mutter....Mr. and Mrs. Joseph N. Mills....Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Hughes....Mr. and Mrs. Charles Allinger....Dr. and Mrs. Charles E. Lemmon....

Dr. and Mrs. Burt R. Shurly....Mr. and Mrs. Owen R. Skelton....Mr. and Mrs. Thaddeus Wronski....Mrs. Eliel Saarinen....

Judge and Mrs. Joseph A. Moynihan....Mr. and Mrs. Carl Breer....Mr. and Mrs. Arthur B. Tilton....Mr. and Mrs. J. Henry Pichler....

Mrs. Frederick M. Alger....Mr. and Mrs. Douglas Dow.... Mr. and Mrs. John S. Newberry....Mr. and Mrs. Thomas F. Paddock....Mr. and Mrs. Lester Ruwe....

Mr. and Mrs. Standish Backus....Mrs. Frederick S. Ford ....Mr. and Mrs. John R. Decker....Mr. and Mrs. Stanley J. Posselius....Mr. and Mrs. C. Henry Buhl....

Mrs. Homer Warren....Mrs. W. E. Scripps....Miss Alice Dowley....Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Hodges Jr.....Mrs. Morse Rohnert....

* * *

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS

DEC 5 - 1936

Clementi Symphony, Lost for 100 Years, Given Big Reception At First Performance in America

(By Associated Press)

BOSTON, Dec. 4.—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Its performance by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky won warm applause from a traditionally staid Hub audience.

Written sometime between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed was melodious, beautiful and individual.

Beaming at friends in his quarters after the performance, Dr. Koussevitzky happily predicted the opus in D Major was bound to become "an indispensible part of the standard repertoire."

"It will be played soon by everybody," he asserted enthusiastically. "I'm going to play it in New York on the next trip."

"It is a beautiful work. And that third movement, the Minuetto, it is not like a Minuetto one would expect to have been written at that period. It is certainly individual."

The symphony helps fill in a 100-year gap in musical history. Clementi, a contemporary of Beethoven, was widely recognized for his piano sonatas, some of which were held in high esteem by the great German master.

But he also was known through yellowed newspaper and magazine clippings to have written about 20 symphonies, widely popular in their day.

Yet, when Clementi died near London in 1832, bequeathing his large estates and all his manuscripts to his widow, none of the symphonic scores could be found. Only two of them had been printed, and the others dropped from public knowledge.

In 1917, Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder. How they came into Dr. Cummings' possession still remains a mystery.

The Library of Congress of the United States purchased the manuscripts at public auction soon after, and musicologists attempted to weave them together. Alfredo Casella, noted Italian composer-pianist-scholar, completed four symphonies by his own filling-in, and with the aid of fragmentary manuscripts that inexplicably had come into the possession of the British Museum in 1871. These had lain in dusty oblivion for years, catalogued as "sketches."

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

DEC 5 - 1936

Symphony Lost 100 Years Hailed in Boston Premiere

Boston — (U.P.) — Music lovers hailed today the longlost Italian masterpiece, "Symphony in D Major" by Muzio Clementi, brought to life in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in a premiere cheered by 2,500 listeners.

The symphony, composed in 1871 but never published, vanished mysteriously more than a century ago. Clementi, died in England in 1832 at the age of 80.

After remarkable sleuthing, Alfredo Claela, Italian composer, reassembled the masterpiece two years ago. He proved that an incomplete symphony in the Library of Congress could be completed by adding as its opening movement a fragment that had lain in the British Museum since 1871 without its real identity having been established.

Casella presented the symphony at Rome last January, but the Boston orchestra was the first major symphony to give it life. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, disclosed during his intermission last night that a great-granddaughter of Clementi lives in New York.

Koussevitzky read a telegram from Cecilia Clementi Pitman, Bronxville, expressing "best wishes for the Clementi."

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

A.P.

DEC 5 - 1936

SYMPHONY LOST 100 YEARS HEARD IN HUB

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE

A.P.

DEC 5 - 1936

Symphony, Lost For Over Century Revived at Boston

116

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 6 - 1936

SIBELIUS IN AMERICA

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

THE British press has lately been commenting on the American press in a tone which might be described as that of modified rapture. Let us not be too hasty in returning the compliment; for the British press, at its best, has the admiration of every American newspaper man who is capable of recognizing journalistic honor and journalistic craftsmanship of the first rank.

Yet it must be admitted that occasionally the British press does perpetrate some rather odd things. Those of us who follow its activities in, especially, the field of musical comment were more than a little astonished to find a while ago in that excellent publication, the London "Listener," issued weekly by the British Broadcasting Corporation, some observations which, had they appeared in an American publication, would have been put down to mere ignorant provincialism. But it is needless to say that the British press is incapable of ignorance or provincialism; so there must be some other explanation—if only one could find it.

* * *

"Virtually Unknown"

WHAT I am referring to is an article on Sibelius contributed to "The Listener" by Mr. Alan Frank. The name of Mr. Alan Frank, I am ashamed to say, is not known to me. But undoubtedly he is a writer and speaker of standing, else his beliefs, opinions, and assertions would not have been spread over three and a half columns of so important and widely read a publication as "The Listener." And no doubt Mr. Frank's remarks had previously been broadcast; for the contents of "The Listener" are always, I believe, printed talks. So Mr. Frank's remarks must have come to the attention of a good many people.

With Mr. Frank's opinions on the subject of Sibelius I am not at the moment concerned. I am concerned with what he presents as statements of fact, contained in the following paragraph from his article:

"The situation as regards Sibelius presents one of the most remarkable phenomena in the musical history of our times, and it will not be amiss to recall a few facts and dates. Sibelius was born in 1865, and at the early age of thirty-two he was able to retire on a life grant offered to him by the State. The faith thus shown in him and clearly vindicated by subsequent events reflects the greatest credit upon his country. Thirty-four years later, in 1931, appeared Mr. Cecil Gray's monograph upon Sibelius. Until then his music had remained virtually unknown outside Finland."

Let me quote again that last sentence of Mr. Frank's:

"Until then his music had remained virtually unknown outside Finland."

One rubs one's eyes, and reads it again. . . . Yes, the meaning is perfectly clear, quite unmistakable. It means that until 1931, when the apostolic Mr. Gray published in England his able study of the Finnish master, the music of Sibelius had remained virtually unknown outside Finland. And mark you. Mr. Frank's remarkable phrase does not read, "virtually unknown in England" (which is possibly true); it reads, "virtually unknown." This would appear to mean that in the United States, as well as in Europe (save for Finland), the music of Sibelius was virtually unknown prior to 1931.

It would probably have been too much to expect of Mr. Alan Frank that before taking it for granted that American concert-givers are as provincial as he seems to think most European ones are, he might have done a little quiet detective work in the underworld of American music. Probably the program-books of the Boston Symphony, Chicago, New York Philharmonic-Symphony, and other American orchestras are available in England. Or, if they are not, Mr. Frank might have invested in a five-cent stamp and written to some colleague in America for a little information on the subject. That might not have been cricket. But it would have been prudent. It would have saved Mr. Frank from laying himself open to the charge of writing like a musically illiterate American, instead of like a musically educated Briton.

* * *

The Funniest Thing in the World

IT IS really too bad. For if Mr. Frank had bothered to look into the matter, he would have discovered some facts—true facts, not imaginary facts—which might have astonished even himself; although they would have required the modification of a striking paragraph in his article, and the elimination of a handsome compliment to Mr. Cecil Gray. For, much as one dislikes to deprive Mr. Gray of the credit for putting the music of Sibelius upon the map of the musical world ("outside Finland"), the truth—at least in the United States—must prevail.

Mr. Bernard Shaw once observed that "the truth is the funniest thing in the world." That, I dare say, still holds good. Perhaps even Mr. Frank will find it amusing to learn that almost thirty years before Mr. Gray published his valuable monograph upon Sibelius, the music of that composer was being performed and discussed in the United States; and that between 1901 and 1931 (the year when Mr. Gray's book appeared), the major orchestras of the United States gave no fewer than 265 performances of works by Sibelius. In a single season of six months, one of those orchestras gave seventeen performances of compositions by Sibelius.

* * *

Sibelius in The States

MR. FRANK may leap to the conclusion that those 265 American performances of Sibelius were chiefly performances of such sure-fire stand-bys as "Finlandia" and the "Valse Triste," which are played ad nauseam by every orchestra in the world and are adored by every average concert-goer from Hartford to Tokio. But Mr. Frank would be mistaken in that conclusion. The Sibelius performances by American orchestras to which I refer included virtually all of Sibelius's greater orchestral works, some of them many times repeated. When the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in 1917, gave twelve performances of compositions by Sibelius, eight of them (or two-thirds of the total) were devoted to the "Oceanides," "Night Ride and Sunrise," "Pohjola's Daughter,' 'and the Fourth Symphony. When the Philadelphia Orchestra, in the season of 1925-'26, gave seventeen performances of works by Sibelius, thirteen of those performances were of the Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Symphonies. Moreover, the Symphonies of Sibelius were in most cases introduced to American audiences within a few years of their appearance. If Mr. Frank would like to know the dates of these performances, I should be happy to supply them.

C[illegible]n of the other principal works of Sibelius were specially composed for America—his greatest symphonic poem, "Tapiola," was commissioned in 1926 by Walter Damrosch for the Symphony Society of New York, and was played by that orchestra under Mr. Damrosch, for the first time anywhere, on December 26, 1926. Mr. Cecil Gray says in his book, by the way, that "Tapiola" was composed in "1925"—which suggests that either Mr. Damrosch was dreaming or that Mr. Gray is mistaken. The tone-poem "Die Okeaniden" ("Aallottaret"), was composed at the invitation of the late Carl Stoeckel for one of his Norfolk (Conn.) Music Festivals, and was performed there, under the direction of Sibelius himself, in June, 1914. It would be interesting, by the way, to know whether Mr. Alan Frank's belief that the music of Sibelius was "virtually unknown outside Finland" before 1931 is shared by Sibelius himself. If so, he must have wondered a little why it was that Yale University conferred upon him in 1914 the degree of Doctor of Music—an odd thing to do for a composer whose music was "virtually unknown" in the land where he was being honored!

* * *

An American Champion

IF MR. FRANK had deigned to investigate the facts of the case, he might have said, with truth, that although Sibelius as a composer had been known for more than a quarter of a century in at least one country "outside Finland" long before Mr. Gray's vivacious monograph appeared in 1931, it took the average concert-goer a good many years to appreciate the more characteristic music of Sibelius. It might astonish Mr. Frank to know that long before Mr. Gray was ever heard of, a penetrating and courageous American critic began to hammer into the heads of the dull and the obdurate his conviction that Sibelius was a great composer.

As long ago as the first year of the War, when the Fourth Symphony was new, and when less intelligent critics were comparing it with "the ravings of a drunken man." Mr. Olin Downes, then a ministrant to the Bostonians, wrote and published a searching and eloquent article about the forbidding novelty. No one in the English-speaking countries, with the possible exception of such pioneering conductors as Thomas, Muck, Damrosch, Stokowski, and Koussevitzky, has done more than Olin Downes to make the American music-lover ashamed of being deaf and dumb in the presence of the great creative imagination that has finally come to dominate the music of our time.

(Continued from preceding page)

* * *

Jean Sibelius will be seventy-one years old on Tuesday of this week. He was born at Tavastehus December 8, 1865. It is pleasant to reflect that more than a generation ago, music by Sibelius, then an almost unknown composer of thirty-six, was placed upon a program of the Chicago Orchestra, Theodore Thomas conductor, in the old Auditorium at Chicago, and, a few weeks later, on a program of the Philharmonic Society of New York, then directed by Emil Paur. The same work had been chosen for both performances. It was "Lemminkäinen's Home-Coming," a "legend for orchestra" based on an episode from the Finnish national epic, the "Kalevala." The music was announced as "new" (it had been completed about five years before). The composer, too, was "new." But the annotator of the program for the Chicago performance of December 6-7, 1901, was encouraging. "Sibelius," he wrote, "is a name which bids fair to become famous in musical circles."

A wild guess, but a good one.

N. TONAWANDA, N. Y.
EVENING NEWS

DEC 5 - 1936

SYMPHONY IS WELL RECEIVED

Masterpiece Of Italian Composer Which Vanished More Than Century Ago, Given Life By Boston Orchestra

Boston, Dec. 5 (U.P.)—Music lovers hailed today the long-lost Italian masterpiece, "Symphony in D Major" by Muzio Clementi, brought to life in America by the Boston Symphony orchestra last night in a premier cheered by 2,500 listeners.

The symphony, composed in 1817 but never published, vanished mysteriously more than a century ago. Clementi died in England in 1832 at the age of 80.

Sleuthing Successful

After remarkable sleuthing, Alfredo Caella, Italian composer, reassembled the masterpiece two years ago. He proved that an incomplete symphony in the library of congress could be completed by adding as its opening movement a fragment that had lain in the British museum since 1871 without its real identity having been established.

Casella presented the symphony at Rome last January, but the Boston orchestra was the first major symphony orchestra to give it life. Dr. Serge Kaussevitzky, conductor, disclosed during his intermission last night that a great granddaughter of Clementi lives in New York.

Kaussevitzky read a telegram from Clementi Pitman, Bronxville, N. Y., expressing "best wishes for the Clementi."

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

DEC 5 - 1936

Music and The Drama

BOSTON AUDIENCE ACCLAIMS LONG-LOST SYMPHONY REVIVED BY DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

[illegible]

[illegible] of them had been printed and the [illegible] dropped from [illegible] knowledge.

In [illegible] Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar died and in a chest in his attic were found a bundle of Clementi manuscripts, [illegible] in utter disorder. How they came into Dr. Cummings' possession still remains a mystery.

The Library of Congress of the United States purchased the manu[illegible] attempted to [illegible] Alfredo Casella, noted Italian composer-pianist [illegible] completed four symphonies [illegible] British [illegible] These had lain in [illegible]

[illegible] Dr. [illegible] message ex[illegible] from Mrs. [illegible] Pitman, of Bronxville [illegible] she was a [illegible] grand-daughter of Clementi.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
AGE HERALD

A.P. DEC 5 - 1936

OLD SYMPHONY HEARD

Boston Orchestra Plays Work Lost For 100 Years

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

DEC 5 - 1936

BOSTON SYMPH HERE ON TUE

Beethoven Fifth on Orchestra Local Group, Franco Autori to Play Sunday Even

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY comes back with the Beethoven Fifth when he brings the Boston Symphony orchestra here next Tuesday evening. The Fifth is the favorite of the Beethoven nine, and the Koussevitzky performance now is familiar locally. The first time he offered it here was on the occasion of his first visit to Buffalo with the Boston organization. Tuesday evening's concert in Elmwood Music hall will be the fourth in the present Zorah B. Berry series.

The complete program reads:

1
Overture, The Roman Carnival... Berlioz
Prelude to Lohengrin.......... ..Wagner
Scherzo in G Minor (from Octet Opus 20).......... Mendelssohn
Divertimento (from Le Baiser de la Fee)..............Stravinsky
Allegorical Ballet
  1. Sinfonia
  2. Danses Suisses: Valse
  3. Schsrzo
  4. Pas de deus
Adagio—Variations—Coda
2
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Opus No. 67...............Beethoven
  Allegro con brio
  Andante con moto
  Allegro: Trio
  Allegro

* * *

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

[illegible]

Boston Hears Lost Symphony

Composed More Than Century Ago by Clementi.

BOSTON, Dec. 5 (U.P.)—Music lovers hailed today the long-lost Italian masterpiece, "Symphony in D Major" by Muzio Clementi, brought to live in America by the Boston Symphony orchestra last night in a premiere cheered by 2500 listeners.

The symphony, composed in 1817 but never published, vanished mysteriously more than a century ago. Clementi died in England in 1832 at the age of 80.

After remarkable sleuthing, Alfredo Caella, Italian composer, reassembled the masterpiece two years ago. He proved that an incomplete symphony in the Library of Congress could be completed by adding as its opening movement a fragment that had lain in the British museum since 1871 without its real identity having been established.

Catella presented the symphony at Rome last January, but the Boston orchestra was the first major symphony orchestra to give it life.

117

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE

DEC 5 - 1936

Famous Boston Orchestra Will be Heard Soon

Of interest to Niagara Falls music-lovers is the concert which will be presented in Buffalo by the Boston Symphony orchestra next Tuesday night. The orchestra will be under the leadership of the great Koussevitsky.

At the end of the coming April, the Boston Symphony orchestra will bring to a close the fifty-sixth season of its illustrious history, and the thirteenth under the conductorship of its Russian leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. In 1900 Symphony Hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to a unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. The term of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began in 1924 and has extended beyond any single term of a previous conductor. The long association of such an orchestra and such a leader is eloquently justified by the results. The great Russian conductor has brought new beauties to the Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and dintinction reflected in the greatly enlarged circle, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the conductorship of Dr. Koussevitzky, will play in Elmwood Music Hall, Buffalo, Tuesday evening, December 8, the concert being the fourth in the series sponsored by Mrs. Zorah B. Berry. The orchestra will be heard in the following program:

1.
Overture, "The Roman Carnival" .... Berlioz
Prelude to "Lohengrin"...... Wagner
Scherzo in G Mino.r.... Mendelssohn
(From Octet, Opus 20)
Divertimento (from "Le Baiser de la Fee) .... Stravinsky
Allegorical Ballet
1. Sinfonia
2. Danses Suisses: Valse
3. Scherzo
4. Pas de deus
Adagio—Variations—Coda
2.
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor Opus No. 67 .... Beethoven
Allegro con broi
Adante con moto
Allegro: Trio
Allegro

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

[illegible] 36

Symphony Lost for Century Played First Time in U. S.

Traditionally staid Hub audience cheers work of Muzio Clementi

Boston, Mass., Dec. 4 (AP)—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Its performance by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky won warm applause from a traditionally staid Hud audience.

Written sometime between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed was melodious, beautiful and individual.

Beaming at friends in his quarters after the performance, Dr. Koussevitzky happily predicted the opus in D Major was bound to become "an indispensible part of the standard repertoire."

"It will be played soon by everybody," he asserted enthusiastically. "I'm going to play it in New York on the next trip."

"It is a beautiful work. And that third movement, the minuetto, it is not like a minuetto one would expect to have been written at that period. It is certainly individual."

The symphony helps fill in a 100-year gap in musical history. Clementi, a contemporary of Beethoven, was widely recognized for his piano sonatas, some of which were held in high esteem by the great German master.

But he also was known through yellowed newspaper and magazine clippings to have written about twenty symphonies, widely popular in their day.

Yet, Clementi died near London in 1832, bequeathing his large estates and all his manuscripts to his widow, none of the symphonic scores could be found. Only two of them had been printed, and the others dropped from public knowledge.

In 1917, Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder. How they came in Mr. Cummings' possession still remains a mystery.

The Libraary of Congress of the United States purchased the manuscripts at public auction soon after, and musicologists attempted to weave them together. Alfredo Casella, noted Italian composer-pianist-scholar, completed four symphonies by his own filling-in, and with the aid of fragementary manuscripts that inexplicably had come into the possession of the British Museum in 1871. These had lain in dusty oblivion for years, catalogued as "sketches."

Dr. Koussevitzky described Casella's revision as "magnificent."

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 5 - 1936

MUSICAL EVENTS

Novelties, Some of Them New

ACCORDING to a friendly dictionary, a novelty doesn't necessarily have to be something new, so it's probably all right to say that there have been half a dozen new and ancient novelties performed in Carnegie Hall in the recent orchestral excitements by the Philharmonic-Symphony, Philadelphia, and Boston bands. Four of the novelties were contemporary, and the two others were by a couple of relatively neglected composers named Mozart and Schubert.

The first current novelty in the parade was "Les Offrandes Oubliées," which had its début in Paris in 1931, and received its introduction to New York society from Mr. Koussevitzky at the first of the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall Saturday matinées. The composer, Olivier Messiaen, tried to translate into music a religious sentiment which may be summarized by titles once attached to the three divisions of the work—"La Croix," "Le Péché," "L'Eucharistie." It would have taken a Bach—in fact, The Bach—to accomplish what M. Messiaen attempted, and since one can't light into any young composer for not being in the Bach stratum, it's enough to note that M. Messiaen writes sincerely and with a good command of scoring. Probably we haven't heard the last of M. Messiaen, although it isn't likely that we'll hear more of the composition which brought his name into the Carnegie Hall programs.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

DEC 5 - 1936

LOST SYMPHONY GIVEN HEARING

Work by Muzio Clementi Is Played by Boston Orchestra

BOSTON, Dec. 4 (AP)—Lost for a

Lansing [illegible] Mich.
News

DEC 3 - 1936

Symphony Orchestra Plays at Ann Arbor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of approximately one hundred and ten players, will be heard for the thirteenth time in Ann Arbor in Hill Auditorium, in the Choral Union Concert Series, Thursday evening, December 10.

This distinguished organization was heard in this series several times during the nineties and on intermtitent occasons in later years. Since 1931, however, it has been heard annually in Hill Auditorium. Dr. Koussevitzky has brought this orchestra with its distinguished record of past accomplishments to a high state of perfection. On the occasion of its coming appearance, Dr. Koussevitzky has invited Joseph Brinkman of the piano faculty, to appear as soloist.

SPOKANE, WASH.
CHRONICLE

[illegible] 1936

BACK BAY HEARS LOST SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Dec. 5. (AP)—Lost for a century, the D Major Symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America Friday at the hands of the Boston symphony orchestra. Its performance by Conductor Serge Kossevitzky won warm applause from a traditionally staid hub audience.

Written some time between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed was melodious, beautiful and individual.

The symphony helps fill in a 100-year gap in musical history. Clementi, a contemporary of Beethoven, was widely recognized for his piano sonatas, some of which were held in high esteem by the great German master.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES

[illegible] 1936

Lost Symphony Played in America

BOSTON, Dec. 4. (AP)—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Written some time between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed, was melodious, beautiful and individual.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

ON THE RECORDS

By MICHAEL SHAW, JR.

SINCE FRITZ KREISLER

Via Orchestra " ... recordi

ARTHUR FIEDLER and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra steadily add to their string. Leading in interest is Mendelssohn's arrangement of the Scherzo from his String Octet which Kousevitky and his parent organization will play here next Sunday. On the reverse is the skeenteenth waxing of Schubert's "Marche Militaire," this time in Glazounow's orchestration (Victor 11947). The "Pops" also swirl through "Dagger Dance," from Herbert's "Natoma" and Tschaikowsky's "Sleeping Beauty Waltz" (Victor 11932).

Peppy Overture

NOT THE LEAST of Rossini's virtues was the ability to write with a flare and the Overture to "La Cenerantola," a comic opera ranking close to his masterpiece, "The Barber of Se-

---

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXAMINER

DEC 5 - 1936

THE LOST SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra Plays Clementi Music

BOSTON, Dec. 4.—(AP)—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Written sometime between 1785 and 1824, the music was melodious, beautiful and individual, critics agreed.

When Clementi died near London in 1832, bequeathing his large estates and all his manuscripts to his widow, none of the symphonic scores could be found. In 1917, Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts. The Library of Congress of the United States purchased the manuscripts at public auction soon after.

OMAHA, NEB.
Evening World-Herald

DEC 5 - 1936

Lost Symphony Given First Hearing in U. S.

Boston, Mass., Dec. 4 (AP).—

sible part of the standard reper

BINGHAMTON, N. Y.
PRESS

DEC 5 - 1936

MUS. [illegible]OVERS HAIL LONG LOST ITALIAN MASTERPIECE OF '17

2,500 Listeners Cheer Premiere of Clementi Symphony in Boston

Boston, Dec. 5—(United Press) Music lovers hailed today the long-lost Italian masterpiece, "Symphony In D Major" by Muzio Clementi, brought to life in America by the Boston symphony orchestra last night in a premiere cheered by 2,500 listeners.

The symphony, composed in 1817 but never published, vanished mysteriously more than a century ago. Signor Clementi died in England in 1832 at the age of 80.

After remarkable sleuthing, Alfredo Caella, Italian composer reassembled the masterpiece two years ago. He proved that an incomplete symphony in the Library of Congress could be completed by adding as its opening movement a fragment that had lain in the British museum since 1871 without its real identity having been established.

Signor Casella presented the symphony at Rome last January, but the Boston orchestra was the first major symphony orchestra to give it life. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, disclosed during his intermission last night that a great granddaughter of Signor Clementi lives in New York.

DEC 6 - 1936

Symphony Lost For Century Wins Plaudits At Hearing

it for amed
, re-erica oston isse-

itzky, conductor, won warm applause from a traditionally staid Hub audience.

Written some time between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed, was melodious, beautiful, and individual.

Beaming at friends in his quarters after the performance, Dr. Koussevitzky happily predicted the opus in D major was bound to become "an indispensable part of the standard repertoire."

"It will be played soon by everybody," he asserted enthusiastically. "I'm going to play it in New York on the next trip."

"It is a beautiful work. And that third movement, the minuetto, it is not like a minuetto one would expect to have been written at that period. It is certainly individual."

The symphony helps fill in a 100-year gap in musical history. Clementi, a contemporary of Beethoven, was widely recognized for his piano sonatas, some of which were held in high esteem by the great German master.

But he also was known through yellowed newspaper and magazine clippings to have written about 20 symphonies, widely popular in their day.

Yet, when Clementi died near London in 1832, bequeathing his large estates and all his manuscripts to his widow, none of the symphonic scores could be found. Only two of them had been printed, and the others dropped from public knowledge.

In 1917, Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder. How they came into Dr. Cummings' possession still remains a mystery.

The Library of Congress of the United States purchased the manuscripts at public auction soon after, and musicologists attempted to weave them together. Alfredo Casella, noted Italian composer-pianist-scholar, completed four symphonies by his own filling-in and with the aid of fragmentary manuscripts that inexplicably had come into the possession of the British museum in 1871. These had lain in dusty oblivion for years, cataloged as "sketches."

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SUNDAY AMERICAN

Theater Parties Planned

The theater will draw brilliant gatherings of Rochester's elite this week as the Eastman Theater offers the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor tomorrow evening and Fritz Kreisler, beloved violinist, on Friday evening. The same evening, the Walter Hustons, who established themselves through their performances in "Dodsworth" as one of America's foremost acting teams return to Rochester in Max Gordon's presentation of "Othello," at the Masonic Auditorium.

Among those who have made reservations for the Boston Symphony concert, which will open with the Haydn Symphony No. 102, are Mrs. Jacob Rosenberg, Mr. and Mrs. Harry F. Leiter, Mr. and Mrs. M. J. Baum, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Klonick, Mr. and Mrs. D. M. Beach, Carl F. Lomb, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Fitch.

117

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE

DEC 5 - 1936

Famous Boston Orchestra Will be Heard Soon

Of interest to Niagara Falls music-lovers is the concert which will be presented in Buffalo by the Boston Symphony orchestra next Tuesday night. The orchestra will be under the leadership of the great Koussevitsky.

At the end of the coming April, the Boston Symphony orchestra will bring to a close the fifty-sixth season of its illustrious history, and the thirteenth under the conductorship of its Russian leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. In 1900 Symphony Hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to a unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. The term of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began in 1924 and has extended beyond any single term of a previous conductor. The long association of such an orchestra and such a leader is eloquently justified by the results. The great Russian conductor has brought new beauties to the Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and dintinction reflected in the greatly enlarged circle, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the conductorship of Dr. Koussevitzky, will play in Elmwood Music Hall, Buffalo, Tuesday evening, December 8, the concert being the fourth in the series sponsored by Mrs. Zorah B. Berry. The orchestra will be heard in the following program:

1.

Overture, "The Roman Carnival" .... Berlioz
Prelude to "Lohengrin"......Wagner
Scherzo in G Mino.r....Mendelssohn
(From Octet, Opus 20)
Divertimento (from "Le Baiser de la Fee) ....Stravinsky
Allegorical Ballet
1. Sinfonia
2. Danses Suisses: Valse
3. Scherzo
4. Pas de deus
Adagio—Variations—Coda

2.

Symphony No. 5 in C Minor Opus No. 67 ....Beethoven
Allegro con broi
Adante con moto
Allegro: Trio
Allegro

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

DEC 5 - 1936

Symphony Lost for Century Played First Time in U. S.

Traditionally staid Hub audience cheers work of Muzio Clementi

Boston, Mass., Dec. 4 (AP)—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Its performance by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky won warm applause from a traditionally staid Hud audience.

Written sometime between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed was melodious, beautiful and individual.

Beaming at friends in his quarters after the performance, Dr. Koussevitzky happily predicted the opus in D Major was bound to become "an indispensible part of the standard repertoire."

"It will be played soon by everybody," he asserted enthusiastically. "I'm going to play it in New York on the next trip."

"It is a beautiful work. And that third movement, the minuetto, it is not like a minuetto one would expect to have been written at that period. It is certainly individual."

The symphony helps fill in a 100-year gap in musical history. Clementi, a contemporary of Beethoven, was widely recognized for his piano sonatas, some of which were held in high esteem by the great German master.

But he also was known through yellowed newspaper and magazine clippings to have written about twenty symphonies, widely popular in their day.

Yet, Clementi died near London in 1832, bequeathing his large estates and all his manuscripts to his widow, none of the symphonic scores could be found. Only two of them had been printed, and the others dropped from public knowledge.

In 1917, Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder. How they came in Mr. Cummings' possession still remains a mystery.

The Libraary of Congress of the United States purchased the manuscripts at public auction soon after, and musicologists attempted to weave them together. Alfredo Casella, noted Italian composer-pianist-scholar, completed four symphonies by his own filling-in, and with the aid of fragementary manuscripts that inexplicably had come into the possession of the British Museum in 1871. These had lain in dusty oblivion for years, catalogued as "sketches."

Dr. Koussevitzky described Casella's revision as "magnificent."

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 5 - 1936

MUSICAL EVENTS

Novelties, Some of Them New

ACCORDING to a friendly dictionary, a novelty doesn't necessarily have to be something new, so it's probably all right to say that there have been half a dozen new and ancient novelties performed in Carnegie Hall in the recent orchestral excitements by the Philharmonic-Symphony, Philadelphia, and Boston bands. Four of the novelties were contemporary, and the two others were by a couple of relatively neglected composers named Mozart and Schubert.

The first current novelty in the parade was "Les Offrandes Oubliées," which had its début in Paris in 1931, and received its introduction to New York society from Mr. Koussevitzky at the first of the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall Saturday matinées. The composer, Olivier Messiaen, tried to translate into music a religious sentiment which may be summarized by titles once attached to the three divisions of the work—"La Croix," "Le Péché," "L'Eucharistie." It would have taken a Bach—in fact, The Bach—to accomplish what M. Messiaen attempted, and since one can't light into any young composer for not being in the Bach stratum, it's enough to note that M. Messiaen writes sincerely and with a good command of scoring. Probably we haven't heard the last of M. Messiaen, although it isn't likely that we'll hear more of the composition which brought his name into the Carnegie Hall programs.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

DEC 5 - 1936

LOST SYMPHONY GIVEN HEARING

Work by Muzio Clementi Is Played by Boston Orchestra

BOSTON, Dec. 4 (AP)—Lost for a

Lansing - Mich
News

DEC 3 - 1936

Symphony Orchestra Plays at Ann Arbor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of approximately one hundred and ten players, will be heard for the thirteenth time in Ann Arbor in Hill Auditorium, in the Choral Union Concert Series, Thursday evening, December 10.

This distinguished organization was heard in this series several times during the nineties and on intermtitent occasons in later years. Since 1931, however, it has been heard annually in Hill Auditorium. Dr. Koussevitzky has brought this orchestra with its distinguished record of past accomplishments to a high state of perfection. On the occasion of its coming appearance, Dr. Koussevitzky has invited Joseph Brinkman of the piano faculty, to appear as soloist.

SPOKANE, WASH.
CHRONICLE

DEC 5 - 1936

BACK BAY HEARS LOST SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Dec. 5. (AP)—Lost for a century, the D Major Symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America Friday at the hands of the Boston symphony orchestra. Its performance by Conductor Serge Kossevitzky won warm applause from a traditionally staid hub audience.

Written some time between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed was melodious, beautiful and individual.

The symphony helps fill in a 100-year gap in musical history. Clementi, a contemporary of Beethoven, was widely recognized for his piano sonatas, some of which were held in high esteem by the great German master.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES

DEC 5 - 1936

Lost Symphony Played in America

BOSTON, Dec. 4. (AP)—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Written some time between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed, was melodious, beautiful and individual.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

STANLEY
Continuous from 2 P. M.
GENE RAYMOND ANN SOTHERN

SINCE FRITZ KREISLE

Via Orchestra

ARTHUR FIEDLER and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra steadily add to their string. Leading in interest is Mendelssohn's arrangement of the Scherzo from his String Octet which Kousševitky and his parent organization will play here next Sunday. On the reverse is the skeenteenth waxing of Schubert's "Marche Militaire," this time in Glazounow's orchestration (Victor 11947). The "Pops" also swirl through "Dagger Dance," from Herbert's "Natoma" and Tschaikowsky's "Sleeping Beauty Waltz" (Victor 11932).

Peppy Overture

NOT THE LEAST of Rossini's virtues was the ability to write with a flare and the Overture to "La Cenerantola," a comic opera ranking close to his masterpiece, "The Barber of Se-

---

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXAMINER

DEC 5 - 1936

THE LOST SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra Plays Clementi Music

BOSTON, Dec. 4.—(AP)—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Written sometime between 1785 and 1824, the music was melodious, beautiful and individual, critics agreed.

When Clementi died near London in 1832, bequeathing his large estates and all his manuscripts to his widow, none of the symphonic scores could be found. In 1917, Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts. The Library of Congress of the United States purchased the manuscripts at public auction soon after.

OMAHA, NEB.
Evening World-Herald

DEC 5 - 1936

Lost Symphony Given First Hearing in U. S.

Boston, Mass., Dec. 4 (AP).— | sible part of the standard reper-

---

BINGHAMTON, N. Y.
PRESS

DEC 5 - 1936

MUS. LOVERS HAIL LONG LOST ITALIAN MASTERPIECE OF '17

2,500 Listeners Cheer Premiere of Clementi Symphony in Boston

Boston, Dec. 5—(United Press)—Music lovers hailed today the long-lost Italian masterpiece, "Symphony In D Major" by Muzio Clementi, brought to life in America by the Boston symphony orchestra last night in a premiere cheered by 2,500 listeners.

The symphony, composed in 1817 but never published, vanished mysteriously more than a century ago. Signor Clementi died in England in 1832 at the age of 80.

After remarkable sleuthing, Alfredo Caella, Italian composer reassembled the masterpiece two years ago. He proved that an incomplete symphony in the Library of Congress could be completed by adding as its opening movement a fragment that had lain in the British museum since 1871 without its real identity having been established.

Signor Casella presented the symphony at Rome last January, but the Boston orchestra was the first major symphony orchestra to give it life. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, disclosed during his intermission last night that a great granddaughter of Signor Clementi lives in New York.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SUNDAY AMERICAN

Theater Parties Planned

Dec. 6/36

The theater will draw brilliant gatherings of Rochester's elite this week as the Eastman Theater offers the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor tomorrow evening and Fritz Kreisler, beloved violinist, on Friday evening. The same evening, the Walter Hustons, who established themselves through their performances in "Dodsworth" as one of America's foremost acting teams return to Rochester in Max Gordon's presentation of "Othello," at the Masonic Auditorium.

Among those who have made reservations for the Boston Symphony concert, which will open with the Haydn Symphony No. 102, are Mrs. Jacob Rosenberg, Mr. and Mrs. Harry F. Leiter, Mr. and Mrs. M. J. Baum, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Klonick, Mr. and Mrs. D. M. Beach, Carl F. Lomb, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Fitch.

Phoenix Ariz
Republic

DEC 6 - 1936

Symphony Lost For Century Wins Plaudits At Hearing

BOSTON, Dec. 5.—(AP)—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Its performance by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, won warm applause from a traditionally staid Hub audience.

Written some time between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed, was melodious, beautiful, and individual.

Beaming at friends in his quarters after the performance, Dr. Koussevitzky happily predicted the opus in D major was bound to become "an indispensable part of the standard repertoire."

"It will be played soon by everybody," he asserted enthusiastically. "I'm going to play it in New York on the next trip."

"It is a beautiful work. And that third movement, the minuetto, it is not like a minuetto one would expect to have been written at that period. It is certainly individual."

The symphony helps fill in a 100-year gap in musical history. Clementi, a contemporary of Beethoven, was widely recognized for his piano sonatas, some of which were held in high esteem by the great German master.

But he also was known through yellowed newspaper and magazine clippings to have written about 20 symphonies, widely popular in their day.

Yet, when Clementi died near London in 1832, bequeathing his large estates and all his manuscripts to his widow, none of the symphonic scores could be found. Only two of them had been printed, and the others dropped from public knowledge.

In 1917, Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder. How they came into Dr. Cummings' possession still remains a mystery.

The Library of Congress of the United States purchased the manuscripts at public auction soon after, and musicologists attempted to weave them together. Alfredo Casella, noted Italian composer-pianist-scholar, completed four symphonies by his own filling-in, and with the aid of fragmentary manuscripts that inexplicably had come into the possession of the British museum in 1871. These had lain in dusty oblivion for years, cataloged as "sketches."

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SUNDAY AMERICAN

DEC 6 - 1936

Boston Symphony Is Due Tomorrow

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra come to the Eastman Theater tomorrow evening for a single performance. A capacity house will be on hand to greet them.

Dr. Kaussevitzky will open his program with the Haydn Symphony No. 102. which has not been heard here in several seasons. This will be followed by "La Mer," by Debussey. The program will close with the Brahms Symphony No. 1.

Th orchestra is making a tour of eight cities, of which Rochester is the first to be visited. Its schedule calls for subsequent appearances in Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Pittsburgh and Cambridge.

The complete personnel, numbering 115 men, will be heard tomorrow evening.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
UTAH TRIBUNE

- 1936

'Cello Recital

OGDEN — Gregor Piatigorsky, who has been designated as "the greatest exponent of the cello today," will appear under the auspices of the Ogden Community Concert association at the tabernacle on Friday at 8:30 p. m. Here in Utah, where a world-famed cellist is seldom heard, he will be welcomed as an outstanding artist in a series of great artists.

Piatigorsky divides his concert seasons between Europe and America, playing half the winter abroad, half in this country. Ogden is deemed especially fortunate in securing him for a concert this season. Members of the Salt Lake Civic association are invited to attend.

Both here and on the continent this artist is a particular favorite with conductors and he has played repeatedly with all the great orchestras of the world. During six visits to the United States he has made 57 appearances with such organizations as the following: Chicago Symphony, Boston Symphony, New York Philharmonic Symphony, National orchestra, New York City; Cleveland orchestra, and with orchestras in the following cities: Cincinnati, Detroit, Philadelphia, San Francisco, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, and Toronto, Canada.

Last season he gave the world premiere of Castelnuovo-Tedesco's violoncello concerto with the New

Ogden Event

York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, under Toscanini's conductorship, and of Berezowski's "Concerto Lirico" with the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky. The former work is dedicated to Piatigorsky.

The program for the Friday concert, with Valentin Pavlovsky as accompanist, is given as follows:

Toccata .... Frescobaldi
onata in A major, Op. 69 .... Beethoven
(For piano and cello)
Allegro
Scherzo
Adagio-Allegro
onata .... Francoeur
Adagio
Gavotte
Vivo
INTERMISSION
zigane ....
icilienne .... Ravel
argo and Rondo ..... M. T. de Paradis
octurne in C sharp minor .... Weber
(Op. posthumous) .... Chopin
ance of Terror .... De Falla

LIVINGSTON, MONT.
ENTERPRISE

DEC 6 - 1936

Symphony Lost for Century Played By Boston Orchestra

BOSTON, Dec. 5.—(AP)—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America yesterday at the hands of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Its performance by Conductor Serge Kossevitzky won warm applause from a traditionally staid Hub audience.

The symphony helps fill in a 100-year gap in musical history. Clementi, a contemporary of Beethoven, was widely recognized for his piano sonatas, some of which were held in high esteem by he great German master.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

DEC 6 - 1936

MUSIC FOR WEEK

Koussevitzky, Casadesus Due Here

By J. FRED LISSFELT

TWO different concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on successive days—Saturday evening and next Sunday afternoon—should attract every music lover in this vicinity. They are among the most important occasions in this season's music.

Mr. Lissfelt

Every opinion one meets regarding Serge Koussevitzky and his players corroborates what we know and revere about them.

Many works on these programs are well known to us all. Stravinsky's brief "Divertimento" from his ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee" is new here, though it antedates his latest idiom. To hear Beethoven's favored "Fifth Symphony" played under rather ideal conditions will be another milestone in our music. The complete Saturday program:

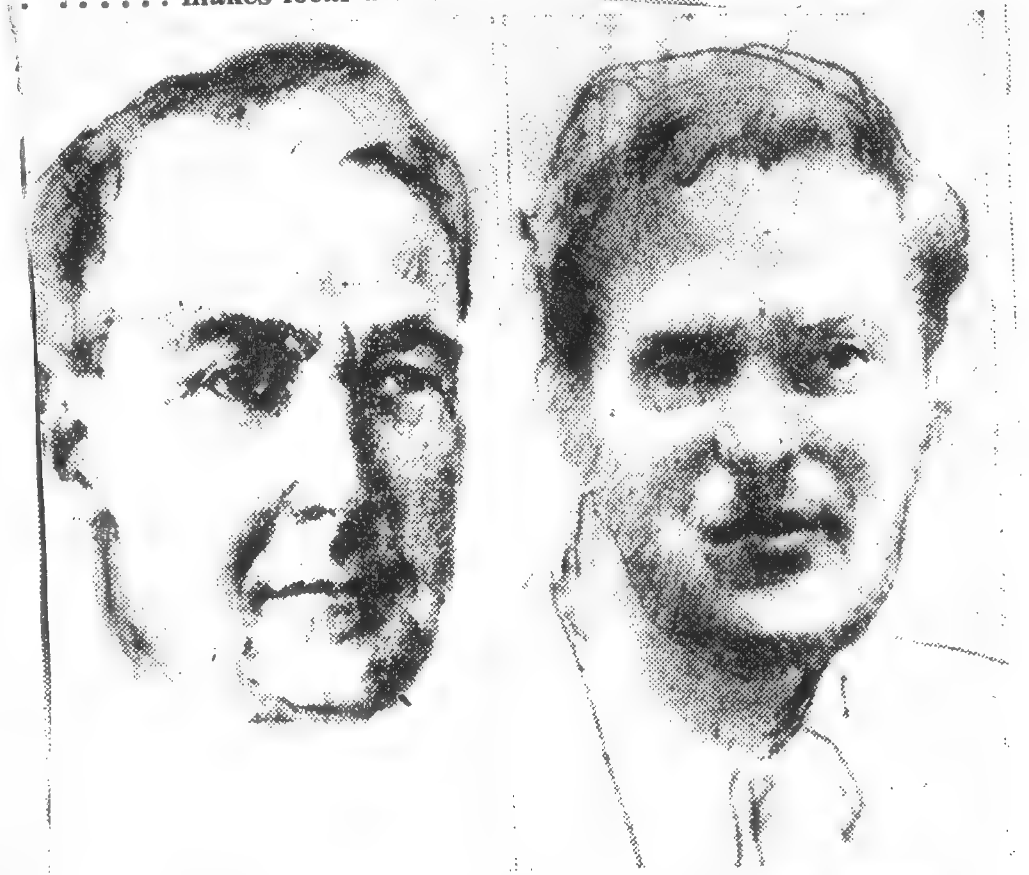
Symphony in C major No. 34 .... Mozart
Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fee" .... Stravinsky
Symphony in D Minor .... Franck

The following afternoon the program, which starts at 3 p. m., will be:

Concerto Grosso for string orchestra .... Handel
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Scherzo in G Minor, from the Octet, Op. 20 .... Mendelssohn
"Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 2..Ravel
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor..Beethoven

CONCERT HIGHLIGHTS

. . . . . . makes local debut



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY RICHARD BURGIN

Pencil sketches by Gerome Brush of famous conductor, now entering 13th year at helm of Boston Symphony, and his concert master, a pupil of Joachim and Auer, who has been head of the organization's remarkable string section since 1920. The Bostonians give concerts here next Saturday and Sunday.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 6 - 1936

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Directs Boston Symphony In Concert Here Tuesday

Buffalo's Federal Project Orchestra Gives All-Operatic Program Tonight; Alene McKenna's Work Lauded at San Diego; High School Girl Gives Recital

By MARY M. HOWARD
Times Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be the fourth attraction in the Zorah B. Berry concert series. The orchestra will play Tuesday evening in Elmwood Music Hall.

An all-operatic program has been arranged by Franco Autori, conductor for tonight's concert in Shea's Court St. Theater by the Symphony Orchestra of the Federal Music Project. The soloist will be Paola Autori, soprano. Mrs. Autori has had operatic as well as concert experience here and abroad. She was chosen by Mascagni to sing a leading role in his opera, "L'Amico Fritz," under his personal direction. She has appeared in various other operas.

Tuesday's Program

The program Tuesday night by the Boston Symphony in which the Stravinsky work is almost a novelty, follows:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival" ..... Berlioz
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Scherzo in G minor .... Mendelssohn
(From Octet, Opus 20)
Divertimento (from "Le Baiser de la Fee") .... Stravinsky
Allegorical Ballet.
Sinfonia; Danses Suisses: Valse; Scherzo; Pas de deus. Adagio—Variations—Coda.
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus No. 67 .... Beethoven
Allegro con brio; Andante con moto; Allegro: Trio; Allegro.

Tonight's Program

Tonight's program by the Federal Music project orchestra follows:

Overture to "Marriage of Figaro" .... Mozart
(a) Aria: "Non so piu," from "Marriage of Figaro" .... Mozart
(b) Aria: "Dich, teure Halle," "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Mme. Paola Autori.
Siegfried's Rhine Journey, from "Gotterdammerung" .... Wagner
Prelude and Love-Death, from "Tristan and Isolde" .... Wagner
Prelude to the fourth act of "La Triaviata" .... Verdi
Aria: "Tacea la notte placida," from "Il Trovatore" .... Verdi
Mme. Autori.
Overture to Sicilian Vespers .... Verdi

ILE WOMEN GIVE SHOW ON DEC. 19

GROSSE ILE, Dec. 5.

The night of December 10 Mr. and Mrs. Reginald Leggette, Mr. and Mrs. Hale Knight, Mr. and Mrs. Rufus Knight of Detroit, Mr. and Mrs. Clifford Ward and Mr. and Mrs. H. F. Roderick will motor to Ann Arbor for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Joseph Brinkman, a brother-in-law of Mr. Leggette, will be the concert pianist for that evening.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

* * *

Among those to motor to Ann Arbor the evening of Dec. 10 to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Joseph Brinkman of the School of Music as soloist, are his brother and sister-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Reginald E. Leggette, Mr. and Mrs. Hale G. Knight, Mr. and Mrs. Clifford C. Ward and Mr. and Mrs. H. F. Roderick.

* * *

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SUNDAY AMERICAN

Symphonic Sympathy

Boston Orchestra's Advent Gives Rise to Thoughts of Shooting Peas in Cannon

By David Kessler

Within the space of the next five days, three of the most significant events of the local music season will transpire.

The busy week begins with the Boston Symphony, probably the world's greatest orchestra, tomorrow night at the Eastman. Thursday will bring the first of the season's Amerind ark ritz ast- is, stra. this the ying. s of oped . In or- truly ne.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

DEC 6 - 1936

Conductor

Serge Kousseirtzky, world famous musician and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which ~~will~~ give a concert in Elmwood Music Hall Tuesday evening.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

DEC 6 - 1936

Koussevitzky Will Direct Boston Symphony in City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, will play this program in the Masonic Temple at 8:30 p. m. Wednesday:

Handel .... Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in G-minor.
Sibelius .... Symphonic Fantasia, "Pohjola's Daughter."
Ravel .... Fragments from Daphne and Chloe," second suite.
INTERMISSION
Brahms .... Symphony No. 1, in C-minor

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

DEC 6 - 1936

MUSICAL OPUS, LOST CENTURY, MAKES BIG HIT

Symphony by Clementi Helps Fill in Gap in Musical History; Is Called Beautiful Work.

By Associated Press.

Boston, Dec. 5.—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America Friday at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Its performance by Conductor Serge Kossevitzky won warm applause from a traditionally staid Hub audience.

Written sometime between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed was melodious, beautiful and individual.

Beaming at friends in his quarters after the performance, Doctor Koussevitzky happily predicted the Opus in D Major was bound to become "an indispensible part of the standard repertoire."

"It will be played soon by everybody," he asserted enthusiastically. "I'm going to play it in New York on the next trip."

○ ○ ○

"Certainly Individual."

"It is a beautiful work. And that third movement, the minuetto, it is not like a minuetto one would expect to have been written at that period. It is certainly individual."

The symphony helps fill in a 100-year gap in musical history. Clementi, a contemporary of Beethoven, was widely recognized for his piano sonatas, some of which were held in high esteem by the great German master.

But he also was known through yellowed newspaper and magazine clippings to have written about 20 symphonies, widely popular in their day.

○ ○ ○

Dropped From Sight.

Yet, when Clementi died near London in 1832, bequeathing his large estates and all his manuscripts to his widow, none of the symphonic scores could be found. Only two of them had been printed, and the others dropped from public knowledge.

In 1917, Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder. How they came into Doctor Cummings' possession still remains a mystery.

The Library of Congress of the United States purchased the manuscripts at public auction soon after, and musicologists attempted to weave them together. Alfredo Casella, noted Italian composer-piano-scholar, completed four symphonies by his own filling-in, and with the aid of fragmentary manuscripts that inexplicably had come into the possession of the British Museum in 1871. These had lain in dusty oblivion for years, catalogued as "sketches."

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

DEC 6 - 1936

GODING WITH SYMPHONY IN MACDOWELL CONCERTO

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be absent this week on its western tour. It is to play in Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toledo, and Pittsburgh. Boston will hear Serge Koussevitzky and his men next on Friday and Saturday, December 18 and 19. That Friday being the seventy-fifth anniversary of the birth of Edward MacDowell to a day, Koussevitzky is remembering the occasion with the Second Piano Concerto. The soloist is to be Howard Goding, who made his first appearance with this orchestra in the same work, under Muck, in Cambridge. For prelude to the American concerto, there will be Arthur Foote's Suite in E major, Op. 63, for String orchestra. The Third Symphony of Brahms, in F major, will complete the programme.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SUNDAY AMERICAN

DEC 6 - 1936

Boston Symphony Is Due Tomorrow

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra come to the Eastman Theater tomorrow evening for a single performance. A capacity house will be on hand to greet them.

Dr. Kaussevitzky will open his program with the Haydn Symphony No. 102. which has not been heard here in several seasons. This will be followed by "La Mer," by Debussey. The program will close with the Brahms Symphony No. 1.

Th orchestra is making a tour of eight cities, of which Rochester is the first to be visited. Its schedule calls for subsequent appearances in Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Pittsburgh and Cambridge.

The complete personnel, numbering 115 men, will be heard tomorrow evening.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
UTAH TRIBUNE

1936

'Cello Recital

OGDEN — Gregor Piatigorsky, who has been designated as "the greatest exponent of the cello today," will appear under the auspices of the Ogden Community Concert association at the tabernacle on Friday at 8:30 p. m. Here in Utah, where a world-famed cellist is seldom heard, he will be welcomed as an outstanding artist in a series of great artists.

Piatigorsky divides his concert seasons between Europe and America, playing half the winter abroad, half in this country. Ogden is deemed especially fortunate in securing him for a concert this season. Members of the Salt Lake Civic association are invited to attend.

Both here and on the continent this artist is a particular favorite with conductors and he has played repeatedly with all the great orchestras of the world. During six visits to the United States he has made 57 appearances with such organizations as the following: Chicago Symphony, Boston Symphony, New York Philharmonic Symphony, National orchestra, New York City; Cleveland orchestra, and with orchestras in the following cities: Cincinnati, Detroit, Philadelphia, San Francisco, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, and Toronto, Canada.

Last season he gave the world premiere of Castelnuovo-Tedesco's violoncello concerto with the New

Ogden Event

York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, under Toscanini's conductorship, and of Berezowski's "Concerto Lirico" with the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky. The former work is dedicated to Piatigorsky.

The program for the Friday concert, with Valentin Pavlovsky as accompanist, is given as follows:

occata ....Frescobaldi
onata in A major, Op. 69 ...Beethoven
(For piano and cello)
Allegro
Scherzo
Adagio-Allegro
onata ....Francoeur
Adagio
Gavotte
Vivo
INTERMISSION
igane cilienne ....Ravel
argo and Rondo ......M. T. de Paradis
octurne in C sharp minor ....Weber
(Op. posthumous) ....Chopin
ance of Terror ....De Falla

LIVINGSTON, MONT.
ENTERPRISE

DEC 6 - 1936

Symphony Lost for Century Played By Boston Orchestra

BOSTON, Dec. 5.—(AP)—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America yesterday at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Its performance by Conductor Serge Kossevitzky won warm applause from traditionally staid Hub audience.

The symphony helps fill in a 100-year gap in musical history. Clementi, a contemporary of Beethoven, was widely recognized for his piano sonatas, some of which were held in high esteem by the great German master.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

DEC 6 - 1936

MUSIC FOR WEEK

Koussevitzky, Casadesus Due Here

By J. FRED LISSFELT

TWO different concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on successive days—Saturday evening and next Sunday afternoon—should attract every music lover in this vicinity. They are among the most important occasions in this season's music.

Mr. Lissfelt

Every opinion one meets regarding Serge Koussevitzky and his players corroborates what we know and revere about them.

Many works on these programs are well known to us all. Stravinsky's brief "Divertimento" from his ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee" is new here, though it antedates his latest idiom. To hear Beethoven's favored "Fifth Symphony" played under rather ideal conditions will be another milestone in our music. The complete Saturday program:

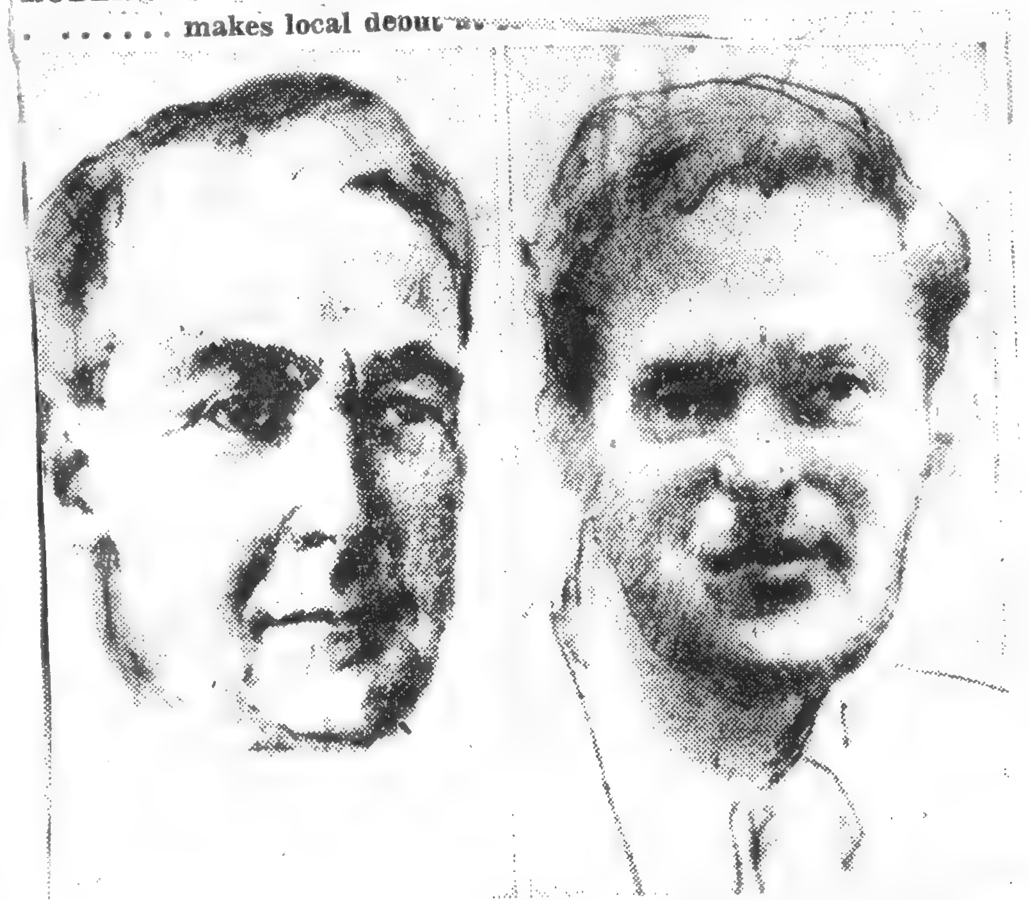
Symphony in C major No. 34....Mozart
Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fee" .... Stravinsky
Symphony in D Minor ....Franck

The following afternoon the program, which starts at 3 p. m., will be:

Concerto Grosso for string orchestra ....Handel
Prelude to "Lohengrin"..........Wagner
Scherzo in G Minor, from the Octet, Op. 20 ....Mendelssohn
"Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 2..Ravel
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor..Beethoven

CONCERT HIGHLIGHTS

ROBE... makes local debut ...



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY RICHARD BURGIN

Pencil sketches by Gerome Brush of famous conductor, now entering 13th year at helm of Boston Symphony, and his concert master, a pupil of Joachim and Auer, who has been head of the organization's remarkable string section since 1920. The Bostonians give concerts here next Saturday and Sunday.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 6 - 1936

E 5420
PURE DYE.

Bu
P

T
Ser
B. ever
A
Aut ... for tonight's concert in Shea's Court St. Theater by the Symphony Orchestra of the Federal Music Project. The soloist will be Paola Autori, soprano. Mrs. Autori has had operatic as well as concert experience here and abroad. She was chosen by Mascagni to sing a leading role in his opera, "L'Amico Fritz," under his personal direction. She has appeared in various other operas.

Tuesday's Program

The program Tuesday night by the Boston Symphony in which the Stravinsky work is almost a novelty, follows:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival".....Berlioz
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ....Wagner
Scherzo in G minor ....Mendelssohn
(From Octet, Opus 20)
Divertimento (from "Le Baiser de la Fee") .... Stravinsky
Allegorical Ballet.
Sinfonia; Danses Suisses: Valse; Scherzo; Pas de deus. Adagio—Variations—Coda.
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus No. 67 .... Beethoven
Allegro con brio; Andante con moto; Allegro: Trio; Allegro.

Tonight's Program

Tonight's program by the Federal Music project orchestra follows:

Overture to "Marriage of Figaro"....Mozart
(a) Aria: "Non so piu," from "Marriage of Figaro" ....Mozart
(b) Aria: "Dich, teure Halle," "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Mme. Paola Autori.
Siegfried's Rhine Journey, from "Gotterdammerung" .... Wagner
Prelude and Love-Death, from "Tristan and Isolde" .... Wagner
Prelude to the fourth act of "La Triaviata" .... Verdi
Aria: "Tacea la notte placida," from "Il Trovatore" ....Verdi
Mme. Autori.
Overture to Sicilian Vespers..........Verdi

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SUNDAY AMERICAN

Symphonic Sympathy

Boston Orchestra's Advent Gives Rise to Thoughts of Shooting Peas in Cannon

By David Kessler

Within the space of the next five days, three of the most significant events of the local music season will transpire.

The busy week begins with the Boston Symphony, probably the world's greatest orchestra, tomorrow night at the Eastman. Thursday will bring the first of the season's American Composers' concerts and the following night will mark the annual appearance of Fritz Kreisler in recital at the Eastman Theater.

Overshadowing the others is, of course, the Boston orchestra. Individually the members of this famed group are among the finest orchestral players living. Because of heir many years of teamwork, they have developed an almost perfect ensemble. In Dr. Serge Kaussevitzky, the orchestra has one of the truly great conductors of our time.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

DEC 6 - 1936

Conductor

Serge Kousseirtzky, world famous musician and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert in Elmwood Music Hall Tuesday evening.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

DEC 6 - 1936

ILE WOMEN GIVE SHOW ON DEC. 19

GROSSE ILE, Dec. 5.

The night of December 10 Mr. and Mrs. Reginald Leggette, Mr. and Mrs. Hale Knight, Mr. and Mrs. Rufus Knight of Detroit, Mr. and Mrs. Clifford Ward and Mr. and Mrs. H. F. Roderick will motor to Ann Arbor for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Joseph Brinkman, a brother-in-law of Mr. Leggette, will be the concert pianist for that evening.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

* * *

Among those to motor to Ann Arbor the evening of Dec. 10 to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Joseph Brinkman of the School of Music as soloist, are his brother and sister-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Reginald E. Leggette, Mr. and Mrs. Hale G. Knight, Mr. and Mrs. Clifford C. Ward and Mr. and Mrs. H. F. Roderick.

* * *

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

DEC 6 - 1936

Koussevitzky Will Direct Boston Symphony in City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, will play this program in the Masonic Temple at 8:30 p. m. Wednesday:

Handel ....Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in G-minor.
Sibelius............Symphonic Fantasia, "Pohjola's Daughter."
Ravel..................Fragments from Daphne and Chloe," second suite.
INTERMISSION
Brahms ....Symphony No. 1, in C-minor

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

DEC 6 - 1936

MUSICAL OPUS, LOST CENTURY, MAKES BIG HIT

Symphony by Clementi Helps Fill in Gap in Musical History; Is Called Beautiful Work.

By Associated Press.

Boston, Dec. 5.—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America Friday at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Its performance by Conductor Serge Kossevitzky won warm applause from a traditionally staid Hub audience.

Written sometime between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed was melodious, beautiful and individual.

Beaming at friends in his quarters after the performance, Doctor Koussevitzky happily predicted the Opus in D Major was bound to become "an indispensible part of the standard repertoire."

"It will be played soon by everybody," he asserted enthusiastically. "I'm going to play it in New York on the next trip."

○ ○ ○

"Certainly Individual."

"It is a beautiful work. And that third movement, the minuetto, it is not like a minuetto one would expect to have been written at that period. It is certainly individual."

The symphony helps fill in a 100-year gap in musical history. Clementi, a contemporary of Beethoven, was widely recognized for his piano sonatas, some of which were held in high esteem by the great German master.

But he also was known through yellowed newspaper and magazine clippings to have written about 20 symphonies, widely popular in their day.

○ ○ ○

Dropped From Sight.

Yet, when Clementi died near London in 1832, bequeathing his large estates and all his manuscripts to his widow, none of the symphonic scores could be found. Only two of them had been printed, and the others dropped from public knowledge.

In 1917, Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder. How they came into Doctor Cummings' possession still remains a mystery.

The Library of Congress of the United States purchased the manuscripts at public auction soon after, and musicologists attempted to weave them together. Alfredo Casella, noted Italian composer-piano-scholar, completed four symphonies by his own filling-in, and with the aid of fragmentary manuscripts that inexplicably had come into the possession of the British Museum in 1871. These had lain in dusty oblivion for years, catalogued as "sketches."

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

DEC 6 - 1936

GODING WITH SYMPHONY IN MACDOWELL CONCERTO

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be absent this week on its western tour. It is to play in Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toledo, and Pittsburgh. Boston will hear Serge Koussevitzky and his men next on Friday and Saturday, December 18 and 19. That Friday being the seventy-fifth anniversary of the birth of Edward MacDowell to a day, Koussevitzky is remembering the occasion with the Second Piano Concerto. The soloist is to be Howard Goding, who made his first appearance with this orchestra in the same work, under Muck, in Cambridge. For prelude to the American concerto, there will be Arthur Foote's Suite in E major, Op. 63, for String orchestra. The Third Symphony of Brahms, in F major, will complete the programme.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

h.g

DEC 6 - 1936

Great French Pianist And Boston Symphony Musical Attractions

Art Society Brings Robert Casadesus And Orchestra Group Sponsors Koussevitzky Appearance

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

MAJOR music events of the current week include a piano recital by Robert Casadesus, distinguished French musician, under Art Society auspices Tuesday night at Carnegie Music Hall, and the appearances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Dr. Serge Koussevitzy at Syria Mosque.

Mr. Lewando

Under Pittsburgh Orchestra Association auspices the Boston players will give different programs Saturday evening at 8:30 o'clock and Sunday afternon at 3.

The recital of Mr. Casadesus will be devoted to Beethoven's 32 Variations; Schumann's Carnaval; three Chopin works: Polonaise, opus 44; Berceuse, opus 57, and Tarantelle, opus 43; and Ravel's Jeux d'Eau, Forlane, and Toccata.

Born at Paris, Mr. Casadesus comes from a famous musical family. He entered the Paris Conservatory at 13, studied piano with Louis Diemer, a Liszt pupil, and won a first prize within a year. Later, as a student of Xavier Leroux, he gained first award in harmony. Subsequently, Casadesus annexed the coveted Diemer piano prize.

After an extensive concert tour across Europe, North Africa and South America, Casadesus came to America, making his first solo appearance at New York, Jan. 20, 1935, performing Mozart's "Coronation" concerto with the Philharmonic-Symphony.

* * *

The two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Dr. Koussevitzky will afford a rare experience for local lovers of symphonic music. In past seasons this surpassing orchestra under its brilliant leader has been heard but once each year, and the decision of the Orchestra Association's officers to sponsor two concerts is highly commendable.

Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen a different program for each performance. The Saturday night concert features Mozart's C-major symphony, No. 40 (Koechel 338); Stravinsky's Divertimento from his allegorical ballet in four scenes, "Le Baiser de la Fee" (The Fairy's Kiss); and Cesar Franck's D-minor symphony.

The Sunday afternoon program comprises Handel's G-minor concerto Grosso string orchestra, opus 6, No. 6; Prelude to Lohengrin, Wagner; Mendelssohn's own arrangement for orchestra of the Scherzo from his octet, opus 20; Ravel's 2nd Daphnis and Chloe Suite, and Beethoven's 5th symphony.

* * *

The Stravinsky Divertimento will be new to many. Therefore, coment on it might not be amiss.

"Le Baiser de la Fee," the ballet from which this orchestral number is derived, was composed by Stravinsky at the behest of Ida Rubinstein, the noted dancer, who desired another important work for her repertory. "The idea was that I should compose something inspired by the music of Tschaikowsky," writes Stravinsky in his autobiography (published by Simon and Shuster). An admirer of Tschaikowsky, together with the fact that Miss Rubinstein's performance date approximated the 35th anniversary of the Russian master's death induced Stravinsky to accept the commission.

"As I was free to choose both subject and scenario," writes Stravinsky, I began search for them — in view of the characteristic trend of Tschaikowsky's music—in the literature of the 19th century."

* * *

Interest finally centered on the Hans Christian Anderson tale, "The Ice Maiden," the gist of which is as follows: "A fairy imprints her magic kiss on a child at birth and parts it from its mother. Twenty years later, when the youth has attained the very zenth of good fortune, she repeats the fatal kiss and carries him off to live in supreme happiness with her ever after."

"As my object was to commemorate Tschaikowsky's work," adds Stravinsky, "this subject seemed to me to be particularly appropriate as an allegory, the muse having similarly branded Tschaikowsky with her fatal kiss, and the magic imprint has made itself felt in all the musical creations of this great artist."

The work was completed in 1928 and premiered at the Paris Opera, Nov. 27, of that year with Stravinsky conducting. Within the year the entire ballet was produced in Brussells, Monte Carlo and Milan.

As in the case of his other ballets, Stravinsky made the orchestral suite from the music of "La Baiser de la Fee," which is to be played here. This suite was premiered November, 1928, by the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris at the Theater Champs Elysees. The composer conducted.

The suite is scored for three flutes and piccolo, two oboes, English horn, three clarinets and bass clarinet, two bassoons, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones and tuba, timpani, bass drum, harp and strings.

Orchestra Head

Dr. Koussevitzky, eminent leader of the Boston Symphony, who will lead the famous orchestra in two concerts to be played at Syria Mosque Saturday night and next Sunday afternoon.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

DEC 6 - 1936

Boston Symphony

Following are the selections to be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in the Toledo Museum of Art peristyle Friday evening:

Overture, "Roman Carnival" .... Berlioz
"Divertimento" from "Le Baiser de la Fee" .... Stravinsky
    "Sinfonia"
    "Danses Suisses: Valse"
    "Scherzo"
    "Pas de Deux"
    "Adagio—Variation—Coda"
Orchestral fragments from "Daphnis et Chloe" .... Ravel
    "Lever du Jour"
    "Pantomime"
    "Danse Generale"
"Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 73" .... Brahms
    "Allegro non troppo"
    "Adagio non troppo."
    "Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino"
    "Allegro con spirito"

Serge Koussevitzky Brings Symphony Here

More than half a century old, the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will return to Toledo for a concert in the Museum of Art peristyle Friday evening, easily takes rank as the most famous symphonic ensemble ever heard here. The history of the great organization, which will give the annual concert complimentary to members of the museum, is an interesting one.

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiratoin of his life by founding in America an orchestra of the sort he had heard as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

First Established

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. In his 84th year, the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, the term of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began in 1924 and, it will be seen, has extended beyond any single term of a previous conductor.

The long association of such an orchestra and such a leader is eloquently justified by the results. The great Russian conductor has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

DEC 6 - 1936

Koussevitzky to Offer Variegated Program

With Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear at 8:30 p. m. Wednesday in Masonic Auditorium. Handel, Sibelius and Ravel will be represented in the first half of the program. Following the intermission the orchestra will play Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68.

Thursday evening the Boston Symphony will play in Ann Arbor, in Hill Auditorium. The program will include works by Berlioz, Wagner, Mendelssohn and Sowerby. The symphony will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

Dec. 7/36

Symphony Here From Boston

SEATS will be at a premium this morning for the second annual appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Eastman Theater this evening, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

The box office reported late Saturday that a few orchestra, mezzanine and loge seats were still to be had, but these are expected to be taken early today. It will be the second successive year that the orchestra has played here to a capacity house.

Doctor Koussevitzky has elected to open the program with the Haydn Symphony No. 102, a work that has not been heard here in several years. Debussey's "La Mer" will follow. The program will close with the Brahms Symphony No. 1.

First curtain is scheduled for 8:20 p. m.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

Dec. 6/36

Symphony Concert Is Subject of Talk

Mary Van Doren, of the music department of the Toledo Museum of Art, Tuesday at 10:30 a. m. and 8:30 p. m. will lecture in the museum on the program of the next symphoney concert.

The concert is that of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and will be played in the museum peristyle Friday night.

Mrs. Van Doren will give the greater part of her lecture time to a discussion and illustration of Brahms' second symphony which will be the Boston orchestra's major offering in the Friday concert.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

Distinguished

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brings his famous band to Masonic Auditorium, Wednesday evening.

EVENTS IN MUSIC FOR THIS WEEK

By Charles Gentry

DETROIT WELCOMES the return this week of two noted artists in the music world who have been too long absent.

John McCormack, famous Irish tenor, returns after a two-year absence from the concert stage and several seasons away from Detroit and Serge Koussevitsky, noted director of the Boston Symphony and his well-known organization arrive Wednesday.

The Boston Symphony, one of the leading orchestras in the country, has toured every year, but this is the first season in several when Detroit has been included in the itinerary.

The orchestra will play Wednesday evening in the Masonic Auditorium and will offer the following program:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6; No. 6, in G minor .... Handel
"Pohjola's Daughter," Symphonic Fantasia, Op. 49 .... Sibelius
Orchestral Fragments from "Daphnis et Chloe" (Second Suite). Ravel
INTERMISSION
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68 .... Brahms

The following Thursday evening, the Boston Orchestra plays in Ann Arbor filling a Choral Union date in the Hill Auditorium with a complete change of program.

John McCormack makes his appearance here Monday evening in Orchestra Hall as the debut attraction of the newly formed Detroit Artists series, under the management of Alice Terbo.

The beloved Irish tenor will give the following recital:

1. (a) Caro Amor (Pastor Fide)..Handel
    (b) Where e'er You Walk (Semele) .... Handel
2. (a) Memnon .... Arthur Foote
    (b) Grieve Not, Dear Love (Earl Bristol's Farewell) ....C. A. Lidgey
    (c) Alma Mia (Floridente).....Handel
    (d) When Night Descends .... Rachmaninoff
3. Piano Solos—
    (a) The Island Spell..........Ireland
    (b) Players (Spanish Dance).Granados
    (c) Arabesque (Romance).....Arnold
INTERMISSION
4. Irish Folk Songs—
    (a) The Bard of Armagh (arranged by Hughes).
    (b) *Green Grows the Laurel (arranged by Hughes).
    (c) *The Star of the County Down (arranged by Hughes).
    (d) O Mary Dear (The Londonderry Air), arranged by Edwin Schneider
5. (a) Far Apart ......Edwin Schneider
    (b) Mary Shaw (traditional Scottish melody), arranged by MacLeod.
    (c) *The Song of the Seals .... Granville Bantock
    (d) When I Have Sung My Songs ....Ernest Charles

John Wummer and Bernhard Heiden will give a flute and harpsichord recital this afternoon at the Colony Club.

The Tuesday musical will hold its third concert Tuesday morning in the Art Institute auditorium. The program will be presented by Minnie Mitchell, organist; Mary Griffith, harpist; Clarice Mosdale, soprano, and Pauline Athay. Christmas carols will also be a feature of the morning.

Hazel Zumstein will present two of her pupils in a pianoforte recital at Grinnell's auditorium Saturday morning.

Saturday will also be the date for the first meeting of the In and About Detroit Music Educators' Club at the Statler Hotel. A program of Christmas music by the Ypsilanti State Normal College Madrigal Club, under the direction of Frederick Alexander, will be offered.

Another Christmas program will be offered by the Musical Club of Highland Park Friday at the McGregor Library.

Events within the next two weeks include a recital by Margaret Barthel, young Detroit pianist, at the Cass Theater next Sunday evening, December 13; Lawrence Rosenthal of the Netzorg School for the Piano the afternoon of the same day; the first concert of Pro-Musica at the Women's City Club, December 14, and the Josef Hoffman recital December 15.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

DEC 7 - 1936

A SNAPP of MUSIQUE

Every one, these days, is filled with suggestions for Christmas gifts, and every one inevitably believes that his own suggestions are better than all other suggestions. If one didn't believe in his own ideas, life, presumably, would be very sad. Anyway, this reviewer of records is firmly convinced that few Christmas presents are nicer than recordings of good music. In the first place, records nowadays are excellent. In the second place, reproducing machines are excellent, too. And fine music is a constant joy.

Listed in this place are some of the brand new releases, all suitable for gifts to those who enjoy music. (To be sure, most of the music listed in this column during the past year will fill the same purpose, but many like to give the very latest things.)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, has a new recording of Schubert's "unfinished" Symphony in B Minor (Victor album 319). The "high brows" customarily scoff a bit at this symphony, although it is a mystery why they should. It is beautiful music, and the Bostonians play it superbly.

* * *

Victor also has another album of interest (322): A "program" of Debussy songs sung by Maggie Teyte, with Alfred Cartot at the piano. You may remember Miss Teyte as an opera singer, who used to be with the old Chicago opera. She sings these songs, some fourteen of them, with impeccable artistry. They are charming songs in Debussy's best vocal manner.

* * *

Brahms "hounds" will revel in the Trio in C Major, Op. 87, recorded for Columbia (set 266) by Myra Hess, pianist; Yelly D'Aranyi, violinist, and Gaspar Cassado, cellist. Here is fine music, and it is finely played by this ensemble, whose only "vice" seems to be that the violinist is sometimes a bit weak. Chamber music "fans" can scarcely do without the album.

* * *

There are also several single records of interest. The least good of the lot is Gladys Swarthout's singing of two arias from Saint-Saens' "Samson et Dalila" (Victor 14143). "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix" and "Amour, viens aider" sound pretty, but they don't mean much as Miss Swarthout sings them. Both arias are about love, but you'd never suspect it, unless you know the words.

Elisabeth Schumann will please you much more, for she is a good artist. She sings two Schumann songs (Lorelei and Staendchen) and two Schubert songs (An die Nachtigall and Liebhaber in allen Gestalten), and sings them with finesse, as she always does (Victor 1764).

There is likewise a new Marian Anderson record (Victor 1766) containing two Sibelius songs, "Saf, Saf, Susa" and "Flickan kom ifran sin alsklings mote." Miss Anderson's voice is miraculous (you will hear her "in person," this winter, for she is coming to town under the auspices of the Concert Guild).

Leopold Stokowski has been transcribing again, this time two ancient liturgical melodies which you may find on Victor 1789. The Philadelphia Orchestra plays them, which is sufficient indication of what the music is like.

Lastly, Horowitz, who is also coming to town this winter, under the auspices of Martens Concerts, gives you a glimpse of his pianistic art in three Chopin works, the C-sharp Minor Mazurka, Op. 50, No. 3, and the fourth and fifth Etudes from Op. 10, in C-sharp Minor and G-flat Major, respectively (Victor 14140). They are all they should be.

* * *

Fritz Kreisler delighted all those who heard him here in recital, recently. He is one of the world's great violinists, and, when he plays great music, as he does on occasion, he is still supreme. He has re-recorded Beethoven's D Major Violin Concerto for Victor (set 325) with the aid of the London Philharmonic Orchestra, John Barbirolli conducting (he is at present in America conducting the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, as you should know). This new recording atones for all the bad spots in the previous recording. It is, in fact, practically perfect from any point of view.

W. W.

BURLINGTON, VT.
FREE PRESS

DEC 7 - 1936

SOCIAL ACTIVITIES

Silver Tea Given By Green Mountain Chapter, D. A. R., At Residence of Mrs. A. A. Starbird—Informal Dance Held At Fort Ethan Allen—Society Chat

D. A. R. Silver Tea Held At Home Of The Regent, Mrs. Alfred A. Starbird

A most successful and delightful silver tea and entertainment was given on Saturday afternoon by the members of Green Mountain Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution at the home of the regent, Mrs. Alfred A. Starbird, with about 75 members and their guests present, including members from the Vergennes and St. Albans Chapters.

During the afternoon, Mr. Hart of Fort Ethan Allen entertained with music upon the xylophone. Mrs. Robert Adams, a former member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, accompanied by Mrs. Raymond Place of Essex Junction, charmed her listeners with selections upon the 'cello. Most clever and witty was a series of original essays entitled "Living Alone With A Husband And Liking It" by Mrs. Sherman R. Moulton. Terminating the program, several patriotic marches were very stirringly played on the piano by the composer, Myrtie E. Wallace Watson of Cambridge.

The appointments in the dining room were of silver and crystal, silver candles and candlesticks and a crystal and silver jewelled tree upon a mirror centerpiece being used on the tea table.

Mrs. William E. Moore and Mrs. L V. Chaplin of Fort Ethan Allen, presided at the tea table and poured, alternating with Mrs. C. K. Johnson and Mrs. Joseph Reynolds.

Assisting were Mrs. F. Elliott Cox Mrs. Oliver N. Eastman and Miss Catharine Starbird.

Members of the committee in charge were Mrs. W. H. Collins, Mrs. C. R White and Mrs. C. Durrell Simonds

---

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

Dec 7/36

Boston Symphony Wednesday

IT WILL be a full week, in our amusement halls. The mighty Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will play at the Masonic Auditorium, Wednesday evening. This, unless the signs fail, will attract one of the big audiences of the season.

The mettle of this great organization will be admirably tested by the program, whose appeal to the popular appetite will be high, as well.

The program will open with a "Concerto Grosso," by Handel; Op. ,No. 6, in G. Minor. This type of composition must not be confused with the familiar concerto, for orchestra and solo instrument, but is an old-fashioned sort of scoring for strings alone. It will be followed by the Symphonic Fantasia by Sibelius, called "Pohjola's Daughter," and the first half will close with Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

After the intermission will come a great and beloved work; Brahms' First Symphony in C Minor, Op. 68. To tell you anything about that would be to gild the lily and turn a colored flood-light on the sunset.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

Dec.

Boston Symphony H

OF ALL the public functions of Toledo's social season, the symphony concerts undoubtedly attract the most brilliant audiences. The Peristyle of the Toledo Museum of Art is, in itself, a beautiful edifice and, when it is filled with a sparkling, fashionably gowned group, it is seen at its very best.

The complimentary concert to members on Friday evening when the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, will play, will be the outstanding event of the series.

Attend one of these functions and you will see the vogue of metallic lames used both for wraps and frocks. The short ermine swagger is a favored wrap as well as velvet, and here and there one sees full-length coats of gorgeous furs.

ere Friday

Color, too, is dominant in the evening picture as it always is when economic conditions are improving.

Many dinner parties are being formed preceding this brilliant concert.

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

DEC 8 - 1936

Varied Program

Berlioz, Stravinsky, Ravel and Brahms are represented on the attractively varied program to be given by the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in the Toledo Museum of Art peristyle Friday evening. Berlioz is represented by his overture, "Roman Carnival," Stravinsky by a "Divertimento" from his allegorical ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee," Ravel by orchestral fragments from "Daphnis et Chloe" and Brahms by his mighty "Symphony No. 2, D Major, Op. 73."

Performed by what generally is conceded to be the finest symphonic ensemble in the United States, this array of music undoubtedly will be the brightest highlight of the current season in Toledo. The concert is the annual event complimentary to members of the museum.

Dec. 21

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

DEC 8 - 1936

Mrs. H. V. Kaltenborn Is Hostess at Tea in Interest Of Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mrs. H. V. Kaltenborn of 9 Garden Place entertained at a tea this afternoon in the interest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. Mrs. Henry Davenport and Mrs. Nelson Sprackling presided at the tea table. A musical program was presented.

Guest Symphony Wins Ovation At Concert

Rochester Chronicle

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Serge Koussevitsky, Conductor

Haydn ..Symphony in B-flat No. 102
(the Ninth of the London series)
Largo: Allegro vivace
Adagio
Menuetto: Allegro; Trio
Finale: Presto
Debussy .... "La Mer,"
Three Orchestral Sketches
De Paube a midi sur la mer
Jeux de vagues
Dialogue du vent et de la mer

Intermission

Brahms ..Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68
Un poco sostenuto: Allegro
Andante sostenuto
Un poco allegretto e grazioso
Adagio: Allegro non troppo, ma con brio

Dec. 8/36

By ROBERT SABIN

NEVER has the Eastman Theater witnessed a more excited and tempestuous ovation than the one accorded the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky last evening, and one may justly add, never has it witnessed a more brilliant and superb performance.

This organization possesses a superlative technique, impeccable taste, and enjoys the leadership of a masterful conductor. One doubts if a Haydn symphony ever meant quite so much to a Rochester audience as Koussevitsky made the B flat mean last evening. The majesty of the opening was sung by the strings; the phrasing of the Adagio was a joy to hear; and the trumpets in the Menuetto with its charming trio were all that trumpets can be, and that is a great deal, even in the scores of Haydn. Of the marvelous precision in the swift, darting Presto, it is scarcely necessary to speak.

Then came a musical experience of rarest order. For Koussevitsky's interpretation of La Mer is classic, unforgettable. The exquisite pianissimo, the plastic, sinuous tone, the iridescent coloring of this interpretation evade any hurried critical description. What magnificent music this is. All of the whispers of the ocean, its morning silver and its evening velvet, all of those unutterable mysteries felt by Conrad and Loti are in this music. There was the reticence of Chinese art in the playing of this poem. Where others smear, Koussevitsky adds one stroke of the brush.

Who will forget the opening chords of this masterpiece, the wave-like diminuendo and rhythm of the theme in the 'cellos and brasses, the wisps of tone in the woodwinds in the second section, or the miraculous sense of infinite distance, of wind and sun and sky, in the last? To have lived and heard this music is something. It represents the peak of Debussey's creation, perhaps his most profound utterance.

Again in the towering and austere Brahms First Symphony the orchestra built up a breathless magnificence and a broad, flowing line which made the music seem like a new revelation. One might disagree with some things in Koussevitsky's interpretation, the horn passage in the last movement, for instance, but one was swept away by the whole. The writer has never heard the detail of the Allegretto so beautifully emphasized, nor the surging finale so fearlessly proclaimed. It was a bold, declamatory Brahms that Koussevitsky brought to us, yet with lyric interludes of hushed quiet.

Long after the concert was over, people stood in the aisles still applauding. A musical experience of major importance had exercised its spell.

AMERICAN BANKER
NEW YORK CITY

DEC 8 - 1936

MUSICIAN LAUDS BANK BROADCAST OF SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Richmond, Va., Dec. 8.—Colonel Julien H. Hill, president of the State-Planters Bank & Trust Co., has been informed by Mrs. Frances Reinhardt, local soloist who was a pupil of Madame Marcella Sembrich, that listeners to the WMBG Columbia network are now being enabled to hear the world's greatest music played on Friday nights and sponsored by the bank in a Richmond broadcast of the music of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Reinhardt credits this orchestra with being one of the three greatest orchestras in America, the others being the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic Symphony. Mrs. Reinhardt said she considers it a credit to the South.

HAMMOND, LA.
DAILY COURIER

DEC 7 - 1936

Lost Symphony

(By The Associated Press)

Boston.—Lost for a century, a symphony by the famed Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Its performance by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky won warm applause from a traditionally staid audience.

Written some time between 1785 and 1824, the music, critics agreed, was melodious, beautiful and individual.

Beaming at friends in his quarters after the performance, Dr. Koussevitzky happily predicted the Opus D Major was bound to become "an indispensible part of the standard repertoire."

The symphony helps fill in a 100-year gap in musical history. Clementi, a contemporary of Beethoven, was widely recognized for his piano sonatas, some of which were held in high esteem by the great German master.

But he also was known through yellowed newspaper and magazine clippings to have written about 20 symphonies, widely popular in their day.

Yet, when Clementi died near London in 1832, bequeathing his large estates and all his manuscripts to his widow, none of the symphonic scores could be found. Only two of them had been printed, and others dropped from public knowledge.

In 1917, Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder. How they came into Dr. Cummings' possession still remains a mystery.

The Library of Congress of the United States purchased the manuscripts at public auction soon, after, and musicologists attempted to weave them together.

ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL

DEC 8 - 1936

* * *

SANS HORSES—Sometimes I turn to the music columns for a glance at the current Carnegie Hall parade, and lately what impresses me particularly are the virtues singled out by the critical clan for special commendation. In almost every case, when dealing with orchestral conductors, these seem to be things the leaders haven't got.

Thus, Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony, has just been praised for conducting "without fireworks," and Fritz Reiner earned a local magazine's approval for conducting "without compromise." Having been praised for everything else, Jose Iturbi is now achieving recognition for conducting "without a piano."

To continue the left-handed enumeration, a leading morning paper has been patting Eugene Ormandy on the back for conducting "without a score." Leopold Stokowski is bowling people over because he leads without a baton. Otto Klemperer used to cause favorable comment because he conducted without a podium, and John Barbirolli, the new Philharmonic maestro, now makes everyone take notice because he conducts without his eye-glasses.

The leader has still to come along who can conduct without an orchestra.

* * *

CURB MARKET—There must have been many envious hearts in Manhattan when Ambroise Vollard, the French art collector, came to town at the age of 71 for his first American visit. Vollard is the canny fellow who forty years ago bought paintings by Cezanne, Degas, Renoir and Picasso when almost nobody else in Paris would. Today his collection is worth millions, and stuff for which he paid $20 now sells for $100,000.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

12)

DEC 8 - 1936

Listening in on Detroit

By H. C. L. JACKSON

Totem Pole, Ugh.

THIS column feels more prepared against the predatory fingers of winter and Santa Claus, now that there is perched upon his desk, a totem pole.

It includes a lot of unpleasant looking symbols and characters, with special reference to a red and horrendous beast which the author of the pole, Whispering Wind, insists is "Listening in on Detroit."

Yes sir, with a totem pole big enough to act as a deterrent to any visitor who expects me to break down and spend the day discussing Eddie and Wally, everything looks a lot more merry.

And at that point the phone rang, and a briskly Scottish voice at the other end of the line said:

"Jack, keep me out of this, but here's a thought about what's going on in England. I got pretty well battered up in the early part of the War, and since I was in the British Army, they found a job for me—recruiting.

"Now, recruiting meant going into the humble homes of England, and convincing the married men in the presence of their wives, and single men in the presence of their best girls, that the Country came ahead of their affections.

"Well, a lot of men went to France on the strength of that argument. And a lot of them were killed. And I can't help wondering how the widows react to a king who puts his affections ahead of the Country."

THANK YOU
Minga

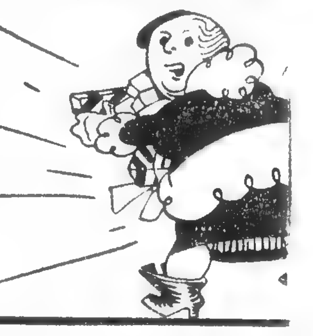
* * *

Dog-House

AND fending away from that [illegible] the kind to which husbands are elected. It's the kind that some men play upon in Symphony orchestras. And chief among the virtuosos of the dog-house is SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concert here tomorrow evening.

This "dog-house," of course, is the bass viol, usually regarded as a musical instrument that emits growls instead of music. But in the hands of an expert such as Koussevitzky the bumbling bass becomes lyrical indeed.

MURRAY PATERSON, for example, sharply took my irreverent references to the dog-house to task and pointed out that, particularly when it's played in its upper registers, the bass viol is a thing of transcendent beauty.



Director Koussevitzky once used the dog-house with telling effect. When he was presented with an honorary degree by Brown University Koussevtzky, being short on English but long on dog-houses, proceeded to play a response, letting his music speak his thanks for him. The original of "say it with music," as far as I know.

It may be the ill-temper brought upon us by our departed molar, David, but we can't help thinking that it would be all to the good if the majority of those who receive honorary degrees replied in music, if they could play; otherwise just kept silent.

And in passing on to the next item, we might pause long enough to recall that the musicians have a lot of merry names for the instruments they use. Any violin is a "fiddle", or better still a "Woolworth Strad." And my vote for the most apropos title is that applied to the percussion section, you know, drums, xylophones, cymbals whistles, etc. Musicians refer to that section as the "kitchen."

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

DEC 8 - 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY DRAWS BRILLIANT CONCERT AUDIENCE

Koussevitsky Has Personal Triumph

Long before Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra had completed the famous Haydn Symphony No. 102, they had won the rapt attention and admiration of a large and colorful audience which turned out last night for the concert at the Eastman.

Regular patrons of the many fine concerts which come to Rochester are Mrs. Ralph Kilmer and her daughters, Miss Betty Kilmer and Miss Barbara Kilmer. Mrs. Kilmer was in black velvet, Miss Betty Kilmer wore a wine wrap over white satin, and Miss Barbara Kilmer had chosen white crepe with a black velvet cloak.

Mrs. William T. Noonan, in black crepe with black velvet wrap, is another devotee of good music. She was with her daughter, Miss Loretta Noonan, who wore a black velvet wrap over a gown of silver lame.

Dr. and Mrs. George Norton were seen as they entered the mezzanine, Mrs. Norton wearing a striking gown of gold sequins. Also enjoying the concert from theh mezzanine were Mrs. Charles Hoeing in black velvet, Mrs. Robert Ranlet wearing black chiffon, Mrs. Charles Ford in salmon crepe with ermine wrap, and Mrs. Charles Everest who was wearing black satin.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

DEC 8 - 1936

Guest Symphony Wins Ovation At Concert

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Serge Koussevitsky, Conductor

Haydn ..Symphony in B-flat No. 102
(the Ninth of the London series)
Largo: Allegro vivace
Adagio
Menuetto: Allegro; Trio
Finale: Presto
Debussy .... "La Mer,"
Three Orchestral Sketches
De Paube a midi sur la mer
Jeux de vagues
Dialogue du vent et de la mer

Intermission

Brahms ..Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68
Un poco sostenuto: Allegro
Andante sostenuto
Un poco allegretto e grazioso
Adagio: Allegro non troppo, ma con brio

By ROBERT SABIN

NEVER has the Eastman Theater witnessed a more excited and tempestuous ovation than the one accorded the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky last evening, and one may justly add never has it witnessed a more brilliant and superb performance.

This organization possesses a superlative technique, impeccable taste, and enjoys the leadership of a masterful conductor. One doubts if a Haydn symphony ever meant quite so much to a Rochester audience as Koussevitsky made the B flat mean last evening. The majesty of the opening was sung by the strings; the phrasing of the Adagio was a joy to hear; and the trumpets in the Menuetto with its charming trio were all that trumpets can be, and that is a great deal, even in the scores of Haydn. Of the marvelous precision in the swift, darting Presto, it is scarcely necessary to speak.

Then came a musical experience [illegible] description. What magic music this is. All of the whispers of the ocean, its morning silver and its evening velvet, all of those unutterable mysteries felt by Conrad and Loti are in this music. There was the reticence of Chinese art in the playing of this poem. Where others smear, Koussevitsky adds one stroke of the brush.

Who will forget the opening chords of this masterpiece, the wave-like diminuendo and rhythm of the theme in the 'cellos and brasses, the wisps of tone in the woodwinds in the second section, or the miraculous sense of infinite distance, of wind and sun and sky, in the last? To have lived and heard this music is something. It represents the peak of Debussey's creation, perhaps his most profound utterance.

Again in the towering and austere Brahms First Symphony the orchestra built up a breathless magnificence and a broad, flowing line which made the music seem like a new revelation. One might disagree with some things in Koussevitsky's interpretation, the horn passage in the last movement, for instance, but one was swept away by the whole. The writer has never heard the detail of the Allegretto so beautifully emphasized, nor the surging finale so fearlessly proclaimed. It was a bold, declamatory Brahms that Koussevitsky brought to us, yet with lyric interludes of hushed quiet.

Long after the concert was over, people stood in the aisles still applauding. A musical experience of major importanuce had exercised its spell.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

DEC 8 - 1936

Concert by Boston Symphony Proves Outstanding Event On Musical Calendar

THE concert played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky last night in Eastman Theater proved one of the most noteworthy social occasions on the musical calendar to date.

The symphony performance drew an exceptionally large crowd.

A storm of applause followed the playing of DeBussy's three orchestral sketches entitled "La Mer," and Doctor Koussevitzky was recalled to the stage again and again after the number, which closed the first half of the concert.

The brilliance of the concert program was matched by the smartness of the new winter gowns seen during the promenade intermission as the members of the audience strolled to chat and smoke. Lustrous satins and soft velvets mingled to present a richly colorful picture, and lovely coiffures were made still more attractive by the newest mode in hair ornaments.

Noted chatting together were Mr. and Mrs. Hawley Ward, the latter in a simple gown of white, and Mr. and Mrs. Richard Ford, Mrs. Ford wearing black. Strolling in the upper corridor were Mrs. R. B. Kilmer, in a becoming gown of black, and her two daughters, the Misses Betty and Barbara, both wearing lovely gowns of white crepe. Also noted in the corridor were Mrs. Karl Schnepel, in a beautiful gown of white crepe with a cape edged with deep fringe of white; Dr. and Mrs. Harold L. Alling, Mrs. Alling in red crepe; Dr. and Mrs. J. Merrell Parker, the latter in a gown of maroon velvet, and Dr. John Murlin with his daughter, Miss Frances Murlin, who was wearing rust velvet [illegible] with sash of scarlet chiffon, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Hays, the latter lovely in deep blue with Dubonnet trim; Mrs. William B. Macomber, in black with aqua trim; Mrs. George B. Leech in black with trim of brilliant buttons; Mr. and Mrs. T. Randall Dubois, the latter wearing a black velvet wrap over her evening gown, and Mr. and Mrs. Donald R. Cole with their daughter, Virginia, who wore a gown of plaid taffeta.

After the playing of the Brahms Symphony which concluded the concert, Doctor Koussevitzy was accorded a tremendous ovation, and he returned to the stage a number of times to acknowledge the applause of the enthusiastic audience.

Noted as they left the theater were Mrs. Frank E. Gannett, in a gown and wrap of black, with Mrs. Douglas C. Townson and her daughter, Miss Antoinette Townson. Mrs. Townson was gowned in black and Miss Townson wore a lovely dress in blue chiffon with a white fur wrap. Also seen were Miss Loretto Noonan, in black lace with her mother, Mrs. William T. Noonan, who was also gowned in black with a black velvet wrap.

Others noted at the conclusion of the concert were Miss Mary Whipple, in an attractive gown of blue chiffon with scarlet flowers at the neckline, with her fiance, Donald Clark; Mrs. H. Dean Quinby Jr., in deep red velvet; Mr. and Mrs. Horace Hart, the latter in blue moire; Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Horwitiz with their son, Samter Horwitz; Dr. and Mrs. E. Earl Elliott, Miss Elliott in rust velvet; Miss Yolanda Fisher, and Mrs. Raymond Milow in black with a blouse of silver lame with her daughter, Mrs. William H. DeWitt, who wore a gown of rose tafeta.

MUSIC MISCEL

GROUP ACTIVITIES

Judged from the increasing activities in music as reported throughout the land it would seem that each and every professed teacher of music must have just every pupil he or she could find time for, but such a state does not prevail. One reason for this is that numerous group organizations are made up of genuine "music lovers," none of whom is at this time studying and many of whom have never studied, under a teacher. These latter are found in greater numbers among singers than among instrumentalists.

To what heights these organizations might rise if their members did individual work with teacher guidance is not to be estimated but the benefits that would accrue to the individual would be great indeed.

While one regrets that every worthy teacher has not a full quota of pupils, it is heartening that music participation and patronage continues or is being begun by such large numbers. The value of all this may be measured not alone by what it may achieve in music but for the contributions of the participants as citizens along avenues opened by "music's magic."

HERE AND THERE

"New England's own" Boston Sym- [illegible] first New [illegible] week and [illegible] of Nov. Concert [illegible] student orchestra will be conducted by Wallace Goodrich in its first public concert of the season at Jordan hall, Boston, Monday evening, Nov. 23, for which free tickets may be obtained at the conservatory.

L'Africaine Singers, under the direction of Henry Gideon, organist and music director at Temple Israel, will give their third annual concert at the Boston Public library, Sunday, Nov. 22, at 8.

Massinet's ballet version of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" will be given its first performance in Boston by De Basil's Monte Carlo Ballet Russe company, during their five-day engagement in Boston Opera House, beginning Nov. 24.

The music department of Michigan State college announces through its director, Lewis Richards, the inauguration of a series of unusual musical programs. A sequence of 10 intimate programs of music from the eighth to the eighteenth century will be given during the winter. These programs are designed to render "through the production of music in as nearly as possible contemporary conditions, a cross section of the social culture of each period."

The National Association of Schools of Music in a recent bulletin lists books appropriate for use in libraries of schools of music. This bulletin is a supplement to the one published last year. It adds recent titles and some older works not previously included. Those interested may obtain the bulletins by addressing Burnet C. Tuthill, secretary of the association, Southwestern College, Memphis, Tenn.

At Brown University the music study field has been widened. Co-operation with other branches has been extended and the staff strengthened. This expansion of associations with other departments and with student life to broaden the influence of the department of music at Brown will include association with the department of Biblical literature, the departments of "Germanic Languages and Literatures," the department of "Romance Languages and Literatures" and the department of history. Music with student life outside the class room is being strengthened by providing more opportunity for informal use of three libraries of recorded music, which has grown to nearly 3000 records in the last five years. These collections, rich in instrumental music of the past century, range from early Hebrew chants to contemporary music.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

DEC 9 - 1936

High French Honor For Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky, who conducts the Boston Symphony in concerts at Syria Mosque Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, has been accorded the highest official decoration within the gift of France. Francois de Tessan, French Unde-secretary of State, has bestowed on him the ivory and gold star and scarlet "cravat" of a commander of the Légion of Honor for "universal eminence in music."

The Bostonians will give symphonies by Mozart and Franck and the Divertimento from Stravinsky's "Le Baiser de la Fee," on Saturday. Sunday's program consists of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Handel's Concerto Grosso, Wagner's "Lohengrin" Prelude, a Mendelssohn Scherzo and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

DEC 9 - 1936

On Tuesday evening of next week in Jordan hall a new chamber orchestra is to give the first of a series of three programs. It will be directed by Bernard Zighera and will be made up of musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The special soloist will be Guioma Novaes, Brazilian pianist.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

121

DEC 8 - 1936

Listening in on Detroit

By H. C. L. JACKSON

Totem Pole, Ugh.

THIS column feels more prepared against the predatory fingers of winter and Santa Claus, now that there is perched upon his desk, a totem pole.

It includes a lot of unpleasant looking symbols and characters, with special reference to a red and horrendous beast which the author of the pole, Whispering Wind, insists is "Listening in on Detroit."

Yes sir, with a totem pole big enough to act as a deterrent to any visitor who expects me to break down and spend the day discussing Eddie and Wally, everything looks a lot more merry.

And at that point the phone rang, and a briskly Scottish voice at the other end of the line said:

"Jack, keep me out of this, but here's a thought about what's going on in England. I got pretty well battered up in the early part of the War, and since I was in the British Army, they found a job for me—recruiting.

"Now, recruiting meant going into the humble homes of England, and convincing the married men in the presence of their wives, and single men in the presence of their best girls, that the Country came ahead of their affections.

"Well, a lot of men went to France on the strength of that argument. And a lot of them were killed. And I can't help wondering how the widows react to a king who puts his affections ahead of the Country."

* * *

Dog-House

AND fending away from that subject as neatly as ever did BELA DE TUSCAN an opponent's foil, we find ourselves dissertating on the "Dog-house."

Only this particular variety isn't the kind to which husbands are elected. It's the kind that some men play upon in Symphony orchestras. And chief among the virtuosos of the dog-house is SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concert here tomorrow evening.

This "dog-house," of course, is the bass viol, usually regarded as a musical instrument that emits growls instead of music. But in the hands of an expert such as Koussevitzky the bumbling bass becomes lyrical indeed.

MURRAY PATERSON, for example, sharply took my irreverent references to the dog-house to task and pointed out that, particularly when it's played in its upper registers, the bass viol is a thing of transcendent beauty.

Director Koussevitzky once used the dog-house with telling effect. When he was presented with an honorary degree by Brown University Koussevtzky, being short on English but long on dog-houses, proceeded to play a response, letting his music speak his thanks for him. The original of "say it with music," as far as I know.

It may be the ill-temper brought upon us by our departed molar, David, but we can't help thinking that it would be all to the good if the majority of those who receive honorary degrees replied in music, if they could play; otherwise just kept silent.

And in passing on to the next item, we might pause long enough to recall that the musicians have a lot of merry names for the instruments they use. Any violin is a "fiddle", or better still a "Woolworth Strad." And my vote for the most apropos title is that applied to the percussion section, you know, drums, xylophones, cymbals whistles, etc. Musicians refer to that section as the "kitchen."

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

DEC 8 - 1936

BOS ERT A Vi H

Koussevitsky Has Personal Triumph

Long before Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra had completed the famous Haydn Symphony No. 102, they had won the rapt attention and admiration of a large and colorful audience which turned out last night for the concert at the Eastman.

Regular patrons of the many fine concerts which come to Rochester are Mrs. Ralph Kilmer and her daughters, Miss Betty Kilmer and Miss Barbara Kilmer. Mrs. Kilmer was in black velvet, Miss Betty Kilmer wore a wine wrap over white satin, and Miss Barbara Kilmer had chosen white crepe with a black velvet cloak.

Mrs. William T. Noonan, in black crepe with black velvet wrap, is another devotee of good music. She was with her daughter, Miss Loretta Noonan, who wore a black velvet wrap over a gown of silver lame.

Dr. and Mrs. George Norton were seen as they entered the mezzanine, Mrs. Norton wearing a striking gown of gold sequins. Also enjoying the concert from theh mezzanine were Mrs. Charles Hoeing in black velvet, Mrs. Robert Ranlet wearing black chiffon, Mrs. Charles Ford in salmon crepe with ermine wrap, and Mrs. Charles Everest who was wearing black satin.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

DEC 9 - 1936

High French Honor For Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky, who conducts the Boston Symphony in concerts at Syria Mosque Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, has been accorded the highest official decoration within the gift of France. Francois de Tessan, French Unde-secretary of State, has bestowed on him the ivory and gold star and scarlet "cravat" of a commander of the Legion of Honor for "universal eminence in music."

The Bostonians will give symphonies by Mozart and Franck and the Divertimento from Stravinsky's "Le Baiser de la Fee," on Saturday. Sunday's program consists of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Handel's Concerto Grosso, Wagner's "Lohengrin" Prelude, a Mendelssohn Scherzo and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

DEC 8 - 1936

Guest Symphony Wins Ovation At Concert

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Serge Koussevitsky, Conductor

Haydn ..Symphony in B-flat No. 102
(the Ninth of the London series)
Largo: Allegro vivace
Adagio
Menuetto: Allegro; Trio
Finale: Presto
Debussy .... "La Mer,"
Three Orchestral Sketches
De Paube a midi sur la mer
Jeux de vagues
Dialogue du vent et de la mer

Intermission

Brahms ..Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68
Un poco sostenuto: Allegro
Andante sostenuto
Un poco allegretto e grazioso
Adagio: Allegro non troppo, ma con brio

By ROBERT SABIN

NEVER has the Eastman Theater witnessed a more excited and tempestuous ovation than the one accorded the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky last evening, and one may justly add, never has it witnessed a more brilliant and superb performance.

This organization possesses a superlative technique, impeccable taste, and enjoys the leadership of a masterful conductor. One doubts if a Haydn symphony ever meant quite so much to a Rochester audience as Koussevitsky made the B flat mean last evening. The majesty of the opening was sung by the strings; the phrasing of the Adagio was a joy to hear; and the trumpets in the Menuetto with its charming trio were all that trumpets can be, and that is a great deal, even in the scores of Haydn. Of the marvelous precision in the swift, darting Presto, it is scarcely necessary to speak.

Then came a musical experience of rarest order. For Koussevitsky's interpretation of La Mer is classic, unforgettable. The exquisite pianissimo, the plastic, sinuous tone, the iridescent coloring of this interpretation evade any hurried critical description. What magnificent music this is. All of the whispers of the ocean, its morning silver and its evening velvet, all of those unutterable mysteries felt by Conrad and Loti are in this music. There was the reticence of Chinese art in the playing of this poem. Where others smear, Koussevitsky adds one stroke of the brush.

Who will forget the opening chords of this masterpiece, the wave-like diminuendo and rhythm of the theme in the 'cellos and brasses, the wisps of tone in the woodwinds in the second section, or the miraculous sense of infinite distance, of wind and sun and sky, in the last? To have lived and heard this music is something. It represents the peak of Debussey's creation, perhaps his most profound utterance.

Again in the towering and austere Brahms First Symphony the orchestra built up a breathless magnificence and a broad, flowing line which made the music seem like a new revelation. One might disagree with some things in Koussevitsky's interpretation, the horn passage in the last movement, for instance, but one was swept away by the whole. The writer has never heard the detail of the Allegretto so beautifully emphasized, nor the surging finale so fearlessly proclaimed. It was a bold, declamatory Brahms that Koussevitsky brought to us, yet with lyric interludes of hushed quiet.

Long after the concert was over, people stood in the aisles still applauding. A musical experience of major importanuce had exercised its spell.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

DEC 8 - 1936

Concert by Boston Symphony Proves Outstanding Event On Musical Calendar

THE concert played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky last night in Eastman Theater proved one of the most noteworthy social occasions on the musical calendar to date.

The symphony performance drew an exceptionally large crowd.

A storm of applause followed the playing of DeBussy's three orchestral sketches entitled "La Mer," and Doctor Koussevitzky was recalled to the stage again and again after the number, which closed the first half of the concert.

The brilliance of the concert program was matched by the smartness of the new winter gowns seen during the promenade intermission as the members of the audience strolled to chat and smoke. Lustrous satins and soft velvets mingled to present a richly colorful picture, and lovely coiffures were made still more attractive by the newest mode in hair ornaments.

Noted chatting together were Mr. and Mrs. Hawley Ward, the latter in a simple gown of white, and Mr. and Mrs. Richard Ford, Mrs. Ford wearing black. Strolling in the upper corridor were Mrs. R. B. Kilmer, in a becoming gown of black, and her two daughters, the Misses Betty and Barbara, both wearing lovely gowns of white crepe. Also noted in the corridor were Mrs. Karl Schnepel, in a beautiful gown of white crepe with a cape edged with deep fringe of white; Dr. and Mrs. Harold L. Alling, Mrs. Alling in red crepe; Dr. and Mrs. J. Merrell Parker, the latter in a gown of maroon velvet, and Dr. John Murlin with his daughter, Miss Frances Murlin, who was wearing rust velvet.

Mrs. George Whitley, in a becoming blue gown, was with her small son, very trim in a white sailor suit, and others seen during the intermission were Miss Ann Montignani, smart in a black gown with sash of scarlet chiffon; Mr. and Mrs. Henry Hays, the latter lovely in deep blue with Dubonnet trim; Mrs. William B. Macomber, in black with aqua trim; Mrs. George B. Leech in black with trim of brilliant buttons; Mr. and Mrs. T. Randall Dubois, the latter wearing a black velvet wrap over her evening gown, and Mr. and Mrs. Donald R. Cole with their daughter, Virginia, who wore a gown of plaid taffeta.

After the playing of the Brahms Symphony which concluded the concert, Doctor Koussevitzy was accorded a tremendous ovation, and he returned to the stage a number of times to acknowledge the applause of the enthusiastic audience.

Noted as they left the theater were Mrs. Frank E. Gannett, in a gown and wrap of black, with Mrs. Douglas C. Townson and her daughter, Miss Antoinette Townson. Mrs. Townson was gowned in black and Miss Townson wore a lovely dress in blue chiffon with a white fur wrap. Also seen were Miss Loretto Noonan, in black lace with her mother, Mrs. William T. Noonan, who was also gowned in black with a black velvet wrap.

Others noted at the conclusion of the concert were Miss Mary Whipple, in an attractive gown of blue chiffon with scarlet flowers at the neckline, with her fiance, Donald Clark; Mrs. H. Dean Quinby Jr., in deep red velvet; Mr. and Mrs. Horace Hart, the latter in blue moire; Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Horwitiz with their son, Samter Horwitz; Dr. and Mrs. E. Earl Elliott, Miss Elliott in rust velvet; Miss Yolanda Fisher, and Mrs. Raymond Milow in black with a blouse of silver lame with her daughter, Mrs. William H. DeWitt, who wore a gown of rose tafeta.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

DEC 9 - 1936

On Tuesday evening of next week in Jordan hall a new chamber orchestra is to give the first of a series of three programs. It will be directed by Bernard Zighera and will be made up of musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The special soloist will be Guioma Novaes, Brazilian pianist.

MUSIC MISCEL

GROUP ACTIVITIES

Judged from the increasing activities in music as reported throughout the land it would seem that each and every professed teacher of music must have just every pupil he or she could find time for, but such a state does not prevail. One reason for this is that numerous group organizations are made up of genuine "music lovers," none of whom is at this time studying and many of whom have never studied, under a teacher. These latter are found in greater numbers among singers than among instrumentalists.

To what heights these organizations might rise if their members did individual work with teacher guidance is not to be estimated but the benefits that would accrue to the individual would be great indeed.

While one regrets that every worthy teacher has not a full quota of pupils, it is heartening that music participation and patronage continues or is being begun by such large numbers. The value of all this may be measured not alone by what it may achieve in music but for the contributions of the participants as citizens along avenues opened by "music's magic."

HERE AND THERE

"New England's own" Boston Symphony orchestra is giving its first New York series of concerts this week and the regular Boston concerts of Nov. 27-28 will be conducted by Concert Master Richard Burgin.

New England Conservatory student orchestra will be conducted by Wallace Goodrich in its first public concert of the season at Jordan hall, Boston, Monday evening, Nov. 23, for which free tickets may be obtained at the conservatory.

L'Africaine Singers, under the direction of Henry Gideon, organist and music director at Temple Israel, will give their third annual concert at the Boston Public library, Sunday, Nov. 22, at 8.

Massinet's ballet version of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" will be given its first performance in Boston by De Basil's Monte Carlo Ballet Russe company, during their five-day engagement in Boston Opera House, beginning Nov. 24.

The music department of Michigan State college announces through its director, Lewis Richards, the inauguration of a series of unusual musical programs. A sequence of 10 intimate programs of music from the eighth to the eighteenth century will be given during the winter. These programs are designed to render "through the production of music in as nearly as possible contemporary conditions, a cross section of the social culture of each period."

The National Association of Schools of Music in a recent bulletin lists books appropriate for use in libraries of schools of music. This bulletin is a supplement to the one published last year. It adds recent titles and some older works not previously included. Those interested may obtain the bulletins by addressing Burnet C. Tuthill, secretary of the association, Southwestern College, Memphis, Tenn.

At Brown University the music study field has been widened. Cooperation with other branches has been extended and the staff strengthened. This expansion of associations with other departments and with student life to broaden the influence of the department of music at Brown will include association with the department of Biblical literature, the departments of "Germanic Languages and Literatures," the department of "Romance Languages and Literatures" and the department of history. Music with student life outside the class room is being strengthened by providing more opportunity for informal use of three libraries of recorded music, which has grown to nearly 3000 records in the last five years. These collections, rich in instrumental music of the past century, range from early Hebrew chants to contemporary music.

122

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

DEC 8 - 1936

ILS BOSTON SYMP

Outstanding Music Event Of Season Draws Capacity Eastman House

By RUTH B. CHAMBERLAIN

THE THRILL THAT COMES ONCE IN A SEASON. . .

The ultimate in musicianship . . . was offered social and musical Rochester last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting an unforgettable program of three numbers . . . Haydn's Symphony in B Flat, No. 102, Debussy's "La Mer" and Brahm's Symphony No. 1 in C Minor.

Hailed as one of the greatest musical aggregations in America, the orchestra now in its fifty-sixth season, was welcomed to Rochester with prolonged and hearty applause, by an audience which packed the theater. It was an evening long anticipated by Rochester's music lovers and they gave vent to unbridled enthusiam and applause at the conclusion of the program recalling Mr. Koussevitzky to the podium again and again.

The concert, one of those scheduled in series B was scheduled for Monday evening instead of the usual Friday evening date in order to coincide with the December tour of the organization which will take them to Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Pittsburgh, Cambridge and Boston. The performance last night drew one of the most important social gatherings of the season. Personalities well known in art . . . music . . . education and society gathered in the foyers . . . the promenades and the mezzanines both before and after the concert and during the intermission to add their vocal superlatives to their plaudits.

It is a problem to know just where to begin in listing the socially prominent since the entire mezzanine and orchestra looked like the pages of the Social Register come to life. Countless prominent hostesses, lovely in evening gowns in autumn shades and fabrics, accompanied by their well-groomed escorts hurried down the aisles to their places before the hour of 8:30.

There was a breathless pause as the orchestra as well as the audience in the hushed and darkened auditorium awaited the appearance of Mr. Koussevitzky. Then a burst of welcoming applause before the signal by the maestro for the opening bars of the first number.

However, while the vast audience was assembling, we had ample opportunity to observe the arrival of such distinguished Rochesterians as Mrs. James Sibley Watson who was accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Hiram Sibley Jr., the latter wearing a wrap of wine red velvet over her evening gown of leaf green crepe with color or gold lame . . . Mrs. Rush Rhees, regal in black transparent velvet, greeted innumerable friends as she arrived with Dr. Rhees . . . Nearby sat their old friends Mr. and Mrs. Edward G. Miner.

Lovely in white satin was Mrs. Hawley Ward, who with Mr. Ward chatted before the concert with their adjoining seat companions, Mr. and Mrs. Richard T. Ford, and Charles W. Weis Sr. Quiet elegance was expressed in the gown of heavy black satin worn by Mrs. Frank Lovejoy who with Mr. Lovejoy were seated nearby.

Greeting old friends with her unfailing graciousness and charm as she entered the theater was Mrs. J. Clifford Kalbfleish, accompanied by her daughter, Mrs. Clarence P. Thomas and Dr. Thomas. Then followed Mrs. Victoria Powers accompanied by Joseph Hoyt Mr. and Mrs. Charles Dumont, Mrs. J. Dewitt Butts and Mrs. Buell P. Mills, and Miss M. Louise Kelly.

Dr. and Mrs. J. Craig Potter, the latter attired in a simple gown of black transparent velvet with a three-strand circlet of pearls at her neck were among those noted during the evening. While in the mezzanine during the brief intermission we encountered William G. Stuber, with his ready smile and kindly humor, before greeting Mr. and Mrs. Charles G. Hutchison and Mr. and Mrs. Fred K. Thompson, Mrs. George W. Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. Maros S. Hunting, Mr. and Mrs. Frank J. Smith and Mr. and Mrs. Waldo Potter.

Others of interest to be seen in the corridors were Miss Mary Kates, Mrs. Henry Dean Quinby, the Misses Anna and Bertha Hubbell and their sister, Mrs. Herbert Lewis; Mrs. Daniel W. Beach and Miss Marion Beach, Mrs. Fletcher Knight and her daughter Miss Winifred Knight, Mr. and Mrs. Embry C. MacDowell, Miss Molly Mulligan, Mrs. Albert C. Snell, Mrs. J. Foster Warner, and Mrs. Mary A. Allen.

Also present were, Mrs. Abram J. Katz, Dr. and Mrs. E. Earl Elliott, Mrs. Bert Van Wie, and Miss Louie Sackett, Mrs. Harry Gorton, Farley J. Withington, Mrs. Benjamin Forman and Mrs. A. H. Niesner, Mrs. Walter V. Whitmore, Miss Louie J. Hall, Mr. and Mrs. Wendell J. Curtis, Dr. and Mrs. David Jewett, Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Stern, Bishop and Mrs. David Lincoln Ferris.

Dr. and Mrs. Albert W. Kaiser, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Harris, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas G. Spencer, Mrs. Taylor Bidwell, Miss Marjorie Backus, Mrs. Kirby Collier, Miss Eleanor Collier, Miss Eleanor Gleason, Mrs. Junius R. Judson, Miss Lucy Lee Call, Miss Marion Weed, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Farrow Jr., Mrs. Nelson Corkhill, Raymond L. Thompson, Mrs. George Olney Bailey, and her daughter, Mrs. Marjorie Pratt, Mrs. Charles P. Ford, Miss Helen Little, Herbert Stern.

A. J. Cunningham, Miss Louise Devine, Miss Adelaide Devine, Mr. and Mrs. William D. Clapp, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Horwitz and their son, Sampter, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Hart, Mrs. William W. Chapin and her son, Harrison L. Chapin, Dr. and Mrs. John Aikman, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Eastwood, Miss Emily Ashley, Dr. W. W. Percy, Mrs. Alphonse B. Sanderl, and Mrs. Walter Kinnear.

Mrs. David B. Little, Mrs. Everest Clements, Gustav Tinlot, Guy Fraser Harrison, Mrs. William Rosenberg, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Challice, Mr. and Mrs. George Leech, Miss Beth Kochenthal, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Hays, Mrs. William Woodbury, Mr. and Mrs. Leroy Snyder, Mrs. Milton Chapman, Miss Dorothy Millham and Miss Helen Bonner and many others.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

DEC 10 1936

Fashionables Applaud the Boston Symphony

The appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Masonic Temple Wednesday was the signal for all good music lovers to turn out by the hundreds to fill the huge hall for the notable event.

Mrs. John S. Newberry and Mrs. Cameron B. Waterman were together, while John S. Newberry, Jr., squired Peggy Seyburn. Mrs. J. Bell Moran and Mrs. William B. Colburn were present, as were Mrs. Henry P. Williams and Mrs. Brewster Loud.

Others were Mr. and Mrs. Edward N. Hartwick, Mary Lou Anderson, Deedie Dickinson, Suzanne Sibley, Aileen Keena, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Paddock, Mr. and Mrs. John Lord Booth, Walter Meeks, and Mr. and Mrs. Herbert B. Trix.

* * *

W. A. McCarty, of Highland Ave., Dearborn, returned Wednesday morning from Augusta, Ga.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

DEC 8 - 1936

Boston Symphony Group Excites Superlatives In Concert at Eastman

At the Eastman Theater — Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, presented by Rochester Civic Music Association. The program:

Symphony in B Flat, No. 102 .... Haydn
"La Mer," Three Orchestral Sketches .... Debussy
Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Opus 68 .... Brahms

By David Kessler

Leaving the Eastman Theater—scene of the annual Rochester concert of the Boston concert of the Boston Symphony last night—someone inquires:

"What CAN you write that will convey even a portion of the beauty of the music we heard?"

What, indeed?

It poses a problem, one that is usually solved by saying in several hundred carefully chosen words that the Boston Symphony is the finest orchestra of the present day—a conclusion that is indisputable.

Dr. Koussevitsky's orchestra is a constantly fused mass of rich, dark tone, beautiful beyond belief. And this rare quality does not stem from the super-excellence of any one section.

There are those sighing, singing strings; the plaintive, haunting woodwind; the mellow, challenging brass, and the surging ebb and flow of the bass and percussion. It is obvious, that virtuosity sits in every chair in the orchestra. More remarkable even is the fact that such individual brilliance could be welded into a unified instrument that mirrors with perfection every thought of the conductor.

With such a piece of musical mechanism at his command, what joy it must be for a conductor of Dr. Koussevitsky's attainments to range through a program like last night's, with the Haydn and Brahms symphonies and the Debussy "La Mer."

To the enthusiastic acclaim of a capacity audience, the conductor embarked upon the Haydn symphony, justly called one of the three greatest works of that master.

Here is music that, in construction, seems naive and almost childlike compared with the handicraft of Brahms and Debussy. Yet it is a fair expression of the Eighteenth Century composer's genius, with its robust humor and broad thematic strength. The very simplicity of Haydn's symphony imposes a task on an orchestra.

The performance last night brought out every vestige of its beauty, especially in the grand little folk tune that motivates the minuet and the swift moving theme of the finale. Dr. Koussevitzky communicated to his orchestra an apparent relish for and sympathy with Haydn that made the performance something to treasure in memory.

The Debussy trio of sketches was played with mechanical perfection. The writer must disagree with some of the pointed exaggerations in the conductor's reading of the score, by which ordinarily lofty lyrical passages became somewhat saccharine and the progression of breeze and lapping waters to roaring wind and dashing waves was too abrupt. In spite of that, the instrumental clarity made one almost forget preconceived ideas of interpretation.

It was with the Brahms that Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra reached the heights. I never again expect to hear such completely lovely quality of tone as the string section displayed throughout this symphony. And the short oboe solo in the second movement was singularly beautiful.

The Boston conductor seemed less personal than before in his approach to Brahms. It was the most completely satisfying reading of this score in my memory. He caught the brooding strength of Brahms from the start and never permitted the virility of the work to ebb.

Brahms, as J. N. Burk reminds us in his admirable program notes, waited fourteen years before permitting his first symphony to be played in public.

He had told friends:

"I shall never compose a symphony. You have no conception of how the likes of us feel when he hear the tramp of a giant like Beethoven behind us."

Brahms need not have been so deferent to Beethoven. His symphony, especially as it was played last night, does not suffer in comparison with any other of either the past or present.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

DEC 8 - 1936

The CONCERT

By CHARLES E. COLE

Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Eastman

SUPERLATIVES are inescapable in any account of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Eastman Theater. It was the high point, for this reviewer, of this or any other season in Rochester's musical history.

It was music in its purest sense, flawlessly played, surpassingly beautiful in interpretation, appealing to the emotion and the intellect.

Nor are we likely to be alone in our extravagant viewpoint, for the audience called Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, back nine or ten times, finally standing to cheer the great director and his players.

There were only three numbers on the program, the Haydn Symphony in B flat No. 192; Debussy's "La Mer," and the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor. The latter took up the entire second half of the program, lasting some 50 minutes. If that sounds tedious, you underestimate the magnificent music played, the resources of the Boston Symphony and Koussevitzky's magic baton.

Although it seemed that nothing could excel the splendor of the first two numbers, it remained for the fourth, adagio, movement, of the Brahms symphony to lift the concert to empyrean heights. With its sublime grandeur of melody, its chords like the mighty music of the spheres and its splendidly played solos and horn passages, it was something not soon to be forgotten.

Only in the allegro of the first movement in the Haydn symphony could there be detected a slight raggedness in the strings, but that soon cleared itself up and from then on the concert was pure delight.

From the simple themes of the Haydn composition, with their rich embroidery, precise phrases in the menuetto in antique style, the shift to the elusive mood of the Debussy suite was accomplished effortlessly by the players.

This particular number represents for us Debussy at his best. It is freer of the decadence and eroticism of many of his compositions, although it does have traces of the latter quality. It is essentially a tone poem; the first section conveys the brooding, mystical atmosphere of the great deep; intangible, fleeting as mist. In more realistic vein, the second part creates the rise and fall of the waves and the beating of surf. It ends with the tumultuous "dialog of wind and sea" climaxed by a series of crashing chords and the final abrupt boom of the drum.

Since we seem to be indulging in lyrical metaphor, we might compare Koussevitzky to some titanic Olympian god in frenzied reign over the elements, guiding the orchestra from whispering nuances to sonorous crescendoes, sometimes pleading, sometimes commanding, sometimes placating the unleashed forces.

If the rest of the musical season should seem a little drab, it will be directly owing to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Koussevitzky

---

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

Dec. [illegible]/36

MUSIC REVIEW

By ISABELLE WORKMAN EVANS

erge Koussevitzky, vibrant and agnetic conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led his musicians in a concert last night in Elmwood Music Hall, which will long be remembered by those present. A capacity audience applauded and cheered the artists for their perfect as is humanly interpretations of masterpieces possible. It is certain that every listener must have regreted the necessity for returning to earth after an evening spent in a heavenly realm of tone!

The well constructed program was replete with interesting music. The brilliant Roman Carnival Overture by Berlioz, thet etmotinal Prelude to Lohengrin by Wagner, the lilting Scherzo in G minor from the Octet, Op. 20 by Mendelssohn, the impressionistic Divertimento from Le Baiser de la Fee (The Fairy's Kiss), and the dramatic fifth Symphony by Beethoven.

The perfectly synchronized choirs of the orchestra wre well balanced by the arrangement. This of course is a matter which varies with different conductors. Dr. Koussevitzky's division of the bass, 'celols to the right and basses to the left, forms a resonant support for the violins grouped to the left and the violas forward to thet right. The viola section and the bass group are of great merit. The entire orchestra is a grand instrument and when played by a conductor whose technique comprises totally independent and equally eloquent hands, remarkably clear intelect, thorough knowledge, and imaginative inspiration, what more could be desired?

All this music was so utterly beautiful that it seems difficult to remark about some numbers to the exclusion of others. This listener was particularly impressed by the "singing" tones of the various choirs, especially the violins, in the Lohengrin prelude. Dr. Koussevitzky's molding of delicate phrases, the sensitivity of the response of the musicians and the control of dynamics were amazing. The gayety of Mendelssohn were delineated exquisitely while the potent powers and characteristic charms of the Stravinsky were a revelation. The humor of the Danses Suisses was most effective; the rhythmic complexities of the same movement were treated with perfect clarity, while the difficult passages were excellently played by the wind instrumentalists.

The precision of the introduction to the Beethoven was breathtaking. Dr. Koussevitzky's amazing left hand seemed to be everywhere at once; a cue is never too minute to be cared for by this wonderful leader. The Andante con moto was absolutely free in expression. The beautiful 'cello themes were outstanding while every phase of the brilliant finale received its due proportion.

This superb concert was another presentation of the Zorah B. Berry series. The next recital will be given jointly by Helen Oelheim and Richard Crooks on January 12th.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

12/9

DEC 9 - 1936

Boston Symphony Returns

Koussevitzky and Superb Organization Greeted by Packed House—Receive Ovation.

By EDWARD DURNEY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which last played in this city in December, 1934, provided local music lovers another memorable occasion Tuesday evening in Elmwood Music hall, playing under the baton of the dynamic Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. In the case of the Boston symphony two years is too great an interval between visits, and it is to be hoped this lapse will not be permitted again.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians come to us again and again in such fine fettle that their superb accounting becomes a foregone conclusion. Assuredly it was such high expectation that prompted scores and scores of music lovers to make their way to Elmwood hall and tax its capacity, Tuesday evening.

Eulogy of the electrifying Koussevitzky and his band is an old story. Koussevitzky's indications to his men are unmistakable; they comprehend a wealth of nuance and essential detail, they breathe unfailing vitality of spirit; yet the Koussevitzky manner bespeaks the eloquence of poise. And around him are men of individual and collective skill, providing him a medium of great flexibility, tonal purity and resonance.

The familiar and the novel of Tuesday evening's program were welcomed gladly. The beloved Fifth, of Beethoven, and the "Lohengrin" prelude again were presented, also the rarely heard (in these parts) Scherzo, from the Mendelssohn Octet, Opus 20, and, in local premiere, the Divertimento from Stravinsky's allegorical ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee." The proceedings began with the Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture.

The Stravinsky music, which the composer has made into an orchestral suite from the ballet, is dedicated "to the muse of Tschaikowsky" and is based on "melodies and characteristic turns of expression" of Tschaikowsky. The listener finds the Tschaikowsky element no secret, and occasionally the style calls to mind other influences. At any rate the suite is fascinating, often droll in its speech and orchestration, often grotesque, often utterly alluring. This frankly descriptive score was lucidly unfolded by Koussevitzky and his players, and to the delight of the audience.

The testy "Lohengrin" prelude came into its own in an interpretation suave, serene and of spiritual exaltation, while the charmingly typical Mendelssohn Scherzo was played to a nicety.

Koussevitzky's reading of the Beethoven C Minor symphony always is vital, at times rugged, always authoritative; an interpretation of highlights signalizing profound musicianship. This latest presentation was eminently successful and from beginning to end held the audience spellbound. The slow movement, one of the loveliest in the literature, fell on the ear as a thing of ageless, revealing beauty.

The visitors could little doubt the joy and appreciation of their audience. Ovational applause at the close detained the players and brought their leader back to the stage again and again. Dr. Koussevitzky, in his acknowledgment, shared honors with his musicians.

Zorah B. Berry brought the Boston organization as the fourth attraction of her concert series.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN 12/9/36

JOSE ITURBI will lead the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra during the concert broadcast over WBAL at 3.15 P. M.

"Leonore" Overture No. 3....Beethoven
"Haffner" Symphony............Mozart
Toccata and Fugue...............Bach

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA concert, at 8 P. M. over WBAL will come from Sanders Theater, Harvard University. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. Howard Goding will be piano soloist.

Overture Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet" ....Tschaikowsky
Concerto No. 2 in D Minor, Opus 23....................MacDowell

SAMUEL G. KLING, Crime Reporter of WBAL, will conduct a broadcast from the Maryland Penitentiary at 11.15 P. M.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 9 - 1936

Hall Rings With Applause For Boston Symphony Here

Koussevitsky and Orchestra Received With Great Enthusiasm by Capacity Audience; Admirable Program Beautifully Played

By MARY M. HOWARD
Times Music Critic

It is long since the walls of Elmwood Music Hall have echoed such storms of unabating applause as last evening greeted the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which, ~~conducted by~~ Serge Koussevitzky, gave the fourth concert in the Zorah B. Berry series. The audience was a capacity one and its enthusiasm could scarcely be transcended.

There was cause for this warmth of approval, for the program was an admirable one and to its performance the men brought their full equipment of splendid technical efficiency, well balanced dynamics, broad musicianship and exquisite shading.

It was both just and gracious that Dr. Koussevitzky signalled his players repeatedly to share with him the demonstrative tributes of applause.

Program Listed

"The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; the Prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; a G minor Scherzo from a string octet composed by Mendelssohn at 16; four movements from Stravinsky's "Le Baiser de la Fee," a ballet written for the dancer, Ida Rubinstein, and Beethoven's fifth symphony were the program numbers.

The Mendelssohn octet, which he later scored for orchestra, is altogether captivating in its delicacy and grace. It was played with a tonal daintiness like fairy footsteps and with irresistible naivete.

Stravinsky dedicated his ballet "To the muse of Tschaikowsky," on whose writings he draws for many themes of the work. Fragments of the "Nutcracker Suite," the waltz "Natha," and even the familiar "Humoresque for Piano" are woven into this whimsical, sometimes grotesque, Stravinskyan music, which holds one's attention constantly through its novel and ingenious scoring for orchestra. It made a very agreeable impression.

Symphony Is Climax

The "Lohengrin" prelude, with the beautiful, floating harmonies of the violin choir, subdivided into many parts, from which emerges the Grail motive, grows to full splendor, gradually dies away, received vital utterance.

The climax of the evening came with the playing of the symphony. This music of sheer beauty and profound grandeur was given such a reading, and such a performance as to re-create its nobility and loveliness. It cast a spell over the audience that was only broken at its close.

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

DEC 9 - 1936

Holmes Lecture, Symphony Occasion Several Parties

P. A. Harsches To Entertain Friends Before Attending Talk

BY MARION H. FROST

SEVERAL large evening functions will attract groups of society this week and next. The affairs include the Burton Holmes lecture tomorrow evening, the Boston Symphony the following evening, and the midnight benefit preview Saturday in the Paramount theater sponsored by the women's auxiliary to the Toledo Society for Crippled Children.

Several dinner parties will precede the lecture by Burton Holmes in the Toledo club tomorrow at 7 p. m. in the lounge.

MR. AND MRS. PAUL H. HARSCH will have as their guests at the dinner Miss Leslie Leland, and their son and daughter, Paul and Miss Kate Harsch.

Among others dining at the club will be Mr. and Mrs. Jay Lockwood, and Mr. and Mrs. Beryl Boyer.

THE midnight preview Saturday night in the Paramount theater of "Give Me Your Heart," sponsored by the Women's auxiliary to the Toledo Society for Crippled Children for the benefit of the convalescent home, will occasion much entertaining.

Dr. and Mrs. Albert Bershon will have a group of physicians and their wives as guests at a buffet supper in their home preceding the showing. Their guests will include Dr. and Mrs. John Marshall, Dr. and Mrs. Harold Crosby and Dr. and Mrs. Maury of Findlay, Dr. and Mrs. Wade Stone, Dr. and Mrs. Eugene Ockuly, Dr. and Mrs. A. J. Kuehn, Dr. and Mrs. Wendell Green, Dr. and Mrs. Bernard Karwowski and Dr. and Mrs. Burt Chollett.

* * *

MR. AND MRS. PRESTON THAL also will entertain at dinner before the preview.

Mrs. Philip S. Trost, president of the association, and Mrs. A. J. Spieker, co-chairman with Mrs. Frank Stranahan for arrangements for the Saturday affair, are meeting their captains at tea this afternoon in the Toledo Woman's club to complete plans for the benefit production.

* * *

A BRILLIANT audience will attend the complimentary concert to members of the Toledo Museum of Art Friday evening when the Boston Symphony will be heard under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. Many dinner parties will be given preceding the concert.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

DEC 9 - 1936

A Fine Artist.

Last evening in Carnegie ha
New York, Efrem Zimbalist ga a violin recital to commemorate t
25th anniversary of his Americ debut. Olin Downes of the Ne York Times recalls that his first a pearance in America was ma with the Boston Symphony Orche tra in Boston on Oct. 27, 1911. H played in New York with the Phi harmonic under Stransky on No
3 of the same year. Zimbalist wa the second of the three most famou pupils of the late Leopold Aue
the other two being Mischa Elma and Jascha Heifetz. In his Bosto debut Zimbalist played the Glaz now concerto. The master and hi three famous pupils all becam
American citizens. Appreciation o
Zimbalist's talents came more slow ly than in the case of some of th others. But he has steadily de veloped and now has a large follow ing. A fine artist, and a sincer
one is the general verdict.

It has now been decided that the Metropolitan Opera will open its season with Wagner's "Die Walkuere" with an eminent cast which will include Kirsten Flagstad, Elizbeth Rethberg, Kerstin Thorburg, Lauritz Melchior, Friederich Schorr and Emanuel List with Bodansky conducting. This selection—and it is an unusual one for an opener—may be taken as a marked tribute to the excellence and the appeal of the great German operas as presented at the Metropolitan.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 9 - 1936

Zimbalist Plays To Mark 25th Concert Year

Recital at Carnegie Hall Celebrates Anniversary of First American Tour

Eva Gauthier at Gotham

Sings Spanish Program Dedicated to Schindler

Celebrating the twenty-fifth anniversary of his first tour of this country, Efrem Zimbalist gave a recital last night in Carnegie Hall, playing Kreisler's arrangement of Corelli's "La Folia"; Eugene Ysaye's sonata in D minor for violin alone, Bruch's Scotch Fantasy, Arthur Loesser's "California" and transcriptions of short pieces by Schubert and Paganini. Samuel Chotzinoff, music critic of "The New York Post," was the accompanying pianist. A large audience was present to acclaim this observance of the quarter-centennial of a series of events which were to prove highly auspicious for violin music, and music in general in this city.

Mr. Zimbalist had made his American debut in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's home concerts of October 27-28, 1911, playing Glazounoff's violin concerto under Max Fiedler's direction. He made his bow to New York and Carnegie Hall in the Philharmonic Society's concerts of November 2-3 in the same concerto with Josef Stransky conducting. Reappearing with the Philharmonic on the following Sunday, November 5, he played the Tchaikovsky concerto. His first recital in Carnegie Hall was on the afternoon of November 10, twenty-four hours after a song recital in the same auditorium by the much-admired young opera and concert soprano, Mme. Alma Gluck, whom Mr. Zimbalist was to marry three years later.

The violinist observed the anniversary appropriately last night by playing at the top of his form, both in regard to the clear, mellow and even quality of his tone and to the familiar and still remarkable dexterity of his technical skill, as it was exhibited in the closing swift-paced bravura passages of the Ysaye sonata, as well as in his exceptional mastery of fine points of interpretative color.

When he first played here Henry E. Krehbiel wrote in the New York Tribune: "Mr. Zimbalist is a fine acquisition from every point of view—a violinist with a peculiarly pure and golden quality of tone; an artist every inch of him; a musician in all his instincts, in intelligence, in feeling; . . . master of an irreproachable technique and impeccable taste, of most ingratiating purity of intonation." And this could well be paraphrased to describe Mr. Zimbalist's playing today.

Mr. Chotzinoff, noted in his pre-journalistic days as a foremost accompanist, gave the violinist skillful and sympathetic co-operation. At the close of the program Mr. Zimbalist was handed a wreath from the artists of the "Art of Musical Russia" company.

Another program of reminiscent significance was offered last night by Eva Gauthier, who began a series of concerts at the Hotel Gotham, giving representative examples of the valuable while little-known music which the soprano introduced or made better known here during many years of artistic activity.

Yesterday's recital was devoted to Spanish music of various types and periods, beginning with fourteenth century and other early Christmas songs arranged by the late Kurt Schindler, to whom Mme. Gauthier had dedicated this program. Seventeenth and eighteenth century Spanish music was represented by works of Jose Marin, Jose Bassa, Pablo Esteve and Antonio Literes, a group was devoted to songs of Isaac Albeniz, while more modern composers were represented by Obradors, Mompou, Halffter, Granados, Turina and Da Falla. Celius Dougherty was the accompanist. A good-sized audience applauded the singer, whose pioneering and exploration in regions without the beaten track of vocal program-making have long merited the gratitude of New York music lovers.

F. D. P.

MUSIC REVIEW

Buffalo Dec. 9/36

By ISABELLE WORKMAN EVANS

Serge Koussevitzky, vibrant and magnetic conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led his musicians in a concert last night in Elmwood Music Hall, which will long be remembered by those present. A capacity audience applauded and cheered the artists for their perfect as is humanly interpretations of masterpieces possible. It is certain that every listener must have regreted the necessity for returning to earth after an evening spent in a heavenly realm of tone!

The well constructed program was replete with interesting music. The brilliant Roman Carnival Overture by Berlioz, thet etmotinal Prelude to Lohengrin by Wagner, the lilting Scherzo in G minor from the Octet, Op. 20 by Mendelssohn, the impressionistic Divertimento from Le Baiser de la Fee (The Fairy's Kiss), and the dramatic fifth Symphony by Beethoven.

The perfectly synchronized choirs of the orchestra wre well balanced by the arrangement. This of course is a matter which varies with different conductors. Dr. Koussevitzky's division of the bass, 'celols to the right and basses to the left, forms a resonant support for the violins grouped to the left and the violas forward to thet right. The viola section and the bass group are of great merit. The entire orchestra is a grand instrument and when played by a conductor whose technique comprises totally independent and equally eloquent hands, remarkably clear intelect, thorough knowledge, and imaginative inspiration, what more could be desired?

All this music was so utterly beautiful that it seems difficult to remark about some numbers to the exclusion of others. This listener was particularly impressed by the "singing" tones of the various choirs, especially the violins, in the Lohengrin prelude. Dr. Koussevitzky's molding of delicate phrases, the sensitivity of the response of the musicians and the control of dynamics were amazing. The gayety of Mendelssohn were delineated exquisitely while the potent powers and characteristic charms of the Stravinsky were a revelation. The humor of the Danses Suisses was most effective; the rhythmic complexities of the same movement were treated with perfect clarity, while the difficult passages were excellently played by the wind instrumentalists.

The precision of the introduction to the Beethoven was breathtaking. Dr. Koussevitzky's amazing left hand seemed to be everywhere at once; a cue is never too minute to be cared for by this wonderful leader. The Andante con moto was absolutely free in expression. The beautiful 'cello themes were outstanding while every phase of the brilliant finale received its due proportion.

This superb concert was another presentation of the Zorah B. Berry series. The next recital will be given jointly by Helen Oelheim and Richard Crooks on January 12th.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

Sell-Out For Concert Seen

Boston Symphony Here Tomorrow Night

Another sell-out for the Choral Union concert tomorrow night in Hill auditorium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was indicated today by Dr. Charles A. Sink, president of the University of Michigan School of Music.

The few tickets remaining were expected to be sold today, President Sink said, assuring an audience of close to 5,000 persons and a sell-out for the fifth time this year.

The concert of the Boston orchestra, one of the world's leading musical organizations, will be its sixth in as many years and will be heightened by the appearance of Joseph Brinkman, professor of piano in the School of Music, as soloist.

Brinkman was invited to play Sowerby's Concerto No. 2 in E major for piano and orchestra by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, after he had successfully presented the work with orchestra last week in Boston.

Four well-known orchestrations appear on the program in addition to the concerto. They are "The Roman Carnival" of Berlioz, Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," the Scherzo in G minor from the Octet, Op. 2 of Mendelssohn, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

RO
Den

Var
For Dra

DRAM wh
Da too, pr serious Mu
ing the long-aw the Ea evening.
An in from so nounced
"Othello"
the Aud and Sat that the the seas
"To th
"ty Th good cr three m tomorro

Crowd Cheers at Program by the Boston Symphony

Detroit Dec. 10/36

By RUSSELL McLAUCHLIN

An audience of almost 5,000 stood up and cheered at the conclusion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in the Masonic Auditorium. There were those who shouted "Bravo!" and there were others who made a joyful noise more commonly heard at Navin Field. It was as hearty an example of unleashed enthusiasm as has ever concluded an orchestral concert in Detroit.

The cause and fountain head of the excitement was a remarkable orchestra. In reporting the deeds of the Boston Symphony, under the scholarly and well-tailored Serge Koussevitzky, there is a temptation simply to trundle in a wheel-barrow full of adjectives and dump them between the column-rules. This is

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST GAZETTE

DEC 10 1936

Orchestra Leader

GREENWICH, CONN.

DEC 1 - 1936

UP BATON!

(Continued from page 154) melodic lines, intensified rhythms, and brought vitality and colour to black symbols.

The name Koussevitzky was encircled by an aureole years before he was invited to rescue the Boston Symphony. Legends surrounding his gifts, achievements, and personality aroused high anticipation. Koussevitzky came through handsomely. In an incredibly short time, the orchestra was restored to a greater glory than ever before. Above all towered the magnetic figure of Koussevitzky. Genius, showmanship, suave social grace, tyrannical methods, all the recognizable features of a luminous personality.

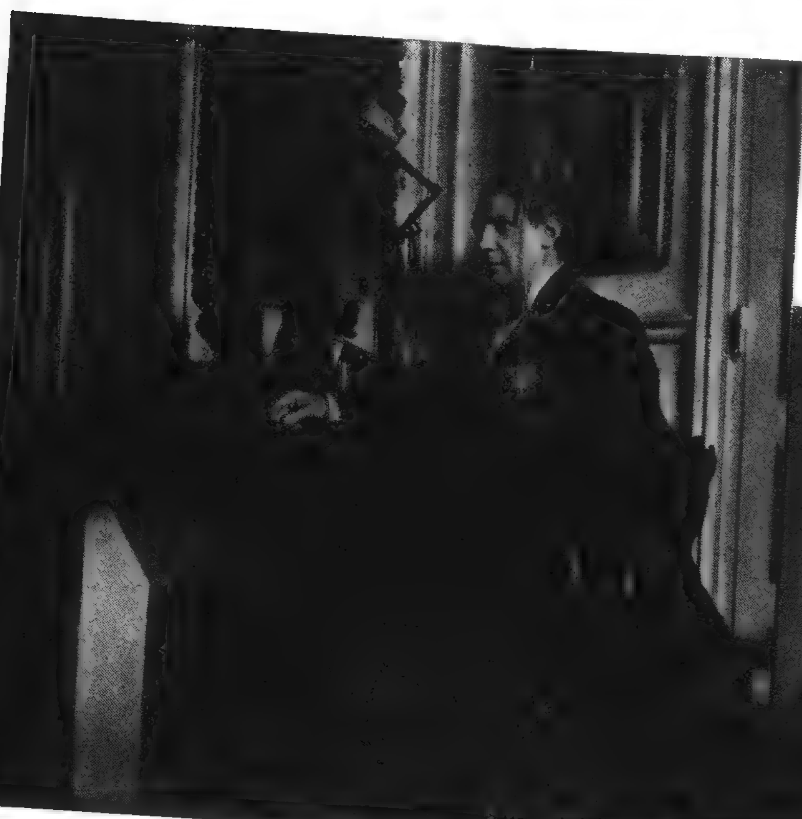
The possibilities of exploiting such personalities are sensational; characteristics entirely subordinate to musical endowments are bound to be exaggerated and capitalized to impress further an already prostrate public, and to swell box-office. We are apt to lose sight that the news we read, the stories which make good table-talk, stress the mere externals around achievements obtained primarily by native talent, heroic labour, and selfless devotion. We are apt to mistake incidental idiosyncrasies for significant norms with which to measure all conductors.

The Toscanini stories, for instance, emanate from his genius. His gifts are not employed for self-glorification, but as offerings to music. Stokowski's dramatic leanings, his personal peculiarities, are overgarments that cover the figure of a conductorial wizard. Koussevitzky's sartorial perfection, his tyrannical manner lead to publicity, of course, but they are supplementary personal quirks of one whose performances have the heat of white fire, the precision of a machine.

The signal qualities of such men are mastery, singleness of purpose, and superb control, all dedicated to the enrichment of our musical life. Why the hue and cry against residual qualities which are so overshadowed? They have aided in furthering a superlative standard which we can not renounce. Most certainly will we not wilfully renounce it. With the approaching twilight of the gods, we can but hope that from the dawn will arise godlings who will then be given undivided power and long years within their organizations. When a Chosen One emerges as the public idol, it will but hasten his power to thrill, to keep the houses packed, and to elicit a benediction upon the symphonic realm. There can be no conquest by Personality alone, no survival of the slickest. The cardinal requisite, and for this certainty we thank the glamorous ones, will always be genius.

DEBENHAM

RUTH GORDON IN "THE COUNTRY WIFE"

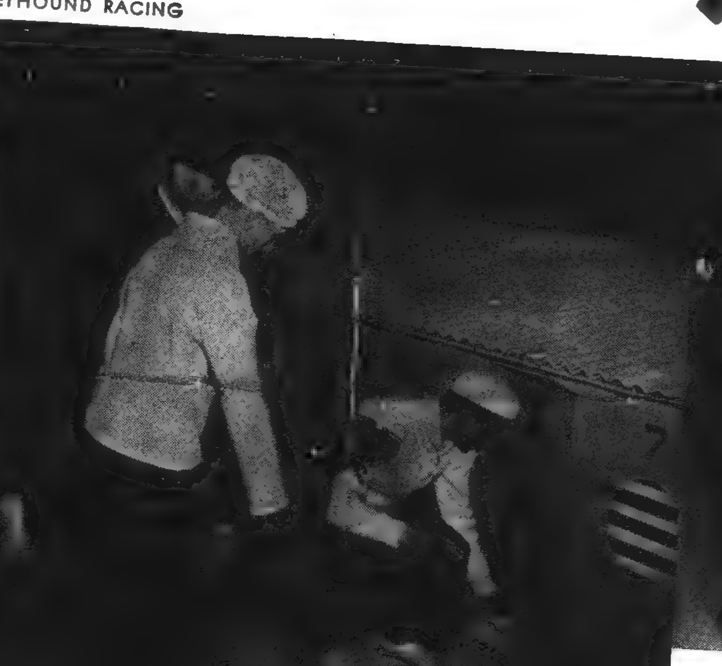


PICASSO HIMSELF

KATHARINE HEPBURN

YORK

GREYHOUND RACING



GARDES MOBILES

HANFSTAENGL, MUNICH

THE RUBENS SHOW

PARI

"THE TWO BOUQUETS"

SASHA

Ravel and the

UP BATON!

(Continued from page 71) ideals, he resorted to circus-like histrionics which were far less noticed than the steep descent of his artistry. With each concert, his prestige diminished, his audience dwindled, and his orchestra atrophied. "Mengy" was through.

The legends attached to Toscanini spring entirely from his colossal knowledge, fantastic memory, and consummate zeal. My own experiences with him have revealed the simple, logical, and entirely artistic considerations motivating dramatic scenes that read like publicity hocus-pocus. At the first rehearsal of my composition, "Parade," Maestro emerged from the wings, pale, intent, walking as though preoccupied. He reached the podium and slowly lifted his head. "Parade," he said, and waited. Then two sharp upward raps of the baton. With utmost economy of motion, the stick swung like the pendulum of a small clock, and the music began. A careless mistake, and the sensitive face ruffled for an instant. Three raps of the baton. Over again. Another mistake. "Stupido!" Again. Something else went wrong. Contempt spread over his features. Again. Then two successive errors, and the orchestra was in three different places at the same time.

Then came the storm. Verbal abuse rising to uncontrollable fury, culminating in a vicious sweep of the baton. It struck a stand and broke in two. Trembling with rage, Toscanini snatched another. The verbal tantrum continued . . . then crack! . . . the new baton was deliberately broken in his hands. Suddenly, pausing for breath, Toscanini grabbed the manuscript that was resting on a table, and, for a moment, I ceased to be a fascinated onlooker. But it did not go the way of those demolished batons. He merely threw it on the floor. Then he kicked over a stand and sat down on the podium, his head between his hands.

I recalled the alleged meeting between the irresistible Farrar and the immovable Maestro. It was rehearsal at the Metropolitan. As greetings were exchanged, there was a disturbing gleam in the eye of the little man. When the diva saw the baton descend like the blade of a guillotine, observed the awed expressions of the hardened virtuosi of the orchestra, she felt an understandable loss of serenity. Her nervousness resulted in deviations from pitch. Increasing nervousness led her more out of tune. Three cracks of the baton. Then out of the awkward silence, the frosty voice of Maestro, "Perhaps Mademoiselle will be so kind to give the orchestra her 'A'?"

"Bughouse. All them guys is bughouse," once commented a player, as Stokowski sprinted to the podium, raised his hand in Messianic benediction, and surveyed the men with the hypnotic gaze of the snake-charmer. On another occasion in Philadelphia, we were rehearsing my second piano concerto. I was running over some passages on the piano. The men were practising and tuning. With a sudden hush, all sound ceased, like the lull before the storm. The door blew open, and Stokowski flew in, like a rush of wind, and leaped to the podium. In a high voice, delivered as rapidly as you can read, he said, "Chasins concerto first movement four measures after number twelve . . . no, make it three. . . ." Swish! . . . went the beautiful hands. Miraculous to me, the men actually played.

I wasn't with them, of course. I hadn't the faintest idea what it was all about. Had Stokowski said it as one reads it, I might have scrambled to the place, but it was given in that peculiar mumbo-jumbo which alters with his moods. It sounded something like this: "Chasins cunsharto firs' mooment faw meshes after num'er twelf . . . no, make it tree. . . ." Swish! I marveled at the orchestra. In those split seconds, the men went through the music on their stands, found the specified score, opened it to the first movement, found number twelve, counted four bars after number twelve . . . no, three, adjusted their instruments, and succeeded in starting together with electric precision. I thought, "Theatricalism, yes . . . but what control! He uses no baton . . . now that every bottle baby conducts without score, he goes them one better." But these reflections disappeared as the shapely digits caressed (Continued on page 155) announced Wednesday. The concert will be given Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

10X

---

Prof. Joseph Brinkman, of the School of Music, who last week played Sowerby's Concerto No. 2 in E major for piano and orchestra with the symphony in Boston, has been invited by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, to repeat the number in Ann Arbor.

---

an absence of critical detachment; two virtues which should prevail. In considering such a concert as this one, however, they are hard to practice.

It is a great orchestra numerically, with 110 members. Koussevitzky has been its lord for enough years to impress completely his brains and musicianship on the whole abandon re with great single exam formance ever heard great wisdo evening exp terminal ep the crowd c

---

INFORMATION OBSCURED

up Baton!

THOSE of us who like our orchestral geniuses with glamour have cause for dismay. Toscanini's retirement from the New York Philharmonic has been capitalized to suggest that this is the propitious moment to dethrone the King of the Baton and "to let music speak for itself."

It is naïve not to recognize that accidents of personality play as important a part in orchestral history as in all other history. The system underlying orchestras is an inevitable development, fostered by the same forces that determine the policies of baseball, moving-pictures, and even of nations.

The orchestral family springs from Leipzig, where the Gewandhaus is the oldest of living orchestras. Its place as a great orchestra first came under the régime of Nikisch, whose genius was matched by his showmanship, whose finger-tips, eyes, and hair were so romanticized that, on his American tour in 1912, the front pages were alive with his pictures and mobs rushed to hear the "Thousand-dollar-a-night conductor."

Some eighty years ago, the New York Philharmonic engaged Karl Bergmann as permanent conductor. A competent musician, he laboured for twenty-one years to develop the orchestra and the taste of his audience. He succeeded in arousing the subscribers to the point where they recognized his shortcomings. At that time, the public was hearing of a young firebrand, Theodore Thomas, whose effect on orchestra and public was volcanic. He possessed a magic baton, a dictatorial manner, and superb histrionic ability. Thomas was a natural, and the Philharmonic engaged him. His programs, at first conservative, began to be coloured with the new music. At a Liszt première, Thomas encountered a hostile audience, annoyed with the growing preponderance of unfamiliar compositions, and bent on not allowing him to proceed. He turned to the rebellious mob, produced his watch, and calmly announced that he would give the dissenters exactly five minutes to leave. This was the man who gave the New York orchestra its first eminence, who first interpreted here the messages of Berlioz, Liszt, Wagner, and Strauss.

Sagely observing Thomas' value to New York, Chicago decided against courting public indifference by the mere formation of an orchestra under a so-called "competent" conductor. A star was wanted. Thomas, offered this post, accepted, repeated his miracle, and the Chicago Symphony became one of the greatest in the land.

Meanwhile, the Philadelphia band was completely out of the running. Then came Stokowski, the unpredictable paradox. Looking like a combination of Saint Francis and Rasputin, he created a magnificent orchestra, made the head-lines, and packed the halls.

An indifferent start marked Boston's entrance into the symphonic arena. Its preeminence the genius of Dr. Muck, around whom of the World War. He fell into bad to admit that his countrymen were cap rumoured Belgian atrocities. Nor wou Beethoven, or Wagner had anything to situation. ck was subjected to poin the coura nner conviction, and scr stamped hi as an artist, he replied th not a politic an, he could maintain strict termed a da rous enemy: then followe imprisonme and deportation was a shan episode; t plunged their nestra to ins lished to its former glory? W by the name of Koussevitzky . . . .

And so we observe that there are no gre
there are only great conductors. The conclus that music is not able to "speak for itself," on creative interpreters. That an orchestra is medium, in a sense like a piano, which respon of inspiration and mastery of individuals wh

The man who rejuvenates a lifeless orch immortalizes music, is unable to achieve these cept on purely artistic grounds. Before he enco and public opinion, the conductor is on trial be of the orchestra. Parlour tricks are of no avai sceptical tribunal; victory is justly won. Thereaft ondary characteristic of the conqueror assumes importance. His accomplishment and his glamou leader, a superman. People identify themselves wi participate in his greatness. Then the deluge of wors

With every new favourite is revived the com audiences are indiscriminate idolaters. Individu might be, but collectively they have the Voice of th
Artists have forgotten this from time to time. In 19
York audiences were storming the halls to hear a Philharmonic and a revitalization of masterpiece they could speak for themselves, were crying, "B ing an Interpreter!" Mengelberg was the answer. H a ments brought an adulation that steadily mount years of this, and Furtwängler came, then Toscani too, were taken to the public bosom, whereupon Meng jealousy proved his undoing. Music became a lesser co tion as he became preeminently concerned with the riv
"menaced" him, obsessed with the fear that his footho the icy steps of power was insecure. Underestimating th lic, unaware of its uncompromising (Continued on page 15

Crowd Cheers at Program by the Boston Symphony

Detroit Dec. 10/36

By RUSSELL McLAUCHLIN

An audience of almost 5,000 stood up and cheered at the conclusion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in the Masonic Auditorium. There were those who shouted "Bravo!" and there were others who made a joyful noise more commonly heard at Navin Field. It was as hearty an example of unleashed enthusiasm as has ever concluded an orchestral concert in Detroit.

The cause and fountain head of the excitement was a remarkable orchestra. In reporting the deeds of the Boston Symphony, under the scholarly and well-tailored Serge Koussevitzky, there is a temptation simply to trundle in a wheel-barrow full of adjectives and dump them between the column-rules. This is unwise, arguing a poor restraint and an absence of critical detachment; two virtues which should prevail. In considering such a concert as this one, however, they are hard to practice.

It is a great orchestra numerically, with 110 members. Koussevitzky has been its lord for enough years to impress completely his brains and musicianship on the whole caboodle. It is, in a genuine and and unusual sense, an instrument whereon he plays. One never has the feeling, familiar enough at orchestral concerts, that all the conductor's work was done at rehearsal and that his antics before the audience are so much gratuitous window-dressing. Koussevitzky, with a teeming crowd in the seats, works harder than his percussionist and one is sure that, if he got a new idea in the middle of a symphonic movement, he'd make the orchestra play it for him, there and then.

With so much evident virtuosity at the desks and with such a really consecrated leadership as Koussevitzky affords, the Boston Symphony has a brilliance that is unmatched in America and probably in the world. This special quality of brilliance is everywhere in the orchestra. Can you imagine a brilliant—a genuinely brilliant—flute? Or a brilliant contra-bassoon or string-bass? A brilliant tuba? Koussevitzky will instruct you that all these are possible and that a combined voice, whether of a choir or of the whole ensemble, can have a brightness that is almost visible.

One is ashamed to speak of anything as rudimentary as dynamics, however they impart an eloquence to the music. As well compliment a cobbler on his proficiency at mending shoes as to extoll Koussevitzky because he can bring the orchestra's tone up and down.

But program-building, according to the Koussevitzky scheme, is certainly newsworthy. He opened with Handel's Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 6, in G Minor, to reveal the silken quality of the strings. Then came a not familiar work of Sibelius, his symphonic fantasia called "Pohjola's Daughter," which is an immensely effective piece of program-music in which every component of the orchestra blazed like a torch. This was followed by Ravel's much admired suite, "Daphnis and Chloe," with all the instruments having a field day with a thoroughly modern score.

After the intermission came the classic period's greatest survival into harsher times, the First Symphony of Brahms, toward whose nobility the program had marched, step by step. The final movement to abandon restraint and detachment with great relief, was the finest single example of orchestral performance which these ears have ever heard, anywhere. It was a great wisdom that constructed an evening expanding delight, with a terminal episode that should send the crowd crazy.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST GAZETTE

DEC 10 1936

Orchestra Leader

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.
Dr. Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra will give concerts Saturday night and Sunday in Syria Mosque.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BE HEARD HERE

Concerts Listed for Saturday and Sunday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its famed conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will come to Pittsburgh this week for a concert Saturday night and another Sunday afternoon in Syria Mosque.

The Mozart Symphony in C-major and the Cesar Franck Symphony in D-minor, and Stravinsky's Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fee," will be played Saturday night and the Beethoven No. 5 Symphony will be given Sunday afternoon.

Just a month ago, Dr. Koussevitzky was accorded the highest official decoration within the gift of France when he was awarded the ivory and gold star of a commander of the Legion of Honor. Francois de Tessan, French under-secretary of state, who made the presentation said Dr. Koussevitzky was so honored because of his "eminence in music as an artist and interpreter."

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

Dec. 10/36

Music /24

The most spiritually moving flawlessly played concert that has been heard in Detroit this season —and in many seasons—was presented in the Masonic Temple Wednesday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky.

In a program that was arranged with that delicate balance and true artistry for which Koussevitzky is famous, this orchestra showed beyond a shadow of doubt that it is entitled to its rank among the three top-flight orchestras of the United States.

It is difficult to tell what makes an orchestra great. It must have a group of highly skilled musicians, accustomed to playing together, and to performing the most difficult of pieces without an error. It must have numbers —a volume of instruments and a variety. It must have a background of accomplishment over a period of years.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has this, and so have many other orchestras. But the Boston Symphony has in addition a leader who, with a single graceful movement of the hand or the nod of his head, can blend the forces and abilities of all the men into a compact unit that lives, for the moment, for nothing but the music which is being played.

The program opened with Handel, included Sibelius and Ravel, and the First Symphony of Brahms. The range of the program showed the complete mastery of all music which this man has. At the end, the audience was left breathless for a moment, then burst into a round of applause that indicated that the 5,000 persons who packed the auditorium were deeply moved by this superb performance. It proved conclusively that love of music is not dead in this "dynamic city."

The strings alone performed in Handel's "Concerto Grosso," Op. No. 6 in G-minor. Calmly, quietly, but with a firm command of his men, Koussevitzky conducted this number with the incisiveness demanded by Handel, losing no opportunity to blend the melodic phrases and changes in mood into an enchanting whole.

In the following number, "Pohjola's Daughter," Symphonic Fantasia of Sibelius, the depths of beauty and heights of ecstasy of which this modern Finnish composer is capable were ably shown by this orchestra. To say that Koussevitzky did the composer justice with this very difficult composition is ample.

Equally difficult to play was the third number, Fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," music that was written for the Diaghileff Russian Ballet. This magnificent tone picture was brought to vibrant life by the conductor's baton, and one could easily imagine the ballet that it was designed to accompany.

What has been said about the preceding numbers can be repeated endlessly about the Boston Symphony's rendition of the Brahms First Concerto, a work that combines the monumental with the delicate, the somber with the victorious to produce one of the greatest compositions in musical literature.

The thrilling andante movement was played with such romantic calm and tenderness that one really felt he had an insight into the composer's mind. The finale, a song of triumph, was a masterpiece.

Through it all, in one of the front rows, sat Jose Iturbi, who recently conducted a series for the Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

D. L. W.

---

up

THOSE of us who like our orchestral geniuses with glamour have cause for dismay. Toscanini's retirement from the New York Philharmonic has been capitalized to suggest that this is the propitious moment to dethrone the King of the Baton and "to let music speak for itself."

It is naïve not to recognize that accidents of personality play as important a part in orchestral history as in all other history. The system underlying orchestras is an inevitable development, fostered by the same forces that determine the policies of baseball, moving-pictures, and even of nations.

The orchestral family springs from Leipzig, where the Gewandhaus is the oldest of living orchestras. Its place as a great orchestra first came under the régime of Nikisch, whose genius was matched by his showmanship, whose finger-tips,

---

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

DEC 10 1936

Variety to Mark Social Scene For Weekend, with Music, Drama Predominating

DRAMA and music dominate the social scene for this weekend, which is of the busy between-holiday variety.

Dances and dinners are having their place on the program too, providing light diversion and a change from the more serious musical and theater offerings.

Music lovers are doubly blessed this week, for after hearing the Boston Symphony Monday night they have another long-awaited concert in store, the recital of Fritz Kreisler in the Eastman Theater tomorrow evening.

An imposing list of play-goers from social ranks has been announced for the production of "Othello" with Walter Huston at the Auditorium Theater tomorrow and Saturday, and it is probable that the theater will see some of the season's largest audiences.

"To the Ladies" at the Community Theater continues to draw good crowds. It will be given for three more performances, tonight, tomorrow and Saturday night, and

---

Crowd Cheers at Program by the Boston Symphony

By RUSSELL McLAUCHLIN

An audience of almost 5,000 stood up and cheered at the conclusion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in the Masonic Auditorium. There were those who shouted "Bravo!" and there were others who made a joyful noise more commonly heard at Navin Field. It was as hearty an example of unleashed enthusiasm as has ever concluded an orchestral concert in Detroit.

The cause and fountain head of the excitement was a remarkable orchestra. In reporting the deeds of the Boston Symphony, under the scholarly and well-tailored Serge Koussevitzky, there is a temptation simply to trundle in a wheel-barrow full of adjectives and dump them between the column-rules. This is unwise, arguing a poor restraint and an absence of critical detachment; two virtues which should prevail. In considering such a concert as this one, however, they are hard to practice.

It is a great orchestra numerically, with 110 members. Koussevitzky has been its lord for enough years to impress completely his brains and musicianship on the whole caboodle. It is, in a genuine and and unusual sense, an instrument whereon he plays. One never has the feeling, familiar enough at orchestral concerts, that all the conductor's work was done at rehearsal and that his antics before the audience are so much gratuitous window-dressing. Koussevitzky, with a teeming crowd in the seats, works harder than his percussionist and one is sure that, if he got a new idea in the middle of a symphonic movement, he'd make the orchestra play it for him, there and then.

With so much evident virtuosity at the desks and with such a really consecrated leadership as Koussevitzky affords, the Boston Symphony has a brilliance that is unmatched in America and probably in the world. This special quality of brilliance is everywhere in the orchestra. Can you imagine a brilliant—a genuinely brilliant—flute? Or a brilliant contra-bassoon or string-bass? A brilliant tuba? Koussevitzky will instruct you that all these are possible and that a combined voice, whether of a choir or of the whole ensemble, can have a brightness that is almost visible.

One is ashamed to speak of anything as rudimentary as dynamics, however they impart an eloquence to the music. As well compliment a cobbler on his proficiency at mending shoes as to extoll Koussevitzky because he can bring the orchestra's tone up and down.

But program-building, according to the Koussevitzky scheme, is certainly newsworthy. He opened with Handel's Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 6, in G Minor, to reveal the silken quality of the strings. Then came a not familiar work of Sibelius, his symphonic fantasia called "Pohjola's Daughter," which is an immensely effective piece of program-music in which every component of the orchestra blazed like a torch. This was followed by Ravel's much admired suite, "Daphnis and Chloe," with all the instruments having a field day with a thoroughly modern score.

After the intermission came the classic period's greatest survival into harsher times, the First Symphony of Brahms, toward whose nobility the program had marched, step by step. The final movement to abandon restraint and detachment with great relief, was the finest single example of orchestral performance which these ears have ever heard, anywhere. It was a great wisdom that constructed an evening expanding delight, with terminal episode that should send the crowd crazy.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

10/31

Ann Arbor Predicts a Sellout for Concert

ANN ARBOR, Dec. 9—A sellout of tickets for the fifth Choral Union concert at the University of Michigan's Hill Auditorium is virtually assured, Dr. Charles Sink, president of the School of Music, announced Wednesday. The concert will be given Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Prof. Joseph Brinkman, of the School of Music, who last week played Sowerby's Concerto No. 2 in E major for piano and orchestra with the symphony in Boston, has been invited by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, to repeat the number in Ann Arbor.

135

TOLEDO, O.
NEWS-BEE

DEC 10 1936

Boston Orchestra To Play Varied Program Friday

Berlioz' Overture, Brahms' Second Symphony Listed For Art Museum Concert

By RODOLFO FLORIPE

Select examples of modern and romantic music make up the program which the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will play at 8:30 p. m. Friday in the Museum of rt Peristyle.

This is the annual concert given for the Museum members and it is not included in the regular concert series. This will also mark the third successive year that the Boston orchestra has been the featured attraction at the annual members' concert.

The program will open with Berlioz' "Overture, Roman Carnival," followed by the "Divertimento" from "Le Baiser de la Fee," by Stravinsky; the orchestral fragments from the second suite of "Daphis and Chloe," by Ravel, and it will end with Brahms' "Symphony No. 2 in D Major."

Was Opera Overture.

The "Overture Roman Carnival" was originally written by Berlioz to serve as the introduction to the second act of his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," which turned out to be a failure. It is based on two chief subjects — Benvenuto's love song in the opera's first act, which comes after a short introduction, and the "saltarello," a wild Italian dance of vigorous and impetuous rhythm which is delivered with glowing brilliance. Toward the end the dance figure becomes dominant and the music moves on to a powerful, brilliant conclusion.

The Stravinsky number should be of particular interest to Toledo concert goers because it was played here last year in a special arrangement for violin and piano with Stravinsky himself at the piano and Samuel Dushkin, violinist. The composition on the program of the Stravinsky concert is listed as a "divertimento, inspired by the Muse of Tschaikowsky." It is permissible, therefore, to look for some resemblance to the music of the older composer. It is a descriptive composition originally written for a ballet. It is divided into four parts titled respectively, "Sinfonia, Danses Suisses, Scherzo and Pas de Deux."

Ballet Russe Number.

"Daphnis and Chloe" likewise was originally written for the Ballet Russe of Diaghileff, and had the famous Nijinski and lovely Karsavina in the leading roles at its world premiere in Paris in 1912. A brief resume of the story printed on the score of the second suite reads: "In the first scene at daybreak Daphnis is found lying asleep near a grotto of nymphs. The shepherds waken him. In anguish he looks about for Chloe. She at last appears witl a group of shepherdesses and the two fall in each other's arms. Daphnis observes the crown Chloe is wearing which symbolizes that Pan (the woodland god, according to Greek mythology) saved Chloe in rememberance of Syrinx, a nymph the god loved.

"Daphnis and Chloe mime the story of Pan and Syrinx, each impersonating the god and nymph. The dance grows more and more animated. Young bacchantes enter and join in the dance. Daphnis and Chloe embrace tenderly and swear eternal fidelity. A group of young men come on the scene. There is a joyous tumult . . . a general dance."

Brahms Symphony.

In sharp contrast to these two modern program compositions is the second symphony of Brahms which will end the program. If it lacks the epic breadth and grandeur of th first symphony (in C Minor) the second is perhaps the best introduction to the orchestral music of Brahms. Its content is rich enough for the most exacting classicist and its structure is clear, its moods not too subtle.

It is lyric and joyous in general although it has occasional moments of somberness. Worthy of particular attention are the second and fourth movements. In the former the 'cellos and violins sing a restrained yet passionate song, poignantly human, which is the utterance of one who observes the woes of humanity from a calm but not remote eminence. No one can accuse Brahms of coldness and unsensitivity after hearing this music where he reaches so vas and profound human feeling.

The finale of the symphony is concerned with joy and optimism and it ought to satisfy those from whom music must produce a thrill by rhythmic and dyna iic power. It has passages of seemingly emotional abandon. Brahms manages to remain within the confines of strict form, but the spirit of the music is never lost in purely academic mold.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

DEC 10 1936

Boston Symphony Wins Great Ovation

Koussevitzky Gets Cheers For Brahms

By Ralph Holmes

AN OVATION as thrilling as the performance itself rewarded the playing of the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra to a Masonic Temple full of people Wednesday evening—an audience that not only stood, but cheered until the oft-returning leader had twice waved his players to their feet in acknowledgment.

A virtuoso ovation to a virtuoso orchestra!

There were more than twice as many people present as Orchestra Hall can hold and, just as a matter of statistics, the excitement was even more intense and prolonged, after Serge Koussevitzky had finished the concert with a gorgeous reading of the Brahms First Symphony, than it was for Iturbi with the Detroit orchestra a couple of weeks ago.

It was even greater than it should have been just in ratio of the numerical strength of the two bands—80 to 110. So it must have been due to the fact that the Boston is really QUITE an orchestra.

Inaudible Orator

Koussevitzky is, of course, the silent orator of the podium, exhorting and admonishing his men, not only with his reed-like baton and a meaningful left hand, but by a continuous flow of silent language whose effectiveness makes it apparent that his men are all lip readers. And a flirtation with apoplexy he considers a small price to pay for a ffff crescendo.

It was a beautifully planned program, starting with an old-fashioned but delightful concerto grosso by Handel for string orchestra alone, excellent advertisement of the power and glory of that army of assorted fiddles.

Sibelius Tone Poem

Then came one of Sibelius' early tone poems, "Pohjola's Daughter," inspired by a Finnish folk tale. It was new to Detroit, if I remember rightly, although the composer brought it to this country more than 20 years ago. It left me somewhat baffled after a single hearing, but I would like to hear it again soon.

Featured

INA SCOTT is appearing in the current floor show at the Northwood Inn.

A suite made by Ravel from his "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet is familiar enough and always lovely, especially if one closes one's eyes and imagines the dancers materializing it. And so beautifully played, with just the necessary French delicacy, but without weakness.

More About Brahms

Of the Brahms First, which filled the latter part of the evening, I speak with my customary humility and hesitation. As well might I, a non-Catholic, try to explain the thrill of the mass to a true believer. It simply does not seem to be for me.

Judged by the four symphonies, Brahms seems to me the uninspired genius of music — a great composer but not an artist a master mechanic who created the musical equivalent of these elaborate clocks which charm people in the German public squares. They work perfectly, amazingly, but that's about all.

And this in spite of a reading and a performance Wednesday evening that moved me almost to tears with admiration. Koussevitzky made the last movement almost great, and he at least sold me the orchestra if he couldn't sell me Brahms.

Though I am sure that the great effect he created with this work represented the prowess of Brahms fully as much as his own. The big audience went quite mad (and I, too, for the perfection of the performance) so I can only hang my head in shame at my own insensitivity.

I do hope all the Detroit Symphony folks were present to realize how exciting music may be from a truly great orchestra under a man of power and authority. Another 30 men might be the means of filling Orchestra Hall to overflow at every performance.

GREAT FALLS, MONT.
TRIBUNE

DEC 11 1936

Aged Symphony Is Unearthed

Boston, Dec. 12.—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance next Friday afternoon when the Boston orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, plays the symphony in D major by the Americanized Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musicologists credit Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were high in high regard by Beethoven and Haydn and who as an established pianist gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Liszt, then 13 years old, was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity, between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other 14 symphonies. Yet when he died in 1832, bequeathing all his manuscripts to his widow, none but sonata scores could be found.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

DEC 11 1936

Concert This Evening In Museum Peristyle To Attract Society

By IDA TAYLOR

ONE of the most brilliant audiences of the winter will gather in the Peristyle of the Toledo Museum of Art this evening to hear the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky.

Among the many dinner parties bringing together small groups of the members of the Museum, to whom this concert is a complimentary one, is that at which Mr. and Mrs. Collord Acklin will be hosts.

MONONGAHELA, PA.
REPUBLICAN

DEC 11 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS IN PITTTSBURGH THIS WEEK

Two different concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on successive days—Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon—should attract every music lover in the district. They are among the most important occasions in this season's music.

Every opinion one meets regarding Serge Koussevitzky and his players corroborates what one knows and reveres about them.

Many works on these programs are well known to music enthusiasts. Stravinsky's brief "Divertimento" from his ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee" is new though it antedate his latest idiom. To hear Beethoven's favored "Fifth Symphony" played under rather ideal conditions will be another milestone in music. The complete program for tomorrow night.

Symphony in C major No. 34 .... Mozart
Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fee" .... Stravinsky
Symphony in D Minor .... Franck

Sunday afternoon the program, which starts at 3 p. m., will be:

Concerto Grosso for string orchestra .... Handel
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Scherzo in G Minor, from the Octet, Op. 20 .... Mendelssohn
"Daphne and Chloe" Suite No. 2 .... Ravel
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor .... Beethoven

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

DEC 11 1936

Concert Tonight in Museum

THE Boston Symphony orchestra Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard in the Toledo Museum of Art peristyle tonight at 8:30, the event being the annual concert complimentary to members of the museum.

The Berlioz overture, "The Roman Carnival," an excerpt from Stravinsky's allegorical ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee," orchestral fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" and Brahms' "Symphony No. 2, D Major, Op. 73" are the works to be played by this famous ensemble.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 11 1936

Boston Orchestra's Work Captivates Audience Here

By Kenneth N. Westerman

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky once more captivated a capacity audience in Hill auditorium Thursday night.

Whether it was the rollicking rhythms of the Berlioz "Roman Carnival," the restful, soul-stirring purity of the sacred emotions of the "Lohengrin" prelude, or the dainty beauties of the Mendelssohn "Scherzo," the orchestra and conductor were always a perfect unit in emotion, technique, and phrasing until the audience lived with them the thoughts and emotions of the number being played.

Joseph Brinkman, of the University School of Music, proved himself a master pianist in his rendition of the Sowerby "Concerto No. 2," but the writer wished he might have heard him in some other Concerto, for although Concerto No. 2 is far superior to "Prairie," it seems to start nowhere and finish nowhere, and in spite of being full of "substance" has so little "form" that—well—maybe the writer's ears are not trained to the jumble of modern formlessness — anyway Joseph Brinkman has all the things it takes to be a great pianist; technique, emotionalism, interpretive sense and the personality to use them. The University School of Music should be proud of the head of its piano department.

There were no vacant seats Thursday night after "Intermission," for every member of the vast audience wished to hear Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Beethoven "Fifth Symphony." They were certainly not disappointed. The writer has never heard a more beautiful reading of this most popular of Beethoven's symphonies. Its vigorous themes with their appealing replies were given a new significance under Koussevitzky's imaginative emotionalism; and the keen response of the superior playing of the Boston Symphony would have satisfied the creative genius of Beethoven himself.

We hope that the annual return of the Boston Symphony may become a regular habit when the management of the Choral Union Series makes out its future programs.

Publishers Weekly
CAMDEN, N. J.

DEC 12 1936

THE INTEREST and value of the original manuscripts of famous composers has resulted in many discoveries in recent years. Lost for a century, a symphony by the famous Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in the United States last week in Boston at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, and was received with enthusiasm. Written some time between 1785 and 1824, the critics agreed that the composition was melodious, beautiful and individual. When Clementi died, near London in 1832, bequeathing his large estate and all his manuscripts to his widow, none of the symphonic scores could be found, and only two had been printed. Clementi's manuscripts dropped out of sight until 1917 when the Library of Congress purchased many of the composer's original manuscripts at auction.

125

TOLEDO, O.
NEWS-BEE

DEC 10 1936

Boston Orchestra To Play Varied Program Friday

Berlioz' Overture, Brahms' Second Symphony Listed For Art Museum Concert

By RODOLFO FLORIPE

Select examples of modern and romantic music make up the program which the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will play at 8:30 p. m. Friday in the Museum of rt Peristyle.

This is the annual concert given for the Museum members and it is not included in the regular concert series. This will also mark the third successive year that the Boston orchestra has been the featured attraction at the annual members' concert.

The program will open with Berlioz' "Overture, Roman Carnival," followed by the "Divertimento" from "Le Baiser de la Fee," by Stravinsky; the orchestral fragments from the second suite of "Daphis and Chloe," by Ravel, and it will end with Brahms' "Symphony No. 2 in D Major."

Was Opera Overture.

The "Overture Roman Carnival" was originally written by Berlioz to serve as the introduction to the second act of his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," which turned out to be a failure. It is based on two chief subjects — Benvenuto's love song in the opera's first act, which comes after a short introduction, and the "saltarello," a wild Italian dance of vigorous and impetuous rhythm which is delivered with glowing brilliance. Toward the end the dance figure becomes dominant and the music moves on to a powerful, brilliant conclusion.

The Stravinsky number should be of particular interest to Toledo concert goers because it was played here last year in a special arrangement for violin and piano with Stravinsky himself at the piano and Samuel Dushkin, violinist. The composition on the program of the Stravinsky concert is listed as a "divertimento, inspired by the Muse of Tschaikowsky." It is permissible, therefore, to look for some resemblance to the music of the older composer. It is a descriptive composition originally written for a ballet. It is divided into four parts titled respectively, "Sinfonia, Danses Suisses, Scherzo and Pas de Deux."

Ballet Russe Number.

"Daphnis and Chloe" likewise was originally written for the Ballet Russe of Diaghileff, and had the famous Nijinski and lovely Karsavina in the leading roles at its world premiere in Paris in 1912. A brief resume of the story printed on the score of the second suite reads: "In the first scene at daybreak Daphnis is found lying asleep near a grotto of nymphs. The shepherds waken him. In anguish he looks about for Chloe. She at last appears with a group of shepherdesses and the two fall in each other's arms. Daphnis observes the crown Chloe is wearing which symbolizes that Pan (the woodland god, according to Greek mythology) saved Chloe in rememberance of Syrinx, a nymph the god loved.

"Daphnis and Chloe mime the story of Pan and Syrinx, each impersonating the god and nymph. The dance grows more and more animated. Young bacchantes enter and join in the dance. Daphnis and Chloe embrace tenderly and swear eternal fidelity. A group of young men come on the scene. There is a joyous tumult . . . a general dance."

Brahms Symphony.

In sharp contrast to these two modern program compositions is the second symphony of Brahms which will end the program. If it lacks the epic breadth and grandeur of the first symphony (in C Minor) the second is perhaps the best introduction to the orchestral music of Brahms. Its content is rich enough for the most exacting classicist and its structure is clear, its moods not too subtle.

It is lyric and joyous in general although it has occasional moments of somberness. Worthy of particular attention are the second and fourth movements. In the former the 'cellos and violins sing a restrained yet passionate song, poignantly human, which is the utterance of one who observes the woes of humanity from a calm but not remote eminence. No one can accuse Brahms of coldness and unsensitivity after hearing this music where he reaches so vast and profound human feeling.

The finale of the symphony is concerned with joy and optimism and it ought to satisfy those from whom music must produce a thrill by rhythmic and dynamic power. It has passages of seemingly emotional abandon. Brahms manages to remain within the confines of strict form, but the spirit of the music is never lost in purely academic mold.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

DEC 10 1936

Boston Symphony Wins Great Ovation

Koussevitzky Gets Cheers For Brahms

By Ralph Holmes

AN OVATION as thrilling as the performance itself rewarded the playing of the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra to a Masonic Temple full of people Wednesday evening—an audience that not only stood, but cheered until the oft-returning leader had twice waved his players to their feet in acknowledgment.

A virtuoso ovation to a virtuoso orchestra!

There were more than twice as many people present as Orchestra Hall can hold and, just as a matter of statistics, the excitement was even more intense and prolonged, after Serge Koussevitzky had finished the concert with a gorgeous reading of the Brahms First Symphony, than it was for Iturbi with the Detroit orchestra a couple of weeks ago.

It was even greater than it should have been just in ratio of the numerical strength of the two bands—80 to 110. So it must have been due to the fact that the Boston is really QUITE an orchestra.

Inaudible Orator

Koussevitzky is, of course, the silent orator of the podium, exhorting and admonishing his men, not only with his reed-like baton and a meaningful left hand, but by a continuous flow of silent language whose effectiveness makes it apparent that his men are all lip readers. And a flirtation with apoplexy he considers a small price to pay for a ffff crescendo.

It was a beautifully planned program, starting with an old-fashioned but delightful concerto grosso by Handel for string orchestra alone, excellent advertisement of the power and glory of that army of assorted fiddles.

Sibelius Tone Poem

Then came one of Sibelius' early tone poems, "Pohjola's Daughter," inspired by a Finnish folk tale. It was new to Detroit, if I remember rightly, although the composer brought it to this country more than 20 years ago. It left me somewhat baffled after a single hearing, but I would like to hear it again soon.

A suite made by Ravel from his "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet is familiar enough and always lovely, especially if one closes one's eyes and imagines the dancers materializing it. And so beautifully played, with just the necessary French delicacy, but without weakness.

More About Brahms

Of the Brahms First, which filled the latter part of the evening, I speak with my customary humility and hesitation. As well might I, a non-Catholic, try to explain the thrill of the mass to a true believer. It simply does not seem to be for me.

Judged by the four symphonies, Brahms seems to me the uninspired genius of music — a great composer but not an artist—a master mechanic who created the musical equivalent of these elaborate clocks which charm people in the German public squares. They work perfectly, amazingly, but that's about all.

And this in spite of a reading and a performance Wednesday evening that moved me almost to tears with admiration. Koussevitzky made the last movement almost great, and he at least sold me the orchestra if he couldn't sell me Brahms.

Though I am sure that the great effect he created with this work represented the prowess of Brahms fully as much as his own. The big audience went quite mad (and I, too, for the perfection of the performance) so I can only hang my head in shame at my own insensitivity.

I do hope all the Detroit Symphony folks were present to realize how exciting music may be from a truly great orchestra under a man of power and authority. Another 30 men might be the means of filling Orchestra Hall to overflow at every performance.

Featured

INA SCOTT is appearing in the current floor show at the Northwood Inn.

GREAT FALLS, MONT.
TRIBUNE

DEC 11 1936

Aged Symphony Is Unearthed

Boston, Dec. 12.—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance next Friday afternoon when the Boston orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, plays the symphony in D major by the Americanized Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musicologists credit Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were high in high regard by Beethoven and Haydn and who as an established pianist gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Liszt, then 13 years old, was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity, between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other 14 symphonies. Yet when he died in 1832, bequeathing all his manuscripts to his widow, none but sonata scores could be found.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

DEC 11 1936

Concert This Evening In Museum Peristyle To Attract Society

By IDA TAYLOR

ONE of the most brilliant audiences of the winter will gather in the Peristyle of the Toledo Museum of Art this evening to hear the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky.

Among the many dinner parties bringing together small groups of the members of the Museum, to whom this concert is a complimentary one, is that at which Mr. and Mrs. Collord Acklin will be hosts.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 11 1936

Boston Orchestra's Work Captivates Audience Here

By Kenneth N. Westerman

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky once more captivated a capacity audience in Hill auditorium Thursday night.

Whether it was the rollicking rhythms of the Berlioz "Roman Carnival," the restful, soul-stirring purity of the sacred emotions of the "Lohengrin" prelude, or the dainty beauties of the Mendelssohn "Scherzo," the orchestra and conductor were always a perfect unit in emotion, technique, and phrasing until the audience lived with them the thoughts and emotions of the number being played.

Joseph Brinkman, of the University School of Music, proved himself a master pianist in his rendition of the Sowerby "Concerto No. 2," but the writer wished he might have heard him in some other Concerto, for although Concerto No. 2 is far superior to "Prairie," it seems to start nowhere and finish nowhere, and in spite of being full of "substance" has so little "form" that—well—maybe the writer's ears are not trained to the jumble of modern formlessness — anyway Joseph Brinkman has all the things it takes to be a great pianist; technique, emotionalism, interpretive sense and the personality to use them. The University School of Music should be proud of the head of its piano department.

There were no vacant seats Thursday night after "Intermission," for every member of the vast audience wished to hear Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Beethoven "Fifth Symphony." They were certainly not disappointed. The writer has never heard a more beautiful reading of this most popular of Beethoven's symphonies. Its vigorous themes with their appealing replies were given a new significance under Koussevitzky's imaginative emotionalism; and the keen response of the superior playing of the Boston Symphony would have satisfied the creative genius of Beethoven himself.

We hope that the annual return of the Boston Symphony may become a regular habit when the management of the Choral Union Series makes out its future programs.

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

DEC 11 1936

Concert Tonight in Museum

THE Boston Symphony orchestra Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard in the Toledo Museum of Art peristyle tonight at 8:30, the event being the annual concert complimentary to members of the museum.

The Berlioz overture, "The Roman Carnival," an excerpt from Stravinsky's allegorical ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee," orchestral fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" and Brahms' "Symphony No. 2, D Major, Op. 73" are the works to be played by this famous ensemble.

MONONGAHELA, PA.
REPUBLICAN

DEC 11 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS IN PITTSBURGH THIS WEEK

Two different concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on successive days—Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon— should attract every music lover in the district. They are among the most important occasions in this season's music.

Every opinion one meets regarding Serge Koussevitzky and his players corroborates what one knows and reveres about them.

Many works on these programs are well known to music enthusiasts. Stravinsky's brief "Divertimento" from his ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee" is new though it antedate his latest idiom. To hear Beethoven's favored "Fifth Symphony" played under rather ideal conditions will be another milestone in music. The complete program for tomorrow night.

Symphony in C major No. 34 .... Mozart
Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fee" .... Stravinsky
Symphony in D Minor .... Franck

Sunday afternoon the program, which starts at 3 p. m., will be:

Concerto Grosso for string orchestra .... Handel
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Scherzo in G Minor, from the Octet, Op. 20 .... Mendelssohn
"Daphne and Chloe" Suite No. 2 .... Ravel
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor .... Beethoven

Publishers Weekly
CAMDEN, N. J.

DEC 12 1936

THE INTEREST and value of the original manuscripts of famous composers has resulted in many discoveries in recent years. Lost for a century, a symphony by the famous Italian pianist, Muzio Clementi, received its first hearing in the United States last week in Boston at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, and was received with enthusiasm. Written some time between 1785 and 1824, the critics agreed that the composition was melodious, beautiful and individual. When Clementi died, near London in 1832, bequeathing his large estate and all his manuscripts to his widow, none of the symphonic scores could be found, and only two had been printed. Clementi's manuscripts dropped out of sight until 1917 when the Library of Congress purchased many of the composer's original manuscripts at auction.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 10 1936

Crowd Cheers at Program by the Boston Symphony

By RUSSELL McLAUCHLIN

An audience of almost 5,000 stood up and cheered at the conclusion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in the Masonic Auditorium. There were those who shouted "Bravo!" and there were others who made a joyful noise more commonly heard at Navin Field. It was as hearty an example of unleashed enthusiasm as has ever concluded an orchestral concert in Detroit.

The cause and fountain head of the excitement was a remarkable orchestra. In reporting the deeds of the Boston Symphony, under the scholarly and well-tailored Serge Koussevitzky, there is a temptation simply to trundle in a wheel-barrow full of adjectives and dump them between the column-rules. This is unwise, arguing a poor restraint and an absence of critical detachment; two virtues which should prevail. In considering such a concert as this one, however, they are hard to practice.

It is a great orchestra numerically, with 110 members. Koussevitzky has been its lord for enough years to impress completely his brains and musicianship on the whole caboodle. It is, in a genuine and unusual sense, an instrument whereon he plays. One never has the feeling, familiar enough at orchestral concerts, that all the conductor's work was done at rehearsal and that his antics before the audience are so much gratuitous window-dressing. Koussevitzky, with a teeming crowd in the seats, works harder than his percussionist and one is sure that, if he got a new idea in the middle of a symphonic movement, he'd make the orchestra play it for him, there and then.

With so much evident virtuosity at the desks and with such a really consecrated leadership as Koussevitzky affords, the Boston Symphony has a brilliance that is unmatched in America and probably in the world. This special quality of brilliance is everywhere in the orchestra. Can you imagine a brilliant—a genuinely brilliant—flute? Or a brilliant contra-bassoon or string-bass? A brilliant tuba? Koussevitzky will instruct you that all these are possible and that a combined voice, whether of a choir or of the [illegible] can have a brigh[illegible] most visible.

One is ashamed [illegible] thing as rudiment[illegible] however they imp[illegible] to the music. As a cobbler on hi[illegible] mending shoes as to extoll Koussevitzky because he can bring the orchestra's tone up and down.

But program-building, according to the Koussevitzky scheme, is certainly newsworthy. He opened with Handel's Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 6, in G Minor, to reveal the silken quality of the strings. Then came a not familiar work of Sibelius, his symphonic fantasia called "Pohjola's Daughter," which is an immensely effective piece of program-music in which every component of the orchestra blazed like a torch. This was followed by Ravel's much admired suite, "Daphnis and Chloe," with all the instruments having a field day with a thoroughly modern score.

After the intermission came the classic period's greatest survival into harsher times, the First Symphony of Brahms, toward whose nobility the program had marched, step by step. The final movement to abandon restraint and detachment with great relief, was the finest single example of orchestral performance which these ears have ever heard, anywhere. It was a great wisdom that constructed an evening expanding delight, with a terminal episode that should send the crowd crazy.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC 11 1936

* * *

PITTSBURGH is having a week full of sharps and flats. The Friends of Chamber Music opened a series of concerts last night at the University Club.

Tomorrow night and Sunday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will entertain society at two concerts in Syria Mosque.

Several box parties have been planned by registrites. Among those who will attend the musicals are Mrs. William Thaw Jr., returned recently from a plane trip to Rio de Janeiro, who is president of the association; Mrs. William Reed Thompson, Mrs. Howard Hale McClintic, Mrs. William Watson Smith, Mrs. Alexander Laughlin, Mrs. William D. Hamilton and Mrs. Horace Forbes Baker.

Also planning to attend the concerts are Moorhead B. Holland, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. Ralph Flinn, Mrs. W. Terrell Johnson, Mrs. James Edward Lewis, Dr. Ellen J. Patterson, Mrs. John G. Stephenson Jr., Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Leon Falk, Mrs. Alexander J. Barron, Mrs. Frank B. Ingersoll, Mrs. William A. Gordon III, Mrs. James G. Pontefract, Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. Joseph H. Bialas, Mrs. Oliver J. Keller, Mrs. George J. Willock and Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson.

TOLEDO, O.
NEWS-BEE

DEC 12 1936

* * *

A CAPACITY audience filled the Peristyle of the Toledo Museum of Art Friday evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky presented its third annual concert in this city.

A distinct change in outer apparel was noted among the smartly gowned women, stunning fur coats taking the place of the usual fur-trimmed velvet wraps.

Mrs. E. D. Libbey, wife of the founder of the museum, who came from her home in New York City to attend the concert, wore a black gown under a squirrel evening coat.

Mink coats were in predominance. Mrs. J. C. Blair wore a dark blue velvet gown accented by a corsage of artificial red flowers at the waistline under her mink coat, and Mrs. Lyman P. Goodbody's stunning wrap was of the same fur.

Mrs. Aaron Chesbrough's gown was of dark green crepe. The square neckline was trimmed with flowers of the same material and shade as her gown. She also wore a mink coat, as did Miss Sally Libbey, whose gown was of white satin.

Mrs. Justice Wilson was stunning in a midnight blue crepe gown with black caracul evening wrap, and Mrs. Paul Prudden's wrap was of ermine.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE
DEC 13 1936

KOUSSEVITSKY

Clementi's Symphony in D (edited by Casella) was played for the first time in Boston, by Koussevitsky. Other works played so far this season by the Boston orchestra include Hindemith's symphony based on his opera, "Mathis der Maler", and a symphony by the Russian, Basil Kallinikov. At the concerts of November 13 and 14, Werner Josten conducted his own symphony in F.

The first American performance of Balakirev's "En Boheme" was given recently by Iturbi at Rochester.

---

siasm. Written 1824, the critics
was melodious.
When Clementi
bequeathing his nuscripts to his nic scores could d been printed.
ped out of sight of Congress pur
's original manu

Dec.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

13

Fourth Boston Symphony Program Is Scheduled

The fourth of this season's broadcasts by the Boston Symphony will be broadcast over WCKY Thursday from 8 to 9 p. m. from Sanders Theater in Cambridge, Mass., where Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be conducting one of his regular Harvard University subscription concerts.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture and Edward MacDowell's Second Concerto for piano and orchestra will comprise the program. Former work was written not as an overture to Shakespeare's famous love drama, but as a fantasy in overture form intended to embody the romance and tragedy of that familiar story.

MUSIC MISCELLANY

Dec. 10/36

ANNIVERSARIES

Significant anniversaries are at hand, the 50th of the death of Liszt, the 75th of the birth of MacDowell and the 25th of the first American performance of Zimbalist.

In observance of the birth anniversary of MacDowell, which is Dec. 18, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky has placed the second piano Concerto of this American composer on the Dec. 18 and 19 concert programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Howard Goding, soloist.

While numerous Liszt anniversary programs will be given, the outstanding event in conjunction with this season's observance will be the recitals of Moriz Rosenthal, last of Franz Liszt's great pupils to maintain himself as a touring virtuoso of the piano.

Rosenthal has returned to America after an absence of seven years and following his recent New York recital, the reviewers without exception declared the brilliance of his technic did not support the fact that he is now 74. He was acclaimed for his alert musical powers, the charm, grandeur and finish of his playing.

It was also recounted by the reviewers that Rosenthal's New York debut was made in November, 1883, when he had as assisting artist, a young violinist of 14, Fritz Kreisler.

Another violinist of eminence, Efrem Zimbalist, played his silver jubilee program in New York, Sunday, Dec. 6. The American debut of Zimbalist was made in Boston with the Boston Symphony orchestra, Oct. 27, 1911. He was the second of the three most celebrated pupils of Auer who came to this country. Mischa Elman came in 1908 and Heifetz in 1917.

Zimbalist is an American citizen. His wife is Alma Gluck.

ADULT EDUCATION COURSE

Dr. Carl F. Pfatteicher's course entitled, "The Five Greatest Choral Compositions Ever Written"—Handel's Messiah, Bach's Mass in B Minor, Bach's Passion According to St. Matthew, Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, and Brahm's German Requiem—in the Andover adult evening study group series, meeting Monday evenings from 8:30 to 9:30, beginning Jan. 4, will be held in the Faculty room of Phillips academy, George Washington hall. The lectures will be illustrated with records played on the new talking machines recently presented to Phillips academy by the Carnegie Corporation of New York. Dr. Pfatteicher will discuss the antecedents or evolution of the works mentioned, their latent and patent beauties, their claims to immortality. The course will also attempt to present vivid pictures of Handel, the cosmopolite; Bach, the mystic; Beethoven, the passionate; and Brahms, the classical romanticist.

HERE AND THERE

The first American composers' concert of the Eastman School of Music this season will take place Dec. 17, when the Rochester Philharmonic orchestra, led by Howard Hanson, will play MacDowell's Suite for Orchestra, Opus 41.

From the William Knabe Co., New York, comes announcement that as a forerunner of the centennial celebration to be held by the firm this year, music will be carried by means of "a trailer studio" to small communities from Long Island to Florida. The first concert given at Smithtown, L. I., Dec. 8, will be followed by a series in communities adjacent to the principal cities from Long Island to Florida. The trailer as large as a bus, has large windows, a display room for both grand and upright pianos, seats, carpeted floor, venetian blinds, lights and a heating unit. At the end of this tour other parts of the country will be visited during the spring and summer months, the firm has announced.

At Lehigh university a poll of musical tastes was conducted when it was found the student concerts group chose as their favorite form of music that by symphony orchestras. Band concerts rated second, choral singing next, and the following order in other forms, piano recitals, baritone recitals, string quartets and violin recitals.

For the first time in the history of teacher training in the United States, a normal school is offering a semester's work in the various centres of Europe. The Crane department of music at the State Normal school, Potsdam, N. Y., with the sanction of the state education department, is offering to music students a six-month tour with school credit for a regular semester's work.

Nineteen students are now visiting Germany, France and the British Isles on the first study tour in charge of Miss Helen M. Hosmer.

French, German, history of art, history of music, music literature, harmony, conducting, European history and comparative education make up the curriculum. In Berlin, a special course in general culture will be taken at the university which will afford prospective teachers a first-hand view of German pedagogical methods.

The study tour as planned this year contains many special features. Among them are the two great festivals at Bayreuth and Salzburg; visits to the Deutsches Museum at Munich; study of the collection of ancient instruments at Nuremberg; and shorter visits at Bamberg, Jena, Leipzig and Dresden.

A plan is being made to make available every two or three years a tour of this nature, so that every music student at Potsdam will have the opportunity of joining a foreign study tour twice during his course at the school.

E. B. F.

DETROIT, MICH.
Dec. NEWS 10/36

ncluded on Your Chri

* * *

Concert Draws Big Crowd; Iturbi Attends as Patron

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, played to an audience of more than 4,000 enthusiastic patrons at Masonic Auditorium Wednesday but no one was more interested nor more appreciative than Jose Iturbi, who slipped into the auditorium at the last minute when the lights were going down. Iturbi, guest conductor and pianist with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra during the last few weeks, grinned up at Koussevitzky as he applauded from his seat in the very first row and nodded his approval.

Any symphony story would be lacking if the name of Mrs. John S. Newberry did not appear well near the beginning, for Mrs. Newberry and the symphony are usually mentioned in the same sentence. She was in the audience last evening with Mr. Newberry and Mrs. Cameron B. Waterman. John S. Newberry, Jr., escorted the pretty post-deb, Peggy Seyburn.

* * *

Mr. and Mrs. John Lord Booth were there and nearby sat Mary Lou Anderson with her parents, the Lee Andersons.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph B. Mills were among those who arrived early. Mrs. Mills wore a pale blue and silver lame gown with a fitted peplum jacket and a two skin sable scarf over her shoulders.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Bell Moran and Mrs. William Colburn arrived together and just behind them was Mrs. Zoltan Sepeshy, whose dark green velvet wrap was collared in mink.

Mrs. Henry P. Williams and Mrs. Brewster Loud were together. The James B. Steeps were there and Madelyn Maiullo, Perry Rathbone and Mr. and Mrs. J. Elden Bemis.

* * *

Deedie Dickinson and her escort arrived in time to miss the 17 minute wait imposed on those who were late. Judge and Mrs. Joseph A. Moynihan were not so lucky and along with a score of others had to wait in the foyer while the Handel Concerto was being played.

Mrs. Allan Shelden was in the audience and Mr. and Mrs. Thomas F. Paddock, Mrs. Moritz Kahn, Mrs. Leigh B. Roberts, Mrs. Sherwood Field, Mrs. Frank W. Coolidge, Dr. William R. Valentiner, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert B. Trix, Walter M. Meek, Eileen Keena, and Mr. and Mrs. Edward N. Hartwick.

Suzanne Sibley, in light blue satin made with ruffled cap sleeves, was with Frank Donovan.

PITTSFIELD, MASS
EAGLE

DEC 14 1936

George W. Edman of 83 Dawes Avenue has returned from a trip with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On the tour the orchestra gave performances in Rochester and Buffalo, N. Y., at Detroit and Ann Arbor, Mich., Toledo, Ohio, and Pittsburgh, Pa.

GLOBE
New Wilmington, Pa.
12/10/36

5-126

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Present Concert December 13

Syria Mosque Will Be Scene Of Coming Program Next Sunday Afternoon

New Wilmington music lovers will be pleased with the news that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Sunday afternoon concert in Pittsburgh on December 13th. This celebrated orchestra of 110 virtuoso players under Serge Koussevitzky will give two concerts in Pittsburgh on their forthcoming visit, both at Syria Mosque. The Saturday evening concert on December 12th, will be followed with a different program on Sunday afternoon, December 13th. Both programs are announced herewith.

Saturday evening, December 12

Symphony in C major No. 34 (K 338) Mozart

Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fee" Stravinsky

Symphony in D Minor, Franck

Sunday Afternoon
December 13 at 3 o'clock

Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ, Vivaldi

Prelude in "Lohengrin", Wagner

Scherzo in G minor from the Octet, Op. 20, Mendelssohn

"Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 2, Ravel

Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Beethoven.

Many from New Wilmington are planning to attend both concerts.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

13 1936

NOTES ON

Schumann Is Soloist

Henrietta Schumann, concert pianiste, will be soloist with the Radio City Music Hall Symphony Orchestra during the Music Hall on the Air program today at 12:30 p. m. over WJZ. Miss Schumann will play Richard Strauss' "Burlesque."

"Love in Summer"

"Love in Summer," an original story by Agnes Ridgeway, will be presented during Grand Hotel today at 3:30 p. m. over WEAF. Anne Seymour and Lester Tremayne play the leading roles.

We, the People

Edward J. Bradley, head of Grand Central Station's information bureau, will be among those telling their unusual stories during the We, the People program today at 5 p. m. over WJZ.

Carnegie Hall Concert

Moriz Rosenthal, concert pianist, and Donald Dixon, barytone, will be soloists with the symphony orchestra during the concert today at 10 p. m. over WEAF. Erno Rapee will conduct the orchestra in the Intermezzo from Wolf-Ferrari's "The Jewels of the Madonna" to open the concert, which will be broadcast from Carnegie Hall, New York.

Gladys Swarthout and Margaret Speaks

Gladys Swarthout, Metropolitan Opera mezzo-soprano, will be soloist during the concert tomorrow at 8:30 p. m. over WEAF. Miss Swarthout will open the concert with Ponce's "Estrellita." Joined by Margaret Speaks, soprano, Miss Swarthout will conclude the concert with the Barcarolle from Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffman."

Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, broadcast Thursday at 8 p. m. over WJZ, will come from Sanders Theater, Harvard University. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. Howard Goding will be piano soloist. The orchestra will play Overture Fantasia from "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky, and Concerto No. 2 in D Minor, Opus 23, by MacDowell.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 10 1936

Crowd Cheers at Program by the Boston Symphony

By RUSSELL McLAUCHLIN

An audience of almost 5,000 stood up and cheered at the conclusion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in the Masonic Auditorium. There were those who shouted "Bravo!" and there were others who made a joyful noise more commonly heard at Navin Field. It was as hearty an example of unleashed enthusiasm as has ever concluded an orchestral concert in Detroit.

The cause and fountain head of the excitement was a remarkable orchestra. In reporting the deeds of the Boston Symphony, under the scholarly and well-tailored Serge Koussevitzky, there is a temptation simply to trundle in a wheel-barrow full of adjectives and dump them between the column-rules. This is unwise, arguing a poor restraint and an absence of critical detachment; two virtues which should prevail. In considering such a concert as this one, however, they are hard to practice.

It is a great orchestra numerically, with 110 members. Koussevitzky has been its lord for enough years to impress completely his brains and musicianship on the whole caboodle. It is, in a genuine and and unusual sense, an instrument whereon he plays. One never has the feeling, familiar enough at orchestral concerts, that all the conductor's work was done at rehearsal and that his antics before the audience are so much gratuitous window-dressing. Koussevitzky, with a teeming crowd in the seats, works harder than his percussionist and one is sure that, if he got a new idea in the middle of a symphonic movement, he'd make the orchestra play it for him, there and then.

With so much evident virtuosity at the desks and with such a really consecrated leadership as Koussevitzky affords, the Boston Symphony has a brilliance that is unmatched in America and probably in the world. This special quality of brilliance is everywhere in the orchestra. Can you imagine a brilliant—a genuinely brilliant—flute? Or a brilliant contra-bassoon or string-bass? A brilliant tuba? Koussevitzky will instruct you that all these are possible and that a combined voice, whether of a choir or of the whole ensemble, can have a brightness that is almost visible.

One is ashamed to speak of anything as rudimentary as dynamics, however they impart an eloquence to the music. As well compliment a cobbler on his proficiency at mending shoes as to extoll Koussevitzky because he can bring the orchestra's tone up and down.

But program-building, according to the Koussevitzky scheme, is certainly newsworthy. He opened with Handel's Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 6, in G Minor, to reveal the silken quality of the strings. Then came a not familiar work of Sibelius, his symphonic fantasia called "Pohjola's Daughter," which is an immensely effective piece of program-music in which every component of the orchestra blazed like a torch. This was followed by Ravel's much admired suite, "Daphnis and Chloe," with all the instruments having a field day with a thoroughly modern score.

After the intermission came the classic period's greatest survival into harsher times, the First Symphony of Brahms, toward whose nobility the program had marched, step by step. The final movement to abandon restraint and detachment with great relief, was the finest single example of orchestral performance which these ears have ever heard, anywhere. It was a great wisdom that constructed an evening expanding delight, with a terminal episode that should send the crowd crazy.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC 11 1936

* * *

PITTSBURGH is having a week full of sharps and flats. The Friends of Chamber Music opened a series of concerts last night at the University Club.

Tomorrow night and Sunday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will entertain society at two concerts in Syria Mosque.

Several box parties have been planned by registrites. Among those who will attend the musicals are Mrs. William Thaw Jr., returned recently from a plane trip to Rio de Janeiro, who is president of the association; Mrs. William Reed Thompson, Mrs. Howard Hale McClintic, Mrs. William Watson Smith, Mrs. Alexander Laughlin, Mrs. William D. Hamilton and Mrs. Horace Forbes Baker.

Also planning to attend the concerts are Moorhead B. Holland, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. Ralph Flinn, Mrs. W. Terrell Johnson, Mrs. James Edward Lewis, Dr. Ellen J. Patterson, Mrs. John G. Stephenson Jr., Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Leon Falk, Mrs. Alexander J. Barron, Mrs. Frank B. Ingersoll, Mrs. William A. Gordon III, Mrs. James G. Pontefract, Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. Joseph H. Bialas, Mrs. Oliver J. Keller, Mrs. George J. Willock and Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson.

TOLEDO, O.
NEWS-BEE

DEC 12 1936

* * *

A CAPACITY audience filled the Peristyle of the Toledo Museum of Art Friday evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky presented its third annual concert in this city.

A distinct change in outer apparel was noted among the smartly gowned women, stunning fur coats taking the place of the usual fur-trimmed velvet wraps.

Mrs. E. D. Libbey, wife of the founder of the museum, who came from her home in New York City to attend the concert, wore a black gown under a squirrel evening coat.

Mink coats were in predominance. Mrs. J. C. Blair wore a dark blue velvet gown accented by a corsage of artificial red flowers at the waistline under her mink coat, and Mrs. Lyman P. Goodbody's stunning wrap was of the same fur.

Mrs. Aaron Chesbrough's gown was of dark green crepe. The square neckline was trimmed with flowers of the same material and shade as her gown. She also wore a mink coat, as did Miss Sally Libbey, whose gown was of white satin.

Mrs. Justice Wilson was stunning in a midnight blue crepe gown with black caracul evening wrap, and Mrs. Paul Prudden's wrap was of ermine.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE

DEC 13 1936

KOUSSEVITSKY

Clementi's Symphony in D (edited by Casella) was played for the first time in Boston, by Koussevitsky. Other works played so far this season by the Boston orchestra include Hindemith's symphony based on his opera, "Mathis der Maler"; and a symphony by the Russian, Basil Kallinikov. At the concerts of November 13 and 14, Werner Josten conducted his own symphony in F.

The first American performance of Balakirev's "En Boheme" was given recently by Iturbi at Rochester.

---

husiasm. Written d 1824, the critic
n was melodious
When Clement
, bequeathing his nanuscripts to his onic scores could ad been printed pped out of sigh
y of Congress pur
er's original manu

Dec. CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR 14/36

Fourth Boston Symphony Program Is Scheduled

The fourth of this season's broadcasts by the Boston Symphony will be broadcast over WCKY Thursday from 8 to 9 p. m. from Sanders Theater in Cambridge, Mass., where Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be conducting one of his regular Harvard University subscription concerts.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture and Edward MacDowell's Second Concerto for piano and orchestra will comprise the program. Former work was written not as an overture to Shakespeare's famous love drama, but as a fantasy in overture form intended to embody the romance and tragedy of that familiar story.

MUSIC MISCELLANY

Dec 10/36

ANNIVERSARIES

Significant anniversaries are at hand, the 50th of the death of Liszt, the 75th of the birth of MacDowell and the 25th of the first American performance of Zimbalist.

In observance of the birth anniversary of MacDowell, which is Dec. 18, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky has placed the second piano Concerto of this American composer on the Dec. 18 and 19 concert programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Howard Goding, soloist.

While numerous Liszt anniversary programs will be given, the outstanding event in conjunction with this season's observance will be the recitals of Moriz Rosenthal, last of Franz Liszt's great pupils to maintain himself as a touring virtuoso of the piano.

Rosenthal has returned to America after an absence of seven years and following his recent New York recital, the reviewers without exception declared the brilliance of his technic did not support the fact that he is now 74. He was acclaimed for his alert musical powers, the charm, grandeur and finish of his playing.

It was also recounted by the reviewers that Rosenthal's New York debut was made in November, 1883, when he had as assisting artist, a young violinist of 14, Fritz Kreisler.

Another violinist of eminence, Efrem Zimbalist, played his silver jubilee program in New York, Sunday, Dec. 6. The American debut of Zimbalist was made in Boston with the Boston Symphony orchestra, Oct. 27, 1911. He was the second of the three most celebrated pupils of Auer who came to this country. Mischa Elman came in 1908 and Heifetz in 1917.

Zimbalist is an American citizen. His wife is Alma Gluck.

ADULT EDUCATION COURSE

Dr. Carl F. Pfatteicher's course entitled, "The Five Greatest Choral Compositions Ever Written"—Handel's Messiah, Bach's Mass in B Minor, Bach's Passion According to St. Matthew, Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, and Brahm's German Requiem—in the Andover adult evening study group series, meeting Monday evenings from 8:30 to 9:30, beginning Jan. 4, will be held in the Faculty room of Phillips academy, George Washington hall. The lectures will be illustrated with records played on the new talking machines recently presented to Phillips academy by the Carnegie Corporation of New York. Dr. Pfatteicher will discuss the antecedents or evolution of the works mentioned, their latent and patent beauties, their claims to immortality. The course will also attempt to present vivid pictures of Handel, the cosmopolite; Bach, the mystic; Beethoven, the passionate; and Brahms, the classical romanticist.

HERE AND THERE

The first American composers' concert of the Eastman School of Music this season will take place Dec. 17, when the Rochester Philharmonic orchestra, led by Howard Hanson, will play MacDowell's Suite for Orchestra, Opus 41.

From the William Knabe Co., New York, comes announcement that as a forerunner of the centennial celebration to be held by the firm this year, music will be carried by means of "a trailer studio" to small communities from Long Island to Florida. The first concert given at Smithtown, L. I., Dec. 8, will be followed by a series in communities adjacent to the principal cities from Long Island to Florida. The trailer as large as a bus, has large windows, a display room for both grand and upright pianos, seats, carpeted floor, venetian blinds, lights and a heating unit. At the end of this tour other parts of the country will be visited during the spring and summer months, the firm has announced.

At Lehigh university a poll of musical tastes was conducted when it was found the student concerts group chose as their favorite form of music that by symphony orchestras. Band concerts rated second, choral singing next, and the following order in other forms, piano recitals, baritone recitals, string quartets and violin recitals.

For the first time in the history of teacher training in the United States, a normal school is offering a semester's work in the various centres of Europe. The Crane department of music at the State Normal school, Potsdam, N. Y., with the sanction of the state education department, is offering to music students a six-month tour with school credit for a regular semester's work.

Nineteen students are now visiting Germany, France and the British Isles on the first study tour in charge of Miss Helen M. Hosmer.

French, German, history of art, history of music, music literature, harmony, conducting, European history and comparative education make up the curriculum. In Berlin, a special course in general culture will be taken at the university which will afford prospective teachers a first-hand view of German pedagogical methods.

The study tour as planned this year contains many special features. Among them are the two great festivals at Bayreuth and Salzburg; visits to the Deutsches Museum at Munich; study of the collection of ancient instruments at Nuremberg; and shorter visits at Bamberg, Jena, Leipzig and Dresden.

A plan is being made to make available every two or three years a tour of this nature, so that every music student at Potsdam will have the opportunity of joining a foreign study tour twice during his course at the school.

E. B. F.

DETROIT, MICH.
Dec. NEWS 10/36

Be on Your Chri

* * *

Concert Draws Big Crowd; Iturbi Attends as Patron

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, played to an audience of more than 4,000 enthusiastic patrons at Masonic Auditorium Wednesday but no one was more interested nor more appreciative than Jose Iturbi, who slipped into the auditorium at the last minute when the lights were going down. Iturbi, guest conductor and pianist with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra during the last few weeks, grinned up at Koussevitzky as he applauded from his seat in the very first row and nodded his approval.

Any symphony story would be lacking if the name of Mrs. John S. Newberry did not appear well near the beginning, for Mrs. Newberry and the symphony are usually mentioned in the same sentence. She was in the audience last evening with Mr. Newberry and Mrs. Cameron B. Waterman. John S. Newberry, Jr., escorted the pretty post-deb, Peggy Seyburn.

* * *

Mr. and Mrs. John Lord Booth were there and nearby sat Mary Lou Anderson with her parents, the Lee Andersons.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph B. Mills were among those who arrived early. Mrs. Mills wore a pale blue and silver lame gown with a fitted peplum jacket and a two skin sable scarf over her shoulders.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Bell Moran and Mrs. William Colburn arrived together and just behind them was Mrs. Zoltan Sepeshy, whose dark green velvet wrap was collared in mink.

Mrs. Henry P. Williams and Mrs. Brewster Loud were together. The James B. Steeps were there and Madelyn Maiullo, Perry Rathbone and Mr. and Mrs. J. Elden Bemis.

* * *

Deedie Dickinson and her escort arrived in time to miss the 17 minute wait imposed on those who were late. Judge and Mrs. Joseph A. Moynihan were not so lucky and along with a score of others had to wait in the foyer while the Handel Concerto was being played.

Mrs. Allan Shelden was in the audience and Mr. and Mrs. Thomas F. Paddock, Mrs. Moritz Kahn, Mrs. Leigh B. Roberts, Mrs. Sherwood Field, Mrs. Frank W. Coolidge, Dr. William R. Valentiner, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert B. Trix, Walter M. Meek, Eileen Keena, and Mr. and Mrs. Edward N. Hartwick.

Suzanne Sibley, in light blue satin made with ruffled cap sleeves, was with Frank Donovan.

PITTSFIELD, MASS
EAGLE

DEC 14 1936

George W. Edman of 83 Dawes Avenue has returned from a trip with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On the tour the orchestra gave performances in Rochester and Buffalo, N. Y., at Detroit and Ann Arbor, Mich., Toledo, Ohio, and Pittsburgh, Pa.

GLOBE
New Wilmington, Pa.
12/10/36

5-126

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Present Concert December 13

Syria Mosque Will Be Scene Of Coming Program Next Sunday Afternoon

New Wilmington music lovers will be pleased with the news that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Sunday afternoon concert in Pittsburgh on December 13th. This celebrated orchestra of 110 virtuoso players under Serge Koussevitzky will give two concerts in Pittsburgh on their forthcoming visit, both at Syria Mosque. The Saturday evening concert on December 12th, will be followed with a different program on Sunday afternoon, December 13th. Both programs are announced herewith.

Saturday evening, December 12

Symphony in C major No. 34 (K 338) Mozart

Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fee" Stravinsky

Symphony in D Minor, Franck

Sunday Afternoon
December 13 at 3 o'clock

Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ, Vivaldi

Prelude in "Lohengrin", Wagner

Scherzo in G minor from the Octet, Op. 20, Mendelssohn

"Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 2, Ravel

Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Beethoven.

Many from New Wilmington are planning to attend both concerts.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

13 1936

NOTES ON

Schumann Is Soloist

Henrietta Schumann, concert pianiste, will be soloist with the Radio City Music Hall Symphony Orchestra during the Music Hall on the Air program today at 12:30 p. m. over WJZ. Miss Schumann will play Richard Strauss' "Burlesque."

"Love in Summer"

"Love in Summer," an original story by Agnes Ridgeway, will be presented during Grand Hotel today at 3:30 p. m. over WEAF. Anne Seymour and Lester Tremayne play the leading roles.

We, the People

Edward J. Bradley, head of Grand Central Station's information bureau, will be among those telling their unusual stories during the We, the People program today at 5 p. m. over WJZ.

Carnegie Hall Concert

Moriz Rosenthal, concert pianist, and Donald Dixon, barytone, will be soloists with the symphony orchestra during the concert today at 10 p. m. over WEAF. Erno Rapee will conduct the orchestra in the Intermezzo from Wolf-Ferrari's "The Jewels of the Madonna" to open the concert, which will be broadcast from Carnegie Hall, New York.

Gladys Swarthout and Margaret Speaks

Gladys Swarthout, Metropolitan Opera mezzo-soprano, will be soloist during the concert tomorrow at 8:30 p. m. over WEAF. Miss Swarthout will open the concert with Ponce's "Estrellita." Joined by Margaret Speaks, soprano, Miss Swarthout will conclude the concert with the Barcarolle from Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffman."

Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, broadcast Thursday at 8 p. m. over WJZ, will come from Sanders Theater, Harvard University. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. Howard Goding will be piano soloist. The orchestra will play Overture Fantasia from "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky, and Concerto No. 2 in D Minor, Opus 23, by MacDowell.

Y27

TOLEDO, O.
NEWS-BEE

DEC 12 1936

Boston Orchestra Wins New Laurels in Toledo

Enthusiastic Audience Greets Dr. Koussevitzky in Third Concert at Art Museum

By RODOLFO FLORIPE.

History does a good deal of repeating when the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra under its wiry Napoleonic leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky visits the Art Museum peristyle in concert.

As in the past there was a capacity house, unbridled enthusiasm, insistent demands for more and more.

The program was characteristic of what we have become accustomed to expect of the Boston orchestra here. There is always a liberal dose of modern music, a sample of romanticism and a measure of classicism. Last night the romantic note furnished by Berlioz' "Overture, the Roman Carnival," whic hopened the concert. Modernism was represented by Stavinsky's "Divertimento," from "Le Baiser de la Fee," and Ravel's "Daphins and Chloe," (second suite). For the classic note Mr. Koussevitzky turned to Brahms' magnificent "Symphony No. 2 in D Major." The last selection does not exactly fall into the classic standard in point of time and some may reasonably object to the classification.

Brahms Symphony Leads.

Whatever your classification may be, however, the fact remains that Brahms' symphony was the major offering of the evening and where the orchestra's virtuosity and the mastery of Mr. Koussevitzky over his men shone the brightest. Let no man upon hearing this music still call Brahms cold and obscure. The warm-blooded humanity of a great artist who could survey the woes of his fellow men from a calm, yet not remote eminence, vibrate in every measure of the score. This is not the utterance of a neurotic who finds the world is too much with him.

If the music lacks the grandeur and epic breath or the exquisite lyricism of some of the composer's other symphonies, it is nevertheless, beautiful, surcharged with hope and optimism. Lacking the heroic simplicity of that other master symphonist, Beethoven, Brahms nevertheless inherited the harmonic mantle dropped by the master and his shoulders did not prove too weak for the task. He is the deep river at the foot of the mountain we call Beethoven.

Ravel Number Praised.

Of the other compositions on the program, Mr. Koussevitzky gave us a masterful reading of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." He is admittedly one of the greatest living interpreters of Ravel. He knows exactly how to extract the very essence of Ravel's music, how to reveal its delicate tints, subtle shades, and charming rhythms for the listener.

Stravinsky's "divertimento" was of particular interest because it gave us the chance to hear the same composition by the orchestra in contrast to the arrangement for piano and violin which we heard not long ago with Stravinsky himself at the piano assisted by violinist Dushkin.

It must be reported, however, that despite the added color and greater utterance of the orchestra, the music did not gain much in size. If anything it was exposed as one of the weakest examples of Stravinsky's creations. To borrow a simile from a friend, the composition had as much relation to the rest of the program as a cherry has to the principal ingredients in a cocktail.

The concert as a whole was in keeping with the traditional aristocracy of tone and virtuosity of the orchestra and its distinguished leader and won the warm and prolonged applause of the capacity audience.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
DEC 12 1936

To mark the seventy-fifth anniversary of the birth of Edward MacDowell, Serge Koussevitzky is including upon the Boston Symphony programs of the coming week in Boston (December 18-19) the American composer's Second Pianoforte Concerto in D minor. Howard Goding, the American pianist, will be the soloist. The program will also include Arthur Foote's Suite in E major and Brahms's Fourth Symphony in E minor.

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard in Notable Concert

Brahms Composition Is Outstanding Feature of Diversified Program in Art Museum Peristyle.

BY V. K. RICHARDS

Weaving strands of tone into the intricate pattern which is Brahms' "Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 73," the Boston Symphony orchestra brought to a brilliant climax last night's concert complimentary to members of the Toledo Museum of Art.

Never has this famous ensemble had a more attentive audience in Toledo and never has it given finer account of itself than in this program, which packed the peristyle. Berlioz, Stravinsky and Ravel were on the program, too, thanks to the wisdom and discernment of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, whose leadership of this organization has made it one of the finest in the world.

We heard that dashing and colorful Berlioz overture, "The Roman Carnival," we heard some typical Stravinsky in excerpts from his allegorical ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee" and we listened to chaotic fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." All were played superbly, lent variety and charm to a concert abounding in thrills. But it was the Brahms masterpiece, interpreted with the musicianship it demands, which made this a truly memorable event.

Praise Is Repeated

It is true that much of Brahms' music is on the cerebral side, that it takes familiarity to enjoy it to the fullest, that it can not be understood in a hurry. It is the kind of music skeptics like to call "deep." Fortunate, indeed, is the listener who follows the Boston Symphony orchestra through the four movements of this creation. Its melodic line, its intimate harmonies, its majestic sweep, its smashing conclusion are presented as the composer must have envisioned them. Under the watchful, scholarly and impassioned direction of Koussevitzky, it throbs with life. A great symphony moves the auditor as it must have stirred its author.

The Boston orchestra has been the subject of excited comment in these columns before. Mere repetition is an expression of the opinion that a more competent, better trained organization would be extremely difficult to find. Certainly Toledo never has heard one. What your reporter especially likes about Koussevitzky and his band is the manner in which its effects are achieved: A blasting fortissimo, a singing pianissimo, the caressing lilt of a waltz—any of these and a vast variety of other orchestral manifestations are brought about with more musicianship than showmanship.

Movement Impressive

Koussevitzky knows his music and so do the men at his command. They produce it with no unnecessary flourishes—but it remains the kind of music long to be remembered. If the "Pas de Deux" from a Stravinsky ballet score asks for syncopation the Boston orchestra can swing with the most popular dance band, if Ravel gives percussion a heavy assignment it is attended to with care, if Brahms demands that a theme be laced with lush variations, this orchestra knows what to do about it—and does.

"Allegro con spirito" means just that when the Boston Symphony orchestra essays the final movement of Brahms' "Symphony No. 2." Strings, brass, woodwinds and drums make of this a mighty and memorable passage. And so with everything else this orchestra does; its aim is to present music as it was conceived by the composer; its success in this endeavor can be gauged by the eminence this ensemble rightly enjoys.

NEW YORK, N. Y
TIMES

THURSDAY

Maurice Dumesnil, French pianist, presents the third in his series of six broadcasts dealing with the twenty-four preludes by Claude Debussy. An intimate friend of Debussy during the latter part of the noted French composer's life, the pianist possesses a number of Debussy's unpublished works: WJZ, 2:45-3 P. M.

Rochester Philharmonic, conducted by José Iturbi; WJZ, 3:15-4 P. M.

"Leonore" Overture No. 3......Beethoven
"Haffner" Symphony ....Mozart
Toccata and Fugue ....Bach

Boston Symphony, conducted at Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, Cambridge, by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Howard Goding is the piano soloist: WJZ, 8-9 P. M.

Overture Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikovsky
Concerto No. 2, D minor, Opus 23, MacDowell

Richard Hageman, Dutch composer and conductor, in the absence of Leon Barzin, directs this symphonic concert. Helena Mara, soprano, is the soloist: WOR, 10-10:30 P. M.

Overture, "Russlan and Ludmilla"..Glinka
Prize Song, "Die Meistersingers"..Wagner
Song Without Words; At the Well; The Night Has a Thousand Eyes....Hageman
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah", Saint-Saens
Mock Morris ....Grainger

FRIDAY

Music Appreciation Hour, with Dr. Walter Damrosch conducting a symphony orchestra and lecturing on various classical music forms, for school children: WEAF-WJZ, 2-3 P. M.

Suite from the Water Music........Handel
Canon: "To Malzel"; Symphony No. 8 in F (Part 2); Symphony No. 8 in F (Part 4) ....Beethoven

Gregor Piatigorsky, Russian 'cellist, is guest soloist with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, directed by Eugene Goossens: WABC, 2:45-4:30 P. M.

Symphony No. 8, F major......Beethoven
Concerto, A minor for 'cello.....Schumann
Tone Poem, "Don Quixote"........Strauss
Prelude, Act III, "Lohengrin"......Wagner

Variety Music, with Jessica Dragonette, soprano; The Revelers Quartet and Bourdon Orchestra: WEAF, 8-9 P. M.

Beautiful Galathea...............Von Suppe
My Paradise ....Friml
It's De Lovely ....Porter
Dedication ....Turina
Liebestraum ....Liszt
Sylvia ....Speaks
Scotch Songs ....Traditional
Under the Double Eagle..............Wagner
Two Hearts in Waltz Time..........Stoltz
Zigeunerweisen ....Sarasate
Clouds ....Charles
Soldiers Chorus ....Gounod
You Are All I've Wanted........Romberg
Flirting With the Moon...........Grever

Operatic Music by a concert orchestra and chorus, Cesare Sodero directing. The soloist are Aimee Deloro, soprano; Stuart Gracey, baritone, and Willard Amison, tenor: WOR, 8:30-9:00 P. M.

Overture, "Les Petits Rien"........Mozart
Mephisto One Day, Sneering, Said: From "La Mascotte" ....Audran
O Luci di Quest' Anima, "Linda di Chamounix" ....Donizetti
First Arabesque ....Debussy
Serenata ....Renzi
Kermesse, "Faust" ....Gounod

Orchestral Music performed "in the spirit of Old Vienna": WOR, 9:30-10 P. M.

Overture, "Martha" ....Flotow
Under the Linden Tree............Massenet
Prince and Princess, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff
Queen of Sheba Ballet Suite....Goldmark
Sleeping Beauty Waltz.......Tchaikovsky

Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Eugene Ormandy in a concert commemorating the 150th anniversary of the birth of the composer, Carl Maria von Weber: WABC, 10-10:30 P. M.

Euryanthe Overture ....Weber
Intermezzo, "Jewels of the Madonna," Wolf-Ferrari
Londonderry Air for Strings......Grainger
Ride of the Valkyries................Wagner

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

Many Smart Gowns Worn at Symphony Concert Last Evening

By IDA TAYLOR

A BRILLIANT audience filled the peristyle of the Toledo Museum of Art to capacity last evening to hear the superb concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky.

One of the dressiest groups of the season turned out for this function and many beautiful gowns were seen.

Flowers, artificial and natural, bedecked many an evening frock, and numerous real posies and bandeaux of gold and silver adorned the wearers' hair.

Footwear for evening is very elaborate this year. Toes and heels peep forth from sandals of satin and lovely borcades as well as from gold and silver kid.

Miss Olive Colton in a white satin gown with a small white princess ostrich feather in her hair looked regal.

A striking combination of dull black crepe with a square neckline outlined in turquoise blue velvet was worn by Mrs. Joseph Close, and Mrs. Langdon Walbridge was gowned in a flowered chiffon in soft shades of cobalt blue and mauve.

Mrs. Louis Mennel was very smart in a black net frock with bands of black lacquered satin.

Miss Ruth Cartwright's iceblue model had short puffed sleeves made after the modern trend.

Miss Katherine Baker also was in sophisticated black with which she wore a long black velvet coat with an ermine collar.

Miss Christine Close, one of Toledo's attractive subdebs, was gowned in a stunning dubonnet moire frock, fashioned with a boat neck, short puffed sleeves and a flaring skirt.

Mrs. Oscar Foster's chartreuse gown had a band of aubergine velvet marking the front of the bodice.

Mrs. John Bigger's frock of brown metal cloth was most effective.

Mrs. Morrison Waite Young has as a guest for over the week end, Mrs Paul Noyes of Chicago.

Mrs. Libbey Honored at Luncheon

Miss Sally Libbey entertained a small group at luncheon yesterday in her home in honor of Mrs. E. D. Libbey, who returned from New York this week to attend the museum concert, and also complimenting Mrs. Langdon Walbridge of Coronado Beach, Calif., who with her husband is spending a brief time in Toledo.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
DEC 13 1936

Opera Day to Be Sponsored by Social Service Groups Jan. 30

An Opera Day, to be held on Saturday, Jan. 30, at the Academy of Music, will be sponsored by the Cardiac Division of the Social Service Auxiliary of Kings County Hospital, Mrs. Joseph W. Ferris, chairman, in affiliation with other Brooklyn agencies. "Hansel and Gretel" will be presented in the afternoon and "Martha" in the evening.

Opera Day is planned to focus the attention on the problem in connection with convalescent and foster home care for cardiac patients.

Mrs. John E. Jennings is chairman of the Social Service Auxiliary of the Hospital, and Mrs. Ferris is general chairman of the Opera Day presentations. Among those who are serving on the sponsoring committee are Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll, wife of the Borough President of Brooklyn; Mrs. Stephen Valentine Jr., Miss Helen Wood, Mrs. Rodney C. Ward, Mrs. Albert W. Meisel, Mrs. John L. Spence Jr., Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, Mrs. Edward W. Macy, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. John F. Thompson, Mrs. Cameron Duncan, Mrs. Russell S. Hume and Mrs. Rebecca Holmes.

The casts of the operas will be composed of nationally known singers of the National Music League Opera Company. Shereen, who played Gretel in "Hansel and Gretel" at a recent performance before the President at the White House, will sing the leading role.

A reception will be held following the performance of "Martha" in the evening in honor of the executive board, board of directors and artist advisory board of the National Music League. The members of the executive board are Mrs. Frederick Steinway, Mrs. Christian R. Holmes, Felix M. Warburg and Harold V. Milligan. The board of directors comprises Mrs. Henry Martyn Alexander, Mrs. J. Philip Benkard, John Erskine, Dorothy Gordon, Mrs. Charles S. Guggenheimer, Mrs. Ernest Hutcheson, Willard V. King, Mme. Hulda Lashanska, Mrs. Gilbert Montague, Walter W. Naumburg, Mrs. Henry F. Schwarz, A. MacKay Smith, Carleton Sprague Smith, Mrs. Schuyler Smith, William Ziegler Jr., Mme. Alma Gluck-Zimbalist. On the artist advisory board are Harold Bauer, Walter Damrosch, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Wallace Goodrich, Jascha Heifetz, Ernest Hutcheson, Edward Johnson, Serge Koussevitzky, Yolanda Mero, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Fritz Reiner, Olga Samaroff, Ernest Schelling, Nikolai Sokoloff, Albert Spalding, Frederick Stock, Albert Stoessell, Lawrence Tibbett and Efrem Zimbalist.

ORCHESTRA WORLD
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC - - 19

RADIO ROUND-UP

THE Johnny Green-Astaire show was renewed for another 13-week period . . . 'Pears that Harry Jackson's outfit will remain on the Irvin Cobb bill. We understood Chick Webb was to play the New York programs . . . Tommy Dorsey and his swing sentimentalers quietly eased into town and found themselves booked for a long commercial, a theatre showing, the WOR "Morning Matinee" and a hotel spot in the offing . . . The Boston Symphony resumed its fifth season of exclusive microphonics under the NBC flag. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky again will conduct . . . Shep Fields replaces Whiteman on the Woodbury series. About fourteen additional housemen will be added for the broadcasts. However, the Fields' group, on their own numbers, will play as an independent unit . . .

121

TOLEDO, O.
NEWS-BEE

DEC 12 1936

Boston Orchestra Wins New Laurels in Toledo

Enthusiastic Audience Greets Dr. Koussevitzky in Third Concert at Art Museum

By RODOLFO FLORIPE.

History does a good deal of repeating when the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra under its wiry Napoleonic leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky visits the Art Museum peristyle in concert.

As in the past there was a capacity house, unbridled enthusiasm, insistent demands for more and more.

The program was characteristic of what we have become accustomed to expect of the Boston orchestra here. There is always a liberal dose of modern music, a sample of romanticism and a measure of classicism. Last night the romantic note furnished by Berlioz' "Overture, the Roman Carnival," whic hopened the concert. Modernism was represented by Stavinsky's "Divertimento," from "Le Baiser de la Fee," and Ravel's "Daphins and Chloe," (second suite). For the classic note Mr. Koussevitzky turned to Brahms' magnificent "Symphony No. 2 in D Major." The last selection does not exactly fall into the classic standard in point of time and some may reasonably object to the classification.

Brahms Symphony Leads.

Whatever your classification may be, however, the fact remains that Brahms' symphony was the major offering of the evening and where the orchestra's virtuosity and the mastery of Mr. Koussevitzky over his men shone the brightest. Let no man upon hearing this music still call Brahms cold and obscure. The warm-blooded humanity of a great artist who could survey the woes of his fellow men from a calm, yet not remote eminence, vibrate in every measure of the score. This is not the utterance of a neurotic who finds the world is too much with him.

If the music lacks the grandeur and epic breath or the exquisite lyricism of some of the composer's other symphonies, it is nevertheless, beautiful, surcharged with hope and optimism. Lacking the heroic simplicity of that other master symphonist, Beethoven, Brahms nevertheless inherited the harmonic mantle dropped by the master and his shoulders did not prove too weak for the task. He is the deep river at the foot of the mountain we call Beethoven.

Ravel Number Praised.

Of the other compositions on the program, Mr. Koussevitzky gave us a masterful reading of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." He is admittedly one of the greatest living interpreters of Ravel. He knows exactly how to extract the very essence of Ravel's music, how to reveal its delicate tints, subtle shades, and charming rhythms for the listener.

Stravinsky's "divertimento" was of particular interest because it gave us the chance to hear the same composition by the orchestra in contrast to the arrangement for piano and violin which we heard not long ago with Stravinsky himself at the piano assisted by violinist Dushkin.

It must be reported, however, that despite the added color and greater utterance of the orchestra, the music did not gain much in size. If anything it was exposed as one of the weakest examples of Stravinsky's creations. To borrow a simile from a friend, the composition had as much relation to the rest of the program as a cherry has to the principal ingredients in a cocktail.

The concert as a whole was in keeping with the traditional aristocracy of tone and virtuosity of the orchestra and its distinguished leader and won the warm and prolonged applause of the capacity audience.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

DEC 12 1936

To mark the seventy-fifth anniversary of the birth of Edward MacDowell, Serge Koussevitzky is including upon the Boston Symphony programs of the coming week in Boston (December 18-19) the American composer's Second Pianoforte Concerto in D minor. Howard Goding, the American pianist, will be the soloist. The program will also include Arthur Foote's Suite in E major and Brahms's Fourth Symphony in E minor.

TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

DEC 12 1936

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard in Notable Concert

Brahms Composition Is Outstanding Feature of Diversified Program in Art Museum Peristyle.

BY V. K. RICHARDS

Weaving strands of tone into the intricate pattern which is Brahms' "Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 73," the Boston Symphony orchestra brought to a brilliant climax last night's concert complimentary to members of the Toledo Museum of Art.

Never has this famous ensemble had a more attentive audience in Toledo and never has it given finer account of itself than in this program, which packed the peristyle. Berlioz, Stravinsky and Ravel were on the program, too, thanks to the wisdom and discernment of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, whose leadership of this organization has made it one of the finest in the world.

We heard that dashing and colorful Berlioz overture, "The Roman Carnival," we heard some typical Stravinsky in excerpts from his allegorical ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee" and we listened to chaotic fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." All were played superbly, lent variety and charm to a concert abounding in thrills. But it was the Brahms masterpiece, interpreted with the musicianship it demands, which made this a truly memorable event.

Praise Is Repeated

It is true that much of Brahms' music is on the cerebral side, that it takes familiarity to enjoy it to the fullest, that it can not be understood in a hurry. It is the kind of music skeptics like to call "deep." Fortunate, indeed, is the listener who follows the Boston Symphony orchestra through the four movements of this creation. Its melodic line, its intimate harmonies, its majestic sweep, its smashing conclusion are presented as the composer must have envisioned them. Under the watchful, scholarly and impassioned direction of Koussevitzky, it throbs with life. A great symphony moves the auditor as it must have stirred its author.

The Boston orchestra has been the subject of excited comment in these columns before. Mere repetition is an expression of the opinion that a more competent, better trained organization would be extremely difficult to find. Certainly Toledo never has heard one. What your reporter especially likes about Koussevitzky and his band is the manner in which its effects are achieved: A blasting fortissimo, a singing pianissimo, the caressing lilt of a waltz—any of these and a vast variety of other orchestral manifestations are brought about with more musicianship than showmanship.

Movement Impressive

Koussevitzky knows his music and so do the men at his command. They produce it with no unnecessary flourishes—but it remains the kind of music long to be remembered. If the "Pas de Deux" from a Stravinsky ballet score asks for syncopation the Boston orchestra can swing with the most popular dance band, if Ravel gives percussion a heavy assignment it is attended to with care, if Brahms demands that a theme be laced with lush variations, this orchestra knows what to do about it—and does.

"Allegro con spirito" means just that when the Boston Symphony orchestra essays the final movement of Brahms' "Symphony No. 2." Strings, brass, woodwinds and drums make of this a mighty and memorable passage. And so with everything else this orchestra does; its aim is to present music as it was conceived by the composer; its success in this endeavor can be gauged by the eminence this ensemble rightly enjoys.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 13 1936

THURSDAY

Maurice Dumesnil, French pianist, presents the third in his series of six broadcasts dealing with the twenty-four preludes by Claude Debussy. An intimate friend of Debussy during the latter part of the noted French composer's life, the pianist possesses a number of Debussy's unpublished works: WJZ, 2:45-3 P. M.

Rochester Philharmonic, conducted by José Iturbi; WJZ, 3:15-4 P. M.

"Leonore" Overture No. 3......Beethoven
"Haffner" Symphony ....Mozart
Toccata and Fugue ....Bach

Boston Symphony, conducted at Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, Cambridge, by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Howard Goding is the piano soloist: WJZ, 8-9 P. M.

Overture Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikovsky
Concerto No. 2, D minor, Opus 23, MacDowell

Richard Hageman, Dutch composer and conductor, in the absence of Leon Barzin, directs this symphonic concert. Helena Mara, soprano, is the soloist: WOR, 10-10:30 P. M.

Overture, "Russian and Ludmilla"..Glinka
Prize Song, "Die Meistersingers"..Wagner
Song Without Words; At the Well; The Night Has a Thousand Eyes....Hageman
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah", Saint-Saens
Mock Morris ....Grainger

FRIDAY

Music Appreciation Hour, with Dr. Walter Damrosch conducting a symphony orchestra and lecturing on various classical music forms, for school children: WEAF-WJZ, 2-3 P. M.

Suite from the Water Music........Handel
Canon: "To Malzel"; Symphony No. 8 in F (Part 2); Symphony No. 8 in F (Part 4) ....Beethoven

Gregor Piatigorsky, Russian 'cellist, is guest soloist with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, directed by Eugene Goossens: WABC, 2:45-4:30 P. M.

Symphony No. 8, F major......Beethoven
Concerto, A minor for 'cello.....Schumann
Tone Poem, "Don Quixote"........Strauss
Prelude, Act III, "Lohengrin"......Wagner

Variety Music, with Jessica Dragonette, soprano; The Revelers Quartet and Bourdon Orchestra: WEAF, 8-9 P. M.

Beautiful Galathea...............Von Suppe
My Paradise ....Friml
It's De Lovely ....Porter
Dedication ....Turina
Liebestraum ....Liszt
Sylvia ....Speaks
Scotch Songs ....Traditional
Under the Double Eagle............Wagner
Two Hearts in Waltz Time...........Stoltz
Zigeunerweisen ....Sarasate
Clouds ....Charles
Soldiers Chorus ....Gounod
You Are All I've Wanted..........Romberg
Flirting With the Moon.............Grever

Operatic Music by a concert orchestra and chorus, Cesare Sodero directing. The soloist are Aimee Deloro, soprano; Stuart Gracey, baritone, and Willard Amison, tenor: WOR, 8:30-9:00 P. M.

Overture, "Les Petits Riens"........Mozart
Mephisto One Day, Sneering, Said: From "La Mascotte" ....Audran
O Luci di Quest' Anima, "Linda di Chamounix" ....Donizetti
First Arabesque ....Debussy
Serenata ....Renzi
Kermesse, "Faust" ....Gounod

Orchestral Music performed "in the spirit of Old Vienna": WOR, 9:30-10 P. M.

Overture, "Martha" ....Flotow
Under the Linden Tree..............Massenet
Prince and Princess, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff
Queen of Sheba Ballet Suite....Goldmark
Sleeping Beauty Waltz........Tchaikovsky

Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Eugene Ormandy in a concert commemorating the 150th anniversary of the birth of the composer, Carl Maria von Weber: WABC, 10-10:30 P. M.

Euryanthe Overture ....Weber
Intermezzo, "Jewels of the Madonna," Wolf-Ferrari
Londonderry Air for Strings.......Grainger
Ride of the Valkyries..................Wagner

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

DEC 12 1936

Many Smart Gowns Worn at Symphony Concert Last Evening

By IDA TAYLOR

A BRILLIANT audience filled the peristyle of the Toledo Museum of Art to capacity last evening to hear the superb concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky.

One of the dressiest groups of the season turned out for this function and many beautiful gowns were seen.

Flowers, artificial and natural, bedecked many an evening frock, and numerous real posies and bandeaux of gold and silver adorned the wearers' hair.

Footwear for evening is very elaborate this year. Toes and heels peep forth from sandals of satin and lovely borcades as well as from gold and silver kid.

Miss Olive Colton in a white satin gown with a small white princess ostrich feather in her hair looked regal.

A striking combination of dull black crepe with a square neckline outlined in turquoise blue velvet was worn by Mrs. Joseph Close, and Mrs. Langdon Walbridge was gowned in a flowered chiffon in soft shades of cobalt blue and mauve.

Mrs. Louis Mennel was very smart in a black net frock with bands of black lacquered satin.

Miss Ruth Cartwright's iceblue model had short puffed sleeves made after the modern trend.

Miss Katherine Baker also was in sophisticated black with which she wore a long black velvet coat with an ermine collar.

Miss Christine Close, one of Toledo's attractive subdebs, was gowned in a stunning dubonnet moire frock, fashioned with a boat neck, short puffed sleeves and a flaring skirt.

Mrs. Oscar Foster's chartreuse gown had a band of aubergine velvet marking the front of the bodice.

Mrs. John Bigger's frock of brown metal cloth was most effective.

Mrs. Morrison Waite Young has as a guest for over the week end, Mrs Paul Noyes of Chicago.

Mrs. Libbey Honored at Luncheon

Miss Sally Libbey entertained a small group at luncheon yesterday in her home in honor of Mrs. E. D. Libbey, who returned from New York this week to attend the museum concert, and also complimenting Mrs. Langdon Walbridge of Coronado Beach, Calif., who with her husband is spending a brief time in Toledo.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

DEC 13 1936

Opera Day to Be Sponsored by Social Service Groups Jan. 30

An Opera Day, to be held on Saturday, Jan. 30, at the Academy of Music, will be sponsored by the Cardiac Division of the Social Service Auxiliary of Kings County Hospital, Mrs. Joseph W. Ferris, chairman, in affiliation with other Brooklyn agencies. "Hansel and Gretel" will be presented in the afternoon and "Martha" in the evening.

Opera Day is planned to focus the attention on the problem in connection with convalescent and foster home care for cardiac patients.

Mrs. John E. Jennings is chairman of the Social Service Auxiliary of the Hospital, and Mrs. Ferris is general chairman of the Opera Day presentations. Among those who are serving on the sponsoring committee are Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll, wife of the Borough President of Brooklyn, Mrs. Stephen Valentine Jr., Miss Helen Wood, Mrs. Rodney C. Ward, Mrs. Albert W. Meisel, Mrs. John L. Spence Jr., Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, Mrs. Edward W. Macy, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. John F. Thompson, Mrs. Cameron Duncan, Mrs. Russell S. Hume and Mrs. Rebecca Holmes.

The casts of the operas will be composed of nationally known singers of the National Music League Opera Company. Shereen, who played Gretel in "Hansel and Gretel" at a recent performance before the President at the White House, will sing the leading role.

A reception will be held following the performance of "Martha" in the evening in honor of the executive board, board of directors and artist advisory board of the National Music League. The members of the executive board are Mrs. Frederick Steinway, Mrs. Christian R. Holmes, Felix M. Warburg and Harold V. Milligan. The board of directors comprises Mrs. Henry Martyn Alexander, Mrs. J. Philip Benkard, John Erskine, Dorothy Gordon, Mrs. Charles S. Guggenheimer, Mrs. Ernest Hutcheson, Willard V. King, Mme. Hulda Lashanska, Mrs. Gilbert Montague, Walter W. Naumburg, Mrs. Henry F. Schwarz, A. MacKay Smith, Carleton Sprague Smith, Mrs. Schuyler Smith, William Ziegler Jr., Mme. Alma Gluck-Zimbalist. On the artist advisory board are Harold Bauer, Walter Damrosch, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Wallace Goodrich, Jascha Heifetz, Ernest Hutcheson, Edward Johnson, Serge Koussevitzky, Yolanda Mero, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Fritz Reiner, Olga Samaroff, Ernest Schelling, Nikolai Sokoloff, Albert Spalding, Frederick Stock, Albert Stoessell, Lawrence Tibbett and Efrem Zimbalist.

ORCHESTRA WORLD
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC - - 1936

RADIO ROUND-UP

THE Johnny Green-Astaire show was renewed for another 13-week period . . . 'Pears that Harry Jackson's outfit will remain on the Irvin Cobb bill. We understood Chick Webb was to play the New York programs . . . Tommy Dorsey and his swing sentimentalers quietly eased into town and found themselves booked for a long commercial, a theatre showing, the WOR "Morning Matinee" and a hotel spot in the offing . . . The Boston Symphony resumed its fifth season of exclusive microphonics under the NBC flag. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky again will conduct . . . Shep Fields replaces Whiteman on the Woodbury series. About fourteen additional housemen will be added for the broadcasts. However, the Fields' group, on their own numbers, will play as an independent unit . . .

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC 13 1936

Boston Symphony Leader Rejects Coronation Offer

Koussevitsky Refuses to Conduct Orchestra at Crowning of King

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY
Here to conduct Boston Symphony.

Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian poor boy who grew up to be a great musician and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, refused to conduct an orchestra at the coronation which was planned for King Edward VIII.

He came here to conduct the Boston Symphony at its appearance last night and this afternoon at Syria Mosque.

The refusal is a notable achievement even though Koussevitsky, born in the small Russian province of Tyer in 1874 is a world famous musician. To be invited to appear at the English coronation is a signal honor.

Koussevitsky, who has conducted the Boston Symphony for the last 12 years, came to America in 1924, the first Russian conductor of the Boston orchestra.

He was brought to Pittsburgh under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra.

This afternoon's program was to include:

Hendel Concerto Grosso; Wagner Prelude to "Lohengrin;" Mendelssohn Scherzo G minor; Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe;" Beethoven Symphony No. 5.

The Russian conductor received his invitatiton to conduct at the coronation of Edward VIII last summer when he was abroad on his vacation. He refused, he told representatives of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association last night, because he annually conducts at the Berkshire Festival, a performance that he greatly enjoys.

Serge Koussevitsky Leads Boston Orchestra Concert

Musicians Add Another Triumph to Long List Of Successes

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY
Here to conduct Boston Symphony.

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

Peerless Serge Koussevitsky and the incomporable Boston Symphony Orchestra added another triumph to their long list of successes last evening in Syria Mosque where a packed house turned out for the second event of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association.

Not in many a moon have local concert goers listened to great music given such thrilling performance. Small wonder that demonstrations of applause after each number was evoked—a tribute testifying to the eminent place occupied by these players and their conductor.

The program comprised Mozart's C-major symphony, No. 34 (Koechel 338); Stravinsky's Divertimento from his Ballet, "The Kiss of the Fairy;" and Cesar Franck's marvelous D-minor symphony.

No other conductor before the public brings forth from his scores the impressive results achieved by Dr. Koussevitsky. Especially is this so in the case of the Mozart work played last night. Here, the inspirational force of an immortal creator of tone was given fullest expression in a manner that held the vast audience in rapt attention.

In giving us Mozart's music Dr. Koussevitsky endowed it with the natural masculinity that really is innate in the composer's creations. Thus we heard Mozart revitalized.

The ensuing Stravinsky work, tremendously complex as a score, was given glowing performance with the utmost simplicity that is typically characteristic with this conductor. Thus its beauties and fine range of tonal color was revealed in most comprehensive fashion.

The Franck symphony proved climactic, and under the spell of their leader the players brought forth a tonal achievement of surpassing quality.

A second concert will be given this afternoon at 3 o'clock in Syria Mosque. The program will include Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 6, in G-minor; the Prelude to Lohengrin; Mendelssohn's own arrangement for orchestra of the Scherzo of his octet, opus 20; the 2nd suit from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe; and Beethoven's 5th symphony.

Dr. Koussevitsky received an invitation to conduct at the coronation of Edward VIII last summer when he was abroad on his vacation. He refused, he told representatives of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association last night, because he annually conducts at the Berkshire Festival, a performance that he greatly enjoys.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Dec. 13/36

THURSDAY

Jose Iturbi, noted composer-pianist-conductor, will lead the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra during the concert broadcast over WJZ, 3:15-4 p.m.

"Leonore" Overture, No. 3	Beethoven
"Haffner" Symphony	Mozart
Toccata and Fugue	Bach

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert will come from Sanders Theater, Harvard University. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. Howard Goding will be piano soloist. WJZ, 8-9 p.m.

FRIDAY

Among the orchestral features of the concert conducted by Rosario Bourdon will be Von Suppe's "Beautiful Galathea," Wagner's march, "Under the Double Eagle," and the Soldiers Chorus, from Gounod's "Faust." WEAF, 8-9 p.m.

Beautiful Galathea	Von Suppe
My Paradise	Friml
It's Delovely	Porter
Dedication	Turins
Liebestraum	Liszt
Sylvia	Speaks
Scotch Songs	Traditional
Under the Double Eagle	Wagner
Two Hearts in Waltz Time	Stoltz
Zigeunerweisen	Sarasete
Clouds	Charles
Soldiers Chorus	Gounod
You Are All I've Wanted	Romberg
Flirting With the Moon	Grever

In commemoration of the 150th birthday anniversary of Carl Maria von Weber, Eugene Ormandy features a performance of the composer's Euryanthe Overture played by the Philadelphia Orchestra. WABC, 10-10:30 p.m.

Want Ads Only—GRant 5400 — PITTSBURGH SUNDA

ENTHUSING OVER PITTSBURGH MUSIC

Dec. 13/36

International News Photo by Sun-Telegraph.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY . . . "PITTSBURGH'S MUSICAL GROWTH HAS BEEN AMAZING"
Dr. Koussevitsky, famed leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, becoming excited as he praises Pittsburgh's musical growth. He's in town for twoconcerts at the Syria Mosque.

Popular Music? 'Horrible,' Says Koussevitsky

Pittsburgh's growth as a musical center of America is amazing, in the opinion of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky.

The famed Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony who will present his orchestra in its second concert at Syria Mosque this afternoon, has this to say:

"In my first season in this country, 12 years ago, Pittsburgh was just beginning to develope. In the last few years, through your splendid musical organizations, the musical growth has been both amazing and magnificent."

'RADIO NO CONTRIBUTOR'

Ranked generally as one of the first four conductors of the world and by many as second only to Arturo Toscanini, he believes that radio has not contributed one iota to the development of musical culture.

He believes popular music "horrible" and will not live.

THE 'DIVINE SPARK'

Young men anxious to attain musical success must study and study hard, warns Dr. Koussevitsky. Then they must have a "divine spark."

"Fifty per cent is hard work; fifty per cent comes from above."

And the conductor's expressive hands shot Heavenward.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

Who Goes Where

By a Passerby

BIG MOMENT of the week for us came Wednesday night when Serge Koussevitsky brought his band (familiar, what?) to Detroit to play a perfect program. We sat where we could see the controlled energy he puts into his conducting, the soundless shouts with which he directed the players.

The audience of course was enormous in size and in enthusiasm. Sitting practically on top our head were the Eliel Saarinens with their party from Bloomfield—the Richard Rasemans, the Zoltan Sepeshys, Eero Saarinen and Florence Schust.

"Did you like the Sibelius?" we asked Mr. Saarinen when he leaned over to see who was doing the loud clapping under the edge of his box.

"Yes," he stated succinctly, adding, as an afterthought, "I met Mr. Koussevitsky on the boat coming back last summer and asked him to play 'Pohjola's Daughter' when he came to Detroit." We learned later from Mrs. Raseman that the two artists are friends and that on Thursday Mr. Koussevitsky planned to go out to Cranbrook to see some of Mr. Saarinen's architectural triumphs there.

---

no body.

FINE PROGRAM BY ORCHESTRA

By FRED LISSFELT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its annual pilgrimage to Syria Mosque last night and once more proved that it is the most efficient, further, that it is the completely artistic orchestra of the day.

Director Koussevitsky made for the occasion a marvelously attractive program: Mozart's C Major Symphony, a work from the earliest days of the symphony, Cesar Franck's D Minor Symphony, made a century later in the transition days which led to present day music, represented last night by its high priest Stravinsky in his "Le Baiser de la Fee."

Koussevitsky's reading of the Franck Symphony is monumental. How clearly he builds the architecture of the wonderful work from its early theme through the long cycle of its development in three movements of diverse character is one of the feats of directing.

The orchestra plays a second concert this afternoon in Syria Mosque at 3 o'clock.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 13 1936

Krasner With Bostonians.

Louis Krasner, violinist, son of Mrs. Sarah Krasner of this city, is announced as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on April 16 and 17 when he is scheduled to give the first American performance of Alban Berg's Violin Concerto.

Mr. Krasner has been playing this concerto to great acclaim abroad and last Wednesday appeared in it at Queen's Hall, London, a re-engagement with the British Broadcasting Symphony Orchestra, under Sir Henry Wood.

Previously he had played the concerto at the Festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music in Barcelona, with the Vienna Philharmonic, under Otto Klepmerer, and the Paris Philharmonic, under Charles Munch. Future performances are scheduled for Stockholm, at the Konsertverein, conducted by Ernest Ansermef, and at the Maggio Musicale Florentino in Italy.

Krasner was born in Russia, but came to Providence in his early boyhood. He is a graduate of the Boston Conservatory of Music, where he studied with Eugene Gruenberg.

◆ ◆ ◆

Chamber Music Concerts

129

Boston Symphony Receives Ovation at Final Concert

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Orchestra Offer Inspiring Interpretation of Exceptional Program—Wagner's Lohengrin Prelude, Mozart's 'Fifth' Are Highlights

Pittsburgh PRESS -- December 14, 1936

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

Musical pleasure derived from instrumental utterance reached a climactic point yesterday afternoon when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the second and final concert of their two-day visit here at Syria Mosque. The occasion marked the third event sponsored by the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association.

The program comprised Handel's G-minor Concerto Grosso, No. 6; Wagner's "Lohengrin" Prelude; Mendelssohn's own arrangement of the Scherzo from his opus 20 Octet; the 2nd suite from Ravel's one-act ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," and Beethoven's 5th symphony.

Mr. Lewando

This wide range of fine music so beautifully juxtaposed indicated Dr. Koussevitbky's keeness as a program master-builder. The projection of this music revealed him as one of the greatest interpreters of our time and gave ample opportunity for the vast audience which crammed all available seating space to know first hand the great personality whose leadership has brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to its present high estate.

The luscious tonal power evoked by the strings in the Handel piece was a joy to the ear. This marvelous string choir, unequalled by any, forms the very backbone of the orchestra, and the vibrant energy evoked from the combined efforts of the players by their director added even greater stature to the majesty and dignity of the work played. Especially impressive was the performance of the first Allegro, which cast in fugual form, is probably the most striking movement of this notable concerto. The incidental violin solos superbly achieved by Concermaster Richard Burgin.

All the glory that is Wagner's was fully set forth in the Lohengrin Prelude, and the ensuing Mendelssohn piece proved particularly ingratiating. Here is Mendelssohn in delightful mood—music which conjures up a picture of sprites disporting amid sylvan surroundings—which Dr. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra revealed with charm and finesse.

The exotic loveliness of the Ravel piece was disclosed with stunning effect. In the luxuriant instrumentation of this score Ravel has spread rich and vibrant colors over the orchestral canvass. In interpreting this remarkable piece of tonal impressions, Dr. Koussevitzky endowed it with glamor.

Bringing a memorable concert to a close came the immortal "Fifth" of Beethoven. Here, again, the collaboration of players and director reached the heights.

Ovational applause was showered upon leader and players time after time. At the conclusion the audience seemed unwilling to depart from the scene of such an inspiring experience.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

DEC [illegible] 1936

Music in Boston

Boston's determination to support its Symphony orchestra is abundantly justified by the character of that organization. In recent years two or three men have made substantial contributions, and an association known as Friends of the Orchestra has 2000 members, who make annual contributions to the orchestra's expenses. An effort is being made to increase this number. The Boston Herald says: "In this period of 'changing and vanishing institutions, 'the Boston orchestra remains one of 'the major luminaries of the cul'tural world and an object of pride 'for the people of its city." This is true enough; but, if cultural institutions are imperiled in a changing world, it is well to know whether this is mainly because people are growing indifferent to them or because persons who would naturally give them financial support are restrained by diminished incomes and rising taxes.

Boston's solicitude to preserve the orchestra is not less meritorious even if one consideration is a belief that this band of musicians is the one remaining widely recognized symbol of Boston's cultural distinction. It is usually not a bad thing for any cultural institution that persons not directly concerned in its function are desirous of expanding it or preserving its prestige for the sake of community advertising or even for local financial advantage. The Boston orchestra, and other Boston institutions like the Museum of Fine Arts, may, of course, be able to count proportionately as many people with a heartfelt interest in their welfare as there were 30 years ago.

Boston's practical support of its orchestra, whether prompted by love or a sense of obligation, is not likely to be overdone. Enthusiasm, however, may need restraint if it fosters a supercilious attitude toward other cities and other orchestras. Here is a writer in the Boston Transcript who says that "Mr 'Barbirolli merits the esteem of all 'who are building the future of his 'admirable orchestra." The orchestra patronizingly referred to is the New York Philharmonic, which, in recent years, under the conducting of Mr Toscanini, has achieved performances never surpassed in orchestral history. The New York orchestra's misfortune is that it has no permanent conductor—or didn't have when the words were written, for Mr Barbirolli has just been given a three-year contract. But the Boston Symphony orchestra might be in exactly the same position if Dr Koussevitzky were to retire.

PITTSBURGH POST-GAZETTE: MONDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1936

Boston Symphony Gives Two Splendid Programs

Koussevitzky Proves Master at Governing Great Orchestra in Presentation of Classics From Works Of Masters to Standard Modern Repertoire.

By Dr. Frederick Dorian

This week-end was a splendid one for music lovers in Pittsburgh. Boston's famous orchestra under the conductorship of Sergei Koussevitzky presented two outstanding programs in Syria Mosque. Saturday night, as well as Sunday afternoon, an unusually large audience was delighted to hear classical music, ranging from Mozart and Beethoven to contemporary standard works of the symphonic repertoire such as Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" (II Suite) and Igor Stravinsky's suite from the ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee." Every rendition was a masterpiece. No wonder the Boston Symphony occupies such an important position in musical America!

After hearing one of these great performances, for example Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, one is tempted to analyze wherein the perfection of the orchestra lies. First of all the greatest credit must go to Sergei Koussevitzky, a leader in the truest sense of the word.

He is a master who governs the orchestra from the first violinist to the last double bass player, from which ranks he himself ascended to the conductorship. The very fact that the great Russian artist is himself a virtuoso of an orchestral instrument partly accounts for his masterful workmanship.

Do not assume however that his love for the orchestra groups is limited only to the strings (although it is difficult not to mention as an example the superior playing of the double bass in the D minor Symphony by Cesar Franck.) All the orchestra groups are higly favored by Koussevitzky. His woodwinds certainly are comparable to those of the French orchestras which are reputedly the best. Maurice Ravel, the greatest contemporary French composer, (who is at present unfortunately very ill) would himself be highly satisfied with the superior technique of the flutes, the oboes, the clarinets, and the bassoons in "Daphnis and Cloe."

Another reason for the high standard of the Boston players is that Koussevitzky has selected only the finest musicians in the European musical capitals for his orchestra. How surprising and pleasing for this reviewer to discover in the stands of the first clarinetist and the first French horn player, the well-known faces of two Austrian musicians, that he has seen for years in the orchestra of the Viennese Staatsoper — Viktor Polatschek, according to Richard Strauss the best in his field, and Gottfried Freiberg.

Koussevitzky chooses his musicians solely on the basis of ability. As a result, the splendid body of the Boston Symphony is today an ideal unity of players assembled from all over the world.

Besides the already cited works of Beethoven, Franck, Stravinsky and Ravel the Boston program included a group of smaller scores. "In der Beschraenkung zeigt sich erst der Meister," ~~says~~ Goethe, which means that in art one judges mastery, when manifested within the limits of small forms and formal rules. Doubtless the performance of pieces such as Handel's "Concerto Grosso G Minor," Wagner's "Prelude to Lohengrin," Mendelssohn's "Scherzo" or the magic C Major Symphony by Mozart (which was Koussevitzky's introductory work Saturday night) are not less important than the splendid, dynamic performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Sunday afternoon.

The audience's reception of Dr Koussevitzky and his glorious orchestra was overwhelming.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 13 1936

Philadelphians Reappear Here Tuesday Night

Prokofieff and Strauss Works on the Program Scheduled by Ormandy

The Philadelphia Orchestra will give its next concert at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday night, December 15, with Eugene Ormandy conducting. The program includes Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and Brahms's [illegible]ond piano concerto, in B flat, with Rosalyn Tureck as soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, back from a tour which took it as far west as Michigan and Ohio, will observe the seventy-fifth anniversary of Edward MacDowell's birth in Serge Koussevitzky's program for next Friday and Saturday in Carnegie Hall playing the D minor piano concerto with Howard Goding as the soloist.

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist with the Cleveland Orchestra under Artur Rodzinski next week, playing Beethoven's "Emperor" piano concerto. In St. Louis Alexander Tansman will be the soloist in the first American performances of his piano concertino on Friday and Saturday under Vladimir Golschmann's direction. Lotte Lehmann will be the soloist with the National Symphony of Washington under Hans Kindler next Wednesday afternoon in Constitution Hall, singing a Wagner aria and a group of Strauss songs.

Fritz Reiner will make his [illegible] American appearance before leaving for Europe next Thursday as guest conductor of the Detroit Symphony. Mischa Elman, on his way West [illegible] an Oriental tour, will stop over Minneapolis for solo appearances n[illegible] Friday and Sunday. On the last date he will play three violin concertos, by Mozart, Mendelssohn a[illegible] Tchaikovsky.

LITERARY DIGEST
NEW YORK

DEC 12 1936

Another musical chef-d œuvre which had lain in dusty oblivion for a century received its first American performance last weekend when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the talented baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, played the Symphony in D Major by Muzio Clementi (1752-1832).

Mellowed newspaper clippings of 1817 reported that Clementi was composing six symphonies as his bid for a niche in musical history. Other clippings dating from 1786 to 1824 told of fourteen symphonies in addition to the six of 1817.

Yet, when he died, bequeathing all his MSS. to his widow, only 100 sonatas, no symphony scores were found. Tho Clementi was a practical man of affairs for a composer and his large estate was in good order his unprinted symphonies dropped from musical ken for forty years.

Two MSS. came to the British Museum in 1871, but, unconnected, they merely intensified search for the others. Then, in 1917, Dr. William H. Cummings, London antiquary, died and left an attic chest containing several Clementi MSS., incomplete and in utter disorder.

Purchase—Public auction resulted in purchase by Carl Engel, Chief of the Music Division of the Library of Congress, Washington, D. C. There they lay, gathering more dust, until 1924, when a magazine article piqued the curiosity of Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-conductor and musical antiquary.

A decade passed before Casella finally crossed the ocean to study the Washington scores. His is an astonishing detective story in weaving together disordered pages.

Putting them together was similar to doing several jigsaw puzzles at once. By last year there were four symphonies, each with an incomplete first movement. Recalling the two British Museum MSS., Casella went to London, armed with photostats of the Washington scores. Careful work restored all four. He had to fill in a slight part of the first, third and fourth, but the complete Clementi second bridges a century gap in musical history. Doctor Koussevitzky finds the new-old music possessing "great charm and brilliance." But the latter praise belongs, too, to patient musical detectives.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS

DEC 1 1 1936

Symphony Plays To Audience of 5,000 Thursday

A REAL taste of modern music was given the more than 5,000 persons who packed Hill auditorium in Ann Arbor last night to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, in the third concert of this season's Choral Union series.

This taste of modern music came with the fourth number when Joseph Brinkman of the University of Michigan's school of music joined the orchestra in the Concerto No. 2 in E major for piano. Mr. Brinkman is a real artist and proved that a prophet can have some honor in his own country, for he received an ovation from a really thrilled audience. The concerto, which is a composition of Leo Sowerby, a native of Grand Rapids, is a disonant, rhythmic, thoroughly modern thing that immediately captured the whole-hearted interest of those who heard it. The Ann Arbor pianist gave it its first public presentation with the Boston organization in Boston early this month. Last night's performance was the second presentation.

Opening the program was the exciting overture, The Roman Carnival (Berlioz). There followed excellent interpretations of the Prelude to Lohengrin (Wagner) and Scherzo in G minor from the Octet, Opus 20, arranged for orchestra by the composer (Mendelssohn), and the concerto concluded the first part of the program.

The whole second part of the concert consisted of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, which left the audience breathless for a moment after the final majestic bars. Then a storm of applause came, calling Koussevitzky back to the platform several times. The director seemed to realize the applause was meant for appreciation only, for everyone felt an encore would have been nothing but anti-climax after the magnificent symphony.—E. H.

Mr. and Mrs. O. W. Kube of Bertha lake, near Clare, are spending the week with Mr. and Mrs. R .H. Gauss of 19 Anderson court.

W HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

DEC 13 1936

The World Music....

By H. Earle Johnson

ne current issue of The Atlantic ıthly contains an interesting cle entitled "Notes on Conducting; versations with Koussevitzky" by via Dreyfus. Miss Dreyfus asks Dr. ussevitzky many of the seemingly ple, but sometimes complex, stions which frequently occur to average listener; his answers are ays carefully thought out, and ss Dreyfus has expressed them in ple words.

-MONDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1936—

—PITTSBURGH SUN-TELEGRAPH—

Koussevitsky, Boston Orchestra Acclaimed

By FRED J. LISSFELT

*The matinee of the Boston Sym*phony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Syria Mosque drew a capacity audience which accorded Koussevitsky the greatest ovation I can remember in our concert halls. Both he and the players had to respond repeatedly to the storm of applause, and never before has it been better deserved.

Tension broke at the end of Ravel's second suite to "Daphnis and Chloe," the original performance of which induced the French government to pay Koussevitsky its highest recognition for merit in the arts. There was the acme in skill as director, in displaying the ultimate possibilities of color, rhythm and tone in the modern orchestra.

The opening Handel Concerto Grosso in G minor displayed again the cold clarity of musical perceptition which this director can evoke from his players. In the prelude to "Lohengrin" for the first time I have heard a convincing tonal depicting of the miracle Richard Wagner tried to imply with the coming of the "Swan Knight." The Mendelssohn arrangement of his own Sherzo from the Octet Op. 20 was rather a weakling in robust company.

Koussevitsky's reading of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony must have been a surprise to many. Only in the opening theme could one sense the impetuous Russian musician. In straightforward German manner he read this beloved work and kept it quite clear of the maudlin sentiment most directors feel especially towards the Andante.

129

Boston Symphony Receives Ovation at Final Concert

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Orchestra Offer Inspiring Interpretation of Exceptional Program—Wagner's Lohengrin Prelude, Mozart's 'Fifth' Are Highlights

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

Pittsburgh PRESS -- December 14, 1936

Musical pleasure derived from instrumental utterance reached a climactic point yesterday afternoon when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the second and final concert of their two-day visit here at Syria Mosque. The occasion marked the third event sponsored by the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association.

The program comprised Handel's G-minor Concerto Grosso, No. 6; Wagner's "Lohengrin" Prelude; Mendelssohn's own arrangement of the Scherzo from his opus 20 Octet; the 2nd suite from Ravel's one-act ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," and Beethoven's 5th symphony.

Mr. Lewando

This wide range of fine music so beautifully juxtaposed indicated Dr. Kousevitbky's keeness as a program master-builder. The projection of this music revealed him as one of the greatest interpreters of our time and gave ample opportunity for the vast audience which crammed all available seating space to know first hand the great personality whose leadership has brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to its present high estate.

The luscious tonal power evoked by the strings in the Handel piece was a joy to the ear. This marvelous string choir, unequalled by any, forms the very backbone of the orchestra, and the vibrant energy evoked from the combined efforts of the players by their director added even greater stature to the majesty and dignity of the work played. Especially impressive was the performance of the first Allegro, which cast in fugual form, is probably the most striking movement of this notable concerto. The incidental violin solos superbly achieved by Concermaster Richard Burgin.

All the glory that is Wagner's was fully set forth in the Lohengrin Prelude, and the ensuing Mendelssohn piece proved particularly ingratiating. Here is Mendelssohn in delightful mood—music which conjures up a picture of sprites disporting amid sylvan surroundings—which Dr. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra revealed with charm and finesse.

The exotic loveliness of the Ravel piece was disclosed with stunning effect. In the luxuriant instrumentation of this score Ravel has spread rich and vibrant colors over the orchestral canvass. In interpreting this remarkable piece of tonal impressions, Dr. Koussevitzky endowed it with glamor.

Bringing a memorable concert to a close came the immortal "Fifth" of Beethoven. Here, again, the collaboration of players and director reached the heights.

Ovational applause was showered upon leader and players time after time. At the conclusion the audience seemed unwilling to depart from the scene of such an inspiring experience.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS

DEC 1 1 1936

Symphony Plays To Audience of 5,000 Thursday

A REAL taste of modern music was given the more than 5,000 persons who packed Hill auditorium in Ann Arbor last night to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, in the third concert of this season's Choral Union series.

This taste of modern music came with the fourth number when Joseph Brinkman of the University of Michigan's school of music joined the orchestra in the Concerto No. 2 in E major for piano. Mr. Brinkman is a real artist and proved that a prophet can have some honor in his own country, for he received an ovation from a really thrilled audience. The concerto, which is a composition of Leo Sowerby, a native of Grand Rapids, is a disonant, rhythmic, thoroughly modern thing that immediately captured the whole-hearted interest of those who heard it. The Ann Arbor pianist gave it its first public presentation with the Boston organization in Boston early this month. Last night's performance was the second presentation.

Opening the program was the exciting overture, The Roman Carnival (Berlioz). There followed excellent interpretations of the Prelude to Lohengrin (Wagner) and Scherzo in G minor from the Octet, Opus 20, arranged for orchestra by the composer (Mendelssohn), and the concerto concluded the first part of the program.

The whole second part of the concert consisted of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, which left the audience breathless for a moment after the final majestic bars. Then a storm of applause came, calling Koussevitzky back to the platform several times. The director seemed to realize the applause was meant for appreciation only, for everyone felt an encore would have been nothing but anti-climax after the magnificent symphony.—E. H.

Mr. and Mrs. O. W. Kube of Bertha lake, near Clare, are spending the week with Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Gauss of 19 Anderson court.

LITERARY DIGEST
NEW YORK

DEC 1 2 1936

Another musical chef-d'œuvre which had lain in dusty oblivion for a century received its first American performance last week-end when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the talented baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, played the Symphony in D Major by Muzio Clementi (1752-1832).

Mellowed newspaper clippings of 1817 reported that Clementi was composing six symphonies as his bid for a niche in musical history. Other clippings dating from 1786 to 1824 told of fourteen symphonies in addition to the six of 1817.

Yet, when he died, bequeathing all his MSS. to his widow, only 100 sonatas, no symphony scores were found. Tho Clementi was a practical man of affairs for a composer and his large estate was in good order his unprinted symphonies dropped from musical ken for forty years.

Two MSS. came to the British Museum in 1871, but, unconnected, they merely intensified search for the others. Then, in 1917, Dr. William H. Cummings, London antiquary, died and left an attic chest containing several Clementi MSS., incomplete and in utter disorder.

Purchase—Public auction resulted in purchase by Carl Engel, Chief of the Music Division of the Library of Congress, Washington, D. C. There they lay, gathering more dust, until 1924, when a magazine article piqued the curiosity of Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-conductor and musical antiquary.

A decade passed before Casella finally crossed the ocean to study the Washington scores. His is an astonishing detective story in weaving together disordered pages.

Putting them together was similar to doing several jigsaw puzzles at once. By last year there were four symphonies, each with an incomplete first movement. Recalling the two British Museum MSS., Casella went to London, armed with photostats of the Washington scores. Careful work restored all four. He had to fill in a slight part of the first, third and fourth, but the complete Clementi second bridges a century gap in musical history. Doctor Koussevitzky finds the new-old music possessing "great charm and brilliance." But the latter praise belongs, too, to patient musical detectives.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

DEC 14 1936

Music in Boston

Boston's determination to support its Symphony orchestra is abundantly justified by the character of that organization. In recent years two or three men have made substantial contributions, and an association known as Friends of the Orchestra has 2000 members, who make annual contributions to the orchestra's expenses. An effort is being made to increase this number. The Boston Herald says: "In this period of 'changing and vanishing institutions, 'the Boston orchestra remains one of 'the major luminaries of the cul'tural world and an object of pride 'for the people of its city." This is true enough; but, if cultural institutions are imperiled in a changing world, it is well to know whether this is mainly because people are growing indifferent to them or because persons who would naturally give them financial support are restrained by diminished incomes and rising taxes.

Boston's solicitude to preserve the orchestra is not less meritorious even if one consideration is a belief that this band of musicians is the one remaining widely recognized symbol of Boston's cultural distinction. It is usually not a bad thing for any cultural institution that persons not directly concerned in its function are desirous of expanding it or preserving its prestige for the sake of community advertising or even for local financial advantage. The Boston orchestra, and other Boston institutions like the Museum of Fine Arts, may, of course, be able to count proportionately as many people with a heartfelt interest in their welfare as there were 30 years ago.

Boston's practical support of its orchestra, whether prompted by love or a sense of obligation, is not likely to be overdone. Enthusiasm, however, may need restraint if it fosters a supercilious attitude toward other cities and other orchestras. Here is a writer in the Boston Transcript who says that "Mr 'Barbirolli merits the esteem of all 'who are building the future of his 'admirable orchestra." The orchestra patronizingly referred to is the New York Philharmonic, which, in recent years, under the conducting of Mr Toscanini, has achieved performances never surpassed in orchestral history. The New York orchestra's misfortune is that it has no permanent conductor—or didn't have when the words were written, for Mr Barbirolli has just been given a three-year contract. But the Boston Symphony orchestra might be in exactly the same position if Dr Koussevitzky were to retire.

W HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

DEC 1 3 1936

The World Music ....

By H. Earle Johnson

ne current issue of The Atlantic thly contains an interesting cle entitled "Notes on Conducting; versations with Koussevitzky" by ia Dreyfus. Miss Dreyfus asks Dr. ssevitsky many of the seemingly ple, but sometimes complex, stions which frequently occur to average listener; his answers are ays carefully thought out, and s Dreyfus has expressed them in ple words.

PITTSBURGH POST-GAZETTE: MONDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1936

Boston Symphony Gives Two Splendid Programs

Koussevitzky Proves Master at Governing Great Orchestra in Presentation of Classics From Works Of Masters to Standard Modern Repertoire.

By Dr. Frederick Dorian

This week-end was a splendid one for music lovers in Pittsburgh. Boston's famous orchestra under the conductorship of Sergel Koussevitzky presented two outstanding programs in Syria Mosque. Saturday night, as well as Sunday afternoon, an unusually large audience was delighted to hear classical music, ranging from Mozart and Beethoven to contemporary standard works of the symphonic repertoire such as Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" (II Suite) and Igor Stravinsky's suite from the ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee." Every rendition was a masterpiece. No wonder the Boston Symphony occupies such an important position in musical America!

After hearing one of these great performances, for example Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, one is tempted to analyze wherein the perfection of the orchestra lies. First of all the greatest credit must go to Sergei Koussevitzky, a leader in the truest sense of the word.

He is a master who governs the orchestra from the first violinist to the last double bass player, from which ranks he himself ascended to the conductorship. The very fact that the great Russian artist is himself a virtuoso of an orchestral instrument partly accounts for his masterful workmanship.

Do not assume however that his love for the orchestra groups is limited only to the strings (although it is difficult not to mention as an example the superior playing of the double bass in the D minor Symphony by Cesar Franck.) All the orchestra groups are higly favored by Koussevitzky. His woodwinds certainly are comparable to those of the French orchestras which are reputedly the best. Maurice Ravel, the greatest contemporary French composer, (who is at present unfortunately very ill) would himself be highly satisfied with the superior technique of the flutes, the oboes, the clarinets, and the bassoons in "Daphnis and Cloe."

Another reason for the high standard of the Boston players is that Koussevitzky has selected only the finest musicians in the European musical capitals for his orchestra. How surprising and pleasing for this reviewer to discover in the stands of the first clarinetist and the first French horn player, the well-known faces of two Austrian musicians, that he has seen for years in the orchestra of the Viennese Staatsoper — Viktor Polatschek, according to Richard Strauss the best in his field, and Gottfried Freiberg.

Koussevitzky chooses his musicians solely on the basis of ability. As a result, the splendid body of the Boston Symphony is today an ideal unity of players assembled from all over the world.

Besides the already cited works of Beethoven, Franck, Stravinsky and Ravel the Boston program included a group of smaller scores. "In der Beschraenkung zeigt sich erst der Meister," says Goethe, which means that in art one judges mastery, when manifested within the limits of small forms and formal rules. Doubtless the performance of pieces such as Handel's "Concerto Grosso G Minor," Wagner's "Prelude to Lohengrin," Mendelssohn's "Scherzo" or the magic C Major Symphony by Mozart (which was Koussevitzky's introductory work Saturday night) are not less important than the splendid, dynamic performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Sunday afternoon.

The audience's reception of Dr. Koussevitzky and his glorious orchestra was overwhelming.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 1 3 1936

Philadelphians Reappear Here Tuesday Night

Prokofieff and Strauss Works on the Program Scheduled by Ormandy

The Philadelphia Orchestra will give its next concert at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday night, December 15, with Eugene Ormandy conducting. The program includes Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and Brahms's second piano concerto, in B flat, with Rosalyn Tureck as soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, back from a tour which took it as far west as Michigan and Ohio, will observe the seventy-fifth anniversary of Edward MacDowell's birth in Serge Koussevitzky's program for next Friday and Saturday in Carnegie Hall, playing the D minor piano concerto with Howard Goding as the soloist.

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist with the Cleveland Orchestra under Artur Rodzinski next week, playing Beethoven's "Emperor" piano concerto. In St. Louis Alexander Tansman will be the soloist in the first American performances of his piano concertino on Friday and Saturday under Vladimir Golschmann's direction. Lotte Lehmann will be the soloist with the National Symphony of Washington under Hans Kindler next Wednesday afternoon in Constitution Hall, singing a Wagner aria and a group of Strauss songs.

Fritz Reiner will make his last American appearance before leaving for Europe next Thursday as guest conductor of the Detroit Symphony. Mischa Elman, on his way West for an Oriental tour, will stop over in Minneapolis for solo appearances next Friday and Sunday. On the latter date he will play three violin concertos, by Mozart, Mendelssohn and Tchaikovsky.

-MONDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1936—

—PITTSBURGH SUN-TELEGRAPH—

Koussevitsky, Boston Orchestra Acclaimed

By FRED J. LISSFELT

The matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Syria Mosque drew a capacity audience which accorded Koussevitsky the greatest ovation I can remember in our concert halls. Both he and the players had to respond repeatedly to the storm of applause, and never before has it been better deserved.

Tension broke at the end of Ravel's second suite to "Daphnis and Chloe," the original performance of which induced the French government to pay Koussevitsky its highest recognition for merit in the arts. There was the acme in skill as director, in displaying the ultimate possibilities of color, rhythm and tone in the modern orchestra.

The opening Handel Concerto Grosso in G minor displayed again the cold clarity of musical percepttion which this director can evoke from his players. In the prelude to "Lohengrin" for the first time I have heard a convincing tonal depicting of the miracle Richard Wagner tried to imply with the coming of the "Swan Knight." The Mendelssohn arrangement of his own Sherzo from the Octet Op. 20 was rather a weakling in robust company.

Koussevitsky's reading of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony must have been a surprise to many. Only in the opening theme could one sense the impetuous Russian musician. In straightforward German manner he read this beloved work and kept it quite clear of the maudlin sentiment most directors feel especially towards the Andante.

130

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
DEC 13 1936

AMERICAN COMPOSERS: THERE IS STILL TIME

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

ANY American composer who is now putting the finishing touches on the score of an orchestral masterpiece, "from twenty-five minutes to symphonic length," had best complete it forthwith and send the manuscript to the office of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York before January 1, 1937. If the judges in the Society's "American Composers Contest" find the work sufficiently worthy, it will be performed this season, and the composer will receive $1,000.

Of course there is not much time between now and the first day of 1937; but it is quite a while since the Philharmonic announced its "American Composers Contest," and there must be many orchestral works which, inspired by the Society's offer, have come almost to maturity upon the desks of American composers. And much can be accomplished in eighteen days. Schubert would have thought that a laggard's allowance.

* * *

The Philharmonic has already made public announcement of the judges' decision that one of the two prizes which it had offered ($500 for a short orchestral work, not to exceed twenty minutes in length) would not be awarded—presumably because none of the submitted scores had met the required conditions of that particular contest, the period for the entry of shorter works having closed on October 1. The judges suggested that the money which had been set aside for the $500 prize be held over, and that another similar contest be organized next season.

At the same time, however, the Philharmonic announced that the judges had decided to award Honorable Mention, in accordance with the terms of the contest, to the well known New York musician, Philip James, for an Overture entitled "Bret Harte." Mr. James's Overture will be performed, of course for the first time anywhere, at next Sunday's Philharmonic concert (December 20), under the direction of Barbirolli. It is in order, therefore, to have a look at Mr. James and his honorably mentioned Overture.

* * *

Enter Mr. James

MR. JAMES, a long-time resident of New York, was born on the other side of the Hudson, in Jersey City, some forty-six years ago. He has composed a quantity of music in various forms. Much of it has been played—the orchestral works by such organizations as the Boston Symphony, Philharmonic, Philadelphia, and others. Mr. James served in the infantry during the war, and after the armistice he conducted General Pershing's Headquarters Band of the A. E. F. For the last seven years he has been conductor of the symphonic programs broadcast through station WOR. He is also conductor of programs for N. B. C. Formerly instructor of music at Columbia University, he is now professor of music and chairman of the department of music at New York University.

Mr. James is used to prize contests, and has had success in them. Four years ago a suite of his called "Station WGZBX" won first prize in a radio competition for American orchestral works. It was broadcast in May, 1932, from a New York studio under the direction of Eugene Goossens; and six months later, Mr. James conducted a performance of it at Carnegie Hall with Nikolai Sokoloff's New York Orchestra.

Mr. James in that composition amused himself by spoofing such familiar aspects and activities of the world of radio as crooning, slumber-hours, auditions, mike-struck amateurs, and so forth. He did it very well, "with sly humor and authentic musical wit," as I remarked in the Herald Tribune the day after.

But Mr. James is not only a musical satirist. He has composed in quite different veins. You will find among his scores such works as a symphonic poem, "Song of the Night"; an "Overture in Olden Style on French Noëls"; a Kammersymphonie; much chamber music, various cantatas and oratorios.

* * *

The Overture, "Bret Harte"

CONCERNING the new Overture, "Bret Harte," Mr. James writes me as follows:

'Bret Harte' is the third of three overtures I have written with that title. I do not propose, however, to entitle this one 'Bret Harte No. 3,' inasmuch as the first and second have never been performed, and the first (written some fifteen years ago) will never be performed, since I have destroyed it. All three overtures are quite different, although using largely the same thematic material. The present overture, composed in 1934, is not programmatic, although its title might have that implication. It is absolute in form, using motives based on bits of songs belonging to the time and people written of by Bret Harte in his 'Luck of Roaring Camp,' 'Outcast of Poker Flat,' etc. I have tried to engender, through the medium of music, the romance, the boisterousness, the animation, and the many other abstract qualities of the people of Bret Harte and the West—a people and a section of our country whose glamour has been bedimmed through the eyes of Hollywood as well as by the mawkishness of the radio 'hill-billy' singer.

"The work is scored for full orchestra, with an enlarged percussion group (including rattle, wire-brush, and slap-stick), and a tenor banjo."

* * *

The Conditions

TO REVERT to the matter of the prize that may still be won by an American composer of "a major symphonic work": Here is what the Philharmonic-Symphony Society had to say in its original announcement concerning the conditions governing this award:

"The first award of $1,000 is offered for a major symphonic work, lasting from twenty-five minutes to forty or forty-five ["symphonic length"]. It may be cast in any form the composer sees fit—that of a suite, tone-poem, symphony, etc. It should not exceed in its instrumental requirements the limits of the normal symphony orchestra: 18 first violins, 16 second violins, 12 violas, 12 'celli, 9 string bass, 3 flutes, piccolo, 3 oboes, English horn, 3 clarinets, bass clarinet, 3 bassoons, contra bassoon, 5 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, tuba, usual percussion group, harp, piano-celeste [no heckelphone].

"The work submitted must never have been published or publicly performed before.

"The material and treatment are left entirely to the composer; but it is suggested that the works have their roots in the American scene or derive their inspiration from indigenous sources."

The judges are: Hans Lange and Alexander Smallens, the conductors; Carleton Sprague Smith, head of the Music Division of the New York Public Library; Lee Orean Smith, editor of the publishing house of Carl Fischer, and the composer Ernst Toch. Men of taste and discrimination, all of them. The Society could scarcely have chosen better.

* * *

Some may wonder what the Society means by an "American composer." It means a native-born composer. If you were born in Siam, but journeyed to America with your parents at the age of three and one-half months and have lived ever since in Salem, Mass., as a naturalized citizen, voting the straight Republican ticket at appropriate intervals, you need not submit your symphonic poem, "The Life and Times of Daniel Webster": you are not an American.

If, however, you were born in "These States," as Walt Whitman lovingly called them, sit down before your score-paper and finish that Passacaglia in D minor or that "Symphonic Ode to the East Wind" which you have long wished to write, and send it, before the old year dies, to the New York office of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, 113 West 57th Street. You must fill out an entrance-blank. The Society will send you one if you write and ask for it.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

Boston Symphony Receives Ovation at Final Concert

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Orchestra Offer Inspiring Interpretation of Exceptional Program—Wagner's Lohengrin Prelude, Mozart's 'Fifth' Are Highlights

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

Musical pleasure derived from instrumental utterance reached a climactic point yesterday afternoon when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the second and final concert of their two-day visit here at Syria Mosque. The occasion marked the third event sponsored by the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association.

The program comprised Handel's ~~G-minor~~ Concerto Grosso, No. 6; Wagner's "Lohengrin" Prelude; Mendelssohn's own arrangement of the Scherzo from his opus 20 Octet; the 2nd suite from Ravel's one-act ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," and Beethoven's 5th symphony.

Mr. Lewando

This wide range of fine music so beautifully juxtaposed indicated Dr. Koussevitbky's keeness as a program master-builder. The projection of this music revealed him as one of the greatest interpreters of our time and gave ample opportunity for the vast audience which crammed all available seating space to know first hand the great personality whose leadership has brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to its present high estate.

The luscious tonal power evoked by the strings in the Handel piece was a joy to the ear. This marvelous string choir, unequalled by any, forms the very backbone of the orchestra, and the vibrant energy evoked from the combined efforts of the players by their director added even greater stature to the majesty and dignity of the work played. Especially impressive was the performance of the first Allegro, which cast in fugual form, is probably the most striking movement of this notable concerto. The incidental violin solos superbly achieved by Concermaster Richard Burgin.

All the glory that is Wagner's was fully set forth in the Lohengrin Prelude, and the ensuing Mendelssohn piece proved particularly ingratiating. Here is Mendelssohn in delightful mood—music which conjures up a picture of sprites disporting amid sylvan surroundings—which Dr. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra revealed with charm and finesse.

The exotic loveliness of the Ravel piece was disclosed with stunning effect. In the luxuriant instrumentation of this score Ravel has spread rich and vibrant colors over the orchestral canvass. In interpreting this remarkable piece of tonal impressions, Dr. Koussevitzky endowed it with glamor.

Bringing a memorable concert to a close came the immortal "Fifth" of Beethoven. Here, again, the collaboration of players and director reached the heights.

Ovational applause was showered upon leader and players time after time. At the conclusion the audience seemed unwilling to depart from the scene of such an inspiring experience.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN 12/36

Boston, Dec. 18—(AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra ovserved the 75th birthday anniversary today of the late Edward MacDowell by playing the noted American composer's piano concerto No 2 with Howard Goding as soloist.

The Boston orchestra has not played this concerto since 1919, when Goding, a Bostonian now on the faculty of the New England conservatory, also was the soloist making his debut with the orchestra.

Arthur Foote, 80-year-old American composer and friend of MacDowell, attended today's concert and heard the orchestra, under Dr Serge Koussevitzky, play his own suite in E major for string orchestra. Brahms's symphony completed the program.

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

P. Dec. 13

Notes on the Merits of MacDowell

19—36

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

WHEN Howard Goding plays the Second Piano Concerto of Edward MacDowell at next Friday afternoon's Symphony Concert, the performance will fall upon the 75th anniversary of that composer's birth. It may not be inappropriate, then, to reflect upon the place which MacDowell holds as composer in the world of today. Admittedly nine informed people out of 10, or 99 out of 100, if asked to name the outstanding American music-maker, would select MacDowell. Certainly, he is the only American composer of "serious" music outside, whose name is a household word among us. And did his music disappear altogether from public and private performance, MacDowell's name would still be recalled to us by the numerous MacDowell Clubs scattered throughout the country and by the MacDowell Colony in Peterborough, N. H.

When MacDowell had been dead 25 years, or in 1933, this commentator considered the preparation of an extended article in which MacDowell's entire musical output would be surveyed in terms of contemporary criticism. Faithfully, he read through the piano music, the songs and orchestral compositions — and the net result was discouraging, so discouraging, in fact, that the projected article was never written lest it offend these same MacDowell Clubs and the devotees of the composer in general.

Alone among American composers, MacDowell achieved a very personal idiom, but like many other writers of music who have done so, including Grieg and Debussy, he himself came near to running that idiom into the ground. We can say of a piece of music that it is MacDowellish—or could once, when MacDowell imitations were rife—in a way which we could never say that it was Chadwickian, although Dr. Muck, a contemporary of both composers, told this reviewer in Munich 10 years ago that he considered Chadwick the greater man and one more representatively American. But to return to the question of the MacDowell idiom, the harmonic, melodic and rhythmic idiosyncracies of which it is composed have somehow staled. And so in surveying MacDowell's music there seemed to be a greater freshness in the early, uncharacteristic pieces than in the later ones, by which the composer's real reputation was made. A singular paradox, to be sure. This very Concerto which Mr. Goding plays at Cambridge on Thursday night and at Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, and which seems to exhibit a greater vitality than any other of his larger works, was composed at the age of 27 and is certainly not as MacDowellish, although it is unmistakably individual, as a work like the "Keltic" Sonata. But further comment on this Concerto will be more to the point when it has been freshly reheard.

* * * *

We are reminded by Symphony Hall that Mr. Goding played this same Concerto of MacDowell on the occasion of his first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra, at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, in 1917. Dr. Muck conducted. Together with the Concerto the impending Symphony Concerts will offer another American work, Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings, in E major, to which Dr. Koussevitzky is greatly devoted. The Fourth Symphony of Brahms will be the remaining item. At Cambridge on Thursday the other pieces besides the Concerto will be Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture and the Symphony of Franck.

* * * *

Tuesday evening at Jordan Hall a new and promising series of concerts for chamber orchestra will be inaugurated by a group from the Boston Symphony led by Bernard Zighera, the orchestra's first harpist. The soloists at this first concert will be Guiomar Novaes, the distinguished Brazilian pianist, who will be heard in a Concerto of Mozart, and Chester Hazlett, saxophonist, who will play a Concertino by Jacques Ibert. Pieces by the 18th century Rigel, by Daniel-Lesur of the latest French group, by Domenico Scarlatti and by Paul Hindemith complete a tempting programme.

131

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 1 3 1936

INFLUENCE OF LISZT'S GENIUS

By OLIN DOWNES

THE observances of the fiftieth anniversary of Liszt's death in 1886 have been in this country very few. In New York, where the Philharmonic-Symphony and the visiting orchestras are concerned, they have been negligible. The Wiener transcription of the Liszt transcription of Bach's Weinen, Klagen, played by the Philharmonic-Symphony ten days ago, served as a rather unfortunate reminder of Liszt's notorious weaknesses as a composer, rather than providing an example of the remarkable genius of the creative artist who is so profoundly responsible for evolutions of modern music.

The indifference to Liszt thus manifested may appear to those who minimize him as the logical confirmation of their opinions. But the Liszt question is not so easily solved as that. Liszt's influence is living as well as historical—is in fact woven into the very warp and woof of much of the music that we hear—and there are numerous vivid and original compositions by him which should be heard and revalued.

In Boston Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston ~~Symphony~~ Orchestra have performed what is perhaps Liszt's supreme symphonic expression, the "Faust" symphony. In New York the one most faithful to his memory is his old and great pupil, Alexander Siloti, whose masterly interpretation of the "Totentanz" remains a treasured memory for those who heard it in Carnegie Hall four seasons ago. Recently, on occasions which he chose to describe as his last appearances in public, with the orchestra of Elizabeth, N. J., and with the orchestra of the Juilliard Graduate School, Mr. Siloti played again the "Totentanz" and the unique A major concerto. Perhaps a partial answer to the question of Liszt observances would be a further question. How many musicians have we hereabout of Mr. Siloti's great spirit and grand style?

* * *

But Liszt, even in the days of his glory, often missed rewards which would properly have been his. That he missed them sometimes through his own faults and weaknesses it would not be possible to deny. He also missed them through his generosity to his colleagues and to the cause of music, and through the genuine modesty which went side by side with his romantic posturings and virtuoso manifestations. The story may or may not be fact, but in principle it holds true of the composer who sat at Liszt's elbow while the latter played for him one of his poorer transcriptions of airs from an Italian opera. When Liszt finished, his friend took him by the arm and said, very earnestly, "But, my dear Franz, why do you spend your genius on such stuff?" Liszt turned to him, a little sadly, a little ironically: "In order, my dear friend, that you may have opportunity to produce your music."

He made it possible for many of his contemporaries to compose their music, and he did this in three ways: through out-and-out generosity, often of a perfectly reckless order; by an amazing intuition for new creative genius, wherever he encountered it, and finally, by the perfect wealth of original ideas of form, harmony and thematic transformation which he contributed to the composer's art. Wagner's indebtedness is shown in hundreds of pages, at the same time that Wagner's selectiveness and independence are shown by his individual treatment of elements of Liszt's music. Often, to Liszt, Wagner acknowledged his artistic indebtedness, but with the outside world the composer of "Tristan" and "Parsifal" was not disposed to be so frank.

* * *

He wrote Von Buelow from Paris on Oct. 7, 1859, upset because Buelow had written publicly that "Tristan," on account of its very greatness, could never become a popular opera, while C. F. Pohl had referred to Liszt's influence. As for "Tristan's" inaccessibility for the average mind of the day, "Why touch upon it at all." Then the other vexatious thought: "In the same way, there are many matters which we are quite frank about among ourselves (for instance, that since my acquaintance with Liszt's compositions my treatment of harmony has become very different from what it was formerly), but it is indiscreet, to say the least, of friend Pohl to babble this secret to the whole world in the prominent first lines of his short article on the overture to 'Tristan.' I cannot suppose, can I, that he was authorized to this indiscretion? * * * I believe he embarrasses Liszt, even if he pleases the Princess."

The Princess Sayn-Wittgenstein is, of course, the reference. The concern felt about Liszt's tender feelings on the point of Wagner's assimilations is one of those sudden bursts of solicitude that the composer of the "Ring" felt for any one whose course might in any way appear to conflict with his own. But the admission is as conclusive as the music paper's testimony to Wagner's harmonic evolution.

As for the modern musical descendants of Liszt, those whose music would not have been what it is without his inescapable influence—they are all about us. Richard Strauss and Mahler are unthinkable without him. His influence upon César Franck is very obvious. Rimsky-Korsakoff and a majority of his contemporaries in Russia followed Liszt and Berlioz—not Wagner. How many modern Frenchmen, not excluding one Claude Achille Debussy, confess indebtedness to the creator of tone-poems.

* * *

Liszt's exotic harmonic sense survived even his European musical training. In one of his songs measures of "Tristan," note for note, leap out at you. That Wagner, in that same opera of "Tristan," takes the diminished seventh chords which Liszt strewed so lavishly and often indiscriminately about his pages, and works miracles impossible for the Hungarian, is also self-evident. But new harmonic and formal perceptions which have entered with the very texture of present-day music were Liszt's and were not discoveries of the man of Baireuth.

A field in which far less than the just measure of credit has been given Liszt is his extraordinary mastery of form. How he achieved it, in his feverish and preoccupied existence, is a miracle. Because he did not follow the classic symphonic form and because his fugal passages do not hold to the Bach tradition, the new structures of tone which he developed for himself have been underrated. The Hungarian rhapsodies represent simple but extremely finished forms worked out from the bases of Hungarian gypsy music. The piano concertos stand entirely by themselves, and the concerto in E flat is one of the most finished and perfectly balanced forms in modern music. The unithematic principle of the three-movement structure, the kaleidoscopic transformations and the wholly unusual developments of the theme are Liszt's alone. He holds the copyright, and no one can take it from him.

* * *

The concerto in A major, with the Oriental opening, has more remarkable pages, while it is less coordinated, and does not completely consummate the rare promise of the strange and fascinating introduction. Then there are the symphonic poems. "Les Preludes" is not the only one. Rimsky-Korsakoff took freely from the pages of "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne." "Tasso"; "Mazeppa," an evolution of the earlier piano étude; the "Hunnenschlacht," after Kaulbach's painting, are works worth the hearing. Liszt's influence in liberating composers from the strait-jacket of symphonic tradition, in elaborating means of developing a theme not according to an imposed formula but according to the inner dictates of the idea itself—musical as well as poetic—is past calculation. The apex of his symphonic composition is undoubtedly the "Faust" symphony, which, in all modern music, comes probably nearest the characterization and the philosophy of Goethe.

* * *

The scheme is a series of character pictures, of Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles. Faust the restless seeker, the dreamer torn between two worlds, his pride, his introspections and self-tortures, and the vision of Gretchen, are limned in those pages. The Gretchen music is the one revealing orchestral picture of this character. Interwoven with it is the Faust motive, moving across the surface of Liszt's orchestra as the image of the young knight was seen by Gretchen in her mirror. The Mephistopheles movement, that of "the spirit which denies," is caricature and trivialization of the Faust and Gretchen themes, a passage which has proved a whole volume of reference for later composers and stands in itself a masterly example of musical transformations. This is not only a historical but a prophetic score.

But any adequate disquisition upon Franz Liszt and his music would take more columns than a reader would care to scan of a Sunday morning. Our musicians can supplement the discussion better by actual performance of his works.

TIME
CHICAGO, ILL.

DEC 1 4 1936

M U S I C

Clementi Revival

"Dolce, dolcissimo," begged Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky during rehearsal of his Boston Symphony Orchestra one day last week. "It is beautiful music, gentlemen, play it beautifully. . . . Give me the warm Italian sunshine, gentlemen." Three days later Conductor Koussevitzky and his men played this beautiful music so beautifully that a capacity audience in Symphony Hall came near breaking a house rule against applause between movements. What aroused their enthusiasm was the first U. S. performance of a major work by an almost forgotten 18th Century maestro, Muzio Clementi.

Living during 80 years (1752-1832) in which flourished such taller musical giants as Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven, Italian-born Clementi achieved his fame and wealth in England as a teacher, pianist, conductor and music publisher. He wrote a Gradus ad Parnassum, exercises which some piano students still practice. In Vienna he engaged in a public battle of music with Mozart, the two improvising on the pianoforte, playing at sight and in duets. Listeners called it a draw. When Death came to this able composer, whom Beethoven respected, his most ambitious works—a score of symphonies, some of which he had conducted in London—remained unpublished, the manuscripts in complete disorder.

While Clementi's reputation languished for more than a century, some fragments of his symphonic scores began coming to light. The British Museum acquired one batch in 1871, the Library of Congress another in 1917. Two years ago Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-conductor, went to Washington to do some musical sleuthing. With great difficulty he reconstructed one Clementi symphony from a number of sketches and notes. A Great National Symphony which, surprisingly for its time (1824), contains British folk themes and God Save the King in polyphonic elaboration. Casella put aside for future investigation. Easiest job was to take a Symphony in D Major, most of which was in the Library of Congress, combine it with an introduction and allegro in the same key in the British Museum, pronounce the whole the Second Symphony of Clementi. This was the one Dr. Koussevitzky performed last week.

Boston critics found the Second Symphony fresh, charming, dashing. Wrote Critic Alexander Williams of the Boston Herald: "Mr. Casella may have wished to please Mussolini by finding a great Italian symphonist for the grandeur of Rome. Instead, and of greater importance, he has enriched the world." Conductor Koussevitzky said sagely: "It is very individual. Even in Beethoven you hear a suggestion of Haydn. In this, Clementi, you hear only Clementi." A final grace note to the Boston performance was a telegram from Bronxville, N. Y. which Dr. Koussevitzky read aloud: "Best wishes for the Clementi from his great-granddaughter. Hope you will bring it to New York. (Signed) Cecilia Clementi Pitman."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 20 1936

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give an extra concert in Carnegie Hall this season. It will be for the benefit of the ensemble's pension fund, and the date will be Feb. 10. Jascha Heifetz will be the soloist and Serge Koussevitzky will, of course, conduct. Subscribers are receiving first crack at the tickets, and the chances are good that the event will sell out. No program announced yet.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

DEC 1 3 1936

Between Leger Lines

Federal Music Project Plans for Orchestral Series at Academy to Test Brooklyn Attitude on Symphonic Music.

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

EVIDENCE that Brooklyn is still regarded as a field for symphonic programs, as suggested in this column some weeks back, is found in the formal announcement that the Brooklyn Institute is negotiating with the Federal Music Project for a series of concerts similar to those offered in Manhattan by the Bach Chamber Orchestra.

The programs are to be given in the Music Hall rather than in the Opera House. Inasmuch as the ensemble is a chamber group, this plan should prove satisfactory for, too often, in an effort to secure large audiences for a short series rather than extending or repeating the series for a second audience, the idea of chamber music in large halls is not successful.

I can recall, a few seasons back, when an ambitious group of young players, skilfull, cocpetent and sincere musicians, suddenly moved from smaller quarters to the stage of Carnegie Hall. They did not remain there very long because the intimate idea was lost and the group's efforts went for naught.

It is also interesting to note that in connection with the plans for the Brooklyn series, which would be incorporated in the educational program of the Brooklyn Institute, it is proposed to offer programs of Haydn, Mozart and Bach rather than concentrate upon any particular individual.

UNFORTUNATELY, the date selected is one which immediately shows a conflict which it will not be easy to surmount. It is proposed to give the programs on Thursday evenings, the one night which practically every musical organization in the city has found it impossible to secure support, with the Philharmonic-Symphony Society offering serious competition.

And, from the music commentator's standpoint, this conflict will necessarily result in its being impossible to consider the Brooklyn experiment in as much detail as it naturally should receive.

The Bach Chamber Orchestra, however, will not mean the elimination of the series of the Brooklyn Symphony Orchestra and the New York Civic Orchestra at the Brooklyn Museum. These will continue until the opening of the new WPA Theatre in Manhattan next month. This series is free, whereas for the Academy of Music programs subscriptions will be sold.

The most interesting development, however, is the fact that an experiment is under way.

IN this connection, it develops that at the Prospect Plaza Music Center, another symphony orchestra is blossoming. Although started only about a month ago, it has enrolled 101 players, ranging in age from 14 to 60, many of whom have had extensive symphonic experience.

A series of concerts is planned at the center with the soloists selected from the ensemble.

All of which would indicate that the contention of this column that Brooklyn is interested in symphonic music is being demonstrated.

Since this is a local column today, attention might be called to the fact that when "Walkuere" opens the new Brooklyn opera season on Dec. 29 it will be the first time this Wagner opera has been thus honored locally. It will also be the first time that Mme. Flagstad has appeared in a Brooklyn inaugural.

"Walkuere" has not been sung here since Feb. 27, 1932, when Messrs. Melchoir and Schorr, who will appear in the borough opening performance, were members of the cast.

OF interest also to Brooklynites, in view of the fact that much has been written and will continue to be concerning native composers, is the revelation that a former resident has been honored by Dr. Howard Hanson and the Rochester Philharmonic.

Timothy Mather Spellman, born in this borough, but who has spent much of his life abroad, wrote a symphony in G Minor which Dr. Hanson and his players presented in Rochester last week. It was the world premiere of the composition which is said to be strictly modern in style.

Several of his compositions have been heard in Chicago under Dr. Stock and in Boston under Dr. Koussevitzki, but although the latter gives an annual borough series, I do not recall having heard him present a Spellman composition at the Academy. The composer, incidentally, has recently returned to this country, but has forsaken Brooklyn for Westchester.

So many others have preceded him!

MOVING further out on Long Island, we learn that although icy temperatures are now about us, preliminary plans are being considered for another season of opera and operetta at Jones Beach.

The indefatigable Fortune Gallo, who proved audiences would come to the seaside resort in numbers sufficiently large to support such an endeavor, is commuting between the hinterlands, where his San Carlo Opera Company is appearing, to his Manhattan office, so as to keep his finger on the situation.

"Carmen," which was sung at Jones Beach, opened the company's 27th annual transcontinental tour in Montreal. Chicago was the next port of call, while Detroit, Pittsburgh, Utica, Albany and Providence have reported large audiences.

Havana and the West Coast have yet to be visited with the company booked until April.

WHY not a week in Brooklyn at the end of the tour as a preliminary to a new Jones Beach season?

131

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 13 1936

INFLUENCE OF LISZT'S GENIUS

By OLIN DOWNES

THE observances of the fiftieth anniversary of Liszt's death in 1886 have been in this country very few. In New York, where the Philharmonic-Symphony and the visiting orchestras are concerned, they have been negligible. The Wiener transcription of the Liszt transcription of Bach's Weinen, Klagen, played by the Philharmonic-Symphony ten days ago, served as a rather unfortunate reminder of Liszt's notorious weaknesses as a composer, rather than providing an example of the remarkable genius of the creative artist who is so profoundly responsible for evolutions of modern music.

The indifference to Liszt thus manifested may appear to those who minimize him as the logical confirmation of their opinions. But the Liszt question is not so easily solved as that. Liszt's influence is living as well as historical—is in fact woven into the very warp and woof of much of the music that we hear—and there are numerous vivid and original compositions by him which should be heard and revalued.

In Boston Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have performed what is perhaps Liszt's supreme symphonic expression, the "Faust" symphony. In New York the one most faithful to his memory is his old and great pupil, Alexander Siloti, whose masterly interpretation of the "Totentanz" remains a treasured memory for those who heard it in Carnegie Hall four seasons ago. Recently, on occasions which he chose to describe as his last appearances in public, with the orchestra of Elizabeth, N. J., and with the orchestra of the Juilliard Graduate School, Mr. Siloti played again the "Totentanz" and the unique A major concerto. Perhaps a partial answer to the question of Liszt observances would be a further question. How many musicians have we hereabout of Mr. Siloti's great spirit and grand style?

* * *

But Liszt, even in the days of his glory, often missed rewards which would properly have been his. That he missed them sometimes through his own faults and weaknesses it would not be possible to deny. He also missed them through his generosity to his colleagues and to the cause of music, and through the genuine modesty which went side by side with his romantic posturings and virtuoso manifestations. The story may or may not be fact, but in principle it holds true of the composer who sat at Liszt's elbow while the latter played for him one of his poorer transcriptions of airs from an Italian opera. When Liszt finished, his friend took him by the arm and said, very earnestly, "But, my dear Franz, why do you spend your genius on such stuff?" Liszt turned to him, a little sadly, a little ironically: "In order, my dear friend, that you may have opportunity to produce your music."

He made it possible for many of his contemporaries to compose their music, and he did this in three ways: through out-and-out generosity, often of a perfectly reckless order; by an amazing intuition for new creative genius, wherever he encountered it, and finally, by the perfect wealth of original ideas of form, harmony and thematic transformation which he contributed to the composer's art. Wagner's indebtedness is shown in hundreds of pages, at the same time that Wagner's selectiveness and independence are shown by his individual treatment of elements of Liszt's music. Often, to Liszt, Wagner acknowledged his artistic indebtedness, but with the outside world the composer of "Tristan" and "Parsifal" was not disposed to be so frank.

* * *

He wrote Von Buelow from Paris on Oct. 7, 1859, upset because Buelow had written publicly that "Tristan," on account of its very greatness, could never become a popular opera, while C. F. Pohl had referred to Liszt's influence. As for "Tristan's" inaccessibility for the average mind of the day, "Why touch upon it at all." Then the other vexatious thought: "In the same way, there are many matters which we are quite frank about among ourselves (for instance, that since my acquaintance with Liszt's compositions my treatment of harmony has become very different from what it was formerly), but it is indiscreet, to say the least, of friend Pohl to babble this secret to the whole world in the prominent first lines of his short article on the overture to 'Tristan.' I cannot suppose, can I, that he was authorized to this indiscretion? * * * I believe he embarrasses Liszt, even if he pleases the Princess."

The Princess Sayn-Wittgenstein is, of course, the reference. The concern felt about Liszt's tender feelings on the point of Wagner's assimilations is one of those sudden bursts of solicitude that the composer of the "Ring" felt for any one whose course might in any way appear to conflict with his own. But the admission is as conclusive as the music paper's testimony to Wagner's harmonic evolution.

As for the modern musical descendants of Liszt, those whose music would not have been what it is without his inescapable influence—they are all about us. Richard Strauss and Mahler are unthinkable without him. His influence upon César Franck is very obvious. Rimsky-Korsakoff and a majority of his contemporaries in Russia followed Liszt and Berlioz—not Wagner. How many modern Frenchmen, not excluding one Claude Achille Debussy, confess indebtedness to the creator of tone-poems.

* * *

Liszt's exotic harmonic sense survived even his European musical training. In one of his songs measures of "Tristan," note for note, leap out at you. That Wagner, in that same opera of "Tristan," takes the diminished seventh chords which Liszt strewed so lavishly and often indiscriminately about his pages, and works miracles impossible for the Hungarian, is also self-evident. But new harmonic and formal perceptions which have entered with the very texture of present-day music were Liszt's and were not discoveries of the man of Baireuth.

A field in which far less than the just measure of credit has been given Liszt is his extraordinary mastery of form. How he achieved it, in his feverish and preoccupied existence, is a miracle. Because he did not follow the classic symphonic form and because his fugal passages do not hold to the Bach tradition, the new structures of tone which he developed for himself have been underrated. The Hungarian rhapsodies represent simple but extremely finished forms worked out from the bases of Hungarian gypsy music. The piano concertos stand entirely by themselves, and the concerto in E flat is one of the most finished and perfectly balanced forms in modern music. The unithematic principle of the three-movement structure, the kaleidoscopic transformations and the wholly unusual developments of the theme are Liszt's alone. He holds the copyright, and no one can take it from him.

* * *

The concerto in A major, with the Oriental opening, has more remarkable pages, while it is less coordinated, and does not completely consummate the rare promise of the strange and fascinating introduction. Then there are the symphonic poems. "Les Preludes" is not the only one. Rimsky-Korsakoff took freely from the pages of "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne." "Tasso"; "Mazeppa," an evolution of the earlier piano étude; the "Hunnenschlacht," after Kaulbach's painting, are works worth the hearing. Liszt's influence in liberating composers from the strait-jacket of symphonic tradition, in elaborating means of developing a theme not according to an imposed formula but according to the inner dictates of the idea itself—musical as well as poetic—is past calculation. The apex of his symphonic composition is undoubtedly the "Faust" symphony, which, in all modern music, comes probably nearest the characterization and the philosophy of Goethe.

* * *

The scheme is a series of character pictures, of Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles. Faust the restless seeker, the dreamer torn between two worlds, his pride, his introspections and self-tortures, and the vision of Gretchen, are limned in those pages. The Gretchen music is the one revealing orchestral picture of this character. Interwoven with it is the Faust motive, moving across the surface of Liszt's orchestra as the image of the young knight was seen by Gretchen in her mirror. The Mephistopheles movement, that of "the spirit which denies," is caricature and trivialization of the Faust and Gretchen themes, a passage which has proved a whole volume of reference for later composers and stands in itself a masterly example of musical transformations. This is not only a historical but a prophetic score.

But any adequate disquisition upon Franz Liszt and his music would take more columns than a reader would care to scan of a Sunday morning. Our musicians can supplement the discussion better by actual performance of his works.

TIME
CHICAGO, ILL.
DEC 14 1936

MUSIC

Clementi Revival

"Dolce, dolcissimo," begged Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky during rehearsal of his Boston Symphony Orchestra one day last week. "It is beautiful music, gentlemen, play it beautifully. . . . Give me the warm Italian sunshine, gentlemen." Three days later Conductor Koussevitzky and his men played this beautiful music so beautifully that a capacity audience in Symphony Hall came near breaking a house rule against applause between movements. What aroused their enthusiasm was the first U. S. performance of a major work by an almost forgotten 18th Century maestro, Muzio Clementi.

Living during 80 years (1752–1832) in which flourished such taller musical giants as Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven, Italian-born Clementi achieved his fame and wealth in England as a teacher, pianist, conductor and music publisher. He wrote a Gradus ad Parnassum, exercises which some piano students still practice. In Vienna he engaged in a public battle of music with Mozart, the two improvising on the pianoforte, playing at sight and in duets. Listeners called it a draw. When Death came to this able composer, whom Beethoven respected, his most ambitious works—a score of symphonies, some of which he had conducted in London—remained unpublished, the manuscripts in complete disorder.

While Clementi's reputation languished for more than a century, some fragments of his symphonic scores began coming to light. The British Museum acquired one batch in 1871, the Library of Congress another in 1917. Two years ago Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-conductor, went to Washington to do some musical sleuthing. With great difficulty he reconstructed one Clementi symphony from a number of sketches and notes. A Great National Symphony which, surprisingly for its time (1824), contains British folk themes and God Save the King in polyphonic elaboration, Casella put aside for future investigation. Easiest job was to take a Symphony in D Major, most of which was in the Library of Congress, combine it with an introduction and allegro in the same key in the British Museum, pronounce the whole the Second Symphony of Clementi. This was the one Dr. Koussevitzky performed last week.

Boston critics found the Second Symphony fresh, charming, dashing. Wrote Critic Alexander Williams of the Boston Herald: "Mr. Casella may have wished to please Mussolini by finding a great Italian symphonist for the grandeur of Rome. Instead, and of greater importance, he has enriched the world." Conductor Koussevitzky said sagely: "It is very individual. Even in Beethoven you hear a suggestion of Haydn. In this, Clementi, you hear only Clementi." A final grace note to the Boston performance was a telegram from Bronxville, N. Y. which Dr. Koussevitzky read aloud: "Best wishes for the Clementi from his great-granddaughter. Hope you will bring it to New York. (Signed) Cecilia Clementi Pitman."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 20 1936

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give an extra concert in Carnegie Hall this season. It will be for the benefit of the ensemble's pension fund, and the date will be Feb. 10. Jascha Heifetz will be the soloist and Serge Koussevitzky will, of course, conduct. Subscribers are receiving first crack at the tickets, and the chances are good that the event will sell out. No program announced yet.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
DEC 13 1936

Between Leger Lines

Federal Music Project Plans for Orchestral Series at Academy to Test Brooklyn Attitude on Symphonic Music.

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

EVIDENCE that Brooklyn is still regarded as a field for symphonic programs, as suggested in this column some weeks back, is found in the formal announcement that the Brooklyn Institute is negotiating with the Federal Music Project for a series of concerts similar to those offered in Manhattan by the Bach Chamber Orchestra.

The programs are to be given in the Music Hall rather than in the Opera House. Inasmuch as the ensemble is a chamber group, this plan should prove satisfactory for, too often, in an effort to secure large audiences for a short series rather than extending or repeating the series for a second audience, the idea of chamber music in large halls is not successful.

I can recall, a few seasons back, when an ambitious group of young players, skilfull, cocpetent and sincere musicians, suddenly moved from smaller quarters to the stage of Carnegie Hall. They did not remain there very long because the intimate idea was lost and the group's efforts went for naught.

It is also interesting to note that in connection with the plans for the Brooklyn series, which would be incorporated in the educational program of the Brooklyn Institute, it is proposed to offer programs of Haydn, Mozart and Bach rather than concentrate upon any particular individual.

UNFORTUNATELY, the date selected is one which immediately shows a conflict which it will not be easy to surmount. It is proposed to give the programs on Thursday evenings, the one night which practically every musical organization in the city has found it impossible to secure support, with the Philharmonic-Symphony Society offering serious competition.

And, from the music commentator's standpoint, this conflict will necessarily result in its being impossible to consider the Brooklyn experiment in as much detail as it naturally should receive.

The Bach Chamber Orchestra, however, will not mean the elimination of the series of the Brooklyn Symphony Orchestra and the New York Civic Orchestra at the Brooklyn Museum. These will continue until the opening of the new WPA Theatre in Manhattan next month. This series is free, whereas for the Academy of Music programs subscriptions will be sold.

The most interesting development, however, is the fact that an experiment is under way.

IN this connection, it develops that at the Prospect Plaza Music Center, another symphony orchestra is blossoming. Although started only about a month ago, it has enrolled 101 players, ranging in age from 14 to 60, many of whom have had extensive symphonic experience.

A series of concerts is planned at the center with the soloists selected from the ensemble.

All of which would indicate that the contention of this column that Brooklyn is interested in symphonic music is being demonstrated.

Since this is a local column today, attention might be called to the fact that when "Walkuere" opens the new Brooklyn opera season on Dec. 29 it will be the first time this Wagner opera has been thus honored locally. It will also be the first time that Mme. Flagstad has appeared in a Brooklyn inaugural.

"Walkuere" has not been sung here since Feb. 27, 1932, when Messrs. Melchoir and Schorr, who will appear in the borough opening performance, were members of the cast.

OF interest also to Brooklynites, in view of the fact that much has been written and will continue to be concerning native composers, is the revelation that a former resident has been honored by Dr. Howard Hanson and the Rochester Philharmonic.

Timothy Mather Spellman, born in this borough, but who has spent much of his life abroad, wrote a symphony in G Minor which Dr. Hanson and his players presented in Rochester last week. It was the world premiere of the composition which is said to be strictly modern in style.

Several of his compositions have been heard in Chicago under Dr. Stock and in Boston under Dr. Koussevitzki, but although the latter gives an annual borough series, I do not recall having heard him present a Spellman composition at the Academy. The composer, incidentally, has recently returned to this country, but has forsaken Brooklyn for Westchester.

So many others have preceded him!

MOVING further out on Long Island, we learn that although icy temperatures are now about us, preliminary plans are being considered for another season of opera and operetta at Jones Beach.

The indefatigable Fortune Gallo, who proved audiences would come to the seaside resort in numbers sufficiently large to support such an endeavor, is commuting between the hinterlands, where his San Carlo Opera Company is appearing, to his Manhattan office, so as to keep his finger on the situation.

"Carmen," which was sung at Jones Beach, opened the company's 27th annual transcontinental tour in Montreal. Chicago was the next port of call, while Detroit, Pittsburgh, Utica, Albany and Providence have reported large audiences.

Havana and the West Coast have yet to be visited with the company booked until April.

WHY not a week in Brooklyn at the end of the tour as a preliminary to a new Jones Beach season?

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST GAZETTE

DEC. 14 1936

Boston Symphony Gives Two Splendid Programs

Koussevitzky Proves Master at Governing Great Orchestra in Presentation of Classics From Works Of Masters to Standard Modern Repertoire.

By Dr. Frederick Dorian

This week-end was a splendid one for music lovers in Pittsburgh. Boston's famous orchestra under the conductorship of Sergei Koussevitzky presented two outstanding programs in Syria Mosque. Saturday night, as well as Sunday afternoon, an unusually large audience was delighted to hear classical music, ranging from Mozart and Beethoven to contemporary standard works of the symphonic repertoire such as Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" (II Suite) and Igor Stravinsky's suite from the ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee." Every rendition was a masterpiece. No wonder the Boston Symphony occupies such an important position in musical America!

After hearing one of these great performances, for example Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, one is tempted to analyze wherein the perfection of the orchestra lies. First of all the greatest credit must go to Sergei Koussevitzky, a leader in the truest sense of the word.

He is a master who governs the orchestra from the first violinist to the last double bass player, from which ranks he himself ascended to the conductorship. The very fact that the great Russian artist is himself a virtuoso of an orchestral instrument partly accounts for his masterful workmanship.

Do not assume however that his love for the orchestra groups is limited only to the strings (although it is difficult not to mention as an example the superior playing of the double bass in the D minor Symphony by Cesar Franck.) All the orchestra groups are higly favored by Koussevitzky. His woodwinds certainly are comparable to those of the French orchestras which are reputedly the best. Maurice Ravel, the greatest contemporary French composer (who is at present unfortunately very ill) would himself be highly satisfied with the superior technique of the flutes, the oboes, the clarinets, and the bassoons in "Daphnis and Cloe."

Another reason for the high standard of the Boston players is that Koussevitzky has selected only the finest musicians in the European musical capitals for his orchestra. How surprising and pleasing for this reviewer to discover in the stands of the first clarinetist and the first French horn player, the well-known faces of two Austrian musicians, that he has seen for years in the orchestra of the Viennese Staatsoper — Viktor Polatschek, according to Richard Strauss the best in his field, and Gottfried Freiberg.

Koussevitzky chooses his musicians solely on the basis of ability. As a result, the splendid body of the Boston Symphony is today an ideal unity of players assembled from all over the world.

Besides the already cited works of Beethoven, Franck, Stravinsky and Ravel the Boston program included a group of smaller scores. "In der Beschraenkung zeigt sich erst der Meister," says Goethe, which means that in art one judges mastery, when manifested within the limits of small forms and formal rules. Doubtless the performance of pieces such as Handel's "Concerto Grosso G Minor," Wagner's "Prelude to Lohengrin," Mendelssohn's "Scherzo" or the magic C Major Symphony by Mozart (which was Koussevitzky's introductory work Saturday night) are not less important than the splendid, dynamic performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Sunday afternoon.

The audience's reception of Dr. Koussevitzky and his glorious orchestra was overwhelming.

ZIGHERA CONCERT NOTABLE

Post ~~Dec~~. 16/36

His Chamber Orchestra Delights Audience of Musicians

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That most diverting form of musical entertainment, a concert for chamber orchestra, was presented at Jordan Hall last evening by a group from the Boston Symphony conducted by Bernard Zighera. Before his properly enthusiastic listeners, Mr. Zighera set a varied and delectable tonal repast. As is the way with such concerts, most of the items were unfamiliar, so this must be, first of all, a programme story.

TONAL NOVELTIES

For beginning there came a Symphony by Heinrich Rigel, 1741-99; conventional 18th century music perhaps, but with an individual twist or two. Much of it would have passed for early Mozart, some of it would not. Followed five Interludes for four horns by Daniel-Lesur, a member of the group self-styled "Young France," already introduced to us at the Symphony Concerts in the person of Olivier Messiaen. Apparently what Young France chiefly needs is to grow up. These naive Interludes were interesting, however, for their tonal color. And the same might be said of the next number, Strauss' youthful, quite Mendelssohnian Serenade for 13 wind instruments.

Musically of more importance than anything previously heard were the ensuing Toccata, Bourree and Gigue by Domenico Scarlatti, orchestrated with great skill and tact by Alfredo Casella.

Mme. Novaes Soloist

After an intermission there came the two most substantial numbers of the evening, the first an early Piano Concerto of Mozart, in E-flat major, in which the soloist was no less notable an artist than Guiomar Novaes, while for exhilarating conclusion Mr. Zighera offered Hindemith's Kammermusik No. 1.

This last, heard here several years ago at a similar concert directed by Arthur Fiedler, is by way of becoming a modern classic. There is a kinship between the first two movements and the music of Scarlatti, for all their outward differences. If the brief slow movement seems a little dry, it makes excellent preparation for the wildly exciting, "Jazzy" Finale, which portrays Germany in a mood of post-war forgetfulness.

The severest test of orchestra and conductor came in the music of Hindemith, and both emerged triumphant. Yet is is only accurate to say that perfection was the rule of the evening. Mr. Zighera showed himself no less well-graced and versatile as conductor than he has proved himself to be as virtuoso of the harp and of the piano.

FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL

Dec. 17/36

Myrt and Marge, co-stars of a chain last year, will be the starring broadcast over CBS (WJR) tonight at 7 o'clock.

The fourth of this season's broadcasts by the Boston Symphony will be aired over the NBC network (WGL) this evening at 7 o'clock when Dr. Serge Koussvitzky will be conducting one of his regular Harvard University subscription concerts. Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture and Edward MacDowell's second concerto for piano and orchestra will comprise the program.

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL

Dec. 17/36

[illegible]r. Walter Damrosch inaugurates his new policy during his Music Ap[illegible]eciation hour tomorrow aft[illegible]on over NBC at 2 o'clock. H[illegible]ill impersonate Handel and Beethoven.

Boston symphony concert is on the Blue net from 8 to 9 o'clock and will feature Tschaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture.

* * * * * *

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

Dec. 20/36

Paul Stassevitch will give the American premiere of Clementi's C major Sinfonia December 30 at Town Hall, New York. This is one of two Clementi works recently discovered and revised by Alfredo Casella. The other is the D major Symphony lately played for the first time by the Boston Symphony.

Selection

Herald Dec 16/36

MUSIC

CHAMBER ORCHESTRA

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The first of a series of chamber orchestra concerts, conducted by Bernard Zighera, was given last night in Jordan Hall before a fair-sized and musically distinguished audience. The players were all members of the Boston Symphony. The soloist was Guiomar Novaes, pianist. The program was as follows:

Sinfonie	H. J. Rigel
Five Interludes for Four Horns	Daniel-Lesur
Serenade for wind instruments, Op. 7	Strauss
Toccata, Bourree and Gigue for chamber orchestra (orch. A. Casella)	D. Scarlatti
Concerto for piano and orchestra in E flat major, K. 271	Mozart
Kammermusik No. 1, Op. 24	Hindemith

There are few more stimulating concerts than those given by a chamber orchestra. For one thing the music is almost all unfamiliar and yet deserves a hearing. For another it is certain that some of the music will be far from solemn. Such concerts are both surprising and diverting; and Mr. Zighera arranged a particularly interesting example last night. The hall should have been packed for it, but at least the audience was emphatically appreciative.

Rigel (or Riegel, as he was called before h echanged his name) had a reputation as a composer and musician of distinction in his day, as did his son after him. Apparently his day is considered over by some authorities, for he does not figure i nthe lexicons of Grove and Riemann. But Fetis has him and the dependable Baker. This "Symphony" played last night has freshness and a sprightly charm, though it is clearly not music of great depth. The Strauss serenade, like all Strauss's chamber music, an early work, also has charm of a romantic nature. It is really a pity that Strauss did not compose in this form in what may be called his "Rosenkavalier" style.

Daniel-Lesur is a comrade at arms in that group of four, "La Jeune France," as a sample of which Olivier Messiaen's "Les Offrandes oubliees" was played here by the Boston Symphony earlier this season. One would gladly listen to four French horns play scales, so lovely is the instrument—just as Modjeska could give a dramatic interpretation of the alhpabet whe nshe spoke it in Polish. These five interludes are correctly described by their title. They exploit the qualities of four horns playing together in effective fashion. Indeed the composer asks for the lowest notes on the instrument, which—as of course it is a matter of chance—did not happen to come off yesterday. The pieces are experimental rather than intrinsically interesting.

Mme. Novaes was an exceedingly competent and sensitive soloist in this lovely concerto of Mozart. Her playing was polished and musical, which is just what one wants in Mozart. She was sympathetically assisted by the small orchestra under Mr. Zighera and, naturally, received an ovation. As a matter of fact all Mr. ighera's interpretations were in the best possible taste and were well executed by the orchestra.

The Scarlatti pieces are really sonatas for harpsichord, but they have here been retitled and very boldly orchestrated. Yet Casella has not exceeded the bounds of good taste or intelligence in the witty sophistication of his scoring. In this version the music is highly entertaining. So, too, is the Hindemith an amusing work in which the composer is obviously off on a rhythmic holiday. The Kammermusik has all the vigor and exuberance, the contrapuntal skill and the rhythmic emphasis, which we associate with Hindemith when not in a serious mood. Only the slow movement seems thin and out of place.

The next concert of this series will be on Tuesday evening, Jan. 12. Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson, pianists, will be the soloists.

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Honors Edward MacDowell

BOSTON, Dec. 18—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra observed the 75th birthday anniversary today of Edward MacDowell by playing the noted American composer's piano concerto No. 2 with Howard Goding as soloist.

Mrs. MacDowell, widow of the composer who died Jan. 23, 1908, was expected to attend tomorrow evening's performance, when the concerto will be repeated. She lives in Boston.

It was the first time the Boston orchestra has played this MacDowell concerto since 1919. When, curiously enough, Goding, a Bostonian now on the faculty of the New England Conservatory, also a soloist, making his debut with the orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck, conductor. Today's also was his first appearance with the orchestra since that time.

Arthur Foote, 80-year old American composer and friend of MacDowell, attended today's concert and heard the orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, play his own suite in E major for string orchestra. Foote lives in nearby Newton. Brahm's Fourth Symphony completed the program.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

DEC 16 1936

Music of the Day

By B. H. HAGGIN

Rosalyn Tureck Gives Brilliant Performance of Brahms Concerto with the Philadelphia Orchestra—Don Cossacks and Morning Choral in Brooklyn

Last night's concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of Eugene Ormandy began rather unpromisingly with Prokofiev's "Classical" Symphony, whose "classical" refinement and elegance and high-spirited chatter, so marvelously realized in the brilliant, swift, light-as-air performance of the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky, were nullified in a performance that was strenuous, heavy, now over-deliberate, now over-emphatic.

Brahms' Piano Concert in B flat followed, and here Mr. Ormandy operated with better effect. But his achievement—the general shape and color that he gave the work, the better playing of the orchestra—was overshadowed by the achievement of the solo pianist, Rosalyn Tureck. Her performance last night was impressive in its mere technical competence and sheer physical power, in which the work makes heavy demands; and no less impressive in its musical understanding.

The concluding work was Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra"; and with the first phrase Mr. Ormandy revealed an authority, a mastery that had been lacking until then. Clearly, this was the music that he felt with conviction; and the performance had power, sweep and magnificence that were exciting. But only during the earlier portions of the work. From the section entitled "The Dance-Song" Mr. Ormandy seemed no longer to have the same mastery either of the work or of the orchestra, the technical imperfections of whose playing were at times disastrous.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

DEC 18 1936

Widow Will Hear Husband's Concerto At Boston Concert

BOSTON, Dec. 18.—A tiny gray-haired widow will come to Boston tomorrow to hear one of the world's greatest symphony orchestras play her husband's second piano concerto in tribute to his 75th birthday anniversary.

Probably unnoticed by some 2500 music-lovers in the audience, Mrs. William Nevins MacDowell, 75, publicity-shy widow of Edward MacDowell, America's best-known classical composer, will attend tomorrow night's concert by the Boston symphony orchestra.

To the general public, MacDowell, who died in 1908, is perhaps best remembered for his "To a Wild Rose."

Today—the anniversary—the widow was at a New York hotel recovering from a slight indisposition. Grieved at being unable to attend the actual anniversary performance of one of her husband's finest works, she told the United Press by long-distance telephone that she would be in the audience tomorrow night.

"I am looking forward eagerly to hearing what I know will be a magnificent performance," she said. "I can't thank Conductor Serge Koussevitzky for reviving my husband's concerto."

Last night she listened to a broadcast of the concerto from Sander's theatre in Cambridge. It was the first of three daily performances of the work by the Boston symphony.

Globe Dec 19

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The greater part of the Symphony concerts this week is given over to two distinguished American composers of an elder generation: The late Edward MacDowell, who was born in New York 75 years ago yesterday, and Arthur Foote, who is now in his 82d year. The first is represented by the Second Piano Concerto, of which the solo part is played by Howard Goding, Boston musician; Mr Foote by the Suite in E major, Op 63, for strings. The program is concluded with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

The regime of Dr Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony has been characterized in part by his interest in American music, and by his keenness to observe appropriately the anniversaries of composers. That these are happy traits could have been illustrated no better than by the program of this week.

Mr Foote was the first American composer of achievement to gain his musical education solely in this country. Our tonal heritage came, of course, from Europe, but in his own composition Mr Foote has ever followed the counsel of his own mind and heart. He is known for concise, refined expression, and his music preserves a definite independence of thought and style.

Some of his compositions have permanent place in the pages of American musical history of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. The Suite in E major partakes of Mr Foote's individual characteristics. His themes are salient, their development clear. The writing for strings is not only that of a master craftsman, but is really notable for glowing sonority. The composer was present yesterday afternoon, and bowed both from his seat and from the stage. The Friday audience applauded with more than customary warmth.

Much has been said of the position held by Edward MacDowell, one of the earlier American composers of genius. A newspaper review does not provide sufficient scope for full elaboration either of his originality or the national flavor of his work.

In the whirl of contemporary concert-giving, the name of MacDowell is not found so often as it once was upon vocal and instrumental programs. Justice has not been done in this case, for MacDowell created many works of beauty and of force. But musical fashions change, and public concerts sometimes reflect more of current fashion than of representative genius of all ages and races.

If the Second Piano Concerto is not consistently so great as its finest portions, the fact remains that MacDowell here penned some memorable pages. As a lyricist, MacDowell was highly gifted. The lyrical interludes of the D minor Concerto—and its jocose second movement—represent, to one person, MacDowell at his best. Their beauty reveals what the Germans might call "a great deal of Nature."

Mr Goding, making his first appearance at the "regular" Symphony concerts, played admirably. This pianist is a true disciple of musical beauty; straightforwardness of interpretation and technical skill are invariably conspicuous in his work.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra were again in superlative form throughout the afternoon.

The afternoon concert next week will be given Thursday instead of Friday, which is Christmas Day. The evening concert will, as usual, occur Saturday. Gregor Piatigorsky will be soloist in the 'Cello Concerto of Dvorak. The first half of the program will be devoted to Debussy's "The Martyrdom of St Sebastian."

C. W. D.

Trans. Dec. 18/36

133

Two Composers

MacDowell's Seventy-Fifth, Weber's 150th Birthday Anniversaries Reached Today

Edward Alexander MacDowell was born seventy-five years ago today in New York city. Seventy-five years before that, to a day, Carl Maria Friedrich Ernst von Weber was born in Eutin, Germany. The coincidence of birthday anniversaries is not stressed here; neither is any attempt being made to relate the art of Weber and MacDowell. The German Romantic composer died before he was forty years old, but the article about him and his music in Grove's dictionary contains almost forty pages of finely printed matter. In the same reference-work, the American Romantic, who died at the age of forty-six, is conceded a page and a half. On the other hand, in Pratt's Encyclopedia, a one-volume American work, MacDowell receives almost two columns against about three and a half for Weber.

It is obvious, though, however strong one's patriotism, that MacDowell is not to be placed in the same artistic rank with Weber. A few years ago almost no-one would have denied MacDowell's claim to first position among American composers though. And although that claim would no doubt be challenged by many at this time, MacDowell may still reasonably take first place if it is a question of what is called "inspiration," by which people mean essentially the ability to manufacture a tune.

MacDowell could make tunes, and he made many good ones. If he retains his popularity it is because of this melodic gift, not because of other qualities, which several other American composers have possessed more conspicuously. That is why MacDowell's short pieces are of more enduring vitality than his longer and more pretentious works, the most notable exception being the Second Piano Concerto in D minor, which Howard Goding and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are playing three times this week. And MacDowell's shorter works are now more suitable to the parlor and the studio than to the concert-hall, although the radio has made much of a few of them. Like many composers of the second rank MacDowell has left behind a considerable quantity of piano music which makes better teaching material than can be readily got out of some of the greatest masters. A specific instance, not as widely known as the Idylls and Sketches, is the set of Twelve Studies, Opus 29.

Like other composers who died young, Weber remains a question mark What would he have done if he had lived longer? Ernest Newman once argued persuasively that this is a profitless question, except in the case of Chopin. He lived in a day when a composer could be an executant musician and still number his works by the hundred, instead of the specialized craftsman of today who, like a novelist, produces a "major' composition a year—or even less.

Here is Weber's list, taken from Grove's: nine operas; a large amount of miscellaneous dramatic compositions, including incidental music to plays, "scenas" and airs, airs and recitatives, settings of ballads, duets and so forth; eight cantatas; two masses; ninety songs, romances and so forth; nineteen part-songs for men's voices; various other types of part-songs; a group of ten Scotch songs, the accompaniments set for flute, violin and 'cello; two symphonies and other orchestral music; concertos and concert pieces for piano and other instruments; works for piano and other instruments; and a considerable quantity of music, of course, for piano solo.

How much of this catalogue is known in terms of the modern concert or operatic repertory? As to the operas, when they are heard it is as revivals, not as enduring works worthy of periodic billing. The three great operatic overtures — "Freischuetz," "Euryanthe" and "Oberon" —are, of course, in a different case. They constitute Weber's principal basis for popularity today—they and the piano-piece, "Invitation to the Dance," which is more commonly heard in the Berlioz orchestral arrangement.

Otherwise, Weber is occasionally recalled by the Concertstueck in F minor for piano and orchestra, or perhaps by an infrequent performance of a piano sonata or the Perpetual Motion by itself. If we measured Weber's importance in the history of music, indeed, by that portion of his music we hear today we should be doing him an injustice. For while he has written some great music, most of it is not, so to say, in a shape to continue to be presented either in the concert-hall or the opera house. No, Weber's importance lies in the effect his music had on his immediate successors, notably Richard Wagner.

AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL

DEC 1[illegible] 1936

Boston Symphony Honors Composer

Boston, Dec. 18—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra observed the 75th birthday anniversary today of Edward MacDowell by playing the noted American composer's piano concerto No. 2 with Howard Goding as soloist.

Mrs. MacDowell, widow of the composer who died Jan. 23, 1908, was expected to attend tomorrow evening's performance, when the concerto will be repeated. ~~She lives in Boston.~~

It was the first time the Boston orchestra has played this MacDowell concerto since 1919. When, curiously enough, Goding, a Bostonian now on the faculty of the New England Conservatory, also was soloist, making his debut with the orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck, conductor. Today's also was his first appearance with the orchestra since that time.

Arthur Foote, 83-year old American composer and friend of MacDowell, attended today's concert and heard the orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, play his own suite in E major for string orchestra. Foote lives in nearby Newton. Brahms' fourth symphony completed the program.

Dec. 17/36

SUN

DIAL TWISTS

Boston Symphony On WJZ

The Boston Symphony orchestra, playing at Sanders Theater, Harvard University, Cambridge, with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducting, will be heard on the WJZ network from 8 to 9 o'clock this evening. Howard Goding will be the piano soloist. The program will include the Overture Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky, and Concerto No. 2 D Minor, Opus 23, MacDowell.

News of Music

"Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien" by Debussy and Dvorak's Concerto for 'cello and orchestra will constitute the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky for next Thursday afternoon and Saturday evening. It will be noted that because of Christmas Day the regularly scheduled Friday matinee has been advanced a day. Gregor Piatigorsky will be the 'cello soloist, and Olga Averino, the Boston soprano, will present the solo part of the Debussy incidental music to d'Annunzio's play. The Cecilia Society will sing the choral numbers. Dr. Koussevitzky presented this work at the symphony concerts in 1930. It has been almost twenty years since the Dvorak work has been played there, if the orchestra's printed records are correct.

The date of the first of the three concerts which the Boston String Quartet will give in Jordan Hall this season has been changed from Monday evening, Jan. 4, to Monday evening, Feb. 1.

Howard Goding Plays With Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth of its series of concents in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last evening. Serge Koussevitzky directed a program that included Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasy, MacDowell's Second Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra, and the Symphony in D minor by Franck. The soloist in the Concerto was Howard Goding, Boston pianist, who was cordially received by the audience that filled the auditorium.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN

DEC 17 1936

Dialing with Doyle

By J. E. (Dinty) Doyle

Lawyers and judges in New York and adjacent counties will no longer be allowed to serve as arbiters in the Sunday night Good Will Court, under a new canon enacted late yesterday by the Appellate Division.

It is another step in the battle being waged against the radio program by local attorneys, who insist that the show violates legal codes of ethics.

The program will continue, however, as the rule does not yet apply to some counties of New York State, or to Connecticut, New Jersey and Pennsylvania jurisdictions, and judges or ex-judges from these localities will officiate, beginning Sunday night.

The sponsors fear further action for local lawyers' organizations following action taken by the American Bar Association.

Miss Smith's Award

Nine years ago, while on a vaudeville bill at a Hartford theatre, Dorothea Antel, then a star, slipped on a loose piece of concrete, fell and injured her spine.

She has been in bed since that injury, and for nine years has made her living by writing cheery verses for greeting cards.

Dorothea Antel, whose courage is such a sermon, will be one of the nominees for Kate Smith's weekly $500 award tonight, and if the story is told well, dialers will marvel that a person who suffers so much is able to maintain such a frame of mind that she cheers others who are more fortunate.

Stage - hands who remember Dorothea Antel in the days when her name was in lights, go to her home, 316 W. 72nd st., at least every six months, to build new scenes in her room, new backgrounds to help hurry suffering hours.

There may be other nominees tonight who may also have manifested those qualities which have made Dorothea Antel stand out from the crowd.

She may not win the $500 award.

But maybe these few lines will prompt you to drop that brave little lady a Christmas card, just to show her that you want to be a member of the cheering section she needs so badly.

Myrt and Marge return to the air via Smith Band Wagon tonight. Mother Myrtle Vail and Daughter Donna Dammerel have been absent from the kilocycles for some time and will excite interest.

Other Good Shows

Mr. Vallee brings back the talented and versatile Cornelia Otis Skinner, who did so well last Summer. Others will include John Gurney of the Metropolitan, who sang on Rudy's first program seven years ago; Elsa Maxwell, and ventriloquist Edgar Bergen. One is prompted to wonder just how a ventriloquist will project in the loudspeaker, but Vallee usually has ideas.

Miss Maxwell, by the way, has been a guest at the chateau of the Baron and Baroness de Rothschild.

Buffalo will be the honor city for Major Bowes tonight.

Clarence Francis, president of the General Foods Corp., is to extend Christmas greetings when he speaks in the course of the Showboat program, which will have Jepson, Lanny Ross and the other regulars with Al Goodman's orchestra.

At 10 o'clock, Bing Crosby should garner the ears of the nation, as he is to parade Jack Oakie, who will soon have his own program and will probably call Crosby "The Groaner"; Mary Astor of "Dodsworth" fame; Nadine O'Connor, destined for light opera; Jimmy Dorsey's band, and, of course, Bob Burns. That Burns can handle that Oakie, too.

The "Then and Now" show bowed out last week and I doubt if it will be missed.

Gen. Hugh S. Johnson and Clinton L. Bardo are to debate "Can Business Absorb Employment?" (WJZ, 9:30), and others to attract include Margaret Daum and Eugene Lowenthal in the Columbia Concert Hall, the fourth concert in the Boston symphony series (WJZ, 8), and Helena Mara with the WOR symphony (10).

Add Sherlock Holmes, the 10:30 WJZ Jamboree, Braddock, Jerry Cooper, Stan Lomax, the 8 o'clock Melody Treasure Hunt, and several others.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 20 1936

13 SYMPHONY GROUPS EXPENDED $4,346,500

The Year's Earned Income Was $2,782,100 and the Deficit More Than $1,500,000.

ST. LOUIS, Dec. 19 (AP).—America's thirteen leading symphony orchestras, in their first consolidated financial statement, have disclosed an annual combined budget of $4,346,500, an average of $334,346.

Managers of the orchestras, twelve of whom are meeting here, estimated that, exclusive of Summer seasons and radio broadcasts, more than 3,000,000 persons hear their 1,100 musicians in 1,200 concerts every year.

None of the orchestras is self-sustaining. Their annual combined earned income is $2,782,100, leaving a deficit of $1,564,400, or an average of $120,339. The largest earned incomes were reported by the Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Chicago orchestras.

Managers attending the meeting are George E. Judd, Boston; Arthur Judson, New York; Alfred Reginald Allen, Philadelphia; Henry E. Voegeli, Chicago; Carl J. Vossburgh, Cleveland; Murray Patterson, Detroit; Arthur M. See, Rochester; Theo Gannon, Cincinnati; Mrs. Verna Scott, Minneapolis; Miss Grace Kaufmann, Kansas City; Walter B. Howe, Washington, and Arthur J. Gaines, St. Louis.

SYMPHONY NOW A BIG BUSINESS

Post Dec. 19

Thirteen Orchestras Play to 3,500,000 Hearers

ST. LOUIS, Dec. 18 (AP)—Cold statistics showed today symphonic music hides a big business.

America's 13 leading symphony orchestras, in their first consolidated financial statement, disclosed an annual combined budget of $4,346,500, an average of $334,346.

NONE SELF SUSTAINING

Managers of the orchestras, 12 of whom are meeting here, estimated, exclusive of summer seasons and radio broadcasts, more than 3,500,000 persons hear their 1100 musicians in 1200 concerts each year.

None of the orchestras is self-sustaining. Their combined earned income is $2,782,100, leaving a total deficit of $1,564,400, or an average of $120,339.

Box office and miscellaneous earned incomes range from a high of 86 per cent to a low of 35 per cent of the annual budgets, with an average of 66 per cent for the group. The largest earned incomes were reported by the Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Chicago orchestras.

Managers attending the meeting include George E. Judd of Boston and Arthur M. See, Rochester.

MACDOWELL HONORED BY SYMPHONY

Post Dec. 19

Second Concerto With Goding at Piano Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, designed in part to honor the memory of Edward MacDowell on the 75th anniversary of his birth, became through half its length an all-American affair. Sharing the first division of the programme with MacDowell was Arthur Foote, whose 84th birthday approaches; and the pianist in MacDowell's Second Concerto, by which that composer was remembered, was still another Bostonian, Howard Goding.

MACDOWELL'S CONCERTO

It was undoubtedly wise for Dr. Koussevitzky to ordain that MacDowell should be here represented by this Concerto. The music has its weaknesses as well as its attractions: it is a product of the composer's youth, not of his brief maturity. But today it comes closer to being symphony concert material than the Indian Suite once hailed as MacDowell's greatest work.

Like Greig, whom he so much resembles, whom he greatly admired and whom he came close to copying in the chief theme of this Concerto's first movement, MacDowell was essentially a miniaturist. The long breath, the large stride were not for him. But like the Norwegian, he came nearest to achieving these things in a piano concerto composed in his middle 20's. Grieg, however, with his Scandinavian background, strikes in his piece both a more individual and a more distinguished note.

Fresh After 50 Years

While admitting the imaginativeness of the opening passage in MacDowell's Concerto, the infectious gusto of the Scherzo and of parts of the Finale, we may still feel that this Scherzo approaches facile prettiness in the manner of certain of its counterparts in the symphonies of Glazounov; that the moments of sentiment, as always with MacDowell, approach sentimentality and that some of the bravura passages are empty and mechanical, musically meaningless.

After all, MacDowell wrote in the middle 1880's, when the influence of Liszt was still paramount. And we should remind ourselves that few works of 50 years ago sound as fresh today as does this same D minor Concerto. Thus with arguments presented on both sides, the case may rest.

Mr. Goding's Playing

MacDowell was yesterday fortunate in his interpreters, as were Mr. Foote and also Brahms, whose Fourth Symphony brought the end. Mr. Goding, who played the Concerto with the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre 17 years ago, has made the piece peculiarly his own. It is not easy to imagine a juster performance than the one which it received yesterday. And this goes for conductor and orchestra as well as for the accomplished soloist.

Twice yesterday the audience heaped applause upon a deserving fellowtownsman, upon Mr. Foote, called to the stage after a beautifully proportioned performance of his fine Suite for strings, in E major, and upon Mr. Goding for his playing of the Concerto. This Suite of Mr. Foote has been especially favored by Dr. Koussevitzky, and with reason. Again one can comment upon the fact that Mr. Foote's best music does not seem to "date." Fashionableness did not inspire it, and so the presence of that which is no longer fashionable cannot destroy it.

Brahms' Fourth

And to come to what might well have been the centre of interest in many a concert, if there was regret that Dr. Koussevitzky substituted the Fourth Symphony of Brahms for the now more rarely heard Third, there was the compensation of a performance that was surely the best among the many eloquent performances which this most sombre of the Brahms symphonies has already received at his hands.

More than that we need not ask.

Her

MUSIC

Dec 19

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The ninth regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Howard Goding, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Foote..Suite in E major Op. 63 for strings
MacDowell....Concerto for piano and orchestra No. 2 in D minor Op. 23
Brahms—Symphony No. 4 in E minor Op. 98

It is all very well for the program book to congratulate the Boston Symphony on a long association with the music of MacDowell; but the plain fact is that the works of America's greatest composer have been left severely alone since 1919, with but one exception. The English will play Elgar year in and year out; yet one of our greatest orchestras will calmly allow 15 years to slip by with hardly a bow in the direction of MacDowell. Last spring (May 24, to be exact), this same Second Concerto was played at a Pop concert by Mr. Sanroma. And his singularly brilliant performance found a ready response with the public.

Time plays strange tricks with a composer of great reputation. A writer on American music in 1900, Rupert Hughes, could speak of MacDowell's writing for the piano as greater than Brahms. We are also told that MacDowell was greatly influenced by Joachim Raff. Now, looking at these two statements at the present time, we have different reflections. In the first place, fine work through this concerto is, it is unlikely that any one in yesterday's audience would rank it as high as the concertos of Brahms. And, in the second, the music of Raff is no longer played, so that for us the question of his influence on MacDowell is purely academic.

This concerto combines the qualities of brilliance and lyrical beauty. It unquestionably suits the piano and is also, unlike those concertos which are really symphonies with the piano as an important instrument in the orchestra, a work of display. Such a work does not need the suggestion that it is an American product in order to urge its performance, but is on the other hand the best possible advertisement for American music.

The performance yesterday did justice to the qualities of the concerto in the last two movements. Here Mr, Goding's light touch and, in contrast, his knowledge of when to use force and when to let the melody sing found a happy outlet in MacDowell's music. The performance was a fine one both from the soloist's and the orchestra's side in these movements. But in the first movement the interpretation was not so sympathetic. Mr. Goding's playing was far from clear. Dr. Koussevitzky now restrained the woodwinds and now urged on the orchestra so that a good balance was not attained.

Arthur Foote's delightful Suite in E major made an excellent opening number, for it is soundly written and genial music. The Mendelssohnian fugue is particularly effective. Mr. Foote was in the audience and came on to the platform to receive the applause. The audience, it is pleasant to record, gave him an ovation.

Finally there was Brahms' greatest symphony to end a good concert. We have often rather flippantly wondered if Brahms would have used the triangle as he did in the third movement if he had had our familiarity with the telephone bell.

Prof. Lowes used to say in English 72 that connotations with prohibition had spoiled the effect for him of Shelley's use of the word "jag." Thus circumstances, unforeseen by the artist, may in a later age interrupt for an instant one's enjoyment of his work. The orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky, gave a magnificent performance of the Symphony.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week, Thursday afternoon and Saturday night, Debussy's St. Sebastian music and Dvorak's concerto for 'cello (Piatigorsky, soloist) will be given.

AND for the Christmas season, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts of especial interest this week.

The regular Friday afternoon concert has been advanced one day because of the holiday. The program for this, as for the Saturday evening concert, will enlist the distinguished services of Gregor Piatigorsky, who will be heard for the first time in Boston as soloist in Dvorak's violoncello concerto, and Debussy's "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien."

The music of the latter was written around the mystery play of that name by D'Annunzio.

The second concert of the orchestra's Tuesday afternoon series in Symphony Hall will take place on the 22nd. Dr. Koussevitaky will then conduct performances of Weber's Overture to "Oberon," Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor; and three works by Richard Wagner: "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried," and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

Dec. 20/36

Free Concerts

This afternoon at 2 o'clock a distinguished trio, composed of Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; Richard Burgin, violinist; and Jean Bedetti, 'cellist, will play Arensky's Trio in D minor, Opus 32, and Beethoven's Trio in B flat major, Opus 97 in the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum.

* * *

THE WPA State Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Alexander Thiede will present a concert at the Dorchester Manor on Tuesday evening, Dec. 22. Harry Ellis Dickson, conductor and violinist, will play Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. The 105 musicians will be heard in Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser," Saint-Saens' "Algerinne Suite," Handel's "Largo," Borodin's Polovetxian Dances frim "Prince Igor," and "Flight of the Bumblebee" by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

MUSIC

Globe Dec 16/36

JORDAN HALL

Zighera Chamber Concert

Bostonians usually have cause to rejoice over their musical fare from season to season. But one field, however, has not been crowded of late, and that is the chamber orchestra. Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night offered the first of three concerts in this genre. If the remaining two programs match the first for variety, the Winter months hold pleasure in store.

This was said to be Mr Zighera's local debut as a conductor. His talents as a virtuoso of the harp are known. Until last night local concert-goers did not, perhaps, realize that Mr Zighera is also a potential leader of talent. Directing a group of about 30 Symphony men in music from before Mozart to post-war Hindemith, Mr Zighera made an excellent impression by the coolness and authority of his work.

Only a musician with an adventurous mind would have sought out a "Sinfonie" by Heinrich Joseph Riegel, an 18th-century Rhenish musician, who spent most of his life in Paris, and the "Five Interludes" for a quartet of horns, new to America, by the unfamiliar Daniel-Lesur.

Of more substantial interest as music, nevertheless, was the serenade for woodwinds in twos and brass quintet, by Richard Strauss. It is an early work, Op 7, touched with a Brahmsian quality of song. The mighty Richard II was even then fascinated with the timber of orchestral instruments, and though the serenade is scored thickly, some of the voices are piquant through the course of what could be called miniature symphonic treatment.

Mr Zighera secured a really brilliant performance of a toccata, bourree and gigue by Domenico Scarlatti in a startling orchestral version by Alfred Casella, the contemporary Italian. Mr Casella has achieved commendable revivifications of old music, but this is not one of them. There seemed to be far more Casella than Scarlatti perceptible.

Guiomar Novaes, distinguished Brazilian pianist, known here as long as 20 years ago, but absent from Boston concert halls since March, 1925, played the solo part of Mozart's E-flat Concerto (K 271). A few discrepancies in tempi appeared between conductor and soloist, and Miss Novaes permitted herself some peculiar modifications of time in strictly solo portions. These did not adversely effect the total result, however.

The evening ended with one of the wildest pieces ever composed by Paul Hindemith, the "Kammermusik" No 1, dating from 1922. It dates in more than one sense, for though the world is by common agreement steadily growing worse, composers no longer vent their jangled nerves and hysterical feelings in such mechanistic patterns as this. A German critic wrote harshly of the work some years ago, indulging in flaming adjectives: "Lascivious," "lecherous," "vicious," "frivolous" and "the most realistic," while admitting its "unequivocal force of artistic expression."

A decade-and-a-half has tempered our ears, so that now most would probably regard the "Kammermusik" without undue agitation, merely as a phenomenon of post-war years, a period whose bitterness of life has been dimmed by the proverbial healing force of time. This is extremely difficult music. Conductor and players were not only valiant but successful. C. W. D.

Reflections on The Symphony

By Ruth Marsters

Music Editor

Dec. 21/36

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra having been on tour in western vicinities during the previous week-end, it was on doubly grateful ears that the celebrated tones of the orchestra sounded upon its return to the Friday and Saturday concerts in Symphony Hall this past week.

Dr. Koussevitzky had planned the first part of the program in honor of two New England composers, both of whom were among that group of distinguished citizens who lived in Boston in the 'nineties and met in lively discussion of matters musical as a relaxation from, and a stimulus to, writing music of their own. They were Edward MacDowell, the 75th anniversary of whose birth occurred on Friday, and Arthur Foote, venerable octogenarian.

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the program with a performance of the latter's Suite in E major, op. 63, for String Orchestra, a nice piece, beautifully played.

Though Arthur Foote's early and lasting esteem for Brahms and Wagner are self-expressed, his music would find more kinship with a Dresden China shepherdess than with either Wagnerian legend, or the philosophic utterance of Brahms.

* * *

MR. BURKE, in his inestimable program notes, cites an evaluation of Foote's work in "The Art of Music." "His music is the pure and perfectly formed expression of a nature at once refined and imaginative." Though in the Suite there is more evidence of refinement than imagination, it is not arid of ideas. The fragile substance of the Prelude and Pizzicato Adogietto is woven with pleasant melodies and harmonies, voicing tender sentiments with a fastidious lack of sentimentality.

The Fugue is more vigorous, and goes about revealing the good craftsmanship of the composer in a straightforward fashion.

It is a work, in short, of which the composer might justifiably be proud, and its sensitive performance in the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra must have brought him deep gratification.

Mr. Foote came upon the stage to acknowledge the applause which Dr. Koussevitzky, ever gracious, deferred to him.

* * *

THE PERFORMANCE of MacDowell's Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 2 in minor which followed was, on Friday afternoon, less satisfactory.

Howard Goding, Boston pianist, graduated from the New England Conservatory in the class of 1910, was soloist. (Mr. Goding's debut with the orchestra was made in the performance of the same work in 1917.)

The Concerto itself is not as interesting as it must once have been. The soloist's performance was determined rather than inspired. (The bravura passages lacked clarity, as the whole lacked color.)

Mr. Goding is evidently a pianist of skill, and it is perhaps unfair to judge his talents on this not too successful performance, it being the first in which we happen to have heard him. It must be admitted that the instrument itself was faulty, the tone being brittle and without resonance—a disconcerting enough contingency for any pianist.

Dr. Koussevitzky brought the program to a close with a glorious performance of that conclusive testament of genius, Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

13 1936

Eugene Goosens will conduct a young people's concert by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, at 2:30 p. m. Tuesday on the CBS net, for which he has programmed the overture to Von Weber's "Oberon," the Nocturne from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, the Fifth and Sixth Hungarian dances of Brahms, the Forest Music from "Siegfried" and the March from Berlioz' "Faust."

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 7 to 8 o'clock Thursday night on the WJZ net.

The Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy again conducting, will play the overture to von Weber's "Euryanthe," the Intermezzo No. 2 from "Jewels of the Madonna," Grainger's arrangement of the "Londonderry Air" for strings and the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkuere," at 9 o'clock Friday night on KMOX.

Ernest Schelling will direct a children's concert by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra at 10 o'clock Saturday morning that probably will be carried by KMOX.

Part of a performance of "Der Freischuetz," in Liepzig, Germany, will be broadcast at 2:15 p. m. Friday on the WJZ network.

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1936

134

MacDowell's Widow Coming to Hub To Hear Symphony Play Concerto

(Copyright, 1936, by United Press)

A tiny gray-haired widow came to Boston to hear one of the world's greatest symphony orchestras play her husband's second piano concerto in tribute to his 75th birthday anniversary.

Probably unnoticed by some 2500 music lovers in the audience, Mrs. Mariam Nevins MacDowell, 75, publicity-shy widow of Edward MacDowell, America's best known classical composer, will attend tonight's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

To the general public, MacDowell, who died in 1908, is perhaps best remembered for his "To a Wild Rose."

"I am looking forward eagerly to hearing what I know will be a magnificent performance," she said. "I can't thank Conductor Serge Koussevitzky enough for reviving my husband's concerto."

Brown-eyed Mrs. MacDowell has been traveling about the country since her husband's death. An accomplished pianist, she plays and lectures on her husband's works to aid the maintenance of the MacDowell colony, which she founded at Peterboro, N. H., in memory of her husband.

COLONY FOR ARTISTS

The colony fulfills MacDowell's dream of a place free from distraction for writers, artists and musicians. It was there that Edward Arlington Robinson wrote the poems that twice won him a Pulitzer prize.

MacDowell was only 23 when he composed the piano concerto that the Boston Symphony has revived.

"I still thrill at the thought my husband wrote this concerto when we were just a newly-married couple, quite poor, and I was spending all my time keeping house and learning to be a good cook," Mrs. MacDowell called.

Born in New York city of Scotch-ish descent, Edward Alexander acDowell went to Europe as a 15-ar-old piano prodigy to perfect concentrate on composition. Hi st concerto was praised by Liszt. At 26, as America's outstanding mposer, he settled in Boston, later oving to New York to head Columa University's newly-established usic department. His death was tributed to worry and overwork.

END

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

DEC 20 1936

Conductor and Orchestra

The Question of the Guest Artist

By B. H. Haggin

THERE may be good reasons for the engagement of John Barbirolli as sole conductor and musical director of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, but there has been some faulty reasoning in connection with the matter. For example, pointing out that after Gericke the Boston Symphony had three important conductors, Muck, Monteux and Koussevitzky, each of whom was in sole command, Mr. Henderson went on to draw what he thought was the lesson: "If music lovers seek the secret of the splendor of tone and high level of finish which characterize performances of the great Boston organization, let them ponder the advantages of following the artistic ideals of one mind." But what one has to ponder is the advantages of following the artistic ideals of one mind when it is the mind of a Gericke, a Muck, a Monteux or a Koussevitzky. Will Mr. Henderson contend that the Boston orchestra would play with the same tone and finish if its permanent conductor were Klemperer or Dobrowen? And what about the tone and finish of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under One-third-of-the-season Conductor Toscanini? Does Mr. Henderson expect them to be achieved by Permanent Conductor Barbirolli (and I am speaking, remember, only of technical aspects of the orchestra's playing)?

Nor may one take the shabby playing of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under certain guest conductors in recent seasons as proof of the disadvantage of guest conductors; what it demonstrated was the disadvantage of these particular guest conductors. What of the orchestra's playing under Four-week Conductor Beecham last year? What of the playing of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Richard Strauss for a few weeks in 1922? A conductor like Beecham or Strauss will no doubt do better with an orchestra the tenth time than the first, but he will make his quality felt even the first time. There is nothing inherently wrong in an arrangement of guest conductors; many of the important European orchestras operate under such an arrangement, with results that are now good, now bad, but this solely in accordance with the quality of the conductor. I observed this in the Vienna Philharmonic during a period of several months. When the orchestra played poorly under Furtwaengler and superbly under Strauss, it was not because Furtwaengler was a guest, for both men conducted only occasionally; it was because Strauss conducted better. And for the same reason it played better under Strauss than under Schalk, who conducted it far more frequently.

Cont.

A season divided between a Gericke and a Muck, if they were available, would be a better season than one given entirely to a Barbirolli. But where they are not available, then certainly one Barbirolli a season is better than four (and ten Barbirollis are better than one Stokowski, the threat of whom left one pale and shaken). The decision of the Philharmonic-Symphony directors amounts to making the best of a bad situation. They are building for the future, but I do not think the flaws in musical taste that Mr. Barbirolli has revealed are of the sort that can be expected to disappear with time. Deficiencies in performance might be compensated for by interesting programs, but although the ever dependable Deems Taylor had his bright word for Mr. Barbirolli's skill in program-building last Sunday, the fact is that Mr. Barbirolli has shown admirable enterprise but little ability to judge what is worth an audience's attention and what is not. That, however, is something a man can acquire; and if he acquires it he will be valuable to us.

* * *

LAST Sunday's program—with its second half devoted to matters like Delius' "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," Mendelssohn's Scherzo from his Octet and the Rossini-Respighi "Rossiniana"—illustrated the popularization of the Philharmonic-Symphony's weekend programs this season. I don't know whether this has been done for the benefit of the Saturday night audience or the Sunday afternoon radio audience, but in either case it is unnecessary and regrettable. For years we have been told how discriminating and exacting the Saturday night audience is, and the fact is that it has been hearing programs of mid-week caliber and giving evidence of its satisfaction and pleasure. And of the Sunday afternoon radio audience we have been told how exacting and discriminating it has become from hearing such programs; but even if this were not so I would hold that in a week filled with popular programs for the vast radio audience there should be at least one broadcast for those, no matter how comparatively few, who are interested in a program of symphonic caliber and length. The Sunday afternoon Philharmonic-Symphony broadcast was this once, but is no longer.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Her

MUSIC

Dec 19

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The ninth regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Howard Goding, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Foote..Suite in E major Op. 63 for strings
MacDowell.....Concerto for piano and orchestra No. 2 in D minor Op. 23
Brahms—Symphony No. 4 in E minor Op. 98

It is all very well for the program book to congratulate the Boston Symphony on a long association with the music of MacDowell; but the plain fact is that the works of America's greatest composer have been left severely alone since 1919, with but one exception. The English will play Elgar year in and year out; yet one of our greatest orchestras will calmly allow 15 years to slip by with hardly a bow in the direction of MacDowell. Last spring (May 24, to be exact), this same Second Concerto was played at a Pop concert by Mr. Sanroma. And his singularly brilliant performance found a ready response with the public.

Time plays strange tricks with a composer of great reputation. A writer on American music in 1900, Rupert Hughes, could speak of MacDowell's writing for the piano as greater than Brahms. We are also told that MacDowell was greatly influenced by Joachim Raff. Now, looking at these two statements at the present time, we have different reflections. In the first place, fine work through this concerto is, it is unlikely that any one in yesterday's audience would rank it as high as the concertos of Brahms. And, in the second, the music of Raff is no longer played, so that for us the question of his influence on MacDowell is purely academic.

This concerto combines the qualities of brilliance and lyrical beauty. It unquestionably suits the piano and is also, unlike those concertos which are really symphonies with the piano as an important instrument in the orchestra, a work of display. Such a work does not need the suggestion that it is an American product in order to urge its performance, but is on the other hand the best possible advertisement for American music.

The performance yesterday did justice to the qualities of the concerto in the last two movements. Here Mr. Goding's light touch and, in contrast, his knowledge of when to use force and when to let the melody sing found a happy outlet in MacDowell's music. The performance was a fine one both from the soloist's and the orchestra's side in these movements. But in the first movement the interpretation was not so sympathetic. Mr. Goding's playing was far from clear. Dr. Koussevitzky now restrained the woodwinds and now urged on the orchestra so that a good balance was not attained.

Arthur Foote's delightful Suite in E major made an excellent opening number, for it is soundly written and genial music. The Mendelssohnian fugue is particularly effective. Mr. Foote was in the audience and came on to the platform to receive the applause. The audience, it is pleasant to record, gave him an ovation.

Finally there was Brahms' greatest symphony to end a good concert. We have often rather flippantly wondered if Brahms would have used the triangle as he did in the third movement if he had had our familiarity with the telephone bell.

Prof. Lowes used to say in English 72 that connotations with prohibition had spoiled the effect for him of Shelley's use of the word "jag." Thus circumstances, unforeseen by the artist, may in a later age interrupt for an instant one's enjoyment of his work. The orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky, gave a magnificent performance of the Symphony.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week, Thursday afternoon and Saturday night, Debussy's St. Sebastian music and Dvorak's concerto for 'cello (Piatigorsky, soloist) will be given.

AND for the Christmas season, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts of especial interest this week.

The regular Friday afternoon concert has been advanced one day because of the holiday. The program for this, as for the Saturday evening concert, will enlist the distinguished services of Gregor Piatigorsky, who will be heard for the first time in Boston as soloist in Dvorak's violoncello concerto, and Debussy's "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien."

The music of the latter was written around the mystery play of that name by D'Annunzio.

The second concert of the orchestra's Tuesday afternoon series in Symphony Hall will take place on the 22nd. Dr. Koussevitaky will then conduct performances of Weber's Overture to "Oberon," Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor; and three works by Richard Wagner: "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried," and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

Dec. 20/36

Free Concerts

This afternoon at 2 o'clock a distinguished trio, composed of Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; Richard Burgin, violinist; and Jean Bedetti, 'cellist, will play Arensky's Trio in D minor, Opus 32, and Beethoven's Trio in B flat major, Opus 97 in the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum.

* * *

THE WPA State Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Alexander Thiede will present a concert at the Dorchester Manor on Tuesday evening, Dec. 22. Harry Ellis Dickson, conductor and violinist, will play Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. The 105 musicians will be heard in Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser," Saint-Saens' "Algerinne Suite," Handel's "Largo," Borodin's Polovetxian Dances frim "Prince Igor," and "Flight of the Bumblebee" by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

MUSIC

Globe Dec. 16/36

JORDAN HALL

Zighera Chamber Concert

Bostonians usually have cause to rejoice over their musical fare from season to season. But one field, however, has not been crowded of late, and that is the chamber orchestra. Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night offered the first of three concerts in this genre. If the remaining two programs match the first for variety, the Winter months hold pleasure in store.

This was said to be Mr Zighera's local debut as a conductor. His talents as a virtuoso of the harp are known. Until last night local concert-goers did not, perhaps, realize that Mr Zighera is also a potential leader of talent. Directing a group of about 30 Symphony men in music from before Mozart to post-war Hindemith, Mr Zighera made an excellent impression by the coolness and authority of his work.

Only a musician with an adventurous mind would have sought out a "Sinfonie" by Heinrich Joseph Riegel, an 18th-century Rhenish musician, who spent most of his life in Paris, and the "Five Interludes" for a quartet of horns, new to America, by the unfamiliar Daniel-Lesur.

Of more substantial interest as music, nevertheless, was the serenade for woodwinds in twos and brass quintet, by Richard Strauss. It is an early work, Op 7, touched with a Brahmsian quality of song. The mighty Richard II was even then fascinated with the timber of orchestral instruments, and though the serenade is scored thickly, some of the voices are piquant through the course of what could be called miniature symphonic treatment.

Mr Zighera secured a really brilliant performance of a toccata, bourree and gigue by Domenico Scarlatti in a startling orchestral version by Alfred Casella, the contemporary Italian. Mr Casella has achieved commendable revivifications of old music, but this is not one of them. There seemed to be far more Casella than Scarlatti perceptible.

Guiomar Novaes, distinguished Brazilian pianist, known here as long as 20 years ago, but absent from Boston concert halls since March, 1925, played the solo part of Mozart's E-flat Concerto (K 271). A few discrepancies in tempi appeared between conductor and soloist, and Miss Novaes permitted herself some peculiar modifications of time in strictly solo portions. These did not adversely effect the total result, however.

The evening ended with one of the wildest pieces ever composed by Paul Hindemith, the "Kammermusik" No 1, dating from 1922. It dates in more than one sense, for though the world is by common agreement steadily growing worse, composers no longer vent their jangled nerves and hysterical feelings in such mechanistic patterns as this. A German critic wrote harshly of the work some years ago, indulging in flaming adjectives: "Lascivious," "lecherous," "vicious," "frivolous" and "the most realistic," while admitting its "unequivocal force of artistic expression."

A decade-and-a-half has tempered our ears, so that now most would probably regard the "Kammermusik" without undue agitation, merely as a phenomenon of post-war years, a period whose bitterness of life has been dimmed by the proverbial healing force of time. This is extremely difficult music. Conductor and players were not only valiant but successful. C. W. D.

Reflections on The Symphony

Obs.

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

Dec. 21/36

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra having been on tour in western vicinities during the previous week-end, it was on doubly grateful ears that the celebrated tones of the orchestra sounded upon its return to the Friday and Saturday concerts in Symphony Hall this past week.

Dr. Koussevitzky had planned the first part of the program in honor of two New England composers, both of whom were among that group of distinguished citizens who lived in Boston in the 'nineties and met in lively discussion of matters musical as a relaxation from, and a stimulus to, writing music of their own. They were Edward MacDowell, the 75th anniversary of whose birth occurred on Friday, and Arthur Foote, venerable octogenarian.

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the program with a performance of the latter's Suite in E major, op. 63, for String Orchestra, a nice piece, beautifully played.

Though Arthur Foote's early and lasting esteem for Brahms and Wagner are self-expressed, his music would find more kinship with a Dresden China shepherdess than with either Wagnerian legend, or the philosophic utterance of Brahms.

* * *

MR. BURKE, in his inestimable program notes, cites an evaluation of Foote's work in "The Art of Music." "His music is the pure and perfectly formed expression of a nature at once refined and imaginative." Though in the Suite there is more evidence of refinement than imagination, it is not arid of ideas. The fragile substance of the Prelude and Pizzicato Adogietto is woven with pleasant melodies and harmonies, voicing tender sentiments with a fastidious lack of sentimentality.

The Fugue is more vigorous, and goes about revealing the good craftsmanship of the composer in a straightforward fashion.

It is a work, in short, of which the composer might justifiably be proud, and its sensitive performance in the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra must have brought him deep gratification.

Mr. Foote came upon the stage to acknowledge the applause which Dr. Koussevitzky, ever gracious, deferred to him.

* * *

THE PERFORMANCE of MacDowell's Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 2 in D minor which followed was, on Friday afternoon, less satisfactory.

Howard Goding, Boston pianist, graduated from the New England Conservatory in the class of 1910, was soloist. (Mr. Goding's debut with the orchestra was made in the performance of the same work in 1917.)

The Concerto itself is not as interesting as it must once have been. The soloist's performance was determined rather than inspired. (The bravura passages lacked clarity, as the whole lacked color.)

Mr. Goding is evidently a pianist of skill, and it is perhaps unfair to judge his talents on this not too successful performance, it being the first in which we happen to have heard him. It must be admitted that the instrument itself was faulty, the tone being brittle and without resonance — a disconcerting enough contingency for any pianist.

Dr. Koussevitzky brought the program to a close with a glorious performance of that conclusive testament of genius, Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

DEC 13 1936

Eugene Goosens will conduct a young people's concert by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, at 2:30 p. m. Tuesday on the CBS net, for which he has programmed the overture to Von Weber's "Oberon," the Nocturne from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, the Fifth and Sixth Hungarian dances of Brahms, the Forest Music from "Siegfried" and the March from Berlioz' "Faust."

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 7 to 8 o'clock Thursday night on the WJZ net.

The Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy again conducting, will play the overture to von Weber's "Euryanthe," the Intermezzo No. 2 from "Jewels of the Madonna," Grainger's arrangement of the "Londonderry Air" for strings and the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkuere," at 9 o'clock Friday night on KMOX.

Ernest Schelling will direct a children's concert by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra at 10 o'clock Saturday morning that probably will be carried by KMOX.

Part of a performance of "Der Freischuetz," in Liepzig, Germany, will be broadcast at 2:15 p. m. Friday on the WJZ network.

OSTON TRAVELER, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1936

134

MacDowell's Widow Coming to Hub To Hear Symphony Play Concerto

(Copyright, 1936, by United Press)

A tiny gray-haired widow came to Boston to hear one of the world's greatest symphony orchestras play her husband's second piano concerto in tribute to his 75th birthday anniversary.

Probably unnoticed by some 2500 music lovers in the audience, Mrs. Mariam Nevins MacDowell, 75, publicity-shy widow of Edward MacDowell, America's best known classical composer, will attend tonight's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

To the general public, MacDowell, who died in 1908, is perhaps best remembered for his "To a Wild Rose."

"I am looking forward eagerly to hearing what I know will be a magnificent performance," she said. "I can't thank Conductor Serge Koussevitzky enough for reviving my husband's concerto."

Brown-eyed Mrs. MacDowell has been traveling about the country since her husband's death. An accomplished pianist, she plays and lectures on her husband's works to aid the maintenance of the MacDowell colony, which she founded at Peterboro, N. H., in memory of her husband.

COLONY FOR ARTISTS

The colony fulfills MacDowell's dream of a place free from distraction for writers, artists and musicians. It was there that Edward Arlington Robinson wrote the poems that twice won him a Pulitzer prize.

MacDowell was only 23 when he composed the piano concerto that the Boston Symphony has revived.

"I still thrill at the thought my husband wrote this concerto when we were just a newly-married couple, quite poor, and I was spending all my time keeping house and learning be a good cook," Mrs. MacDowell called.

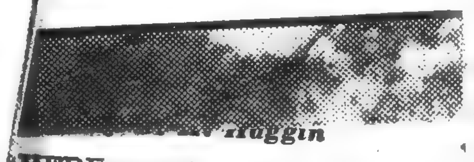
Born in New York city of Scotch-ish descent, Edward Alexander acDowell went to Europe as a 15-ar-old piano prodigy to perfect s technique. He progressed so rapy that at 21 he was mentioned as andidate for the head of the piano partment of Wiesbaden Conservory, but was rejected because of youth.

Shortly thereafter he received the uivalent post at Darmstadt convatory. It was there that he began concentrate on composition. His st concerto was praised by Liszt. At 26, as America's outstanding mposer, he settled in Boston, later oving to New York to head Columa University's newly-established usic department. His death was tributed to worry and overwork.

END

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
DEC 20 1936

Homer's 'The



Haggin

HERE may be good reasons for the engagement of John Barbirolli as sole conductor and ical director of the Philharic-Symphony Orchestra, but has been some faulty reason- connection with the matter. example, pointing out that Gericke the Boston Symphony three important conductors, ck, Monteux and Koussevitzky, h of whom was in sole command, r. Henderson went on to draw hat he thought was the lesson: If music lovers seek the secret of the splendor of tone and high level of finish which characterize performances of the great Boston organization, let them ponder the advantages of following the artistic ideals of one mind." But what one has to ponder is the advantages of following the artistic ideals of one mind when it is the mind of a Gericke, a Muck, a Monteux or a Koussevitzky. Will Mr. Henderson contend that the Boston orchestra would play with the same tone and finish if its permanent conductor were Klemperer or Dobrowen? And what about the tone and finish of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under One-third-of-the-season Conductor Toscanini? Does Mr. Henderson expect them to be achieved by Permanent Conductor Barbirolli (and I am speaking, remember, only of technical aspects of the orchestra's playing)?

Nor may one take the shabby playing of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under certain guest conductors in recent seasons as proof of the disadvantage of guest conductors; what it demonstrated was the disadvantage of these particular guest conductors. What of the orchestra's playing under Four-week Conductor Beecham last year? What of the playing of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Richard Strauss for a few weeks in 1922? A conductor like Beecham or Strauss will no doubt do better with an orchestra the tenth time than the first, but he will make his quality felt even the first time. There is nothing inherently wrong in an arrangement of guest conductors; many of the important European orchestras operate under such an arrangement, with results that are now good, now bad, but this solely in accordance with the quality of the conductor. I observed this in the Vienna Philharmonic during a period of several months. When the orchestra played poorly under Furtwaengler and superbly under Strauss, it was not because Furtwaengler was a guest, for both men conducted only occasionally; it was because Strauss conducted better. And for the same reason it played better under Strauss than under Schalk, who conducted it far more frequently.

A season divided between a Gericke and a Muck, if they were available, would be a better season than one given entirely to a Barbirolli. But where they are not available, then certainly one Barbirolli a season is better than four (and ten Barbirollis are better than one Stokowski, the threat of whom left one pale and shaken). The decision of the Philharmonic-Symphony directors amounts to making the best of a bad situation. They are building for the future, but I do not think the flaws in musical taste that Mr. Barbirolli has revealed are of the sort that can be expected to disappear with time. Deficiencies in performance might be compensated for by interesting programs, but although the ever dependable Deems Taylor had his bright word for Mr. Barbirolli's skill in program-building last Sunday, the fact is that Mr. Barbirolli has shown admirable enterprise but little ability to judge what is worth an audience's attention and what is not. That, however, is something a man can acquire; and if he acquires it he will be valuable to us.

* * *

LAST Sunday's program—with its second half devoted to matters like Delius' "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," Mendelssohn's Scherzo from his Octet and the Rossini-Respighi "Rossiniana"—illustrated the popularization of the Philharmonic-Symphony's weekend programs this season. I don't know whether this has been done for the benefit of the Saturday night audience or the Sunday afternoon radio audience, but in either case it is unnecessary and regrettable. For years we have been told how discriminating and exacting the Saturday night audience is, and the fact is that it has been hearing programs of mid-week caliber and giving evidence of its satisfaction and pleasure. And of the Sunday afternoon radio audience we have been told how exacting and discriminating it has become from hearing such programs; but even if this were not so I would hold that in a week filled with popular programs for the vast radio audience there should be at least one broadcast for those, no matter how comparatively few, who are interested in a program of symphonic caliber and length. The Sunday afternoon Philharmonic-Symphony broadcast was this once, but is no longer.

Cont.

Dec 19 /36 Her

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The ninth regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Howard Goding, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Foote..	Suite in E major Op. 63 for strings
MacDowell....	Concerto for piano and orchestra No. 2 in D minor Op. 23
Brahms—	Symphony No. 4 in E minor Op. 98

It is all very well for the program book to congratulate the Boston Symphony on a long association with the music of MacDowell; but the plain fact is that the works of America's greatest composer have been left severely alone since 1919, with but one exception. The English will play Elgar year in and year out; yet one of our greatest orchestras will calmly allow 15 years to slip by with hardly a bow in the direction of MacDowell. Last spring (May 24, to be exact), this same Second Concerto was played at a Pop concert by Mr. Sanroma. And his singularly brilliant performance found a ready response with the public.

Time plays strange tricks with a composer of great reputation. A writer on American music in 1900, Rupert Hughes, could speak of MacDowell's writing for the piano as greater than Brahms. We are also told that MacDowell was greatly influenced by Joachim Raff. Now, looking at these two statements at the present time, we have different reflections. In the first place, fine work through this concerto is, it is unlikely that any one in yesterday's audience would rank it as high as the concertos of Brahms. And, in the second, the music of Raff is no longer played, so that for us the question of his influence on MacDowell is purely academic.

This concerto combines the qualities of brilliance and lyrical beauty. It unquestionably suits the piano and is also, unlike those concertos which are really symphonies with the piano as an important instrument in the orchestra, a work of display. Such a work does not need the suggestion that it is an American product in order to urge its performance, but is on the other hand the best possible advertisement for American music.

The performance yesterday did justice to the qualities of the concerto in the last two movements. Here Mr. Goding's light touch and, in contrast, his knowledge of when to use force and when to let the melody sing found a happy outlet in MacDowell's music. The performance was a fine one both from the soloist's and the orchestra's side in these movements. But in the first movement the interpretation was not so sympathetic. Mr. Goding's playing was far from clear. Dr. Koussevitzky now restrained the woodwinds and now urged on the orchestra so that a good balance was not attained.

Arthur Foote's delightful Suite in E major made an excellent opening number, for it is soundly written and genial music. The Mendelssohnian fugue is particularly effective. Mr. Foote was in the audience and came on to the platform to receive the applause. The audience, it is pleasant to record, gave him an ovation.

Finally there was Brahms' greatest symphony to end a good concert. We have often rather flippantly wondered if Brahms would have used the triangle as he did in the third movement if he had had our familiarity with the telephone bell.

Prof. Lowes used to say in English 72 that connotations with prohibition had spoiled the effect for him of Shelley's use of the word "jag." Thus circumstances, unforeseen by the artist, may in a later age interrupt for an instant one's enjoyment of his work. The orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky, gave a magnificent performance of the Symphony.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week, Thursday afternoon and Saturday night, Debussy's St. Sebastian music and Dvorak's concerto for 'cello (Piatigorsky, soloist) will be given.

RIVERSIDE, CALIF.

ENTERPRISE

DEC 19 1936

ORCHESTRA TO FEATURE LIVING COMPOSER'S WORK

Giving ear to the many requests for established orchestras to present works of living composers, Los Angeles Philharmonic will go on record this season as one of the first of the larger orchestral bodies to answer that demand in a large way.

Saturday night the orchestra, directed by Dr. Otto Klemperer, will perform for the first time anywhere the Second Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, Opus 68, by Joseph Achron, with the composer himself as violin soloist.

Born in what is now Lithuania, Joseph Achron has resided in America for the past 11 years and is now a resident of Hollywood. His first concerto was given by Serge Koussevitzky and his famous orchestra in Boston in 1927. A third one now in the process of being composed has been commissioned from the composer by Jascha Heifetz, who has been playing his compositions for many years. Zimbalist also has featured this composer's works.

Other numbers on tonight's program include Bach's Toccata in C Major, Afternoon of a Faun by Debussy and the D Major Symphony by Haydn.

---

at Symphc

News of the Day at Home and Elsewhere

Dec. 19/36

Activities in Concert and in Opera; Comment Gleaned From Foreign Press

A phonograph recording of Bach's "Saint Mathew Passion" will be made by Victor during the performance of the work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and soloists on Good Friday, next spring, according to the Harvard Crimson. At Symphony Hall there is no verification of the report, although it is not denied. The recording will require twenty records and will be complete. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct, of course, and the soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, Katherine Meisle, Keith Faulkner and Frederick Jagel. The Glee Club, the same source says, will also make a single record devoted to "Fair Harvard" in Dr. Koussevitzky's arrangement.

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, attended a two-day conference of managers of leading symphony orchestras in St. Louis this week. A new and enlarged public interest in symphonic music is spreading through the land, the managers agreed, and virtually all major orchestras are enjoying increased attendance at their concerts this season, according to the Associated Press. One of the problems discussed at the meeting was the effect of radio broadcasting on attendance.

OLGA AVERINO

Soprano for Debussy's "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien" at Next Week's Symphony Concerts

---

SYMPHONY IN 2D TUESDAY

Post Dec. 23/36

Pieces by Weber, Schumann and Wagner

Beyond the inevitable statement that Carl Maria von Weber was born at Eutin, Oldenburg, Dec. 18, 1786, there was nothing in yesterday's programme book to suggest that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was playing Weber's Overture to "Oberon" within four days of the actual 150th anniversary of his birth. But for that performance this particular anniversary, quite as significant as many that have been marked at Symphony Hall, would have passed unrecognized hereabouts.

Recent comment on Weber has suggested that he is quite as important today for his influence on Wagner as for his own music, and although this is somewhat overstating the case, it was still appropriate that three pieces by Wagner, "A Siegfried Idyl," the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and the Overture to "Tannhauser" brought yesterday's concert to its close. The remaining number, occurring between Weber and Wagner in proper chronological sequence, was Schumann's Symphony in D minor. In such wise did Dr. Koussevitzky prepare the second in a series of Tuesday afternoon concerts intended to be confined to music composed within the 19th century.

With the exception of Weber's Overture, which received the expected poetic and brilliant performance, everything in yesterday's concert had already been heard this season at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Again the performances were masterly and sympathetic, particularly those of the "Idyl" and the "Forest Murmurs." An audience which filled the hall was properly enthusiastic.

Howard Goding Soloist in MacDowell Piano

Concerto

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, DEC

Persistent Question

By Moses Smith

Dec 19, 1936

HOWARD GODING

Rather earlier in the season than customarily Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra have arrived at the American stop in the symphonic journey. This time there was an occasion: the seventy-fifth anniversary of the birthday of Edward MacDowell, which fell on yesterday. To signalize the occasion the conductor placed the composer's D minor Piano Concerto on the programs for the concerts in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, and in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and this evening. For prelude at yesterday's matinee there was the E major Suite for string orchestra by Arthur Foote, who was born more than eight years before MacDowell, but who has already survived him by almost thirty years. And the older composer is happily hale enough to attend a concert where his music is being played and to come on stage, arm-in-arm with the conductor, to acknowledge the audience's warm applause—as he did yesterday.

The only other number on the program was the Brahms E minor Symphony, which was written at approximately the same time when MacDowell was writing his Concerto, and more than twenty years before Foote wrote his Suite. It was fortunate that the American compositions preceded rather than followed the Olympian masterwork of Brahms. They had another advantage in their relative unfamiliarity. For it was possible to indulge yesterday the unholy suspicion that the Brahms E minor has been overplayed here recently.

* * *

On their own, the Americans fared well. Mr. Foote's music reflects the charm of the man that is evident to those who know him and that was even apparent in the few moments of his journey to the stage yesterday. The first movement, which is called Prelude, has the smoothly flowing, untroubled course of much of Mendelssohn's music. There are other similarities, too, between this Prelude and compositions by the earlier master. The pizzicato second movement inevitably suggests the Tchaikovcky of the Fourth Symphony; and the latter must have been in Mr. Foote's mind when he wrote—or rewrote (as the program notes indicate)—his middle movement. It is divided by an adagietto, which is valuable in itself but which does not seem to belong to the main body of the movement. The final movement, a fugue, is skilfully contrived and sonorously scored. The Suite as a whole is an indication that the art of composition in America (Arthur Foote received all his training here) did not begin with our bumptious contemporaries. It sounded beautifully from the Bostonian strings yesterday; and Dr. Koussevitzky treated the performance as a labor of love.

MacDowell's Concerto is a very uneven work. But if an artist is to be judged by his best, this Concerto makes MacDowell out to be a genius, or very close to it. For there are here pages of striking originality and power and beauty. Most of them, I believe, are in the first movement, where both strongly contrasted principal themes immediately arrest the attention of the listener, for different reasons: the bardic flavor of the powerful chords of the first theme, the cool loveliness of the second, attired in sweet but not saccharine harmony. Both the second and third movements are "grateful" music for the solo virtuoso, less grateful for the listener. Though they are perhaps better integrated than the first, they do not hold the attention so persistently.

The Concerto was excellently performed yesterday, with a spirit of closest co-operation between the soloist, Howard Goding, and the conductor. Both were concerned with presenting the work as a symphonic composition rather than as a showpiece for pianist, which it can easily become. Mr. Goding, for his part, displayed none the less the technical equipment and the temperament of a virtuoso pianist, as well as the attributes of a sincere musician. He was always inside the music, refreshingly free from the self-consciousness that has occasionally marked his piano-playing in the past. From the manner in which he played the first bold announcement allotted the solo piano it was evident that his performance would engross the listener. He was rewarded at the end with a few rounds of applause, but with less than his performance deserved.

* * *

Instead of attempting to find new things to say about the E minor Symphony or to re-phrase old it were better to revert to an annual dissertation which, for many years, it has been the custom of this department to deliver as regularly as the Symphony Orchestra returns from its seasonal Western pilgrimage. Playing seven concerts in as many days is sufficient to tax the endurance of musicians and conductor at home. When these are combined with many hundreds of miles of travel, including "sleeper jumps," it is too much to expect the men or their leader to return for a following week's work at home with the usual zest. Casualties, in the form of illness, regularly attend these long and arduous trips. Those who are "well" are not in condition to attempt a program other than one that requires relatively little preparation—like this week's.

Inevitably, the principal number

Cont. above R.

must be one that can be quickly rehearsed, whether because of its in-[illegible]c lack of difficulties [illegible]r because [illegible]hrice-familiar, like the E minor. [illegible]s therefore almost to h[illegible] [illegible]d that the originally ann[illegible] [illegible]d less often played F majo[illegible] [illegible]y of Brahms would go h[illegible] he [illegible]s. It was a pity it had to be [illegible] Alongside the other three symphonies of Brahms, the Third is comparatively neglected by Dr. Koussevitzky.

There is no intent to belittle the quality of yesterday's orchestral playing. The men play magnificently now almost from habit. Although the emotionally taut presentation of the Symphony was not quite so precisely articulated as on other occasions, it was easy to recognize as usual the wonders and glories of the Boston Orchestra. But the larger question remains: Are these Western journeys worth the price paid for them?

WASHINGTON, D. C.

NEWS

TONIGHT'S CONCERT HIGHLIGHT

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Conductor: Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Soloist: Howard Gooding, pianist

WMAL at 8

Overture, "Romeo and Juliet"	Tschaikowsky
Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra	MacDowell

Herald Dec. 23/36

MU

TUESDAY

The second concert of the Tuesday series was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Symphony No. 4 in D minor	Schumann
A Siegfried Idyl	Wagner
Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried"	Wagner
Overture to "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner

This year and month marks the 150th anniversary of Weber's birth; but the musical powers that be have done very little to recognize it. The Metropolitan is opening its season this week, but there is no suggestion that there should be a revival of "Der Freischuetz" or "Oberon." It is a thousand pities that "Oberon" is not occasionally given, for it is a charming opera and quite different from any other. The orchestras do not appear to have done much either. The "Oberon" overture is a pleasant but not very startling act of commemoration. In New York Mr. Barbirolli produced one of the clarinet concertos, arranged for 'cello. Surely that is rather a contemptuous way to remember Weber!

Possibly Weber is for most people a composer of historical importance only, for, outside of the overtures, we do not hear much of his music. Yet, so long as there are scholars to write histories of music, Weber's name will be one of great significance. In the realm of actual performance it is his fate to figure chiefly at popular concerts with the Overture to "Oberon" and the Invitation to the Dance. The overture is a really charming and effective work. Perhaps because of a fear that it is hackneyed, Dr. Koussevitzky gave it yesterday a careful, almost a mannered, interpretation.

The great Fourth Symphony of Schumann followed or, better, was introduced by the overture. Dr. Koussevitzky is evidently devoted to this music and is not lulled into neglecting it by the criticism of those who regard it as mere piano music. It is a splendid work and the frequent performances of it by this orchestra have been neither too many nor in vain. It would be a shrewd act of the Victor Company to secure a recording of it from the Boston Symphony under Dr. Koussevitzky. Yesterday's performance, if not quite as fine as that earlier in the season, was none the less a good one. The Romanza was taken on the slow side; and opening chords were not always sounded with that precision to which we are normally accustomed. The three selections from Wagner, which have been played in the regular series recently, made up the rest of the concert. A. W. W.

QUINCY, MASS.

NEWS

DEC 21 1936

MacDowell's Concerto May Have Started Jazz

BOSTON, Dec. 19 (UP)—Written more than a half-century ago, the second piano concerto of Edward MacDowell, known to millions of music lovers as composer of "To a Wild Rose," may have been the real beginning of modern "jazz."

This possibility was revealed today by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky after his Boston Symphony orchestra, with Howard Goding as soloist, had revived the concerto in tribute to the 75th birthday anniversary of MacDowell, who died in 1908.

"It is like jazz," said Koussevitzky, pointing out that the composition's second movement contained syncopated rhythm and blue notes—which he referred to as dissonances—similar to those found in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Dec 19 /36 Her

MUSIC

SYMPHONY C

By ALEXANDER W

The ninth regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Howard Goding, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Foote..Suite in E major Op. 63 for strings
MacDowell....Concerto for piano and orchestra No. 2 in D minor Op. 23
Brahms—Symphony No. 4 in E minor Op. 98

It is all very well for the program book to congratulate the Boston Symphony on a long association with the music of MacDowell; but the plain fact is that the works of America's greatest composer have been left severely alone since 1919, with but one exception. The English will play Elgar year in and year out; yet one of our greatest orchestras will calmly allow 15 years to slip by with hardly a bow in the direction of MacDowell. Last spring (May 24, to be exact), this same Second Concerto was played at a Pop concert by Mr. Sanroma. And his singularly brilliant performance found a ready response with the public.

Time plays strange tricks with a composer of great reputation. A writer on American music in 1900, Rupert Hughes, could speak of MacDowell's writing for the piano as greater than Brahms. We are also told that MacDowell was greatly influenced by Joachim Raff. Now, looking at these two statements at the present time, we have different reflections. In the first place, fine work through this concerto is, it is unlikely that any one in yesterday's audience would rank it as high as the concertos of Brahms. And, in the second, the music of Raff is no longer played, so that for us the question of his influence on MacDowell is purely academic.

This concerto combines the qualities of brilliance and lyrical beauty. It unquestionably suits the piano and is also, unlike those concertos which are really symphonies with the piano as an important instrument in the orchestra, a work of display. Such a work does not need the suggestion that it is an American product in order to urge its performance, but is on the other hand the best possible advertisement for American music.

The performance yesterday did justice to the qualities of the concerto in the last two movements. Here Mr. Goding's light touch and, in contrast, his knowledge of when to use force and when to let the melody sing found a happy outlet in MacDowell's music. The performance was a fine one both from the soloist's and the orchestra's side in these movements. But in the first movement the interpretation was not so sympathetic. Mr. Goding's playing vitz

win

che

not

Arthur Foote's delightful Suite in E major made an excellent opening number, for it is soundly written and genial music. The Mendelssohnian fugue is particularly effective. Mr. Foote was in the audience and came on to the platform to receive the applause. The audience, it is pleasant to record, gave him an ovation.

Finally there was Brahms' greatest symphony to end a good concert. We have often rather flippantly wondered if Brahms would have used the triangle as he did in the third movement if he had had our familiarity with the telephone bell.

Prof. Lowes used to say in English 72 that connotations with prohibition had spoiled the effect for him of Shelley's use of the word "jag." Thus circumstances, unforeseen by the artist, may in a later age interrupt for an instant one's enjoyment of his work. The orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky, gave a magnificent performance of the Symphony.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week, Thursday afternoon and Saturday night, Debussy's St. Sebastian music and Dvorak's concerto for 'cello (Piatigorsky, soloist) will be given.

NG TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, DECEMBE

nd Death Songs

Univ

Howard Goding Soloi

and Two Americans

Symphony Matinee; Persistent Question

By Moses Smith

Dec 19, 1936

Rather earlier in the season than customarily Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra have arrived at the American stop in the symphonic journey. This time there was an occasion: the seventy-fifth anniversary of the birthday of Edward MacDowell, which fell on yesterday. To signalize the occasion the conductor placed the composer's D minor Piano Concerto on the programs for the concerts in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, and in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and this evening. For prelude at yesterday's matinee there was the E major Suite for string orchestra by Arthur Foote, who was born more than eight years before MacDowell, but who has already survived him by almost thirty years. And the older composer is happily hale enough to attend a concert where his music is being played and to come on stage, arm-in-arm with the conductor, to acknowledge the audience's warm applause—as he did yesterday.

The only other number on the program was the Brahms E minor Symphony, which was written at approximately the same time when MacDowell was writing his Concerto, and more than twenty years before Foote wrote his Suite. It was fortunate that the American compositions preceded rather than followed the Olympian masterwork of Brahms. They had another advantage in their relative unfamiliarity. For it was possible to indulge yesterday the unholy suspicion that the Brahms E minor has been overplayed here recently.

* * *

On their own, the Americans fared well. Mr. Foote's music reflects the charm of the man that is evident to those who know him and that was even apparent in the few moments of his journey to the stage yesterday. The first movement, which is called Prelude, has the smoothly flowing, untroubled course of much of Mendelssohn's music. There are other similarities, too, between this Prelude and compositions by the earlier master. The pizzicato second movement inevitably suggests the Tchaikovcky of the Fourth Symphony; and the latter must have been in Mr. Foote's mind when he wrote—or rewrote (as the program notes indicate)—his middle movement. It is divided by an adagietto, which is valuable in itself but which does not seem to belong to the main body of the movement. The final movement, a fugue, is skilfully contrived and sonorously scored. The Suite as a whole is an indication that the art of composition in America (Arthur Foote received all his training here) did not begin with our bumptious contemporaries. It sounded beautifully from the Bostonian strings yesterday; and Dr. Koussevitzky treated the performance as a labor of love.

HOWARD GODING

MacDowell's Concerto is a very uneven work. But if an artist is to be judged by his best, this Concerto makes MacDowell out to be a genius, or very close to it. For there are here pages of striking originality and power and beauty. Most of them, I believe, are in the first movement, where both strongly contrasted principal themes immediately arrest the attention of the listener, for different reasons: the bardic flavor of the powerful chords of the first theme, the cool loveliness of the second, attired in sweet but not saccharine harmony. Both the second and third movements are "grateful" music for the solo virtuoso, less grateful for the listener. Though they are perhaps better integrated than the first, they do not hold the attention so persistently.

The Concerto was excellently performed yesterday, with a spirit of closest co-operation between the soloist, Howard Goding, and the conductor. Both were concerned with presenting the work as a symphonic composition rather than as a showpiece for pianist, which it can easily become. Mr. Goding, for his part, displayed none the less the technical equipment and the temperament of a virtuoso pianist, as well as the attributes of a sincere musician. He was always inside the music, refreshingly free from the self-consciousness that has occasionally marked his piano-playing in the past. From the manner in which he played the first bold announcement allotted the solo piano it was evident that his performance would engross the listener. He was rewarded at the end with a few rounds of applause, but with less than his performance deserved.

* * *

Instead of attempting to find new things to say about the E minor Symphony or to re-phrase old it were better to revert to an annual dissertation which, for many years, it has been the custom of this department to deliver as regularly as the Symphony Orchestra returns from its seasonal Western pilgrimage. Playing seven concerts in as many days is sufficient to tax the endurance of musicians and conductor at home. When these are combined with many hundreds of miles of travel, including "sleeper jumps," it is too much to expect the men or their leader to return for a following week's work at home with the usual zest. Casualties, in the form of illness, regularly attend these long and arduous trips. Those who are "well" are not in condition to attempt a program other than one that requires relatively little preparation—like this week's.

Inevitably, the principal number

Cont. above 11.

must be one that can be quickly rehearsed, whether because of its intrinsic lack of difficulties or because it is thrice-familiar, like the E minor. It was therefore almost to be expected that the originally announced and less often played F major Symphony of Brahms would go by the boards. It was a pity it had to be so. Alongside the other three symphonies of Brahms, the Third is comparatively neglected by Dr. Koussevitzky.

There is no intent to belittle the quality of yesterday's orchestral playing. The men play magnificently now almost from habit. Although the emotionally taut presentation of the Symphony was not quite so precisely articulated as on other occasions, it was easy to recognize as usual the wonders and glories of the Boston Orchestra. But the larger question remains: Are these Western journeys worth the price paid for them?

RIVERSIDE, CALIF.
ENTERPRISE

DEC 19 1936

ORCHESTRA TO FEATURE LIVING COMPOSER'S WORK

Giving ear to the many requests for established orchestras to present works of living composers, Los Angeles Philharmonic will go on record this season as one of the first of the larger orchestral bodies to answer that demand in a large way.

Saturday night the orchestra, directed by Dr. Otto Klemperer, will perform for the first time anywhere the Second Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, Opus 68, by Joseph Achron, with the composer himself as violin soloist.

Born in what is now Lithuania, Joseph Achron has resided in America for the past 11 years and is now a resident of Hollywood. His first concerto was given by Serge Koussevitzky and his famous orchestra in Boston in 1927. A third one now in the process of being composed has been commissioned from the composer by Jascha Heifetz, who has been playing his compositions for many years. Zimbalist also has featured this composer's works.

Other numbers on tonight's program include Bach's Toccata in C Major, Afternoon of a Faun by Debussy and the D Major Symphony by Haydn.

---

at Symphc

News of the Day at Home and Elsewhere

Dec. 19/36

Activities in Concert and in Opera; Comment Gleaned From Foreign Press

A phonograph recording of Bach's "Saint Mathew Passion" will be made by Victor during the performance of the work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and soloists on Good Friday, next spring, according to the Harvard Crimson. At Symphony Hall there is no verification of the report, although it is not denied. The recording will require twenty records and will be complete. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct, of course, and the soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, Katherine Meisle, Keith Faulkner and Frederick Jagel. The Glee Club, the same source says, will also make a single record devoted to "Fair Harvard" in Dr. Koussevitzky's arrangement.

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, attended a two-day conference of managers of leading symphony orchestras in St. Louis this week. A new and enlarged public interest in symphonic music is spreading through the land, the managers agreed, and virtually all major orchestras are enjoying increased attendance at their concerts this season, according to the Associated Press. One of the problems discussed at the meeting was the effect of radio broadcasting on attendance.

OLGA AVERINO
Soprano for Debussy's "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien" at Next Week's Symphony Concerts

---

SYMPHONY IN 2D TUESDAY

Post Dec. 23/36

Pieces by Weber, Schumann and Wagner

Beyond the inevitable statement that Carl Maria von Weber was born at Eutin, Oldenburg, Dec. 18, 1786, there was nothing in yesterday's programme book to suggest that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was playing Weber's Overture to "Oberon" within four days of the actual 150th anniversary of his birth. But for that performance this particular anniversary, quite as significant as many that have been marked at Symphony Hall, would have passed unrecognized hereabouts.

Recent comment on Weber has suggested that he is quite as important today for his influence on Wagner as for his own music, and although this is somewhat overstating the case, it was still appropriate that three pieces by Wagner, "A Siegfried Idyl," the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and the Overture to "Tannhauser" brought yesterday's concert to its close. The remaining number, occurring between Weber and Wagner in proper chronological sequence, was Schumann's Symphony in D minor. In such wise did Dr. Koussevitzky prepare the second in a series of Tuesday afternoon concerts intended to be confined to music composed within the 19th century.

With the exception of Weber's Overture, which received the expected poetic and brilliant performance, everything in yesterday's concert had already been heard this season at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Again the performances were masterly and sympathetic, particularly those of the "Idyl" and the "Forest Murmurs." An audience which filled the hall was properly enthusiastic.

Herald Dec. 23/36

MU

TUESDAY

The second concert of the Tuesday series was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Oberon"..........Weber
Symphony No. 4 in D minor.....Schumann
A Siegfried Idyl..............Wagner
Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried"..Wagner
Overture to "Tannhaeuser"........Wagner

This year and month marks the 150th anniversary of Weber's birth; but the musical powers that be have done very little to recognize it. The Metropolitan is opening its season this week, but there is no suggestion that there should be a revival of "Der Freischuetz" or "Oberon." It is a thousand pities that "Oberon" is not occasionally given, for it is a charming opera and quite different from any other. The orchestras do not appear to have done much either. The "Oberon" overture is a pleasant but not very startling act of commemoration. In New York Mr. Barbirolli produced one of the clarinet concertos, arranged for 'cello. Surely that is rather a contemptuous way to remember Weber!

Possibly Weber is for most people a composer of historical importance only, for, outside of the overtures, we do not hear much of his music. Yet, so long as there are scholars to write histories of music, Weber's name will be one of great significance. In the realm of actual performance it is his fate to figure chiefly at popular concerts with the Overture to "Oberon" and the Invitation to the Dance. The overture is a really charming and effective work. Perhaps because of a fear that it is hackneyed, Dr. Koussevitzky gave it yesterday a careful, almost a mannered, interpretation.

The great Fourth Symphony of Schumann followed or, better, was introduced by the overture. Dr. Koussevitzky is evidently devoted to this music and is not lulled into neglecting it by the criticism of those who regard it as mere piano music. It is a splendid work and the frequent performances of it by this orchestra have been neither too many nor in vain. It would be a shrewd act of the Victor Company to secure a recording of it from the Boston Symphony under Dr. Koussevitzky. Yesterday's performance, if not quite as fine as that earlier in the season, was none the less a good one. The Romanza was taken on the slow side; and opening chords were not always sounded with that precision to which we are normally accustomed. The three selections from Wagner, which have been played in the regular series recently, made up the rest of the concert. A. W. W.

QUINCY, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 21 1936

MacDowell's Concerto May Have Started Jazz

BOSTON, Dec. 19 (UP)—Written more than a half-century ago, the second piano concerto of Edward MacDowell, known to millions of music lovers as composer of "To a Wild Rose," may have been the real beginning of modern "jazz."

This possibility was revealed today by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky after his Boston Symphony orchestra, with Howard Goding as soloist, had revived the concerto in tribute to the 75th birthday anniversary of MacDowell, who died in 1908.

"It is like jazz," said Koussevitzky, pointing out that the composition's second movement contained syncopated rhythm and blue notes—which he referred to as dissonances—similar to those found in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

TONIGHT'S CONCERT HIGHLIGHT
Boston Symphony Orchestra
Conductor: Dr. Serge Koussevitzky
Soloist: Howard Gooding, pianist
WMAL at 8

Overture, "Romeo and Juliet"..........Tschaikowsky
Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra..........MacDowell

136

Poetry and Strength Mated

GREGOR PIATIGORSKY

Soloist at the Symphony Concerts Next Thursday Afternoon and Saturday Evening

Transcript Dec 19/36

WIDOW TELLS MacDOWELL STORY

Sun ~~Adv.~~ Dec 20

HE PAWNED SILVER FOR LOVE

This is the story of pawned silverware and love — the true romance of Edward MacDowell, America's greatest composer, whose seventy-fifth anniversary was celebrated at Symphony Hall, last night.

It was told at the Hall yesterday for the first time by the composer's widow, Mrs. Marianne MacDowell, a small silver-haired lady, 75 years old, dressed in a dark coat and an old-fashioned mauve-colored hat.

Standing by a show case where manuscripts of her husband's compositions were on exhibit, she talked to reporters and posed, somewhat bashfully, for pictures.

SHOWS MANUSCRIPTS

Her clear eyes sparkled as she pointed to the manuscript of the "Second Concerto" in the case.

"We had to pawn my silverware in order that he could write that," she said. Then she smiled, as reporters picked up their pencils and started to write hurridly. "It was in 1884, the year we were married. We were very poor.

"We were living in London, and had attended several performances of "Much Ado About Nothing," in which Henry Irving and Ellen Terry were appearing. The performance thrilled my husband and inspired him to start work on the concerto, but we were too poor to continue going to the theatre.

"But my husband and I decided that he needed the inspiration, so we pawned the silverware—heirlooms from my family. Before we pawned them, though, my husband made careful drawings of each piece. Some day, he told me, we would be rich, and then we could have the set made up again.

"But we never made enough money," she added, smilingly.

TELLS OF SONG

One of the reporters pointed to a copy of "Long Ago, Sweetheart," a song for which MacDowell wrote both words and music in 1898.

"Was there anything personal in that?" she was asked.

"We had been married nearly 15 years when it was written," she said. "I guess there was something personal in it.

"My husband and I were both temperamental, you know, but we proved that it was possible for two temperamental persons to live together a long time—happily."

MacDowell died in 1908, following a nervous breakdown. He is most famous for his "Woodland Sketches," in which, for the first time in the history of American music, original native Indian themes were used.

KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL

DEC 19 1936

Boston, Dec. 19, (AP)—The famed Boston Symphony orchestra celebrated the 75th birthday anniversary of Edward MacDowell by playing the celebrated American composer's piano Concerto No. 2 with Howard Goding as soloist yesterday. It was the first time since 1919 that the orchestra played the concerto. MacDowell died Jan. 23, 1908.

MacDowell's Widow, at Concert Here, Recalls How Concerto Was Written

Her Dec 20

The final theme of MacDowell's concerto was drawing to a close. Boston music lovers, gathered in Symphony Hall to pay tribute to America's eminent composer on the 75th anniversary of his birth, drank in the strains of the largo movement with rapt attention. Yet one among them, the composer's widow, chuckled to herself as she looked back 52 years to the circumstances surrounding the composition of the work.

"We were very young—23—and poor in those days," said Mrs. MacDowell, during the intermission. "We had just been married in America and had returned to London to live.

"Soon after we settled, John Irving and Ellen Terry opened a two weeks' engagement and we were determined to see them at any cost, poverty or no. When no other means could be found, we pawned some silver heirlooms I had been given by my family as a wedding gift, but not until MacDowell (she always refers to him so) had made sketches of them, so we could have duplicates made when we got rich.

"NEVER GOT RICH"

"One night, after we returned form a performance of 'Much Ado About Nothing,' MacDowell sat down and began making musical sketches based on the airy movement of the play. At the time, he intended them to be the theme of a symphonic poem or a comedy number, but he finally changed his mind and incorporated them as the second movement of the concerto.

"That's how the second movement happened to be written," she said, adding, "and I might say we never got rich enough to have those duplicates of the silver plate made. But I still have the sketches."

Mrs. MacDowell, a small, bird-like, gray-haired woman of 75, is remarkably active and alert. Last night her eyes danced as she viewed a special MacDowell exhibit of original manuscripts, pictures and other mementoes of her late husband which were on display in the corridor of the balcony. In going from one to another, she kept up a running-fire of comment and reminiscence, at times expressing as a musician her critical appreciation of the composer's works and, again, lapsing into episodes in their life together.

Friday afternoon's symphony concert marked the anniversary of MacDowell's birth on Dec. 18, 1861. At the age of 15 he went to Paris to study and while there met Marian Nevins of New York, who studied with him. Upon her return to this country in 1884 he followed and married her. They then returned to Europe and lived there until he came to Boston in 1888. Eight years later he accepted a professorship in music at Columbia University, where he continued until his retirement in 1904. He died in 1908 after a three-year illness.

Speaking of her life with the composer, Mrs. MacDowell said, "We proved that two temperamental persons can get along. When he wrote 'Four Songs' we had been married 24 years and had been happy all the time."

"When MacDowell composed, 50 years ago, his music was considered radical and acid. Hale praised it, but other critics of the times said they 'couldn't understand it.' It was different from the music of those days—I guess it was his Scotch-Irish coming out."

Since her husband's death, Mrs. MacDowell has spent her time between New York, her native city, and Peterboro, N. H., where the composer is buried on their summer estate. She devotes much of her time to directing the well-known artists' colony there, a memorial to her husband and a haven where artists may work without undue interruption. The colony was founded by MacDowell's widow shortly after his death.

Symphony Concert Series

Trav Dec 26

By WILLIAM T. CHASE, Jr.

A strange combination of unusual playing, unfamiliar works and a certain all-pervading atmosphere of dullness marked the 10th of the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, when it was given in Symphony Hall Thursday afternoon, in place of the usual Friday performance. Debussy's music from "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien," the mystery play of Gabriele d'Annunzio, and Dvorak's concerto in B minor for violoncello, Opus 104, made up the program. The Debussy had not been given at these concerts since 1930 and the Dvorak not since 1917. Soloists for the first work were the Cecilia Society Chorus (trained by Arthur Fiedler) and Olga Averino, soprano, while the great Russian 'cellist, Gregor Piatigorsky, performed in the Dvorak.

The fact that there was a general feeling of dullness to the proceedings did not necessarily imply that they were not interesting. Quite the contrary. The Debussy, especially, had the superficial appearance of monotony because of its sustained mood of exalted mysticism. Actually it was an extremely clever and brilliant composition, perfectly suggesting the ancient sufferings of a Christian martyr. It was hard, brightly metallic music—with frequent use of muted strings, three harps, and woodwinds—and its beauty was never marred by overdoses of sentiment. The incidental music yesterday used only a very small portion of the d'Annunzio text and the plot of the play was not brought in to any considerable extent.

However, this was all to the good. The play itself lacked dramatic effect and it was the Debussy score that was really worthy of attention. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien" superbly. The orchestra was at its best and the Cecilia Society chorus gave a very fine account of themselves, thanks to their capable leader, Mr. Fiedler. Mme. Averino sang the solo portion admirably. The score contained many difficulties, but this artist overcame them with the ease and the taste we have now come to expect from her.

The Dvorak concerto was an agreeable, emotional, almost lush score, with plenty of display passages. None the less it was certainly too long, each of its customary three movements seemingly being about equal to a full concerto. Mr. Piatigorsky played it magnificently and was given excellent support from Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. His tone was always delightful and his technique was without limitations. The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week there will be an all Russian program with Sergei Rachmaninoff as piano soloist.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 27 1936

Boston Orchestra Here Jan. 7, 9

Programs for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky on Jan. 7 and Jan. 9, were disclosed yesterday. For Jan. 7 the list includes the Foote Suite for Strings, Clementi's Symphony in D and Brahms's Fourth symphony. For Jan. 9 the program consists of Stravinsky's "Fairy's Kiss," MacDowell's second piano concerto, with Jesus María Sanromá as soloist, and the Franck symphony.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Sergei Rachmaninoff

Who Will Play His Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini With the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday and Saturday

---

Boston Symphony Orchestra

For the holiday program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Dec. 24 and 26) Dr. Koussevitzky chose Debussy's "Le Martyre de Saint Sébastien" and Dvořák's Cello Concerto. Gregor Piatigorsky was the cellist. The chorus for Debussy's "mystery play" was that of the Cecilia Society; and Olga Averino sang the measures for soprano.

Perhaps Dr. Koussevitzky felt some vague association between the legend of Saint Sebastian and the Christmas season. Debussy's work was last heard in Symphony Hall nearly seven years ago; and that was its first performance in full in Boston. The impression made at that time was not materially modified by a second hearing. We have spoken several times lately of sensational music. This is another example of it. The sensation in this instance is that of being shut in an ill-ventilated room, stuffy with the odor of candles, incense and lilies. It is "The Blessed Damozel" indoors. As soon as the ceremonies are over one dashes instinctively into the open air.

There is something unwholesome about these mixtures of mysticism and sensuality. Wagner was fond of them. "Parsifal" is a supreme example. "Le Martyre" is a Debussyan "Parsifal"; to paraphrase George Moore, holy water in a French wine cask.

Would the piece make a better impression with the stage action? Possibly, but it is doubtful. More likely these things are a matter of temperament. To enjoy musical works in which an honest emotion is as impossible as a simple triad, one probably needs a taste for the decadent.

The performance was excellent.

rts

Dec 26
Chris. ~~Sci.~~ Monitor

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

DEC 19 1936

Music and The Drama

BOSTON SYMPHONY HONORS MacDOWELL

Boston, Dec. 18—AP—The Boston Symphony Orchestra observed the 75th birthday anniversary today of Edward MacDowell by playing the noted American composer's piano concerto No. 2 with Howard Goding as soloist.

Mrs. MacDowell, widow of the composer who died Jan. 23, 1908, was expected to attend tomorrow evening's performance, when the concerto will be repeated. She lives in Boston.

It was the first time the Boston orchestra has played this MacDowell concerto since 1919. When, curiously enough, Goding, a Bostonian now on the faculty of the New England Conservatory, also was soloist, making his debut with the orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck, conductor. Today's also was his first appearance with the orchestra since that time.

Arthur Foote, 83-year old American composer and friend of MacDowell, attended today's concert and heard the orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, play his own Suite in E major for string orchestra. Foote lives in nearby Newton. Brahms' Fourth Symphony completed the program.

RACHMANINOFF'S HANDS.

A remarkable study of the hands of the pianist, Rachmaninoff. He plays with the Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, Jan. 1-2.

Post

136

Poetry and Strength Mated

GREGOR PIATIGORSKY

Soloist at the Symphony Concerts Next Thursday Afternoon and Saturday Evening

---

WIDOW TELLS MacDOWELL STORY

HE PAWNED SILVER FOR LOVE

This is the story of pawned silverware and love — the true romance of Edward MacDowell, America's greatest composer, whose seventy-fifth anniversary was celebrated at Symphony Hall, last night.

It was told at the Hall yesterday for the first time by the composer's widow, Mrs. Marianne MacDowell, a small silver-haired lady, 75 years old, dressed in a dark coat and an old-fashioned mauve-colored hat.

Standing by a show case where manuscripts of her husband's compositions were on exhibit, she talked to reporters and posed, somewhat bashfully, for pictures.

SHOWS MANUSCRIPTS

Her clear eyes sparkled as she pointed to the manuscript of the "Second Concerto" in the case.

"We had to pawn my silverware in order that he could write that," she said. Then she smiled, as reporters picked up their pencils and started to write hurridly. "It was in 1884, the year we were married. We were very poor.

"We were living in London, and had attended several performances of "Much Ado About Nothing," in which Henry Irving and Ellen Terry were appearing. The performance thrilled my husband and inspired him to start work on the concerto, but we were too poor to continue going to the theatre.

"But my husband and I decided that he needed the inspiration, so we pawned the silverware —heirlooms from my family. Before we pawned them, though, my husband made careful drawings of each piece. Some day, he told me, we would be rich, and then we could have the set made up again.

"But we never made enough money," she added, smilingly.

TELLS OF SONG

One of the reporters pointed to a copy of "Long Ago, Sweetheart," a song for which MacDowell wrote both words and music in 1898.

"Was there anything personal in that?" she was asked.

"We had been married nearly 15 years when it was written," she said. "I guess there was something personal in it.

"My husband and I were both temperamental, you know, but we proved that it was possible for two temperamental persons to live together a long time—happily."

MacDowell died in 1908, following a nervous breakdown. He is most famous for his "Woodland Sketches," in which, for the first time in the history of American music, original native Indian themes were used.

KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL

DEC 19 1936

Boston, Dec. 19, (AP)—The famed Boston Symphony orchestra celebrated the 75th birthday anniversary of Edward MacDowell by playing the celebrated American composer's piano Concerto No. 2 with Howard Goding as soloist yesterday. It was the first time since 1919 that the orchestra played the concerto. MacDowell died Jan. 23, 1908.

Symphony Concert Series

By WILLIAM T. CHASE, Jr.

A strange combination of unusual playing, unfamiliar works and a certain all-pervading atmosphere of dullness marked the 10th of the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, when it was given in Symphony Hall Thursday afternoon, in place of the usual Friday performance. Debussy's music from "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien," the mystery play of Gabriele d'Annunzio, and Dvorak's concerto in B minor for violoncello, Opus 104, made up the program. The Debussy had not been given at these concerts since 1930 and the Dvorak not since 1917. Soloists for the first work were the Cecilia Society Chorus (trained by Arthur Fiedler) and Olga Averino, soprano, while the great Russian 'cellist, Gregor Piatigorsky, performed in the Dvorak.

The fact that there was a general feeling of dullness to the proceedings did not necessarily imply that they were not interesting. Quite the contrary. The Debussy, especially, had the superficial appearance of monotony because of its sustained mood of exalted mysticism. Actually it was an extremely clever and brilliant composition, perfectly suggesting the ancient sufferings of a Christian martyr. It was hard, brightly metallic music—with frequent use of muted strings, three harps, and woodwinds—and its beauty was never marred by overdoses of sentiment. The incidental music yesterday used only a very small portion of the d'Annunzio text and the plot of the play was not brought in to any considerable extent.

However, this was all to the good. The play itself lacked dramatic effect and it was the Debussy score that was really worthy of attention. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien" superbly. The orchestra was at its best and the Cecilia Society chorus gave a very fine account of themselves, thanks to their capable leader, Mr. Fiedler. Mme. Averino sang the solo portion admirably. The score contained many difficulties, but this artist overcame them with the ease and the taste we have now come to expect from her.

The Dvorak concerto was an agreeable, emotional, almost lush score, with plenty of display passages. None the less it was certainly too long, each of its customary three movements seemingly being about equal to a full concerto. Mr. Piatigorsky played it magnificently and was given excellent support from Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. His tone was always delightful and his technique was without limitations. The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week there will be an all Russian program with Sergei Rachmaninoff as piano soloist.

MacDowell's Widow, at Concert Here, Recalls How Concerto Was Written

The final theme of MacDowell's concerto was drawing to a close. Boston music lovers, gathered in Symphony Hall to pay tribute to America's eminent composer on the 75th anniversary of his birth, drank in the strains of the largo movement with rapt attention. Yet one among them, the composer's widow, chuckled to herself as she looked back 52 years to the circumstances surrounding the composition of the work.

"We were very young—23—and poor in those days," said Mrs. MacDowell, during the intermission. "We had just been married in America and had returned to London to live.

"Soon after we settled, John Irving and Ellen Terry opened a two weeks' engagement and we were determined to see them at any cost, poverty or no. When no other means could be found, we pawned some silver heirlooms I had been given by my family as a wedding gift, but not until MacDowell (she always refers to him so) had made sketches of them, so we could have duplicates made when we got rich.

"NEVER GOT RICH"

"One night, after we returned form a performance of 'Much Ado About Nothing,' MacDowell sat down and began making musical sketches based on the airy movement of the play. At the time, he intended them to be the theme of a symphonic poem or a comedy number, but he finally changed his mind and incorporated them as the second movement of the concerto.

"That's how the second movement happened to be written," she said, adding, "and I might say we never got rich enough to have those duplicates of the silver plate made. But I still have the sketches."

Mrs. MacDowell, a small, bird-like, gray-haired woman of 75, is remarkably active and alert. Last night her eyes danced as she viewed a special MacDowell exhibit of original manuscripts, pictures and other mementoes of her late husband which were on display in the corridor of the balcony. In going from one to another, she kept up a running-fire of comment and reminiscence, at times expressing as a musician her critical appreciation of the composer's works and, again, lapsing into episodes in their life together.

Friday afternoon's symphony concert marked the anniversary of MacDowell's birth on Dec. 18, 1861. At the age of 15 he went to Paris to study and while there met Marian Nevins of New York, who studied with him. Upon her return to this country in 1884 he followed and married her. They then returned to Europe and lived there until he came to Boston in 1888. Eight years later he accepted a professorship in music at Columbia University, where he continued until his retirement in 1904. He died in 1908 after a three-year illness.

Speaking of her life with the composer, Mrs. MacDowell said, "We proved that two temperamental persons can get along. When he wrote 'Four Songs' we had been married 24 years and had been happy all the time."

"When MacDowell composed, 50 years ago, his music was considered radical and acid. Hale praised it, but other critics of the times said they 'couldn't understand it.' It was different from the music of those days—I guess it was his Scotch-Irish coming out."

Since her husband's death, Mrs. MacDowell has spent her time between New York, her native city, and Peterboro, N. H., where the composer is buried on their summer estate. She devotes much of her time to directing the well-known artists' colony there, a memorial to her husband and a haven where artists may work without undue interruption. The colony was founded by MacDowell's widow shortly after his death.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 27 1936

Boston Orchestra Here Jan. 7, 9

Programs for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky on Jan. 7 and Jan. 9, were disclosed yesterday. For Jan. 7 the list includes the Foote Suite for Strings, Clementi's Symphony in D and Brahms's Fourth symphony. For Jan. 9 the program consists of Stravinsky's "Fairy's Kiss," MacDowell's second piano concerto, with Jesus María Sanromá as soloist, and the Franck symphony.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Sergei Rachmaninoff

Who Will Play His Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini With the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday and Saturday

---

Boston Symphony Orchestra

For the holiday program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Dec. 24 and 26) Dr. Koussevitzky chose Debussy's "Le Martyre de Saint Sébastien" and Dvořák's Cello Concerto. Gregor Piatigorsky was the cellist. The chorus for Debussy's "mystery play" was that of the Cecilia Society; and Olga Averino sang the measures for soprano.

Perhaps Dr. Koussevitzky felt some vague association between the legend of Saint Sebastian and the Christmas season. Debussy's work was last heard in Symphony Hall nearly seven years ago; and that was its first performance in full in Boston. The impression made at that time was not materially modified by a second hearing. We have spoken several times lately of sensational music. This is another example of it. The sensation in this instance is that of being shut in an ill-ventilated room, stuffy with the odor of candles, incense and lilies. It is "The Blessed Damozel" indoors. As soon as the ceremonies are over one dashes instinctively into the open air.

There is something unwholesome about these mixtures of mysticism and sensuality. Wagner was fond of them. "Parsifal" is a supreme example. "Le Martyre" is a Debussyan "Parsifal"; to paraphrase George Moore, holy water in a French wine cask.

Would the piece make a better impression with the stage action? Possibly, but it is doubtful. More likely these things are a matter of temperament. To enjoy musical works in which an honest emotion is as impossible as a simple triad, one probably needs a taste for the decadent.

The performance was excellent. Dr. Koussevitzky lavished care on it, and the players and singers responded eagerly. So far as memory can be trusted, the chorus did rather better than on the former occasion. Mme. Averino, though not in her best voice, sang with her customary musical intelligence.

The Dvořák Cello Concerto had been absent so long from Boston Symphony programs as to be essentially a novelty. It was last played at these concerts nearly 20 years ago. Revived, it proved to be tuneful and conventional; of interest chiefly as a vehicle for the virtuosity and the superb art of Mr. Piatigorsky.

L. A. S.

rts

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

DEC 19 1936

News

Secretary Class at Bates

RACHMANINOFF'S HANDS.

A remarkable study of the hands of the pianist, Rachmaninoff. He plays with the Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, Jan. 1-2.

Symphony Concert --- News and Comment Concerning

Paired Debussy and Dvorak Complete Lengthy Program

Piatigorsky, Orchestra and Vocal Forces Excel in a Matinee of Curious Contrasts

By Moses Smith

According to conventional standards the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, presented in Symphony Hall on Thursday afternoon and which it will repeat tonight is unusual. It contains only two numbers, each of them long—Debussy's music to d'Annunzio's play, "Le Martyre de Saint-Sebastien," and the Dvorak 'Cello Concerto, with Gregor Piatigorsky for distinguished soloist. But Dr. Koussevitzky has long ago made evident that he does not hold to the conventions as regards program-building. And he undoubtedly convinced a large portion of the Bostonian concert-going public that some of these conventions have quite lost their value.

But by almost any reasonable standard it would seem that this week's program is slightly preposterous. It is a not unreasonable demand that a conductor, in arranging a symphony program, should order his selection according to some artistic plan, whether of unity or discreet contrast of style, emotional effect and so forth. The program in question devotes an hour to music of an exceedingly civilized, subtle even decadent sort. With a stroll in the lobby for interlude the listener is then asked to hear another long work, containing music of naively emotional quality. The mood that has been carefully built up by the joint efforts of playwrights, composer and performers is thus rudely shattered by the projection of an assortment of emotions quite incompatible with the first.

It is not intended to convey the argument that the Dvorak Concerto was not worth reviving after almost two decades of desuetude. But it ought not to be played at the same concert with the Debussy score. Besides, the program is too long. And the answer that there is no obligation on the listener to stay through is not sufficient. To walk out in the middle of the Concerto, as a considerable number did at the Thursday matinee, can be construed as not merely a discourtesy to the performers but also an annoyance to those members of the audience who remain. To come in midway in the performance of "The Martyrdom of Saint-Sebastian" invites the same objections.

Programs limited to a single number of two are almost always dangerous for the reasons set forth. By the same token they should be carefully considered before they are offered. When a soloist is scheduled to play at a given concert and when his selection is more or less set—as was probably the case this week—it is the task of the conductor to build the rest of the program around the determined portion. Dr. Koussevitsky, we know, had set his mind and heart on reviving the Debussy score this season. What I have tried to indicate is that if Piatigorsky and the Dvorak Concerto were scheduled for this week's concerts, the music of Debussy ought to have been reserved for another week.

* * *

Mr. Burk's program notes point out in some detail how concerned Dvorak was lest his publisher change or delete any of his manuscript for the 'Cello Concerto. The composer, as it seemed on hearing the work on Thursday, need not have been so fussy. The element of repetition, which was carried to great lengths in music of the nineteenth century, is oppressive in this Concerto, which could be considerably cut to advantage. Development in the real sense —as in the music of Beethoven, for instance—was not one of Dvorak's strong points. He "developed" a theme too often by restating it in another key—sometimes in the same key.

To retain the interest of the musical mind Dvorak employed more effectively his admittedly strong melodic gifts. He was a sufficiently national composer, too, so that his themes are often more characteristic than in the general run of nineteenth century Romanticism, strongly influenced as the latter was by the German school. But the tunes of Dvorak are often trivial as well. No matter how much heart-ache this music may have caused the composer during the process of its creation, the listener nowadays must not take it too seriously, since it will not stand too close inspection. Rather listen to it as a tuneful, even displayful piece that makes enormous demands on the soloist.

Piatigorsky, who, as the toastmasters say, needs no introduction here, disposed of the difficulties with his customary ease and despatch. The rapid finger-passages were played with the greatest of precision and articulation. Perhaps the Piatigorsky tone did not have its usual depth and fullness at such times. But speed in passage-work and fullness of tone are almost of necessity related to each other in inverse ratio. In the slower, more songful places, Piatigorsky's tone had its familiar opulence. As to details of style and interpretation the 'cellist was once again master of his instrument, authoritative in his declamation. The conductor and orchestra were essentially at one with him.

* * *

It was a beautiful performance of "The Martyrdom of Saint-Sebastian." The Cecilia Society chorus, trained by Arthur Fiedler, sang with splendidly modulated tone, rhythmic accuracy and reasonably faithful enunciation of the French text. The chorus seemed to be prepared for the minutest demand of the conductor and of the composer. Olga Averino, the Boston soprano, was equally happy in the solo passages. These were delivered so purely and musically, with so delicate a distillation of the Debussyan essence, that it is hard to imagine how a better choice of soloist could have been made. The ease of Mme. Averino's singing was deceptive. Many may have failed to perceive how really daring—as well as remarkably successful—were some of her "effects."

The orchestra played with that assortment of technical and tonal virtues and style which, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, makes it an ideal instrument for music by Debussy. If occasionally it lacked quite the precision of the vocal performers the reason may have been either that Dr. Koussevitzky demanded the impossible or that he was himself so engrossed by the music as to deprive him momentarily of some of his executive powers.

There can be no question, though, that the performance as a whole notably realized the possibilities of the Debussyan score, to the extent that they can be realized in a concert performance. For wondrously as this mystical music made its successive impressions on Thursday, a degree of monotony was inevitable without the stage spectacle to assist. Furthermore, one heard in immediate succession excerpts that, in the theater, would be separated by explanatory comment and action; excerpts that were not intended to sound, one after another, so rapidly in the ears. In preference, it would almost seem, that barbarous institution known as a reader might be employed. At least, this procedure would serve the purpose of giving the listener respite in preparation for another mood.

How large a section of the usual symphonic audience really enjoys the experience of Debussy's strangely beautiful music it is hard to say. But the work is something that ought to be experienced—even in the concert hall—a few times in a life. To play it as regularly as every two or three years would be almost disastrous. But there can be few to quarrel with a conductor who schedules a performance of "The Martyrdom of Saint-Sebastian" at rare intervals.

An Artist Pauses for Contemplation

SERGEI RACHMANINOV

Eminent Pianist and Composer, Who Will Play the Solo Part of His Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini at the Symphony Concerts Next Friday and Saturday.

---

be given at the Hotel Statler on Jan.

Heard Dec. 31

Serge Rachmaninoff, great Russian pianist, who will be the soloist at the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall this week. He will play for the first time in Boston his "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini.

RACHMANINOFF WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Sergei Rachmaninoff will be the distinguished soloist at the next regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The Russian composer-pianist will be heard in the first Boston performance of his Rhapsody for Piano and Orchestra on a theme of Paganini. This work, which is a set of variations, was composed in 1934 and has been performed many times in other cities.

Serge Koussevitzky will present an all-Russian program on this occasion, beginning with Tchaikovsky's Overture Fantasia after Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet." The closing number will be Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," which has not been performed at these concerts since 1933.

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Dec. 27/36

Concerning The Future Symphony Programmes

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

If Dr. Koussevitzky's Christmas programme seemed in the main a bit solemn for the occasion, the list he has prepared for the concerts of January 1 and 2, 1937, is in part festive and in part eventful. Then for the first time in Boston there will be performed by the Symphony Orchestra and the composer himself Serge Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini. This work, in the form of a theme and variations, was composed in 1934 and has been played many times in other cities. The other items on an all-Russian list are Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasy "Romeo and Juliet" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" suite, which our orchestra has not played since 1933 and in which, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction it especially excels.

* * * *

In the columns of the New York Times certain correspondents have been protesting the relative lack of cheerfulness in "good" music. To those who complained that the great composers were gloomy souls another correspondent, Mr. Edward E. Fuchs, replies that "with few exceptions most of the so-called 'popular' music is so sad, so horribly pathetic, so filled with tears, anguish and tragedy, that the old masters, Rossini, Donizetti, Mozart, Gounod, Verdi and Wagner, are by comparison rollicking playboys."

It is true enough that music designed to appeal to the general taste is frequently mournful. There is the flood of "torch" songs, the "Prisoner's Song," the "Suicide Song" from Budapest, there are the cowboy songs and other ditties of a nostalgic or dolorous cast. But in our mothers' or grandmothers' day the trend was still more dismal. Consider such gems as "Ben Bolt," "Strangers Yet" and "The Old Sexton" with its touching refrain, "I gather them in." And such lachrymosities were the rule, not the exception.

In his case for the more substantial composers Mr. Fuchs might well have mentioned Haydn, the most consistently cheerful of them all. And of course the gayest music in the world comes from the composers of legitimate comic opera, not only Rossini and Donizetti but Offenbach, Auber, Johann Strauss, Von Suppe and many others. Martin Luther did not think that the devil should have all the good tunes. Certainly the ballad-mongers, song-smiths and toe-teasers have no monopoly on the cheery ones. Even Brahms and Beethoven wrote their Second Symphonies, and the latter his Seventh and Eighth.

* * * *

It is the custom in this country to cover such things as the opening night of an opera season from the news angle as well as the musical one. But the London Daily Mail went a step farther recently and let its "social editress" discuss a new conductor, Karl Boehm, who directed a performance of "Tristan," given by the Dresden State Opera Company at Covent Garden. Dr. Boehm as "crouching like a cat over his orchestra." Later comes this:

"At times during the opera he seemed lulled into sleep by the quiet throbbing of the strings, but suddenly he would leap forward, fling out an arm to bring in some fresh instrument, and by a secret code of his own convey to the singer a different cue by a flick of three fingers.

"There were moments when he would sit back and rest his tiny, pencil-like baton on the score, only tapping it lightly to indicate the rhythm.

"Suddenly he would be galvanized into action, jump from his seat, and reach over the orchestra with a huge, sweeping movement which was even more dramatic than the action on the stage."

Many composers who now have more need for publicity than has Igor Stravinsky might well envy that Russian's faculty for getting in the news. Arriving in New York the other day, Mr. Stravinsky told the reporters that his latest score is a ballet, "Card Game in Three Deals," based upon a game of poker. This ballet, to be produced at the Metropolitan Opera House next spring by the American Ballet, under the direction of George Blanchine, will require for its setting a double stage, the players above, the impersonated cards below.

* * * *

On Wednesday evening the State Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Leopold Podolsky, will play at the Burke School Auditorium.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon and Saturday [illegible] above.

adv Dec. 27/36

Symphony in Holiday Mood

By Ruth Marsters

Music Editor

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA celebrated the Christmas season with concerts as profoundly interesting in program as they were exceptional in performance, offering Debussy's Music from "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien," and the Dvorak Concerto in B minor, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist.

The regular Friday afternoon concert, advanced to Thursday afternoon because of the holiday, was the first occasion of Piatigorsky's performance in Boston of Dvorak's Concerto.

Since the distinguished 'cellist's first appearance with the orchestra in 1931, his several performances have included the Schumann Concerto in A minor, the Haydn Concerto in D major, Cassado's transcription of the Mozart Horn Concerto, Berezowski's Concerto Lirico and Strauss' "Don Quixote." His incomparable reading of the latter score, which he has performed twice in Boston, is of course, far-famed.

* * *

PIATIGORSKY'S strong individuality as an artist is a point with which some will quarrel, many applaud, and none deny. It was, therefore, a matter of no small moment among his followers to see just what he would do with the Dvorak Concerto—interest in this far exceeding that which in other cases might be applied to the music itself.

For what Piatigorsky did, we can find no better word than unique. The Allegro was played, not allegro, but at various tempi in an effort to make interesting a movement which musically is somewhat lacking in this respect.

For an artist to take such liberties is bad, simply because it doesn't work. The performer is, after all, entirely subject to the composer, whether he likes it or not. No amount of embroidery on a poor idea will make it a good one—quite. If it were possible, Piatigorsky could do it, for the beauty of tone, the exquisite phrasing, the vitality which are his are unsurpassed in kind.

His playing exacts a breathless attention, each phrase seems to possess a penetrating significance, but while these qualities made of the Adagio ma non troppo a thing of unforgettable beauty, the Allegro was not resolved into completeness of musical form.

One could have desired no finer performance than that given the Finale: Allegro moderato.

The orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky's skillful baton, was in complete accord with the soloist throughout.

* * *

THE DEBUSSY music, with which Dr. Koussevitzky opened the program, was marvelously performed. The Cecelia Society (Arthur Fiedler, conductor) assisting in the performance, lent its best efforts. Olga Averino, singing the soprano solo, gave a sensative performance of the difficult score. The orchestra was superb.

The music itself is of the magic substance which was Debussy at his best.

Written around the Mystery Play of Gabriele d'Anunzio, the work was commissioned by the dancer Ida Rubinstein, and first performed in Parin in 1911.

It is written in five sections, "The Court of Lilies," "The Magic Dancer," "The Council of the False Gods," the "Broken Laurel," and "Paradise."

With what marvelous imagination Debussy has wrought this music, creating atmosphere, mood and color, combining Gregorian chants with Oriental melodies and rhythms, blending the austerity of Christian martyrdom with pagan poetry!

* * *

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF will be the distinguished soloist at the next regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday.

The Russian composer-pianist will be here in the first Boston performance of his Rhapsody for Piano and Orchestra on a theme of Paganini.

Dr. Koussevitzky will present an all-Russian program on this occasion.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS
Dec. 19.36

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS REPORT FINANCIAL DATA

ST. LOUIS, Dec. 18 (AP)—Cold statistics showed today symphonic music hides a big business.

America's 13 leading symphony orchestras, in their first consolidated financial statement, disclosed an annual combined budget of $4,346,500, and average of $334,346.

Managers of the orchestras, 12 of whom are meeting here, estimated, exclusive of summer seasons and radio broadcasts, more than 3,500,000 persons hear their 1100 musicians in 1200 concerts each year.

None of the orchestras is self-sustaining. Their annual combined earned income is $2,782,100, leaving a total deficit of $1,564,400, or an average of $120,339.

Box office and miscellaneous earned incomes range from a high of 86 per cent to a low of 35 per cent of the annual budget, with an average of 66 per cent for the group. The largest earned incomes were reported by the Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago orchestras.

Three of the orchestras meet deficits through endowment funds, the others being sustained by maintenance funds raised each year and, in a few cases, supplemented by special gifts.

Debussy Music in Prospect

Note on "Saint Sebastian," to Be Presented at the Symphony Concerts

Trans. Dec. 23/36

Debussy's incidental music to Gabriel d'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," will be given its second pair of performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the regular concerts which fall on Thursday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week. Olga Averino will sing the soprano solos, the Cecilia Society the choral parts.

It was the "sexless grace" of Ida Rubinstein that first gave the Italian poet the idea of his drama. Bakst designed costumes and settings, and the self-styled "lazy" Debussy completed his score in two months of intense concentration. Miss Rubinstein played the part of the Saint at the first performance, just twenty-five years ago. Seldom given since, the work remains far more successful in the concert-room.

D'Annunzio's play is divided into five acts, each bearing a title. Thus, the first section, called "The Court of Lilies," begins with a prelude describing the exaltation of the Christian soul, proceeds with an exposition of the tortures of two Christian maidens chained to pillars. Sebastian, chief of the archers of Diocletian, encourages the sufferers by his ecstatic dance on the burning coals in which are mirrored both the pain and the joy of martyrdom. After a hymn glorifying the heavenly power, Sebastian shoots an arrow into the air. His holiness is proved by the failure of the missile to return to earth; and the act concludes with a vision of an angelic chorus and a proclamation of celestial joy.

"The Magic Chamber" is depicted in the prelude to the second act. Behind a mystic door are hidden magicians and astrologers whose esoteric truths decipher the future. Sebastian symbolically batters down the door. The new power of Christianity rises behind it. The music portrays the battle of Christ's teaching and heathenism. A young maiden whom Sebastian has converted is tortured to death.

The introduction to the third act is a brilliant fanfare for "The Council of False Gods." In the presence of the Emperor, Sebastian refuses his honors and mimes the ascent of Christ to Calvary. Not a word is spoken. It is to the music that the task is given, and only after several minutes is the chorus of endless suffering and limitless pity sounded. The actual martyrdom takes place in the fourth act, where Sebastian is bound to the cross while archers of his own troup fill him with arrows. Again the task of describing his pain and his spiritual resignation is left to the orchestra and chorus, and here it is, in "The Broken Laurel," that d'Annunzio's principal idea may be found, borrowed from the Renaissance poet, Veronica Gambara:

"I say unto you, I say unto you,
He that wounds me the more deeply, the more deeply loves me."

The fifth act pictures Sebastian's rising to Paradise. Chorus and orchestra suffice for the complete presentation. Particularly in this part of the work do we recognize the success of Debussy's intention to simplify his choral writing so that it may as nearly as possible attain to a pure movement at once the opposite of the harmonic and polyphonic writing in "Boris Godunoff" and "Die Meistersinger," respectively. Although both these works influenced him strongly, it is Wagner's "Parsifal" that has been most often chosen for comparison—Debussy's "Parsifal," it has been said, has never found its Bayreuth. Throughout, the most important part of the musical texture is given to the three harps and wind instruments.

* * *

The only other piece on this week's program will be the Violoncello Concerto of Dvorak with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist in the work that made his reputation in America. Not played here since 1917, the concerto is in the usual three movements that tradition has decreed for the form. It is at once symphonic and displayful in character.

G. H. L. S.

German Romantics Heard at Symphony

Weber, Schumann and Wagner, three German Romantic composers who were both very German and very Romantic—each in his own way—were represented on the second of the Tuesday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky yesterday in Symphony Hall.

The music, much of which in its early days may have been as "difficult" for the public as the most abstruse tonal concoctions of Stravinsky and Berg today, has by now taken on a mellow tinge for most of us, something that the Germans would call gemuetlich. The list began with Weber's "Oberon" Overture, proceeded to Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor and ended with three excerpts from the works of Richard of Bayreuth — "A Siegfried Idyl," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and the Overture to "Tannhaeuser." The Idyl was chosen wi for the first played (and Cosima Wagner on Christmas Day, sixty-six years ago.

All of the numbers have appeared on recent programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Friday and Saturday concerts. There is thus as little reason for commenting in detail on the performances as there is to elucidate new opinions about thrice-familiar music. But it was a pleasure for the casual attendant at these Tuesday matinees to observe how relatively cheerful yesterday's concert was, in contrast with the more formal aspect of a Friday afternoon or a Saturday evening in the same place.

Especially in the performance of the Symphony one noted an easy-going air that was altogether welcome. Perhaps the playing did not reach quite the pitch of perfection the conductor and orchestra have commanded on other occasions. though there was little ground for complaint even on that score. But the performers seemed so agreeably relaxed that the music-making took on the most natural appearance in the world—and also the most natural sound. Schumann's prolixity presents notorious difficulties both for his interpreters and his listeners. But yesterday the whole Symphony seemed quite inevitable. One would not have erased a note. This was certainly the finest kind of tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians.

M. S.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

DEC 19 1936

BOSTON—Written more than a half-century ago, the second piano concerto of Edward McDowell, known to millions of music lovers as composer of "To A Wild Rose," may have been the real beginning of modern "jazz." This possibility was revealed today by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky after his Boston Symphony orchestra, with Howard Goding as soloist, had revived the concerto in tribute to the 75th birthday anniversary of MacDowell, who died in 1908. "It is like jazz," said Koussevitsky, pointing out that the composition's second movement contained syncopated rhythm and blue notes—which he referred to as dissonances—similar to those found in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

SUN-TELEGRAPH

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
Dec. [illegible]

138

lharmonic to Play Symphony Premiere

The Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra is to have the honor Thursday afternoon, Jan. 7, of giving the world premiere of a major symphony by one of the foremost of the younger modern composers.

It will be the Third Symphony by Nikolai Berezowsky, former member of the Kroll Sextet. Jose Iturbi will conduct.

The composer's personal friendship with Iturbi, plus the high regard in which he holds the local ensemble is said to have been responsible for the request to give the world premiere. Heretofore, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given the first performance of his works.

In addition to the Berezowsky composition, Iturbi has included symphonies by Haydn and Mendelssohn on the matinee program. Ravel's second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite also will be given.

Rachmaninov to Play His Rhapsody Here Next Week

The program for the Boston Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon (New Year's Day) and Saturday evening of next week will consist entirely of Russian music. It will begin with Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" and end with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade." In between will come, for the first time in Boston, the Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini for piano and orchestra, by Serge Rachmaninov. The soloist will be the eminent pianist-composer himself.

Koussevitsky, Boston Orchestra Acclaimed

By FRED J. LISSFELT

The matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Syria Mosque drew a capacity audience which accorded Koussevitsky the greatest ovation I can remember in our concert halls. Both he and the players had to respond repeatedly to the storm of applause, and never before has it been better deserved.

Tension broke at the end of Ravel's second suite to "Daphnis and Chloe," the original performance of which induced the French government to pay Koussevitsky its highest recognition for merit in the arts. There was the acme in skill as director, in displaying the ultimate possibilities of color, rhythm and tone in the modern orchestra.

The opening Handel Concerto Grosso in G minor displayed again the cold clarity of musical percepttion which this director can evoke from his players. In the prelude to "Lohengrin" for the first time I have heard a convincing tonal depicting of the miracle Richard Wagner tried to imply with the coming of the "Swan Knight." The Mendelssohn arrangement of his own Sherzo from the Octet Op. 20 was rather a weakling in robust company.

Koussevitsky's reading of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony must have been a surprise to many. Only in the opening theme could one sense the impetuous Russian musician: In straightforward German manner he read this beloved work and kept it quite clear of the maudlin sentiment most directors feel especially towards the Andante.

DELPHOS, O.
HERALD

DEC 19 1936

IS MEMBER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Louis H. Huber, Jr., formerly of Delphos, is a member of the New England Conservatory of Music Symphony orchestra, Boston, Mass., which broadcast a program of special Christmas music Saturday afternoon at 2:00 o'clock, EST, over the NBC network.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 24 1936

Boston Symphony Here Jan. 7

On its second New York visit of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky's direction, will play Arthur Foote's suite for strings; Clementi's symphony in D major, and Brahms's fourth symphony Thursday night, January 7, in Carnegie Hall. The program for Saturday afternoon, January 9, will include the music of Stravinsky's ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fée," MacDowell's second piano concerto, with Howard Goding as soloist, and Cesar Franck's symphony.

Note: — December clippings continued at beginning of month of January 1937 —

Ledr Dec. 27/36

Symphony in Holiday Mood

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA celebrated the Christmas season with concerts as profoundly interesting in program as they were exceptional in performance, offering Debussy's Music from "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien," and the Dvorak Concerto in B minor, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist.

The regular Friday afternoon concert, advanced to Thursday afternoon because of the holiday, was the first occasion of Piatigorsky's performance in Boston of Dvorak's Concerto.

Since the distinguished 'cellist's first appearance with the orchestra in 1931, his several performances have included the Schumann Concerto in A minor, the Haydn Concerto in D major, Cassado's transcription of the Mozart Horn Concerto, Berezowski's Concerto Lirico and Strauss' "Don Quixote." His incomparable reading of the latter score, which he has performed twice in Boston, is of course, far-famed.

* * *

PIATIGORSKY'S strong individuality as an artist is a point with which some will quarrel, many applaud, and none deny. It was, therefore, a matter of no small moment among his followers to see just what he would do with the Dvorak Concerto—interest in this far exceeding that which in other cases might be applied to the music itself.

For what Piatigorsky did, we can find no better word than unique. The Allegro was played, not allegro, but at various tempi in an effort to make interesting a movement which musically is somewhat lacking in this respect.

For an artist to take such liberties is bad, simply because it doesn't work. The performer is, after all, entirely subject to the composer, whether he likes it or not. No amount of embroidery on a poor idea will make it a good one—quite. If it were possible, Piatigorsky could do it, for the beauty of tone, the exquisite phrasing, the vitality which are his are unsurpassed in kind.

His playing exacts a breathless attention, each phrase seems to possess a penetrating significance, but while these qualities made of the Adagio ma non troppo a thing of unforgettable beauty, the Allegro was not resolved into completeness of musical form.

One could have desired no finer performance than that given the Finale: Allegro moderato.

The orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky's skillful baton, was in complete accord with the soloist throughout.

* * *

THE DEBUSSY music, with which Dr. Koussevitzky opened the program, was marvelously performed. The Cecelia Society (Arthur Fiedler, conductor) assisting in the performance, lent its best efforts. Olga Averino, singing the soprano solo, gave a sensative performance of the difficult score. The orchestra was superb.

The music itself is of the magic substance which was Debussy at his best.

Written around the Mystery Play of Gabriele d'Anunzio, the work was commissioned by the dancer Ida Rubinstein, and first performed in Parin in 1911.

It is written in five sections, "The Court of Lilies," "The Magic Dancer," "The Council of the False Gods," the "Broken Laurel," and "Paradise."

With what marvelous imagination Debussy has wrought this music, creating atmosphere, mood and color, combining Gregorian chants with Oriental melodies and rhythms, blending the austerity of Christian martyrdom with pagan poetry!

* * *

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF will be the distinguished soloist at the next regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday.

The Russian composer-pianist will be here in the first Boston performance of his Rhapsody for Piano and Orchestra on a theme of Paganini.

Dr. Koussevitzky will present an all-Russian program on this occasion.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS

Dec. 19/36

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS REPORT FINANCIAL DATA

ST. LOUIS, Dec. 18 (AP)—Cold statistics showed today symphonic music rides a big business.

America's 13 leading symphony orchestras, in their first consolidated financial statement, disclosed an annual combined budget of $4,346,500, and average of $334,346.

Managers of the orchestras, 12 of whom are meeting here, estimated, exclusive of summer seasons and radio broadcasts, more than 3,500,000 persons hear their 1100 musicians in 1200 concerts each year.

None of the orchestras is self-sustaining. Their annual combined earned income is $2,782,100, leaving a total deficit of $1,564,400, or an average of $120,339.

Box office and miscellaneous earned incomes range from a high of 86 per cent to a low of 35 per cent of the annual budget, with an average of 66 per cent for the group. The largest earned incomes were reported by the Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago orchestras.

Three of the orchestras meet deficits through endowment funds, the others being sustained by maintenance funds raised each year and, in a few cases, supplemented by special gifts.

Debussy Music in Prospect

~~Note on~~ "Saint Sebastian," to Be Presented at the Symphony Concerts

Trans. Dec. 23/36

Debussy's incidental music to Gabriel d'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," will be given its second pair of performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the regular concerts which fall on Thursday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week. Olga Averino will sing the soprano solos, the Cecilia Society the choral parts.

It was the "sexless grace" of Ida Rubinstein that first gave the Italian poet the idea of his drama. Bakst designed costumes and settings, and the self-styled "lazy" Debussy completed his score in two months of intense concentration. Miss Rubinstein played the part of the Saint at the first performance, just twenty-five years ago. Seldom given since, the work remains far more successful in the concert-room.

D'Annunzio's play is divided into five acts, each bearing a title. Thus, the first section, called "The Court of Lilies," begins with a prelude describing the exaltation of the Christian soul, proceeds with an exposition of the tortures of two Christian maidens chained to pillars. Sebastian, chief of the archers of Diocletian, encourages the sufferers by his ecstatic dance on the burning coals in which are mirrored both the pain and the joy of martyrdom. After a hymn glorifying the heavenly power, Sebastian shoots an arrow into the air. His holiness is proved by the failure of the missile to return to earth; and the act concludes with a vision of an angelic chorus and a proclamation of celestial joy.

"The Magic Chamber" is depicted in the prelude to the second act. Behind a mystic door are hidden magicians and astrologers whose esoteric truths decipher the future. Sebastian symbolically batters down the door. The new power of Christianity rises behind it. The music portrays the battle of Christ's teaching and heathenism. A young maiden whom Sebastian has converted is tortured to death.

The introduction to the third act is a brilliant fanfare for "The Council of False Gods." In the presence of the Emperor, Sebastian refuses his honors and mimes the ascent of Christ to Calvary. Not a word is spoken. It is to the music that the task is given, and only after several minutes is the chorus of endless suffering and limitless pity sounded. The actual martyrdom takes place in the fourth act, where Sebastian is bound to the cross while archers of his own troup fill him with arrows. Again the task of describing his pain and his spiritual resignation is left to the orchestra and chorus, and here it is, in "The Broken Laurel," that d'Annunzio's principal idea may be found, borrowed from the Renaissance poet, Veronica Gambara:

"I say unto you, I say unto you,
He that wounds me the more deeply, the more deeply loves me."

The fifth act pictures Sebastian's rising to Paradise. Chorus and orchestra suffice for the complete presentation. Particularly in this part of the work do we recognize the success of Debussy's intention to simplify his choral writing so that it may as nearly as possible attain to a pure movement at once the opposite of the harmonic and polyphonic writing in "Boris Godunoff" and "Die Meistersinger," respectively. Although both these works influenced him strongly, it is Wagner's "Parsifal" that has been most often chosen for comparison—Debussy's "Parsifal," it has been said, has never found its Bayreuth. Throughout, the most important part of the musical texture is given to the three harps and wind instruments.

* * *

The only other piece on this week's program will be the Violoncello Concerto of Dvorak with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist in the work that made his reputation in America. Not played here since 1917, the concerto is in the usual three movements that tradition has decreed for the form. It is at once symphonic and displayful in character.

G. H. L. S.

German Romantics Heard at Symphony

Weber, Schumann and Wagner, three German Romantic composers who were both very German and very Romantic—each in his own way—were represented on the second of the Tuesday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky yesterday in Symphony Hall.

The music, much of which in its early days may have been as "difficult" for the public as the most abstruse tonal concoctions of Stravinsky and Berg today, has by now taken on a mellow tinge for most of us, something that the Germans would call gemuetlich. The list began with Weber's "Oberon" Overture, proceeded to Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor and ended with three excerpts from the works of Richard of Bayreuth — "A Siegfried Idyl," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and the Overture to "Tannhaeuser." The Idyl was chosen with especial appropriateness for the holiday week since it was first played (and presented) before Cosima Wagner on Christmas Day, sixty-six years ago.

All of the numbers have appeared on recent programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Friday and Saturday concerts. There is thus as little reason for commenting in detail on the performances as there is to elucidate new opinions about thrice-familiar music. But it was a pleasure for the casual attendant at these Tuesday matinees to observe how relatively cheerful yesterday's concert was, in contrast with the more formal aspect of a Friday afternoon or a Saturday evening in the same place.

Especially in the performance of the Symphony one noted an easy-going air that was altogether welcome. Perhaps the playing did not reach quite the pitch of perfection the conductor and orchestra have commanded on other occasions, though there was little ground for complaint even on that score. But the performers seemed so agreeably relaxed that the music-making took on the most natural appearance in the world—and also the most natural sound. Schumann's prolixity presents notorious difficulties both for his interpreters and his listeners. But yesterday the whole Symphony seemed quite inevitable. One would not have erased a note. This was certainly the finest kind of tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians.

M. S.

Rachmaninov to Play His Rhapsody Here Next Week

The program for the Boston Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon (New Year's Day) and Saturday evening of next week will consist entirely of Russian music. It will begin with Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" and end with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade." In between will come, for the first time in Boston, the Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini for piano and orchestra, y Serge Rachmaninov. The soloist will be the eminent pianist-comoser himself.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

Dec. [illegible]

Philharmonic to Play Symphony Premiere

The Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra is to have the honor Thursday afternoon, Jan. 7, of giving the world premiere of a major symphony by one of the foremost of the younger modern composers.

It will be the Third Symphony by Nikolai Berezowsky, former member of the Kroll Sextet. Jose Iturbi will conduct.

The composer's personal friendship with Iturbi, plus the high regard in which he holds the local ensemble is said to have been responsible for the request to give the world premiere. Heretofore, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given the first performance of his works.

In addition to the

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

DEC 19 1936

BOSTON—Written more than a half-century ago, the second piano concerto of Edward McDowell, known to millions of music lovers as composer of "To A Wild Rose," may have been the real beginning of modern "jazz." This possibility was revealed today by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky after his Boston Symphony orchestra, with Howard Goding as soloist, had revived the concerto in tribute to the 75th birthday anniversary of MacDowell, who died in 1908. "It is like jazz," said Koussevitsky, pointing out that the composition's second movement contained syncopated rhythm and blue notes—which he referred to as dissonances—similar to those found in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

SUN-TELEGRAPH

Koussevitsky, Boston Orchestra Acclaimed

By FRED J. LISSFELT

The matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Syria Mosque drew a capacity audience which accorded Koussevitsky the greatest ovation I can remember in our concert halls. Both he and the players had to respond repeatedly to the storm of applause, and never before has it been better deserved.

Tension broke at the end of Ravel's second suite to "Daphnis and Chloe," the original performance of which induced the French government to pay Koussevitsky its highest recognition for merit in the arts. There was the acme in skill as director, in displaying the ultimate possibilities of color, rhythm and tone in the modern orchestra.

The opening Handel Concerto Grosso in G minor displayed again the cold clarity of musical percepttion which this director can evoke from his players. In the prelude to "Lohengrin" for the first time I have heard a convincing tonal depicting of the miracle Richard Wagner tried to imply with the coming of the "Swan Knight." The Mendelssohn arrangement of his own Sherzo from the Octet Op. 20 was rather a weakling in robust company.

Koussevitsky's reading of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony must have been a surprise to many. Only in the opening theme could one sense the impetuous Russian musician. In straightforward German manner he read this beloved work and kept it quite clear of the maudlin sentiment most directors feel especially towards the Andante.

DELPHOS, O.
HERALD

DEC 19 1936

IS MEMBER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Louis H. Huber, Jr., formerly of Delphos, is a member of the New England Conservatory of Music Symphony orchestra, Boston, Mass., which broadcast a program of special Christmas music Saturday afternoon at 2:00 o'clock, EST, over the NBC network.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 24 1936

Boston Symphony Here Jan. 7

On its second New York visit of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will play Arthur Foote's suite for strings; Clementi's symphony in D major, and Brahms's fourth symphony Thursday night, January 7, in Carnegie Hall. The program for Saturday afternoon, January 9, will include the music of Stravinsky's ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fée," MacDowell's second piano concerto, with Howard Goding as soloist, and Cesar Franck's symphony.

Note: — December clippings continued at beginning of month of January 1937 —

MUSIC

Herald Dec. 25

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 10th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Olga Averino, soprano, and the Cecilia Society Chorus (trained by Arthur Fiedler) assisted in the first part of the program. Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, was the soloist in the last half. The program was as follows:

Debussy
Music from "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien," mystery play by Gabriele d' Annunzio.
Dvorak
Concerto for 'cello in B minor Op. 104.

When Gabriele d'Annunzio began to write his play about Saint Sebastien he took a house in France and furnished it with objects about the Christian martyr and works of art that would put him in the right state of mind. Even the air was subtly perfumed with incense. Moreover he studied the archaic side of French letters, the "Fabliaux" and the "Chansons de geste" among others. It is impossible for an audience listening to Debussy's music to be so saturated with atmosphere, but it is advisable that the music be contemplated in a rather different spirit than is brought to bear on the ordinary symphonic program.

Philip Hale believed that it was impossible to enjoy the music away from the stage. Others have felt that the stage is quite unnecessary and that the music can stand alone. It is certainly true that the very small amount of d'Annunzio's text which is set leaves one hopelessly in the dark as far as the action of the drama is concerned. But the play is itself undramatic and is extraordinarily hard to read, not only because of the archaisms but also because of the unrelieved mood of mystical exaltation.

No doubt it is this that makes Debussy's music seem monotonous, although actually it is contrasted with great subtlety and varied with infinite resource. It might, as a concession to the audience, be almost better to leave one movement out. But which? No, it is worth listening to as a whole, even if the mind occasionally wanders during the performance. For Debussy has here captured the feeling of the past and the sorrows of religious martyrdom, as surely as Wolf succeded in some of the songs from the "Spanisches Liederbuch."

One could almost say that the words don't matter and that it is only the penetration of Debussy's music into the emotions of spiritual exaltation and pity and sorrow that counts. The beauty is unquestionably austere; and naturally Debussy did not compose music about a Christian martyr that would have done duty for a faun or for the strange voluptuousness of the "Chansons de Bilitis." As an artist he was giving voice to the thoughts—in music—that the play had inspired in him. When he had words to set he did so with unfailing artistry. But the music is his own and must in the end be considered apart from the dubious qualities of d'Annunzio's play, just as the opera "Peleas et Melisande" is beyond Maeterlinck.

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted an exceedingly fine performance of this moving and strange score. The chorus, which had been well trained by Mr. Fiedler, sang splendidly. Mme. Averino, always an artist of exceptional feeling and taste, sang the difficult music allotted to her superbly. The orchestra played with the utmost sensitiveness for the instrumental beauties of the music. It was also wise to place the Saint Sebastian music first on a long program, where it could be heard to best advantage.

Dvorak's Concerto is obvious music of considerable lyric charm but with it boring moments. The conclusions in particular are interminably prolonged. Mr. Piatigorsky played this work with consummate skill and brought out every possible effect. We only question the peculiar muted tone of his instrument, which gave the impression that he was playing from another planet. It is not an unpleasant sensation in listening, for the tone is lovely to hear. And the artist's ability is extraordinary.

The concert will be repeated tomorrow night. Next week Sergei Rachmaninoff will be the soloist in his own Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini. The other works on the program will be Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN

Dec. 19/36

The Boston Symphony orchestra observed the 75th birthday anniversary yesterday of the late Edward MacDowell by playing the noted American composer's Piano Concerto No. 2 with Howard Goding as soloist.

MUSIC

Globe Dec. 25

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The afternoon concert this week by the Boston Symphony was put ahead to Thursday, since Christmas Day is essentially a home-and-fireside holiday. But Dr Koussevitzky made no concessions to convention in a week when casual concertgoers for the most part are occupied with other concerns than music. He assembled one of the most novel programs of the season in which were paired Debussy's music to the play of D'Annunzio, "The Martyrdom of St Sebastian" and the Cello Concerto of Dvorak.

This late score by Debussy is almost never heard nowadays; it is to the initiative of Dr Koussevitzky that Bostonians are in debt for the first complete concert performance here in 1930. The Dvorak Concerto has been missing from Boston Symphony programs for nearly 20 years.

Gregor Piatigorsky, young Russian virtuoso, played with his customary dazzling technic and consummate artistry the solo portion of the Concerto. The solos for soprano in "The Martyrdom of St Sebastian" were sung by Olga Averino; the chorus was that of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler.

Difference of opinion has persisted regarding the quality of Debussy's score. Some profess to find it a composition made to order, others consider Debussy to have here created the great masterpiece of his later years. For one listener the truth lies between these extremes.

"The Martyrdom of St Sebastian" surely does not represent the Debussy of the Nocturnes, "Pelleas and Melisande," or "Le Mer." He abandoned his subtly evocative orchestra of these previous masterpieces for a style of little color and of austere musical thought. In a sense "The Martyrdom of St Sebastian" is among Debussy's least characteristic work. It may be a graphic tonal counterpart to the mood of D'Annunzio's play when the whole is given in stage performance (though to this reviewer the text is hardly more than decadent fustian), but in concert performance the score must rest upon its merits purely as music.

For inordinate length and occasional monotony Debussy may justly be reproached, even if he was bound by the text. The instrumental preludes are by far the most impressive portion. Here Debussy was in his real element, dealing with a medium of which he was a master, and here he revealed more of his own individuality. The exotic style of the soprano solos does exercise a peculiar fascination, but they are pallid when compared to Debussy's orchestra. The writing for chorus lacks flavor, save for the "Seraphic" chorus of Part 1 and that of the Women of Byblos.

Mme Averino seemed to be singing through a cold. Nevertheless her tones were clear and she delivered her part with excellent taste. The choral singing was adequate. Dr Koussevitzky's interpretation bespoke how zealously he had prepared the work.

After "The Martyrdom of St Sebastian," the Dvorak Cello Concerto was nothing less than exhilarating, paradoxical as this may seem. A pronounced racial tang pervades all three movements, as if Dvorak had been intent upon fitting folk melodies to a sophisticated style.

The rhythms are lively, the melodies infectious if not distinguished, and the whole work testifies to Dvorak's attainments as a technical craftsman. Harmonic and orchestral Wagnerisms crop up, but for that matter few creative musicians of Wagner's time were not affected by the overpowering genius of Richard I.

Mr Piatigorsky's virtues are too well known by reason of his several appearances with this orchestra to need retelling. Again he astonished by the agility of his playing, his silken tone, and the mingled elegance and vitality of his style.

Next week Sergei Rachmaninoff will be soloist in the first Boston performances of his own Rhapsody for Piano and Orchestra on a theme by Paganini. The program will be wholly Russian and will include the "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-fantasia of Tchaikovsky and the "Scheherazade" by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

C. W. D.

AMARILLO, TEX.
NEWS

DEC 18 1936

OIL MAN KILLED

SAN MARCOS, Dec. 17 (U.P.)—John S. Storey, 40, Lockhart oil man, was found dead last night beside his wrecked automobile, seven miles west of San Marcos.

In pre-war days Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was both conductor and financial backer of his own symphony orchestra in Russia.

DEBUSSY'S MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Post. — Dec. 25/36

Cecilia Society and Olga Averino Assist in Work

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When a pair of Symphony Concerts fall in the vicinity of Christmas the conductor may do something about it or he may not. Dr. Koussevitzky, who has tried both courses, held this year to the latter, unless there was in his mind some subtle connection between Christmas and Debussy's music for the "mystery play" of Gabriele d'Annunzio, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." The only other number on a still very long programme is Dvorak's 'Cello Concerto, played, and remarkably, by Gregor Piatigorsky.

LAST HEARD IN 1917

Debussy's music in its complete form, that is to say, with chorus and soprano soloist, was first given us by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1930. Dvorak's concerto was last heard here in 1917. It was possible to feel yesterday that it would be better to hear the concerto every seven years and the incidental every 20 than to get them the other way around, but one does not want to live with either.

We seasoned concert-goers are hard to suit. If a composer shuns the obvious as painfully as did Debussy in his later days, we dub his music precious; if he falls into it as readily as does Dvorak in his less distinguished work, we say it is banal. But, at least, Dvorak, here and elsewhere, has what Philip Hale euphemistically called "entrails," a quality which is conspicuous by its absence in this score of Debussy.

Seems All Background

For a time this St. Sebastian music, with its mystical harmonies, its flavor now churchly, now near-Eastern, its beautiful scoring, particularly for the all-important wind instruments, is soothing, even pleasantly stimulating, to hear, but one cannot subsist entirely upon chord progressions and color, upon mood and atmosphere. One misses the salient phrase, the characterizing melody. Of the two kinds of dramatic music that which embodies the drama and that which serves as background to it, Debussy's, for all the composer's effort to the contrary, falls more nearly into the latter class than into the former. And, when all is said and done, d'Annunzio's poetry, with its curious blend of paganism and Christianity, is decadent, and the music of Debussy is like unto it.

Neither poet nor composer may be accused of insincerity. Rather, in the case of both, preciosity long cultivated had become a natural speech.

The ventual monotony of Debussy's music was largely mitigated by its superb performance at the hands of the orchestra. The chorus and soloist have less grateful tasks, but the Cecilia Society, in the first instance, and Olga Averino, in the second, acquitted themselves well.

In turn, the Concerto of Dvorak was reanimated by Mr. Piatigorsky, who in the past has devoted himself here to more important music, and by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. The audience applauded Debussy's music, or its performers, warmly, and those who had not withdrawn before the end of the Concerto stormily showed their appreciation of Mr. Piatigorsky.

ATLANTA, GA.
CONSTITUTION

DEC 27 1936

Forgotten Clementi Symphony.

Echoes of a long-forgotten musical duel in Vienna, in which Muzio Clementi fought with Mozart, the composer, for premiership in his art—"the two improvising on the pianoforte, playing at sight and in duets"—are recalled in the current issue of Time magazine, which reports "the first United States performance of a major work by an almost-forgotten eighteenth century maestro," namely, the presentation by the Boston Symphony orchestra of Clementi's second symphony, in Symphony Hall, Boston. Conductor Koussevitzky and his men played this beautiful music so beautifully that a capacity audience came near breaking a house rule against applause between movements.

Two years ago Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-conductor, went to Washington to do some musical sleuthing. With great difficulty he reconstructed one Clementi symphony from a number of sketches and notes. A "Great National Symphony" which, surprisingly for its time (1824), contains British folk themes and "God Save the King" in polyphonic elaboration, Casella put aside for future investigation. Easiest job was to take a "Symphony in D Major," most of which was in the Library of Congress, combine it with an introduction and allegro in the same key in the British Museum, pronounce the whole the "Second Symphony" of Clementi. This was the one Dr. Koussevitzky performed last week.

"Boston critics found the 'Second Symphony' fresh, charming, dashing. Wrote Critic Alexander Williams, of the Boston Herald: 'Mr. Casella may have wished to please Mussolini by finding a great Italian symphonist for the grandeur of Rome. Instead, and of greater importance, he has enriched the world.'

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

* * *

Some Musical Digging

No one else but beginners at the piano seem to remember Muzio Clementi, contemporary of Beethoven, a much-traveled musician in his day, whose manuscripts were scattered and rarely printed. Alfredo Casella, one of the leaders in Italian music of our day, who is soon to be soloist with our Art Society, has taken pains to assemble some of these lost works, and traveling from museum to museum, finally has pieced together some four of Clementi's symphonies. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just played one of them at a home concert.

* * *

Camille Nickerson's Creole melodies are soon to be published and doubtless will cause as much of a new movement in folk music as the Negro spirituals. This Washington composer sang and played from her treasures recently and impressed every musician deeply.

Herself a Creole, she has gone to the Louisiana plantations and listened to her people singing in the fields and on the wharves. As a composer she has set these tunes with excellent piano accompaniments so that the untrained musician may help make them popular.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 31 1936

Orchestra Plays Clementi Music At Town Hall

Stassevitch, in Second of Three Concerts, Directs Casella's Arrangements

Beethoven Piece Heard

Also Liadoff, Roger-Ducasse; Schola Cantorum Sings

By Jerome D. Bohm

The second of a series of three orchestral concerts was given under the direction of Paul Stassevitch in Town Hall last night. The focal point of interest in the program was a symphony in C major by Clementi arranged by his countryman, Casella. This work, like the one in D major which recently was played in Boston by Mr. Koussevitsky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and which will be heard in Carnegie Hall next week when the latter organization plays there, is one of the four symphonies which were found among a number of Clementi manuscripts belonging originally to the English musicologist William H. Cummings and which were auctioned off after his death in London in 1917 and were acquired for the Library of Congress through the endeavors of Carl Engel.

These four symphonies were by no means intact when discovered. According to the French musicologist, Georges St. Foix, who brought them to the attention of Casella, they were "a jumble and chaos of sheets." It was part of Mr. Casella's task to assemble and piece together the fragments.

The C major symphony heard on this occasion should have been ascribed to Mr. Casella rather than to his famous predecessor. For while the themes of its four movements indubitably bear the imprint of the century in which they were created, they have been welded into a symphony which would have astounded but scarcely have pleased its original conceiver. If Casella had contented himself with indulging in formal modifications which would not have occurred to Clementi, he might be pardoned. But the tasteless manner in which he has orchestrated the older master's essentially naive matter, investing it with noisy fanfares from three trombones, trumpet and horn, in the best music-hall manner, added to the frequently heavy-handed over-laden employment of the strings, recall his equally infelicitous transcription for orchestra of Bach's chaconne.

If much of this music, especially the minuet, parts of the andante con moto and the final allegro vivace, still provides considerable enjoyment, it is because Clementi's ideas triumph in spite of Casella's impious "modernization."

The program was opened with a version for string orchestra of Beethoven's "Grosse Fuge," Op. 133, originally penned as part of a string quartet and brought in the second half, Liadoff's "Enchanted Lake" and "Baba-Yaga," Roger-Ducasse's "Sarabande," in which a small chorus from the Schola Cantorum participated, and the overture to Weinberger's "Schwanda." An audience of good size attended.

CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS

DEC 19 1936

MacDowell's Widow to Hear His Concerto

By United Press

BOSTON, Dec. 19—A gray-haired widow was in Boston today to hear one of the world's greatest symphony orchestras play her husband's second piano concerto in tribute to his 75th birthday anniversary.

Mrs. Mariam Nevins MacDowell, 75, widow of Edward MacDowell, America's best-known classical composer, will attend tonight's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"I am looking forward eagerly to hearing what I know will be a magnificent performance," she said. "I can't thank Conductor Serge Koussevitzky enough for reviving my husband's concerto."

Brown-eyed Mrs. MacDowell has been traveling about the country since her husband's death. She is an accomplished pianist, and plays and lectures on her husband's works to help maintain the MacDowell colony, which she founded at Peterboro, N. H., in his memory. MacDowell was 23 when he composed the piano concerto.

10

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Yesterday afternoon was a Romanticists' interlude at the second Tuesday concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Weber of the "Oberon" Overture; Schumann of the Fourth Symphony, and Richard Wagner with the "Siegfried Idyll," the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and the overture to "Tannhaeuser" provided a matinee of glowing and rhapsodic musical speech.

The word "speech" is not brought in so casually as first though might suggest, for this trinity of German romanticists did not create patterns of sound so much as they really spoke from their hearts to the hearts of all who listen. When their communications are carried on such gorgeous sonority as that of the Boston Symphony's woods, strings and brass, there can be no mistaking the soaring imaginative quality of what they had to say.

The present age is in respects directly connected with human nature, probably no different from the past: we shall always have with us adamant souls who profess distaste for music which was intended to be lushly emotional. The rest of us can without undue concern about our artistic salvation sit back and enjoy what appeals to us, even if that be a category of music despised by those who worship at the shrine of all that is up to the minute.

Whether or not so designed, the program in fact contained a Christmas gift—the "Siegfried Idyll," which Wagner composed as a present to his wife, Cosima, for the Christmas of 1870. It was remarkably well played.

An ear directed vigilantly for the slightest of shortcomings might have perceived a few in the other two items by Wagner. But on the whole the afternoon was one of prolonged beauty. There was no greater moment, perhaps, than in the hushed rapture of the early portion of the "Forest Murmurs," when the marvelously expressive bass clarinet of Mr Mimart was heard above a string ensemble whose radiant tone almost defies description.

C. W. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

~~TELEGRAM~~

Landmark

DEC 31 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dartmouth's current musical season will reach its climax next Tuesday night when the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra appears in Webster Hall at Hanover, N. H. in the second concert of the 1936-37 Concert Series. Serge Koussevitzky, who has conducted the Boston Symphony for 13 consecutive seasons, will direct the full 110-piece orchestra in its Dartmouth performance.

Tuesday night's program will be made up of Haydn, Wagner, Sibelius and Strauss. It will open at 8:45 with Haydn's "Symphony in B-Flat No. 102" which is the ninth of the famous London series. Then will follow the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the tone poem "Don Juan" by Strauss. Following the intermission the orchestra will play Sibelius' "Symphony No. 5 in E-Flat Major, Opus 82."

In addition to the few reserved-seat tickets available for the Boston Symphony concert, a limited number of general-admission tickets will be on sale this week end and early next week. Tickets may be obtained at either Storrs' Bookstore in Hanover or the Webster hall box-office.

One of the three great symphony orchestras in this country, the Boston Symphony is now enjoying its 56th successive season and its 13th under the celebrated Russian conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky. Founded in 1881 by the late Major Henry L. Higginson, the orchestra has grown steadily in artistry and popular esteem, holding at present a preeminent position among world-famous orchestras. Its conductors over a span of years have included George Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud, and Pierre Monteux.

—0—

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

DEC 30 1936

RESIDES IN CINCINNATI

MILTON ROSEN.

A composer residing in Cincinnati will be given a musical introduction to Cincinnati Symphony audiences at the concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday night in Music Hall, when the orchestra, under the direction of Vladimir Bakaleinikoff, plays Milton Rosen's "Fantasie Americana." The composition is for piano and orhcestra. John Quincy Bass will be at the piano.

The work was given its premiere about 18 months ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At that time the Boston Globe said of it: "The America of this fantasy is found in the turbulent Forties of Manhattan; jazzy, blatant, and full of vitality, eternally fascinating even to that rare specimen, a native New Yorker. Mr. Rosen is skilled in writing for orchestra; he reveals a gift for melody, and a flair for striking harmonies that could be slightly refined without destroying their modern character. The best part of the work—a lively dance section in the last of three connected movements — shows plainly that Mr. Rosen feels the musical spirit of the time, a lyrical gayety that has persisted through depression."

Rosen was born in Yonkers, N. Y., in 1906, and educated in the schools of New York. He attended, for his musical education, Damrosch's Institute of Musical Art, which was subsequently merged with the Juilliard School. He studied also with Pietro Floridia, who was at one time connected with one of Cincinnati's leading musical schools. Floridia also was the teacher of such well-known musical personalities as Ferde Grofe and Nat Shilkret.

Rosen started out as a violinist, playing with various New York ensembles, but he soon became interested in arranging music and original composition. Radio claimed him in the capacity of arranger and composer, and he became associated with various New York stations. Nearly two years ago he was brought to Cincinnati by the Crosley Radio Corporation, with which he has been associated ever since.

"Fantasie Americana" was composed in 1933. It was given a reading in 1934 by Leo Bargin of the National Symphony Orchestra, but had its premiere the following year at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Bakaleinikof became interested in it last summer and directed a performance of it at the National Music Camp, Interlochen, Mich.

Rosen has to his credit a previous orchestral work in the modern manner, which has been quite successful. It is called "A Columnist Suite," for violin, piano, and orchestra. Its four movements are marked thus. 1, tempo di Walter Winchell; 2, tempo di Aircaster (Mike Porter); 3, tempo di Mark Hellinger, and 4, tempo di O. O. McIntyre.

The accompanying picture was snapped while Rosen was at work on a new composition.

TRIBUNE
Sanford Me.
DEC 31 1936

Minute Biography

Mme. Cora Pierce Richmond

In Boston, New York, Paris and London—in Berlin, too—in fact, in any large city when there is a musical group, one is sure to find a protege of Sanford's Mme. Cora Pierce Richmond, whose pupils have graduated from the Richmond School and have blazed a musical trail across the world.

Mrs. Richmond, often affectionately called "The Grand Lady of Maine's Musical World," has kept up the family tradition by devoting her life to music.

She was born in New Bedford, Mass., of musical parents, Thomas Warren and Mary Anne Besse Pierce. She spent her early life in Middleboro, Mass., where she laid a solid foundation for a musical career by singing solos in Boston churches and giving concerts.

In 1914 she accepted the position as head of the voice department of the Acadia University, and for nine years her work in the Provinces was far-reaching.

For 15 years she was identified with the late Arthur J. Hubbard, noted Boston voice teacher. She studied under him for a short period and then assisted him teaching during summers at Wolfville, N. S.

Since coming to Maine, Mme. Richmond has discovered and taught some of the best voices before the public today. Since 1922 when she opened a school in Sanford, the Madame has accomplished brilliant work, foremost of which was the establishment and development of the Richmond Glee Club, considered the outstanding musical group in the state.

Mrs. Richmond was paid a singular honor last June when she was elected general chairman of the first Musical Festival of the Federated Music Clubs of Maine. The two-day program, presented before capacity audiences, attracted music lovers from all sections of New England.

The music director is one of five sisters, all of whom are prominent in musical circles. Mrs. Dora Leonard of Stamford, Conn., is organist and director of the choir in one of the Rockefeller churches, as well as a prominent teacher of piano. Mrs. Ida Posselt of Medford, Mass., is a piano teacher and widow of Emil Posselt, who was concert violinist with Mme. Melba and who came to this country from Germany to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Maud Allen, a contralto, made her debut in motion pictures recently and is claiming the attention of many Hollywood impressarios. Miss Grace Gordon Pierce is the music director of the State Colleges of Massachusetts.

The sisters have had colorful careers, their names being internationally known. During the World War General Pershing wired for Mrs. Allen to come to France to sing for the soldiers, in company with Tom Steele, tenor, and Vera Barstow, violinist. Following the war she organized her own company, the famous Maud Allen Concert Company. The seven children of Mrs. Posselt are all music teachers, including pianists, violinists, 'cellists and vocalists. The youngest daughter is the famous Ruth Posselt, violinist, who recently signed a contract to appear for six years under the management of the Haensel and Jones of Columbia Concerts Corporation. Miss Pierce represented the City of Boston and consulted on school music with the late Edward Elgar in Lucerne, Switzerland at a recent music conference.

Mme. Richmond is the widow of Eben Algier Richmond of North Middleboro, Mass., who died in 1911. She has one son, Lysander, and two grandsons, Lysander, Jr., and Clark Richmond of Calais.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ~~TELEGRAM~~ News
DEC 31 1936

Boston Symphony Orchestra Second Concert Tues. Eve.

Serge Koussevitsky Conducto 110 Piece Orchestra At Webster Hall

Dartmouth's current musical season will reach its climax next Tuesday night when the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra appears in Webster Hall in the second concert of the 1936-37 Concert Series. Serge Koussevitsky, who has conducted the Boston Symphony for 13 consecutive seasons will direct the full 110-piece orchestra in its Dartmouth performance.

Tuesday night's program will be made up of Haydn, Wagner, Sibelius, and Straus. It will open at 8:45 wit Haydn's "Symphony in B-Flat, No 102" which is the ninth of the famou London series. Then will follow the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the tone poem "Don Juan" by Strauss Following the intermission the Orchestra will play Sibelius' 'Symphony No. 5 in E-Flat Major, Opus 82."

In addition to the few reserved-seat tickets available for the Boston Symphony concert, a limited number of general-admission tickets will also be on sale this week-end and early next week. Reserved seats are priced at $2.50, general admission at $1.50. Both may be obtained at either Storrs' Bookstore in Hanover or the Webster Hall box-office.

One of the three great symphony orchestras in this country, the Boston Symphony is now enjoying its 56th successive season and its 13th under the celebrated Russian conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky. Founded in 1881 by the late Major Henry L. Higginson, the Orchestra has grown steadily in artistry and popular esteem, holding at present a preeminent position among world-famous orchestras. Its conductors over a span of years have included George Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud, and Pierre Monteux.

Month of January 1937

(See this month for left-over December clippings.)

14

PATHETIC PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Post — Jan. 2

Rachmaninoff's Illness Causes Change in List

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is seldom enough that the programme of a Boston Symphony Concert is subjected to an 11th hour change, but one of those rare occurrences took place yesterday afternoon and will affect also the concert of this evening. To come to the point, Sergei Rachmaninoff was to have played at this pair of concerts his own "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini" for piano and orchestra, as yet unknown here, but sudden illness kept him in New York. For the Rhapsody Dr. Koussevitzky substituted the "Pathetic" Symphony of Tchaikovsky, and that composer's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," with which the original programme began, was abandoned. Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" remained as closing number.

SYMPHONY WELCOMED

In the heyday of their popularity the presence of both the "Pathetique" and "Scheherazade" in a single concert would have smacked of the extravagant and excessive—like the fabled "Tom" show that boasted "two Uncle Toms, two Little Evas and two mirth-provoking Topsys." It was interesting to note yesterday that whereas the symphony made very nearly the impression that it always has made, particularly when Dr. Koussevitsky has been the conductor, the symphonic suite did not bring down the house in quite the old-time fashion, although the performance was again one that few, if any, orchestras and conductors could duplicate.

When the Pop Concerts first aspired to the finale and later to the other movements of "Scheherazade," one said that these concerts were coming up in the world. Some day when the suite appears at the Symphony Concerts we will say that they are coming down.

Rimsky Seems Pallid

Yesterday merely to hear this music was not quite enough; it would have gone better with a stein of beer or a glass of wine. Dr. Koussevitzky is reported to have rejected a certain familiar composition on the ground that it was "garden music." And that is what "Scheherzade," brilliant and original as it is, is fast coming to be. And why? Not because its melodies have wholly lost their charm, its colors all their freshness, but because it suited Rimsky's purpose, or his taste, to eschew in this work both polyphony, save in the most elementary sense, and that which musicians call development.

The melodies are stated and repeated and repeated again with little change save in their orchestral dress. And resplendent as that dress still is, we have become accustomed to even richer hues. The orchestral palette of Ravel, for example, as in "Daphnis" or "La Valse," makes that of Rimsky, once hailed as the greatest colorist of them all, seem almost pallid by comparison.

Sixth Will Live

Color in music is one of the things that of and by itself wears least well; and patheticism—to use once more a technical term—is another. Fortunately for Tchaikovsky there is a good deal more than patheticism in his Sixth Symphony. If the second and fourth movements are constructed somewhat simple, the first and third are written with a mastery, a command of symphonic means that might well have aroused the envy of Brahms, who ac[illegible]y had no great liking for the music [illegible] Russian contemporary. [illegible]sed, it is the formal strength of [illegible] movements, rather than the emo[illegible] content of the music here and there, that will keep the "Path[illegible]e" alive; that will cause it to out[illegible] the Fourth Symphony and the [illegible]. So much for prophecy.

LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

DEC 31 1936

RACHMANINOFF TOO ILL TO APPEAR IN BOSTON

NEW YORK, Dec. 31-AP-Serge Rachmaninoff, pianist and composer, is ill with a cold, his agents announced today, and has cancelled an appearance in Boston with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on advice of his physician.

He is expected to be able to play with the Philadelphia orchestra in New York Jan. 5.

MUSIC

Globe

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

An eleventh hour change had to be made in the Symphony program this week because Sergei Rachmaninoff is sick in New York. The distinguished Russian pianist and composer was to have been soloist in the first Boston performance of his own Rhapsody On a Theme of Paganini. Dr Koussevitsky substituted for this score and the Overture-fantasia "Romeo and Juliet" of Tchaikovsky, the latter's "Pathetic" Symphony. The second half of the list remained unaltered, and consisted of the "Scheherazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakov. Thus Dr Koussevitsky kept to his original intention of a wholly Russian program.

The "Pathetic" Symphony had not been chosen for the "regular" concerts for nearly two years. The time was ripe for another hearing, because the "Pathetic" is Tchaikovsky's most unusual symphony, and no matter what the present fortunes of Peter Illitch with the Brahmins, his position in musical history remains unique.

There has not yet been anyone like Tchaikovsky. The cynics would answer: "There couldn't be, without stagnation of the art." In a sense they are right, for Tchaikovsky was not an innovator whose accomplishments could be taken up by subsequent composers, developed and absorbed as part of the apparatus of composition.

Tchaikovsky would probably be entitled to extended consideration in a monograph on "Misunderstood Composers." Not that the public has misunderstood him, but the sophisticates who dislike to be carried out of their self-contained serenity have Tchaikovsky's music in general has not endured because of formal construction, novel harmonic or contrapuntal details, but because of his rich gift of melody and his unrestrained emotionalism.

As an expression of personal grief the "Pathetic" has no equal. Tchaikovsky was extremely sensitive; gloom often was his cloak and anguish his lot; he was tormented inwardly and he sensed an impending dismal fate. He wept often and since he was an artist he wept publicly and prodigiously. Now many of us experience this unpleasantness from time to time, and if we are subject to the power of music we recognize here an artistic sublimation of these emotions. That is probably why we like Tchaikovsky.

Others of sterner fiber consider Tchaikovsky's acknowledged sorrow to be unhealthy; from this source—and the fact that Tchaikovsky was not a great technician—has likely come the sneering lack of esteem in which he is held today by some musicians and blase concert-goers.

Even so, the "Pathetic" has its own points of analytical interest, though it may yield to the Fifth for unity and pure musical value. Few would dispute that in his last musical testament Tchaikovsky triumphantly ignored the requirements of conventional symphonic form.

Yesterday's performance might have had, with more rehearsal, added polish. But conceivably there could not have been greater intensity without any suggestion of theatrical overemphasis. Dr Koussevitzky's present way with this composer is no less dignified than moving.

As usual, Rimsky's four gorgeous pictures out of the "Arabian Nights" received superb treatment. The instrumental tone was fabulous, especially the strings. Dr Koussevitzky's interpretation was more than sympathetic; it positively glowed. In just such fashion should the music of Rimsky-Korsakov be played, for he was a preeminent painter of tonal pictures, and a master of Orient story-telling.

Next week the orchestra goes tour. The Boston concerts of J 15 and 16 will be conducted b Dimitri Mitropoulos, who returns as guest during Dr Koussevitzky's mid-season vacation. C. W. D.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

DEC 23 1936

News Views

By CLEVELAND RODGERS

BROOKLYNITES are naturally pleased by the successful opening of the opera in Manhattan and look forward to the improved productions to be seen here. It is no secret that this community has plenty of genuine music lovers who welcome the opportunity to hear good performances.

It is important, however, for Brooklynites to show their appreciation in a substantial way. The forthcoming appearances at the Academy of the Boston Symphony will provide such an opportunity. Unless more support is assured we are in danger of losing this best of symphony offerings in the years to come.

Opens at MUSIC

Jan

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows:

Tchaikovsky
Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic"
Rimsky-Korsakov
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade"

One of the strangest things about contemporary taste in the arts is the abiding affection for the works of Tchaikovsky. Even a brisk modernist like Stravinsky has room in his heart for Tchaikovsky and can write "Le Baiser de la Fee" as a tribute to the great Russian. Furthermore the public likes Tchaikovsky at his gloomiest and will follow him gladly while he analyzes in terms of music every nook and cranny of his desolation. If you ask a majority of yesterday's audience to attend a performance of Ibsen's "Ghosts," they will tell you frankly that they only go to the theater for amusement. Yet Tchaikovsky is never too doleful for them.

The Pathetic Symphony is nearly everybody's music. There are those who—through some personal reaction, some feeling about music that is difficult to define—cannot admire this music and listen to it without being moved. We must admit that we are in sympathy with that small minority. But there is no need to make a virtue out of a deficiency, and yesterday was the time for those who love the Pathetic Symphony. Philip Hale wrote of it: "The somber eloquence of the Pathetic, its pages of recollected joys fled forever, its wild gayety quenched by the thought of the inevitable end, its mighty lamentation—these are overwhelming and shake the soul." Yesterday those souls that were ready must have indeed been shaken, for the performance was splendid.

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" is a storehouse of delights for the ear, of shrewdly calculated effects. It is perhaps music of which one can tire, but it is also music to which one comes back only to realize beauties that have been missed. As with Tchaikovsky, even if the sentiment is at times distasteful to you, there can be no denying the vitality that is in the music.

It is truly marvellous the way that Rimsky-Korsakov works up the climax of the theme, which rings in one's ears for hours afterwards, for trumpets and trombones in the second movement. And with what resource does he vary his melodies, now bringing them out by the instrumentation, now burying them under a glittering shower of harmony! The Suite is a wholly successful experiment in the glamorous and the exotic.

Yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky again secured a superb performance. It is a privilege to listen to the excellent solo playing, not only by Mr. Burgin, but by the wood-winds and brass as well. The great orchestrators among the composers, such as Rimsky-Korsakov and Ravel, have been prodigal with opportunities for solo playing. An orchestra like the Boston Symphony is therefore heard to particular advantage in their works. This is as good a time as any to comment on the extraordinary beauty of the playing by the woodwind section of our orchestra. Their artistry is astonishing and a never failing source of delight to those who listen for it.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. The 12th regular concerts will be given on Jan. 15 and 16, and Dimitri Mitropoulos will be the guest conductor.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

1936

Good Radio Music

BY JAMES THRASHER

Two symphony orchestras are among the next 24 hours' offerings, along with Thursday night's lavish variety bill. They are the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at 7 o'clock tonight on the NBC-Blue network, and the Cincinnati Symphony over WFBM at 1:45 p. m. tomorrow.

Of particular interest to local listeners will be the latter concert, since it features Gregor Piatigorsky, renowned Russion 'cellist, who is to be the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra's next soloist. He is to be heard in the Schumann A Minor Concerto. Eugene Goossens' selections include the Beethoven Eight Symphony, Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" and the Prelude to Act III of Wagner's "Lohengrin."

The Bostonians' concert, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be another of the Harvard University subscription series. In the hour's broadcast portion we shall hear Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture and the Second Piano Concerto of MacDowell. The soloist is not announced.

To revert to the Strauss tone poem, it was heard on a recent New York Philharmonic - Symphony broadcast. This was the first hearing of the work in these parts, broadcast or otherwise, in a long time. Its full title, you may recall, is "Don Quixote, Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character," Op. 58.

Cervantes' famous knight has been the subject of both comic and serious operas, but this is his only symphonic version. The solo cello sings the knight's part, while the viola gives a musical portrayal of the faithful Sancho Panza. It is a lengthy work-theme, 10 variations and a finale.

What's Going On in the Arts

Chris. Sc. Monitor — Jan 2/37

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrated the advent of the new year by playing in Symphony Hall yesterday a Russian program made up of Tchaikovsky's Symphony "Pathétique" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite, "Schéhérazade." The symphony was substituted on this eleventh program of the season for the earlier announced "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasia and Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini, for piano and orchestra. The change was made necesssary by Mr. Rachmaninoff's inability to keep his engagement to play the solo part in his Rhapsody.

The program as it finally stood was clearly an acceptable New Year's present to the audience. Offhand, you might not think of the "Pathétique" as an item for a festival occasion. Nevertheless it worked out very well, with Rimsky's more cheerful measures to polish off the afternoon. Certainly the holiday audience was fortunate in hearing a performance of this symphony which could hardly be equaled anywhere else; a performance which emphasized the fact that much of the contempt which the work arouses in superior persons is due to unawareness of its musical content.

There can be little doubt that Dr. Koussevitzky is the supreme living interpreter of Tchaikovsky, or that his realization of the Russian master's symphonic scores is beyond any that has been audible before except to the inner ear of the composer himself. In Dr. Koussevitzky's reading all the best of the "Pathétique" is brought out and all the worst minimized. And the best of it is superior stuff. By endless subtleties of phrasing and of accent, by an inexhaustible variety of nuance and of tempi, the conductor reveals structure, balance and decoration. If you haven't heard this symphony under Koussevitzky, you haven't heard it.

And what of the orchestra that enables him to realize his vision of the work? We have heard performances by conductorless orchestras, but we have never heard of a symphony being played by a conductor without an orchestra. How many orchestras could hold to Koussevitzky's pace in the third movement of the "Pathétique" and still keep the outlines clear? How many could bring to these melodies the rich, broad, glowing tone of this band? How many could meet such demands of expression? How many could provide soloists for "Schéhérazade," from Mr. Burgin across the stage and back, to voice so deftly and so eloquently the composer's musical reflections? It takes a great conductor, and a great orchestra, to produce such performances as these.

For "Schéhérazade" is another specialty of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men. Of less consequence musically than the symphony, it is full of life and color, and consequently served well for festive conclusion. L. A. S.

MUSICIANS

Jan 3

Notes and Comment

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Athenian conductor, will arrive in America at the end of this week on his second journey to this country, during which he will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two weeks. Mr Mitropoulos will conduct the concerts in Symphony Hall a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan 15 and 16, since the coming week will be occupied by the orchestra's second visit to New York and other cities en route. Mr Mitropoulos will also conduct the concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, Jan 14, and the third concert of the Monday evening series in Symphony Hall on Monday, Jan 18.

The program will be the same for the three concerts of Thursday, Friday and Saturday. It will begin with the Prelude and the famous final air of Dido, "When I Am Laid in Earth," from Purcell's opera "Dido and Aeneas." The excerpts have been arranged for string orchestra by Mr Mitropoulos. The conductor has also edited for performance by string orchestra the great C sharp minor Quartet of Beethoven, Opus 131, and this quartet will be presented in this form. An Italian composer new to America, Castagnone, will be represented by his Preludio Giocoso. Respighi's Toccata for piano and orchestra will likewise have its first performance hereabouts, the conductor taking the piano part. The closing number will be the Second Suite from Casella's opera on Gozzi's "La Donna Serpente."

The soloist at the Monday evening concert of Jan 18 will be Gaspar Cassado, famous Spanish cellist, who is making his first visit to America and was received with great acclaim as soloist with the New York Philharmonic a few weeks ago. Cassado will be heard in the Cello Concerto of Robert Schumann.

◆

Serge Prokofieff, the Russian pianist and composer, will be soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts of Feb 5 and 6. He will play his own Third Piano Concerto.

Symphony in Glowing Mood

Adv. Jan.

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

THE NEW YEAR will hardly bring greater musical experience than it was the privilege of those who attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon to enjoy.

The disappointment naturally incurred by the last-minute announcement that Sergei Rachmaninoff was prevented by illness from appearing as soloist in the performance of his Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 43, as originally announced, was completely efaced from the first darkly portentous phrases of the opening Adagio of Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony which Dr. Koussevitzky had substituted.

For this music, itself the final and complete expression of a great and unhappy soul, was suffused by Dr. Koussevitzky with new meaning. His reading was in fact of such penetration and authority that, in listening, it was as though one knew Tchaikovsky for the first time.

* * *

HOW describe such a performance!

The first movement, Adagio, allegro non troppo—encompassing as it does all possible sadness, all the fury of hysteria, all hopeless loss—was unfolded with unprecedented dramatic pathos. The orchestra was superb—its vast resources seem limitless—tonally, technically, musically.

With what dexterity was the allegro con grazia—that of the 5-4 rhythm performed!

The defiant determination of the Allegro molto vivace found a greater significance than ever before as the martial forces which invade the festive frolic gathered with relentless purpose, sweeping all before them into what Philip Hale described as a "battle drunk" climax.

(The audience forgot its better manners in the overwhelming impulse to applaud at the end of this movement.)

As the strings were finally quiet at the end of the finale: Adagio lamentuoso, however, the highest of all praise was awarded—that of complete and trance-like silence.

The last half of the program was devoted to the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade."

Here the sensitively poetic playing on the part of a virtuoso orchestra of a continually favorite work, justified an enjoyment on the part of the audience which was in every way apparent.

* * *

DURING the coming week the orchestra will be engaged on its second visit to New York, giving concerts in other cities en route.

The Boston Symphony concerts of the two weeks following will be conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos, the distinguished Athenian conductor, who will make his second journey to America for the purpose of appearing as guest conductor with the orchestra.

In addition to the Symphony Hall concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, January 15, and 16, there will be an additional concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge on Thursday evening, January 14.

Mr. Mitropoulos will open the program, which will be the same for the three concerts, with the Prelude and the famous final air of Dido "When I am laid in Earth," from Purcell's opera "Dido and Aeneas." The arrangement for this, as for that of Beethoven's String Quartet in C sharp minor, Op. 131, which follows, have been made by Mr. Mitropoulos.

An Italian composer new to America, Castagnone, will be represented by his Preludio Giocoso. Respighi's Toccata for piano and orchestra will likewise have its first performance hereabouts, the conductor taking the piano part.

The closing number will be the Second Suite from Casella's Opera on Gozzi's "La Donna Serpente."

REDFE
WA
'Fittest to Su
Says John Mc
ing Choru
Redfern Maso
coast music criti
Musical Courier
music critics joins the Boston
No greater tr
to Mr. Mason's cal ability than the following t lisher of the T
most beloved of Cormack. Wire
May I be all
the Boston Tr
gagement of m
Mason as your
I have known h
I know his gre and his gift of impartial judg knowledge. I one more fit
H. T. P. Aga lations and my increasing pros script in the N
That telegram
ceived by the since it became
Mason would c
San Francisco,
years Mr. Mason
the Transcript newspapers. T musical critic of his successes to start anew
lowing among n
small effort.
Mr. Mason's
Francisco cause newspapers to upon his leavi
most laudatory who had been Praise fro
Writes John
umnist of the concerning Mr.
"His multitud
mirers will regr
San Francisco.
at his finding h
ities will have
of music he's with a fine b and experience
ment and with
"Very well I here from the the articles t widely known
From the start knew how to w
tancy in expres course there w share his enth approvals. Bu one say he w craftsman.
"Mason has One is called "
'Rebel Ireland' of Ireland,' a people throug given

REDFERN MASON JOINS TRANSCRIPT, WAS DEAN OF COAST MUSIC CRITICS

Trans-Jan. 4/37

"Fittest to Succeed H. T. P.," Says John McCormack, Leading Chorus of Acclaim

Redfern Mason, dean of Pacific coast music critics and called by the Musical Courier one of the five great music critics of America, today joins the Boston Transcript family.

No greater tribute could be paid to Mr. Mason's newspaper and musical ability than was paid today in the following telegram to the publisher of the Transcript from the most beloved of singers, John McCormack. Wired Mr. McCormack:

> May I be allowed to congratulate the Boston Transcript on the engagement of my old friend Redfern Mason as your chief musical critic. I have known him for twenty years. I know his great musical knowledge and his gift of absolutely fair and impartial judgment built on that knowledge. I cannot imagine anyone more fit to be a successor to H. T. P. Again renewed congratulations and my best wishes for ever-increasing prosperity for the Transcript in the New Year.
>
> JOHN McCORMACK

That telegram is one of many received by the Transcript publisher since it became known that Redfern Mason would come to Boston from San Francisco, where for twenty years Mr. Mason and the publisher of the Transcript worked together on newspapers. To induce this eminent musical critic to forsake the scene of his successes and come to Boston to start anew the creation of a following among music lovers caused no small effort.

Mr. Mason's departure from San Francisco caused columnists on rival newspapers to comment with regret upon his leaving and to give the most laudatory praise to the man who had been a competitor.

Praise from a Columnist

Writes John D. Barry, famous columnist of the San Francisco News, concerning Mr. Mason:

"His multitude of friends and admirers will regret his departure from San Francisco. But they'll rejoice at his finding himself where his abilities will have scope. In the world of music he's a distinguished figure, with a fine background of training and experience, with seasoned judgment and with skill in expression.

"Very well I remember his coming here from the East and publishing the articles that soon made him widely known on the Pacific coast. From the start, anyone could see he knew how to write and had no hesitancy in expressing his opinions. Of course there were those who didn't share his enthusiasms and his disapprovals. But never did I hear anyone say he wasn't an accomplished craftsman.

"Mason has written several books. One is called 'Musical Cameos.' Two, 'Rebel Ireland' and 'The Song Lore of Ireland,' a history of the Irish people through their music, have given many readers the impression that he's Irish. Perhaps the impression is enhanced by his vivacious temperament and by his wit. He's really a native of Manchester, England.

Works on Dante Translation

"As a young man he worked twelve years for the press of Birmingham, where he wrote about both music and drama. In Rochester, N. Y., he gave long service to the Post-Express in the music department. To secure opportunities for hearing good opera he lived for six months in Philadelphia and wrote criticisms for one of the local papers.

"Some years ago he began to translate Dante's 'Divine Comedy' into blank verse. This colossal task he has just about half finished. It will take him some years longer to get it done.

"The Transcript will offer him an audience of cultivated readers, used to the best musical traditions. He'll succeed authorities in music, who, far back through the years, have helped to make the paper authoritative.

"In his new center he will enjoy those groups that are actively concerned with the forward-looking social and economic movements today. He's far removed from the people whose loyalty to the arts keep them from being interested in the teeming world outside.

"Among the Bostonians there will be curiosity about the newcomer from the remote West, what he's like, whether he's able to meet the requirements, how he'll fit in. They'll feel enormous satisfaction when those scintillating articles of his appear and they become acquainted with his alert personality, his richly stored mind, his original and fearless qualities."

Flow of Approval

Like John McCormack, there is hardly a world-famous artist of the opera or concert stage who does not recognize the high position which Redfern Mason holds in the musical world. Praise flowed to the Transcript from many sources about Mr. Mason's selection as music critic of this newspaper.

Here are a few of the telegrams received.

> Heartiest congratulations on the appointment of Redfern Mason as music critic of your esteemed publication. During my career as a singer he was highly and seriously regarded by all artists and was considered most competent and just. His written words were charged with good judgment and authority.
>
> EDWARD JOHNSON,
> Directer, Metropolitan Opera, New York city.

The following telegram from Lawrence Tibbett, the great star of opera, radio and concert, was received:

> I don't know whether or not I am glad that you have taken Redfern Mason from my native California. You have robbed the Pacific coast of its most eminent music critic. However, San Francisco's loss is Boston's gain. Congratulations.
>
> LAWRENCE TIBBETT

Then came this telegram of praise for the benefits gained by Mr. Mason's criticisms:

REDFERN MASON

> I am very happy to hear of the appointment of Redfern Mason, formerly of San Francisco Examiner as music critic of Boston Evening Transcript. Since 1922 I have had pleasure of being acquainted with his work in opera and concert in San Francisco and know him to be keen, intelligent and reliable critic. Although at times his criticisms were a little hard to swallow, still they were beneficial to my work. The Boston Evening Transcript is fortunate in obtaining his services. I wish him success and good luck. Also my best wishes to the Transcript. Sincerely,
>
> GIOVANNI MARTINELLI

From a Symphony Conductor

Out from the West, as soon as the word of Mr. Mason's departure became known, came a telegram from Alfred Hertz, former conductor of the San Francisco Symphony and now in Hollywood conducting the Hollywood Bowl Symphony. He telegraphs:

> I congratulate the Boston Transcript on the appointment of Redfern Mason, for many years dean of San Francisco music critics, to head its music department. Mason has been the ardent champion for the best in music over a long period here. His enthusiastic support of fine music has gone a long way to make possible the development of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. At all times he stood his ground for his convictions and never tired fighting for the good cause. Every music lover in San Francisco and not the least I myself owe him a lasting debt of gratitude. We all will watch his work in Boston with sincere interest and have no doubt that his brilliant style, his good judgment and his great experience will soon make for him a lasting place in Boston's musical life.

Rising each year to prominence in the musical world has been the San Francisco opera and Gaetano Merola, general director of the San Francisco Association, sent the following message:

> Boston Transcript to be congratulated on its choice of Redfern Mason as musical critic. For many years, Mason outstanding music critic of Pacific coast and served San Francisco and its environs with masterly and unbiased reviews of all musical activities. Keen judge of the best and a versatile and brilliant writer, he made himself beloved here for the many constructive criticisms and suggestions in his widely read column.

Paul Althouse, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera, and who was recently in Boston on a concert tour, wired as follows:

> You are fortunate in having secured Redfern Mason as chief music critic for the Boston Transcript. I consider him one of the outstanding men in his field knowing his subject thoroughly and expressing it precisely and eloquently. I extend my congratulations to you both.

Press Agent Commends Choice

Outside the artists but the man behind the artists who has done much to publicize them is Wallace Munro, former president of the Theatrical and Musical Press Agents Association. Concerning Mason, he telegraphed to the Transcript as follows:

> Congratulations upon the appointment of Redfern Mason as chief music critic. I consider him one of the outstanding authoritative writers in America. He is a gentleman worthy of your splendid newspaper and one who has the respect and esteem of the entire musical world. He is a magnificent selection.

Mr. Mason is married but his wife will not arrive in Boston for some weeks. He will reside at the Vendome Hotel until his family arrives. Next Wednesday evening Mr. Mason will be the guest of C. H. Watkins at the Harvard Club where Sir Arthur Willert will speak on "The Press and Diplomacy."

M. Y. Sun

DAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1936.

Boston Symphony Concert

Koussevitsky Offers Haydn, Debussy and Beethoven Works to Open Season.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its fifty-first season in this city with the concert of last evening in Carnegie Hall. It was a concert to be held long in lively remembrance. There was not a moment when the hearer did not feel glad that Boston was sufficiently close to New York to permit of regular visits from this group of virtuosi led by a conductor of authority, enthusiasm and understanding.

One sometimes is lost in wonder at the glory of the tone of the Boston orchestra, so rich, so lucent, so filled with delicate qualities and withal so virile and forthright. And with the tone go finish, precision, unanimity and infinite elasticity. It is a great orchestra and is greatly directed.

Last evening's program was compact, yet generous. There were three numbers, of which the first was Haydn's B flat symphony, No. 102. Hearing this composition as it was performed last night one is tempted to revise all his conceptions of Haydn. Rubinstein's lofty condescensions, his pat on the back for the genial old gentleman who brought his beloved Viennese every day a musical lollipop, becomes ridiculous. This is no mere stick of candy but a beautifully fashioned score, full of fancy, touched with gentle humor, ascending at times to regions of stormy emotion and at others descending to levels of elegant sentiment, but always with the grace of a courtly period and the occasional naivete of a humble mind, and all conveyed with such a mastery of the fundamentals of orchestration one can hardly believe that since the work was written Berlioz and Wagner revolutionized the art of instrumentation.

There have been few orchestral performances in this town so nearly approaching utter perfection as that of the Haydn symphony last evening. Not a detail was slurred, not a minor nuance neglected, not a single fragment of episodic character obscured, yet all was knit firmly into a strong and satisfying whole. The exquisitely poetic treatment of the broad introduction, the polished delivery of the slow movement, the impressiveness of Haydn's sudden modulations and exclamatory outbursts—which must have disturbed the sedate music lovers of London in 1795—and the scintillant finale, all were played with extraordinary smoothness and finesse. The audience was quick to perceive the excellence of the performance and its applause, given liberally to the conductor, increased in volume when the orchestra stood to receive the approbation of the public. If any one entertained a doubt about the genius of Haydn he must have had it painlessly extracted by the performance of this B flat symphony last evening.

The second number on the list was Debussy's tripartite orchestral sketch, with the title "La Mer." Here again the virtuosity of the orchestra was displayed splendidly. The music had the glow, the mystic glamour, the melting of tones and fusing of instrumental parts needed for a compelling evocation of its magic. Mr. Koussevitzky had not now to demonstrate his command of the Debussy idiom. He has long been known as one of the foremost exponents of this highly individual method of expression.

The concert came to its conclusion with Beethoven's fifth symphony. Thus the first concert of the new season presented three works, one representing the best thought of the early classical period, another the rich product of the impressionistic delineation almost created by Debussy, and the third the day of the crossing of the bridge between the two eras. There was no novelty. The Boston organization infrequently comes without one, but Mr. Koussevitzky is reserving it for tomorrow afternoon, when we shall learn something about the late adventurings of young France. We may hazard the conjecture that even then we shall not forget the preaching of the gospel according to Haydn.

DURANT, OKLA.
DAILY DEMOCRAT
DEC 15 1936

VIOLIN EXPERT TO TEACH CLASS HERE

By G. T. STUBBS,
Superintendent of Schools

The boys and girls of Durant who are interested in the study of the violin or other stringed musical instruments are fortunate to have the opportunity to study under the teaching of an unusually talented musician who is at this time organizing classes in stringed instruments. I refer to Mr. Frederic Claiborne whose home is in Hugo. He plans to come to Durant as often as his program of teaching will demand.

The violin is a wonderful instrument, but one that requires competent instruction for the student to make satisfactory progress without losing interest. It is a mistake to expect good musicians on the violin to develop from incompetent instructors without a background of years of study and some experience as a violinist.

As stated above the boys and girls of Durant who enroll with Mr. Claiborne are fortunate to have the opportunity to study with an unusally competent teacher and an artist in performing with the violin. He is not unknown to many in Durant since he has given two concerts in our city within recent months. All who have heard him agree that Southeastern Oklahoma is fortunate to have such a talented person live among us and to share his talent with others who could not get this opportunity otherwise.

Mr. Claiborne is a graduate of Phillips University School of Fine Arts with the bachelor of music degree. His other study was in the New England Conservatory of Music and Boston University with special study of the violin under Anton Witek, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra. In addition to years of experience in playing the violin in concert and orchestras in the Boston and St. Louis Symphony orchestras, Mr. Claiborne has been a teacher of the violin for many years. In short, he brings a background of thorough training and successful experience as a teacher and performer.

It is our hope and plan in the Durant public schools that within another year, we can agais have band and orchestra music in our schools. We are encouraging Mr. Claiborne to teach in Durant and want to encourage parents to enroll pupils with him. By this means, a nucleus for an orchestra will be available in our schools next year and time will be saved.

We are glad to endorse Mr. Claiborne as a musician and to recommend him to parents who have children for instruction.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
JAN 6 - 1937

LYONS DEN

THE Boston Symphony recently played "Epitaph," a new composition by Vladimir Dukelski. Dukelski is Vernon Duke, who wrote most of the music for "The Show Is On."... Theatrical press-agents, most of whom never completed their grammar-school courses, are being invited by the Univ. of Penn. faculty to help map out theatrical courses for the young ladies there...Le Mirage is follow-

143

MENOMINEE, MICH.
HERALD-LEADER
DEC 16 1936

Brinkman Will Be Heard Tonight In Concert Here

Joseph Brinkman, of Ann Arbor, assistant professor of piano at the University of Michigan School of Music, arrived in the city this afternoon to play a concert in the Menominee high school auditorium this evening under the auspices of the Menominee Woman's club. The concert will begin at 8 p. m. and music lovers of both Menominee and Marinette are invited to attend.

Professor Brinkman, who has appeared before three other Women's clubs in the upper peninsula, is a ranking artist and has been featured as guest soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra twice within the past two weeks. He makes frequent concert appearances in Ann Arbor and always is greeted by capacity audiences.

His upper peninsula concerts were made possible through the efforts of Dr. Charles A. Sink, president of the School of Music, and Dr. W. D. Henderson, head of the University Extension Bureau.

CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

Big Business Side of Symphony Is Shown

ST. LOUIS, Dec. 18.—(AP)—Cold statistics showed today symphonic music hides a big business.

America's thirteen leading symphony orchestras, in their first consolidated financial statement, disclosed an anual combined budget of $4,346,500, an average of $334,346.

Managers of the orchestras, twelve of whom are meeting here, estimated, exclusive of summer seasons and radio broadcasts, more than 3,500,000 persons hear their 1,100 musicians in 1,200 concerts each year. None of the orchestras is self-sustaining. Their annual combined earned income is $2,782,100, leaving a total deficit of $1,564,400, or an average of $120,339.

Box office and miscellaneous earned incomes range from a high of 86 per cent. to a low of 35 per cent. of the annual budgets. The largest earned incomes were reported in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Chicago.

Salaries of conductors, orchestra members and assisting artists constitute 74 per cent. of the combined budgets; management, office salaries and expenses, 6 per cent., and advertising, publicity, hall rentals and incidentals the remaining 20 per cent.

Managers attending the meeting are George E. Judd, Boston; Arthur Judson, New York; Alfred Reginald Allen, Philadelphia; Henry E. Voegeli, Chicago; Carl J. Vossburgh, Cleveland; Murray Patterson, Detroit; Arthur M. See, Rochester; Theo Gannon, Cincinnati; Mrs. Verna Scott, Minneapolis; Miss Grace Kaufmann, Kansas City; Walter B. Howe, Washington, and Arthur J. Gaines, St. Louis.

Dec 21/36
BURLINGTON, N. C.
TIMES NEWS

Plans to broadcast from the United States to South and Central America were announced recently by NBC. This move is frankly stated to be in competition with Germany, England and other European countries which have been building programs for South America for years. Among the suggested material to be sent from the United States are the Metropolitan Opera broadcasts and Boston Symphony programs.

Is America Unmusical?

Nikolai Sokoloff, director of the Federal Music Project, says that more than 3300 compositions of 1351 American composers were heard at the governmental concerts since October, 1935, and he adds: "An amazing wealth of creative talent has been brought to light by the WPA musical projects, and hundreds of these native compositions enjoyed repeated performance." A detailed list has been published by Sokoloff, and among the names recorded are most of our tonal creators, including a larger number whose names never before appeared before the public. The music project is unquestionably one which is doing really constructive work. Unmusical America now stands revealed as the land that in a single year has done more than any other country in the way of encouragement, both musically and financially, for the native composers and performers.

Piano Artist

Joseph Brinkman, professor of piano at the University of Michigan school of music, who will present a concert in the Menominee High school auditorium this evening.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

Symphony Big Business Now!

Budgets Of 13 Top Orchestras $4,346,500—Concerts Heard By 3,500,000 Persons.

St. Louis, Mo., December 18—(AP)—Cold statistics showed today symphonic music hides a big business.

America's 13 leading symphony orchestras, in their first consolidated finance statement, disclosed an annual combined budget of $4,346,500, an average of $334,346.

Managers of the orchestras, 12 of whom are meeting here, estimated, exclusive of summer seasons and radio broadcasts, more than 3,500,000 persons hear their 1,100 musicians in 1,200 concerts each year.

None of the orchestras is self-sustaining. Their annual combined earned income is $2,782,000, leaving a total deficit of $1,564,000, or an average of $120,539.

Box office and miscellaneous earned incomes range from a high of 86 per cent to a low of 35 per cent of the annual budgets, with an average of 66 per cent for the group. The largest earned incomes were reported by the Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago orchestras.

Three of the orchestras meet deficits through endowment funds, the others being sustained by maintenance funds raised each year and, in a few cases, supplemented by special gifts.

Salaries of conductors, orchestra members and assisting artists constitute 74 per cent of the combined budgets; management, office salaries and expenses, 6 per cent; and advertising, publicity, hall rentals and incidentals the remaining 20 per cent.

Managers attending the meeting are George E. Judd, Boston; Arthur Judson, New York; Alfred Reginald Allen, Philadelphia; Henry E. Voegeli, Chicago; Carl J. Vossburgh, Cleveland; Murray Patterson, Detroit; Arthur M. See, Rochester; Theo Gannon, Cincinnati; Mrs. Verna Scott, Minneapolis; Miss Grace Kaufmann, Kansas City; Walter B. Howe, Washington, and Arthur J. Gaines, St. Louis. Los Angeles submitted financial data but was not represented at the meeting.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

In The World Of Music . . . .

By H. Earle Johnson

IN THE atmosphere of chancel and choir-loft the music of this wonderful season finds most appropriate expression; a more fundamental and deeper note may there be sounded. To this yearly festival we turn with a familiar joy, delighting in the event which has inspired the greatest good known to man. Music the purest of the arts, fitly expresses the unsurpassing glory of the occasion, and through its oft-repeated beauties keeps fresh the world's aspiration toward Peace on earth, Good-will to men,

* * *

The opening week's repertory for The Metropolitan gives a fair indication of the major operatic success of the times, i. e. this year of grace 1936. The management is putting its box-office foot forward, presumably in an effort to catch the holiday trade. Die Walkrie and Tristan and Isolde both by Wagner and including Flagstad among star-bespangled casts open the season on Monday and Wednesday evenings; Traviata, The Bartered Bride, Samson and Delilah, and Trovatore fill the remainder of the week; Hansel and Gretel, coupled with a ballet, The Bat, provides an extra matinee on Thursday.

Sibelius' Symphony No. 1 and Brahms' pianoforte Concerto No. 1 furnish a goodly afternoon for those who listen to the Philharmonic-Symphony Society this afternoon; Rudolf Serkin is the assisting artist. The Messiah is being done in New York, Boston, and Worcester by civic groups in the course of the week; doubtless, elsewhere too. How long since The Messiah has been sung in New Haven by a large choral society? (Please don't answer.) There are no celebrity concerts of importance during the week, owing to the desire of the artists to remain at home, we are told, but also influenced by the supposition that no one has time to attend them anyhow. Gregor Piatigorsky, violoncellist, is soloist in the regular concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the home city.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
DEC 18 1936

MacDowell Widow to Attend Boston Symphony's Tribute

(Copyright, 1936, by United Press.)

BOSTON, Dec. 18 (UP)—A tiny gray-haired widow will come to Boston tomorrow to hear one of the world's greatest symphony orchestras play her husband's second piano concerto in tribute to his 75th birthday anniversary.

Probably unnoticed by some 2500 music lovers in the audience, Mrs. Mariam Nevins MacDowell, 75, publicity-shy widow of Edward MacDowell, America's best-known classical composer, will attend tomorrow night's concert by the Boston symphony orchestra.

To the general public, MacDowell, who died in 1908, is perhaps best remembered for his "To a Wild Rose."

Today — the anniversary — the widow was at a New York hotel recovering from a slight indisposition. Grieved at being unable to attend the actual anniversaary performance one of her husband's finest works, she told the United Press by long-distance telephone that she would be in the audience tomorrow night.

"I am looking forward eagerly to hearing what I know will be a magnificent performance," she said. "I can't thank (Conductor Serge) Koussevitzky enough for reviving my husband's concerto."

Last night she listened to a broadcast of the concerto from Sander's Theater in Cambridge. It was the first of three daily performances of the work by the Boston symphony.

"But there was too much static for me to hear to the best advantage," she said.

Brown-eyed Mrs. MacDowell, herself 75, has been traveling about the country since her husband's death. An accomplished pianist, she plays and lectures on her husband's works to aid the maintenance of the MacDowell colony, which she founded at Peterboro, N. H., in memory of her husband.

The colony fulfills MacDowell's dream of a place free from distraction for writers, artists and musicians. It was there that Edward Arlington Robinson wrote the poems that twice won him a Pulitzer prize.

MacDowell was only 23 when he composed the piano concerto that the Boston Symphony has revived.

"I still thrill at the thought my husband wrote this concerto when we were just a newly-married couple, quite poor, and I was spending all my time keeping house and learning to be a good cook," Mrs. MacDowell recalled.

Born in New York city of Scotch-Irish descent, Edward Alexander MacDowell went to Europe as a 15-year-old piano prodigy to perfect his technique. He progressed so rapidly that at 21 he was mentioned as a candidate for the head of the piano department of Wiesbaden Conservatory, but was rejected because of his youth.

CHARLESTON, S. C.
POST

es "Jazz" in MacDowell Work

(By United Press)

Boston, Dec. 19. (U.P.)—Written more than a half-century ago, the second piano concerto of Edward MacDowell, known to millions of music lovers as composer of "To a Wild Rose," may have been the real beginning of modern "jazz."

This possibility was revealed by Serge Koussevitzky when his famed Boston Symphony orchestra, with Howard Goding as soloist, revived the concerto in tribute to the 75th birthday anniversary of MacDowell, who died in 1908.

"It is like jazz," said Koussevitzky, pointing out that the composition's second movement contained syncopated rhythm and blue notes—which he referred to as dissonances—similar to those found in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

"It is extraordinary," he said with an emphatic gesture, "when you stop to think it was written 52 years ago, and in Germany at that."

Hitherto, it had been commonly accepted that "jazz" rhythm evolved from "ragtime" which made its first hit in 1898 with "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight." The blue note effect is traced to "Alexander's Ragtime Band."

MacDowell's tiny, gray-haired widow—Mrs. Barian Nevins MacDowell, 75—offered a curious explanation of her husband's apparent long-distance anticipation of "jazz."

In a telephone conversation from New York, Mrs. MacDowell was so amused she chuckled when told of comparisons of her husband's music to modern "jazz."

"Call it jazz if they will," she said. "I think it was a racial heritage. My husband came of pre-revolutionary Scotch-Irish ancestry. I should say the rhythmic effect in question was the 'Scotch Snap' which is a very old trait of Scottish music. It was always cropping up in my husband's composition, although he did not exploit it consciously. He would always be put out with himself when he found he had used it and he'd comment on it a little ruefully."

Recovering from a slight indisposition, Mrs. MacDowell was unable to attend the actual anniversary performance of one of her husband's finest works. She said, however, she would be present at tonight's performance here.

An accomplished pianist, she plays and lectures on her husband's works to aid the maintenance of the MacDowell colony, which she founded at Peterboro, N. H., in memory of her husband.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR
DEC 19 1936

Wife of Famed Composer Will Hear His Music

Mrs. Marian MacDowell Will Attend Concert In Boston

GIVEN AS TRIBUTE

Grateful for Revival of Husband's Great Piano Concerts

Copyright, 1936, by United Press

BOSTON, Dec. 19.—A gray-haired widow will come to Boston today to hear one of the world's greatest symphony orchestras play her husband's second piano concerto in tribute to his 75th birthday anniversary.

Gives Lectures

Probably unnoticed by some 2,500 music-lovers in the audience, Mrs. Mariam Nevins MacDowell, 75, publicity-shy widow of Edward MacDowell, America's best-known classical composer, will attend tonight's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To the general public, MacDowell, who died in 1908, is perhaps best remembered for his "To a Wild Rose."

Yesterday — the anniversary — The widow was at a New York hotel recovering from a slight indisposition. Grieved at being unable to attend the actual anniversary performance of one of her husband's finest works, she told the United Press that she would be in the audience tonight.

"I am looking forward eagerly to hearing what I know will be a magnificent performance," she said. "I can't thank (Conductor Serge) Koussevitzky enough for reviewing my husband's concerto."

Brown-eyed, Mrs. MacDowell has been traveling about the country since her husband's death. An accomplished pianist, she plays and lectures on her husband's works to aid the maintenance of the MacDowell colony, which she founded at Peterboro, N. H., in memory of her husband.

The colony fulfills MacDowell's dream of a place free from distraction for writers, artists and musicians. It was there that Edward Arlington Robinson wrote the poems that twice won him a Pulitzer prize.

MacDowell was only 23 when he composed the piano concerto that the Boston Symphony has revived.

He Began Young

"I still thrill at the thought my husband wrote this concerto when we were just a newly-married couple quite poor, and I was spending all my time keeping house and learning to be a good cook," Mrs. MacDowell recalled.

Born in New York City of Scotch-Irish descent, Edward Alexander MacDowell went to Europe as a 15-year-old piano prodigy to perfect his technique. He progressed so rapidly that at 21 he was mentioned as a candidate for the head of the piano department of Wiesbaden Conservatory, but was rejected because of his youth.

Shortly thereafter he received the equivalent post at Darmstadt Conservatory. It was there that he began to concentrate on composition. His first concerto was praised by Liszt.

At 26, as America's outstanding composer, he settled in Boston. Later moving to New York to head Columbia University's newly-established music department. His death was attributed to worry and overwork.

HOLLYWOOD, CAL.
CITIZEN-NEWS
Dec 17

An hours' concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be broadcast by KECA commencing at 5. Howard Goding, young Bostonian, will be the soloist in Edward MacDowell's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. Also to be included on the program will be Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture said to have been written not as an overture to Shakespeare's love drama but "as a fantasy in overture form intended to embody the romance and tragedy of that familiar story." . . . Elsa Maxwell, who recently visited at Baron Rothschild's castle where the Duke of Windsor is staying; Edgar Burgen, ventriloquist; Cornelia Otis Skinner, monologuist, and John Gurney, Metropolitan Opera basso, will appear on the Rudy Vallee hour to be radiated by KFI at 5.

CL
DE

Two Wo
by

Copland's Bloc

By

MUSIC fr
most in American co
Cleveland n
Rodzinski
Dance Symp
one of the in American been neglect
His works
New York
Walter Dan
Boston Symp
tras of Phi
Angeles, Roc
Mexico City, figured on national Soc sic and is w as in Ameri
Born in studied first bin Goldma to work wit
the latter native land, for Organ of the New

"SH

THE Danc performa and the Phi up of mate
the ballet, works of C phony, the Ode, "Music
—study on
of Piano Va
A decade sidered very the hardy s it. Now, sin music has the shock is be able to objective ma
After Cop
Harris, som
Thompson, crowd of An way to kno hear it.

WOR
T

M

Today

Walte

THE che con
first time phony in
This work
Alfredo poser and ments of script in and by sk pathetic tr
position
Dr. Kous the Boston
the future of the sta
Clementi spent most though he making fr piano virtu stated that contest however, n
He was a works incl
tas and 20
which we

CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS

DEC 19 1936

Two American Works Played by Orchestra

Copland's Dance Symphony and Bloch Viola Piece on Program

By DENOE LEEDY
Music Editor

MUSIC from the pen of one of the most important of the younger American composers will be heard in Cleveland next week when Dr. Artur Rodzinski presents Aaron Copland's Dance Symphony. Why the composer, one of the most discussed personalities in American composition, should have been neglected up to date is a mystery.

His works have been performed by the New York Symphony Orchestra under Walter Damrosch; repeatedly by the Boston Symphony; also by the orchestras of Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Los Angeles, Rochester, as well as those in Mexico City, Berlin and Paris. He has figured on the programs of the International Society for Contemporary Music and is well known in Europe as well as in America.

Born in Brooklyn, N. Y., 1900, he studied first in New York City with Rubin Goldmark and then left for Paris to work with Nadio Boulanger. It was the latter who introduced him to his native land, performing his Symphony for Organ and Orchestra at a concert of the New York Symphony in 1924.

* * *

"Shock" All Gone

THE Dance Symphony, given its first performance by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra, is made up of material originally conceived for the ballet, "Grohg." Other important works of Copland are the First Symphony, the Piano Concerto, Symphonic Ode, "Music for the Theater," "Vitebsk"—study on a Jewish melody, and a set of Piano Variations.

A decade or so ago his music was considered very shocking and it was only the hardy souls who dared to perform it. Now, since so much "revolutionary" music has flowed across the scene and the shock is pretty much gone, we will be able to evaluate his work in a more objective manner.

After Copland let us have some Roy Harris, some Roger Sessions, Randall Thompson, or any other of the younger crowd of American composers. The only way to know what it is all about is to hear it.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

DEC 20 1936

MUSIC Of Today and Tomorrow

By
Walter W. Farmer

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, at one of its recent concerts, performed for the first time in this country, a Symphony in D by Muzio Clementi. This work has been restored by Alfredo Casella, the Italian composer and pianist, who found fragments of the long-neglected manuscript in libraries and museums and by skilfull revision and sympathetic treatment produced a composition that in the opinion of Dr. Koussevitzky conductor of the Boston Orchestra, will be in the future an indispensable part of the standard repertory.

Clementi, born in Rome in 1752, spent most of his life in England, though he often toured Europe, making frequent appearances as a piano virtuoso and conductor. It is stated that in 1781 he engaged in a contest with Mozart, in which, however, no decision was rendered. He was a prolific writer and his works include over 100 piano sonatas and 20 symphonies, only two of which were printed. Piano students of the last generation may recall—perhaps not always with pleasure—their experiences in toiling up the arid slopes of Clementi's "Gradus ad Parnassum," a set of piano studies more technical than inspired.

The Symphony in D was exceptionally well received and was praised for its clarity, lyrical grace and freshness. At the Boston concert, a telegram was read expressing the good wishes of Mrs. Cecelia Clementi Pitman, a great-granddaughter of the composer.

EVANSVILLE, IND.
COURIER

DEC 20 1936

Noted Musician Will Lecture Here Dec. 20

MRS. OLGA SAMAROFF STOKOWSKI

Colorful has been the life of Madame Olga Stokowski, who is soon to lecture in Evansville under auspices of the Evansville Musicians club. She will give an illustrated talk on "What Is Modern Music?" at 8:15 o'clock Wednesday night, December 30, in the Evansville college auditorium.

Madame Stokowski was born in San Antonio, Texas, while her father, an army officer, was stationed there. Her ancestry includes Dutch, German, Russian and Irish-English strains. When she was six weeks old, she was taken to Houston, and from there moved to Galveston where her mother and grandmother taught music.

She began to improvise at the age of three, and showed such talent that her grandmother took her to Europe when she was 12. There she remained until she was 21. She was the first American girl to be given a scholarship in the piano classes of the Paris Conservatoire. Among her teachers was Jedliczka in Berlin, who was a pupil of Anton Rubinstein and Tschaikowsky.

On January, 18, 1905, Olga Samaroff made her debut as a concert pianist in Carnegie Hall, New York, with the New York symphony orchestra, Walter Damrosch conducting. Soon afterwards Charles A. Ellis, impresario of the Boston symphony orchestra, added her to his list of artists. She proceeded to win ever, increasing success in the United States and in Europe, where she appeared in London, Berlin, Paris, Vienna, Munich, Amsterdam, the Hague and other important cities.

In 1911 she married Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia symphony orchestra. One daughter was born of the marriage, which was ended by divorce in 1923.

When the Juilliard Foundation organized its graduate school in 1925, Madame Stokowski was engaged to teach piano, and has remained on the faculty ever since. Since 1927 she has been head of the piano department of the Philadelphia Conservatory of Music. In 1926, when, her concert career was interrupted by an accident to her arm, she turned to educational work and the organization of assistance to young musicians, a work to which she has devoted herself since.

CINCINNATI, O.
Dec. POST 21/36

Widow of Famed Composer To Attend Tribute to Him

Mrs. Mariam Nevins MacDowell, 75, Will Hear Boston Symphony Orchestra Honor Her Dead Husband by Playing His Works in Celebration of His 75th Birthday Anniversary

(Copyright, 1936, by United Press.)

BOSTON, Dec. 21.—A gray-haired widow came to Boston today to hear one of the world's greatest symphony orchestras play her husband's second piano concerto in tribute to his 75th birthday anniversary.

Mrs. Mariam Nevins MacDowell, 75, widow of Edward MacDowell, America's best-known classical composer will attend tonight's concert by the Boston symphony orchestra.

MacDowell, who died in 1908, is perhaps best remembered for his "To A Wild Rose."

"I am looking forward eagerly to hearing what I know will be a magnificent performance," she said. "I can't thank Conductor (Serge) Koussevitzky enough for reviving my husband's concerto."

Brown-eyed Mrs. MacDowell has been traveling about the country since her husband's death. She is an accomplished pianist, and plays and lectures on her husband's works to help maintain the MacDowell colony, which she founded at Peterboro, N. H., in his memory.

MacDowell was 23 when he composed the piano concerto that the Boston symphony has revived.

"I still thrill at the thought my husband wrote this concerto when we were just a newly-married couple, quite poor, and I was spending all my time keeping house and learning to be a good cook," Mrs. MacDowell recalled.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

RACHMANINOFF ILL

New York, Dec. 31.—(AP)—Serge Rachmaninoff, pianist and composer, is ill with a cold, his agents announced today, and has cancelled an appearance in Boston with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on advice of his physician. He is expected to be able to play with the Philadelphia Orchestra in New York, Jan. 5.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
Dec. 17/36

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting the Boston Symphony in its fourth broadcast of the season, presents Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet."

PORTSMOUTH, VA.
STAR

DEC 20 1936

* * *

EDWARD MACDOWELL

Edward Alexander MacDowell, one of the greatest of American musical composers, was born in New York City, December 18, 1861. This being the 75th anniversary of his birth, the occasion is being celebrated in many music clubs and organizations all over the United States at this time.

He is descended from a Quaker family of Scotch-Irish extraction, which emigrated to America about the middle of the 18th Century. As a boy he studied the piano with Juan Buitrago, a South American, and Pablo Desvernine, a Cuban and for a brief space, Teresa Parreno, a native of Venezuela. The nationality of these early teachers is recorded to enable the curious to study or speculate on the influence which, with the varied training received in Europe, may have helped to shape the artistic character of MacDowell, who tho entitled to ranks with contemporary composers of the highest class, irrespective of country, is yet specially significant as a representative of the best that America has produced in music.

His European studies were varied. In 1876 he became a pupil of Savard in composition and Marmontel in piano at the Paris Conservatorie. For three years he remained under French influences, then exchanged them for German, studying under Sebert. Later studying with Louis Ehlert at Wieobadeu and then with Joachim Raff, director of the conservatorium. The admiration which he felt for Raff's music and the attachment which sprang up between master and pupil, were among the strongest influences which shaped his creative career.

Later he went to Darmsbadt as chief teacher at the conservatorium there. It was here he met the young American girl, who later became his wife. It was indeed an ideal match. He the composer and she the exponent of his compositions and helper.

He visited Siszt in Weimar in 1882, playing his first concerto for that master with D'Albert at the second piano, and was invited to take part in the approaching music festival at Zurich. There he played his first piano fortetiute. Raff died shortly after, and MacDowell set up a home in Wiesbaden, where he devoted himself to composition for four years, or until 1887.

Then he came to America, settled in Boston, taught and gave concerts, producing his two pianoforte concertos with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Theodore Thomas Orchestra in New York.

In 1896 he was called to Columbia University in New York to fill the chair of music, and this part he occupied until 1904, when illness compelled his resignation. Cerebial complication ensued the following year.

Struck down in middle life, he nevertheless left an impressive body of creative labor which would have been still greater but for his pianistic and pedagogical exertions. His best compositions exhibits a romantic imagination and a polished craftsmanship that placed him near the top of American composers. Among his more important works are two pianoforte concertos, four pianoforte sonatas, Tragica, Eroica, Norse and Keltic, two pianoforte suites and two groups of short pieces for the same instrument; Woodland Sketches and Sea-Pieces, three symphonic poems, Hamlet, Ohelia and Lancelot and Elaine, and two orchestral suites. He died at New York Jan. 23, 1908.

Not least among his bequests to the artistic life of America is the deeding of his summer home at Peterborough, N. H., for a retreat for creative artists of the different arts. Mrs. MacDowell has concertized and worked untiringly ever since her husband died to keep the coloyn going. The Mendelloshn Glee Club took it up and many MacDowell clubs were formed to help Mrs. MacDowell in this splendid work. Music clubs also contribute towards its upkeep. It has grown from a small 60 acre woodland tract, with one cabin, to some 600 acres with about 25 cabins for the artists, each cabin being out of sight of the other. Lunch is left in a basket on the respective porches, but the individuals are left undisturbed until they drift up to Colony Hall for dinner and entertainment afterwards. The results have proved the wisdom—in worthy works in many fields of creative arts.

One, our native borne Virginian poet, Nancy Byrd Turner says that if one cannot find inspiration there he had better seek other lines of endeavor than creative work.

DOROTHY DUDLEY DAVIS

TERRE HAUTE, IND.
Dec. STAR 22/36

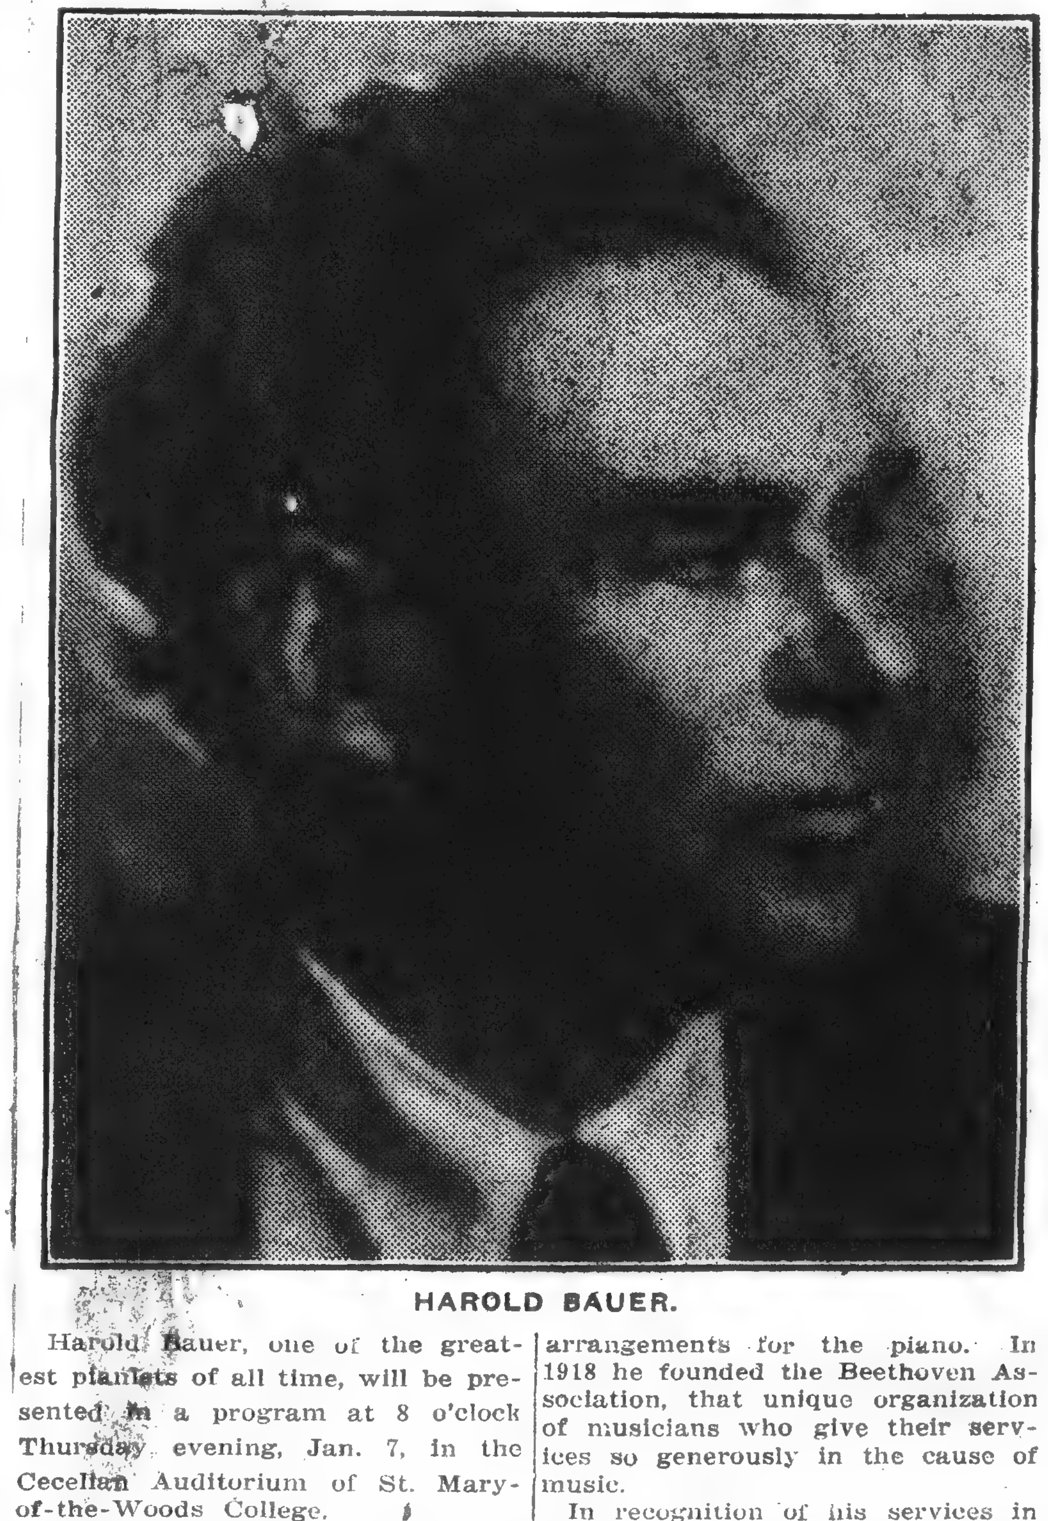
PIANIST TO APPEAR HERE



HAROLD BAUER.

Harold Bauer, one of the greatest pianists of all time, will be presented in a program at 8 o'clock Thursday evening, Jan. 7, in the Cecelian Auditorium of St. Mary-of-the-Woods College.

Although English by birth, Mr. Bauer has identified himself with the musical life of this country. In 1921 he became an American citizen. He was introduced to this country in 1900, appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony, and playing the Brahms D Minor Concerto. In fact, he contributed more than any other pianist to lift the gloom that had settled over the name of Brahms during the early years of the present century.

To piano literature he has contributed valuable transcriptions and arrangements for the piano. In 1918 he founded the Beethoven Association, that unique organization of musicians who give their services so generously in the cause of music.

In recognition of his services in the cause of French art the French government conferred on him the riband of the Legion of Honor. The London Philharmonic Society, the oldest symphonic organization in existence, presented him with the society's gold medal. To him Ravel dedicated his piano composition, "Ondine," and Debussy made the special request that he was to perform for the first time in public his then recently completed "Children's Corner."

His program at St. Mary's will be open to all Terre Hauteans.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 27 1936

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

ALTHOUGH neither the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra nor the Philadelphia nor the Boston Symphony Orchestra found it worth its while to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of Liszt's death with a performance here of his greatest work, the "Faust" symphony, the Columbia Phonograph Company has made amends for this regrettable neglect by putting forth the recorded version of this composition by the Grand Orchestre Philharmonique, of Paris, under Selmar Meyrowitz's direction.

Of the numerous attempts to portray musically the characters of Goethe's "Faust," Liszt's is by far the most telling. Even Hugo Wolf, whose adoration for Wagner knew no bounds and who admired the latter's "Faust" overture, grew ecstatic when he reviewed the first performance in Vienna of Liszt's symphony and dubbed it "one of the most grandiose creations in the whole sphere of music." This may seem extravagant praise to Liszt's snobbish present-day detractors, but listening to this music with an unprejudiced ear, the symphony's wealth of ideas and the mastery with which they have been expressed therein cannot fail to impress one. And since Liszt wisely refrains from attempting to follow the scenic succession of Goethe's tragedy and labels his three movements after its three principal characters, Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles, he avoids the mistakes made by Berlioz in his "Romeo and Juliet" symphony. The conflicting elements of Faust's nature, the introspective, brooding melancholy, the searching after an unattainable ideal, the romantic eroticism, have been strikingly reflected in the thematic material, as have the winsome girlish simplicity and tenderness of Gretchen. And the virtuosity with which Liszt has depicted Mephistopheles, with his impudence, calculating coldness, frivolity and denial of the meaning of all human endeavor, by caricaturing the Faust themes, thus reflecting in tone Goethe's philosophical implications that Mephistopheles is but Faust's alter-ego, surely reveals the touch of a master.

Mr. Meyrowitz again demonstrates in this somewhat shortened version of the symphony that he is a conductor of exceptional attainments. His conception is plastically moulded, imaginative and tonally satisfying. The final tenor solo and choral section, "Alles Vergaengliche ist nur ein Gleichniss," is sung by Mr. Villabella and the Alexis Vlassof Russian Choir in a language which, according to the Gramophone Shop Encyclopedia of Recorded Music, "is probably French." Repeated hearings have left me in a similar quandary as to the tongue employed. I could not distinguish a single word which seemed part of any European language.

Another timely release is that of Handel's "Messiah," conducted by Sir Thomas Beecham, with the London Symphony Orchestra, organ, the B. B. C. Choir, and Dora Labbette, soprano; Muriel Brunskill, contralto; Hubert Eisdell, tenor, and Harold Williams, barytone.

The recording is not complete. Among the surprising omissions are the "Pastoral" Symphony and the final "Amen" chorus. However, the two albums hold the major part of this the greatest of Handel's works. Sir Thomas's interpretation is in all respects a vital one. His tempi are on the quick side, and the B. B. C. Chorus is to be felicitated on its clean delivery of the florid passages, even when the pacing approaches the vertiginous. The soloists are all singers of authoritative style, if not, with the exception of Miss Brunskill, endowed with voices of much sensuous charm.

Verdi's "Rigoletto" has been made available by Columbia in the recording by the Orchestra and Chorus of La Scala under Lorenzo Molajoli's direction, with Riccardo Stracciari singing the title part, the Spanish soprano, Mercedes Capsir, as Gilda, Dino Borgioli, as Duke of Mantau, Ernesto Dominici, as Sparafucile and Mme. A. Massetti Bassi, as Maddelena, and other members of the Scala Company in the remaining parts.

The Rigoletto of the veteran Stracciari, is a first rate accomplishment, amazing for the freshness of voice disclosed throughout. The sixty-one-year-old barytone peals forth high G's and A flats in a manner which proves that a voice skillfully projected can defy the ravages of time. Otherwise the performance is a mediocre one on the part of the principals. Miss Capsir, although she reaches and sustains the E in altissimo in the music accompanying her exit after the close of "Caro Nôme," sings for the most part with wavering, strident tones. Mr. Borgioli voices his part with some semblance of style, though without true distinction, and he is not above making things easy for himself in "La Donna e Mobile," by failing to hold crucial notes for the length of time indicated in the score.

There is a musically and mechanically excellent recording of Beethoven's quartet in A minor, Op. 132 by the Lener Quartet, an equally satisfying set containing Bizet's first "Arlesienne" suite, played by the London Philaharmonic under Sir Thomas Beecham and those who enjoy the acerbities of Aaron Copland's study on a Jewish theme, "Vitebsk." may hear them to their hear's content played by the composer, as pianist, Ivor Karman, violinst and David Freed, cellist. On the reverse side of the second record, the same composer's ukelele serenade will be found.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 27 1936

THE ORCHESTRAS

FAMILIAR music will be performed by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under John Barbirolli's direction this afternoon at Carnegie Hall, where Josef Hofmann will be the soloist in Chopin's piano concerto in F minor. The first Sibelius symphony, played in the program of December 17-18, will be repeated.

A new symphony by Anis Fuleihan, a naturalized American composer, will have its first public performances in Mr. Barbirolli's program for next Thursday night and Friday afternoon, December 31 and January 1, at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Fuleihan, whose "Preface to a Child's Story Book" was introduced by the National Orchestral Association last season, was born in Cyprus and has lived here since 1915. The symphony, which is in four movements taking about twenty minutes to play, was composed between last August and October.

The program also includes Weber's overture, "Der Beherrscher der Geister" (the Ruler of the Spirits), originally composed for his unfinished opera, "Rübezahl," in 1804 and, after revision, published in 1811 under a new title. It was last played here by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Arturo Toscanini in March, 1930.

In Mozart's unfamiliar Sinfonia Concertante for oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horn with orchestra, the soloists will be the Philharmonic's respective principal instrumentalists, Bruno Labate, Simeon Bellison, Benjamin Kohon and Bruce Jaenicke.

On Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, January 2 and 3, Josef Szigeti, in his first appearance here this season, and John Amans, first flutist of the orchestra, will be the soloists, the former in the Beethoven violin concerto and the latter in a concertino for flute and orchestra by Cécile Chaminade. Mr. Barbirolli will conduct his last concerts of the season on Wednesday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday, January 6, 8, 9 and 10. Igor Stravinsky will conduct the first concert of his fortnight's stay here on Thursday night, January 14.

Mr. Stassevitch's Program

Paul Stassevitch will conduct the second orchestra concert in his series of three at Town Hall on Wednesday night, December 30. The program, differing considerably from the list originally announced, will include the first performance in this country of a symphony in C by Muzio Clementi, which is one of two reassembled and revised by Alfredo Casella from fragments which he had found in the Library of Congress and abroad. The other symphony, in D, was performed by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky on December 4. Another item in the program is Beethoven's Great Fugue, Op. 133, originally planned as the finale for the string quartet in B flat, Op. 130.

Philadelphia Orchestra

For the fifth concert of its Carnegie Hall series on Tuesday night, January 5, in Carnegie Hall, the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy's direction will give an all-Rachmaninoff program including the choral symphony "The Bells" and the second piano concerto, in C minor, with the composer as soloist. In "The Bells" the assisting chorus will be the University of Pennsylvania Choral Society, of which Hare McDonald is director, with Agnes Davis, soprano; Fritz Krueger, tenor, and Elwood Hawkins, barytone, as the soloists. It was first presented here in February, 1920, by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Leopold Stokowski. The text is a Russian version of Edgar Allan Poe's poem, "The Bells." In 1920, an English translation of the Russian text was used, as Poe's poem did not fit the music.

Alfredo Casella's reconstruction of Clementi's symphony will have its first performance in New York in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's next concert in Carnegie Hall, Thursday night, January 7, in a program opening with Arthur Foote's suite for strings in E, Op. 63, and closing with Brahms's fourth symphony.

On Saturday afternoon, January 9, Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce here a divertimento in four parts from his allegorical ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee." Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the soloist in MacDowell's second piano concerto, played in honor of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the composer's birth (December 18). Cesar Franck's symphony will follow.

The third symphony of the Russian-American composer, Nicolai Berezowsky, will have its first public performance on Thursday afternoon, January 7, by the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra under Jose Iturbi's direction at the Eastman Theater. Mr. Iturbi will appear as piano soloist with the Cincinnati Symphony next Friday and Saturday, with Vladimir Bakaleinikoff conducting during Eugene Goossens's mid-season vacation.

The Cleveland Orchestra, under Artur Rodzinski, will give Verdi's Requiem next Friday and Saturday, with Rosa Tentoni, Rose Bampton, Mario Chamlee and Chase Baromeo as the soloists.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

DEC 27 1936

A New Symphony To Be Performed On Thursday

A NEW symphony by Anis Fuleihan will have its premiere at Thursday night's Philharmonic-Symphony concert, on a program which will also include the Weber Overture. "The Ruler of the Spirits," a Mozart Sinfonia Concertante for Solo Oboe, Clarinet, Bassoon and Horn, with orchestral accompaniment, and the Polka and Fugue from Weinberger's opera "Schwanda." The soloists in the Mozart work will be Bruno Labate, Simeon Bellison, Benjamin Kohon and Bruno Jaenicke. The program will be repeated Friday afternoon.

Anis Fuleihan is a young composer, a naturalized American, born 35 years ago on the island of Cyprus. He came to the United States in 1915 and has lived here ever since. He received most of his musical education in this country. The symphony, in four movements lasting about 20 minutes, was started last August and finished in October. Other works of Mr. Fuleihan's are his Suite "Mediterranean," which has been performed by the Cincinnati, St. Louis and Detroit Orchestras and which Ernest Schelling plans for one of his Young People's Concerts this season, a "Preface to a Child's Story Book," which Leon Barzin and the National Orchestral Association did last year, and "Symphonic Episode," which Jose Iturbi hopes to do in Rochester later this Winter.

* * *

A work of importance to be performed at the second of a series of three orchestral concerts at Town Hall on Wednesday evening of this week, under the direction of Paul Stassevitch, will be Clementi's Sinfonia in C major, recently discovered and revised by Alfredo Casella. This is one of the two Clementi symphonies, fragments of which were found abroad and in the Library of Congress here and laboriously reassembled by Casella. The other, the Symphony in D major, was given on Dec. 4 in Boston by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. The first American performance of the C major opus was promised Stassevitch by Casélla last March . . . Also of interest on Mr. Stassevitch's program will be a performance by string orchestra of Beethoven's Grosse Fuge. The conductor believes that this work has not been given before in this country except in its original form, for string quartet.

GREENFIELD, MASS.
Recorder-Gazette

DEC 24 193

MUSIC APPRECIATION

by HAROLD LESLIE

EARLY DEVELOPMENT OF MUSIC

Music developed very slowly in comparison with the other arts until the nineteenth century. Its development may be divided historically, into three main periods:

900 A. D.

(a) the melodic—4000 B. C. (Egyptian) to
(b) the polyphonic—900 A. D. to 1600 A. D.
(c) the harmonic—1600 A. D. to the present time.

Melodic means, in this case, a one voice melody. Polyphonic means that two or more melodies are combined, each voice being of equal importance. Harmonic means that one voice is more important and that the others form an accompaniment.

We know that the Egyptians used music a great deal. They were not allowed by the government to develop new music and much of it was considered sacred and used only in the temples. Through the discovery of an Egyptian flute, we have found that they used a scale of several octaves similar to our own. They used lyres, a kind of harp, in different forms, pipes, and rattles. They also used trumpets and tambourines in the army. We know that at times they had orchestras of 600 players. (Our Boston Symphony is comprised of about 112 performers.) ETC.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM

DEC 23 193

FIEDLER GUEST CONDUCTOR HERE

ARTHUR FIEDLER

Music lovers of Greater Lawrence will receive another great personage on Sunday, January 3, when Arthur Fiedler, director of the Boston Symphony "Pops" orchestra, will be guest conductor at a program to be presented by the Alumni orchestra in the Oliver school hall.

The success of the "Pops" in Boston is largely due to Mr. Fiedler's magnetic personality, and his interpretation of the popular classics.

The entire program which has been arranged by the guest, will include Mozart's "E Flat Major Symphony;" the first performance in this country of A. Tscherpnin's "Danses Russes" and Rameau Mottl's "Batt'e Suite.' The program will include conditions of a lighter nature.

The Alumni orchestra has been successful in procuring guest artists of the highest calibre. It is hoped that a large attendance will be on hand to honor its efforts.

BULLETIN

DEC 17 1936

symphonic

JUST BECAUSE THE VOCAL END of your radio boasts a high forehead tonight, the musical side follows suite. Two full-hour symphony concerts grace your dial.

The first will come from the Sanders theater in Cambridge, Mass., at an early hour. There the Boston Symphony will be playing one of its regular Harvard University subscription concerts. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is to conduct. (KECA, 5)

Program details follow:

"Romeo and Juliet"..........Tchaikovsky
Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra ....Edward Dowell
Howard Goding, soloist

SANTA MONICA, CALIF.
OUTLOOK

DEC 17 193

symphonic

JUST BECAUSE THE VOCAL END of your radio boasts a high forehead tonight, the musical side follows suite. Two full-hour symphony concerts grace your dial.

The first will come from the Sanders theater in Cambridge, Mass., at an early hour. There the Boston Symphony will be playing one of its regular Harvard University subscription concerts. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is to conduct. (KECA, 5)

Program details follow:

"Romeo and Juliet"..........Tchaikovsky
Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra ....Edward Dowell
Howard Goding, soloist

The other symphonic offering is one of your regular Thursday favorites—the Standard Symphony Hour. (KFI, 8:15)

Members of the Los Angeles Philharmonic orchestra will play from NBC's Hollywood studios. Batoning will be Henri Svedrovsky. An interesting program is puromised:

Overture: "In Springtime"..Goldmark
Fantastic Symphony.....................Berlioz
a. Pastorale
b. March to the Scaffold
Midsummer Night's Dream...Mendelssohn
a. Nocturne
Enter of the Gods into Valhalla—"Das Rhinegold"....................Wagner
Tales from the Vienna Woods..Strauss

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 27 1936

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

ALTHOUGH neither the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra nor the Philadelphia nor the ~~Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra found it worth its while to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of Liszt's death with a performance here of his greatest work, the "Faust" symphony, the Columbia Phonograph Company has made amends for this regrettable neglect by putting forth the recorded version of this composition by the Grand Orchestre Philharmonique, of Paris, under Selmar Meyrowitz's direction.

Of the numerous attempts to portray musically the characters of Goethe's "Faust," Liszt's is by far the most telling. Even Hugo Wolf, whose adoration for Wagner knew no bounds and who admired the latter's "Faust" overture, grew ecstatic when he reviewed the first performance in Vienna of Liszt's symphony and dubbed it "one of the most grandiose creations in the whole sphere of music." This may seem extravagant praise to Liszt's snobbish present-day detractors, but listening to this music with an unprejudiced ear, the symphony's wealth of ideas and the mastery with which they have been expressed therein cannot fail to impress one. And since Liszt wisely refrains from attempting to follow the scenic succession of Goethe's tragedy and labels his three movements after its three principal characters, Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles, he avoids the mistakes made by Berlioz in his "Romeo and Juliet" symphony. The conflicting elements of Faust's nature, the introspective, brooding melancholy, the searching after an unattainable ideal, the romantic eroticism, have been strikingly reflected in the thematic material, as have the winsome girlish simplicity and tenderness of Gretchen. And the virtuosity with which Liszt has depicted Mephistopheles, with his impudence, calculating coldness, frivolity and denial of the meaning of all human endeavor, by caricaturing the Faust themes, thus reflecting in tone Goethe's philosophical implications that Mephistopheles is but Faust's alter-ego, surely reveals the touch of a master.

Mr. Meyrowitz again demonstrates in this somewhat shortened version of the symphony that he is a conductor of exceptional attainments. His conception is plastically moulded, imaginative and tonally satisfying. The final tenor solo and choral section, "Alles Vergaengliche ist nur ein Gleichniss," is sung by Mr. Villabella and the Alexis Vlassof Russian Choir in a language which, according to the Gramophone Shop Encyclopedia of Recorded Music, "is probably French." Repeated hearings have left me in a similar quandary as to the tongue employed. I could not distinguish a single word which seemed part of any European language.

Another timely release is that of Handel's "Messiah," conducted by Sir Thomas Beecham, with the London Symphony Orchestra, organ, the B. B. C. Choir, and Dora Labbette, soprano; Muriel Brunskill, contralto; Hubert Eisdell, tenor, and Harold Williams, barytone.

The recording is not complete. Among the surprising omissions are the "Pastoral" Symphony and the final "Amen" chorus. However, the two albums hold the major part of this the greatest of Handel's works. Sir Thomas's interpretation is in all respects a vital one. His tempi are on the quick side, and the B. B. C. Chorus is to be felicitated on its clean delivery of the florid passages, even when the pacing approaches the vertiginous. The soloists are all singers of authoritative style, if not, with the exception of Miss Brunskill, endowed with voices of much sensuous charm.

Verdi's "Rigoletto" has been made available by Columbia in the recording by the Orchestra and Chorus of La Scala under Lorenzo Molajoli's direction, with Riccardo Stracciari singing the title part, the Spanish soprano, Mercedes Capsir, as Gilda, Dino Borgioli, as Duke of Mantau, Ernesto Dominici, as Sparafucile and Mme. A. Massetti Bassi, as Maddelena, and other members of the Scala Company in the remaining parts.

The Rigoletto of the veteran Stracciari, is a first rate accomplishment, amazing for the freshness of voice disclosed throughout. The sixty-one-year-old barytone peals forth high G's and A flats in a manner which proves that a voice skillfully projected can defy the ravages of time. Otherwise the performance is a mediocre one on the part of the principals. Miss Capsir, although she reaches and sustains the E in altissimo in the music accompanying her exit after the close of "Caro Nôme," sings for the most part with wavering, strident tones. Mr. Borgioli voices his part with some semblance of style, though without true distinction, and he is not above making things easy for himself in "La Donna e Mobile," by failing to hold crucial notes for the length of time indicated in the score.

There is a musically and mechanically excellent recording of Beethoven's quartet in A minor, Op. 132 by the Lener Quartet, an equally satisfying set containing Bizet's first "Arlesienne" suite, played by the London Philaharmonic under Sir Thomas Beecham and those who enjoy the acerbities of Aaron Copland's study on a Jewish theme, "Vitebsk," may hear them to their hear's content played by the composer, as pianist, Ivor Karman, violinst and David Freed, cellist. On the reverse side of the second record, the same composer's ukelele serenade will be found.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

DEC 27 1936

THE ORCHESTRAS

FAMILIAR music will be performed by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under John Barbirolli's direction this afternoon at Carnegie Hall, where Josef Hofmann will be the soloist in Chopin's piano concerto in F minor. The first Sibelius symphony, played in the program of December 17-18, will be repeated.

A new symphony by Anis Fuleihan, a naturalized American composer, will have its first public performances in Mr. Barbirolli's program for next Thursday night and Friday afternoon, December 31 and January 1, at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Fuleihan, whose "Preface to a Child's Story Book" was introduced by the National Orchestral Association last season, was born in Cyprus and has lived here since 1915. The symphony, which is in four movements taking about twenty minutes to play, was composed between last August and October.

The program also includes Weber's overture, "Der Beherrscher der Geister" (the Ruler of the Spirits), originally composed for his unfinished opera, "Rübezahl," in 1804 and, after revision, published in 1811 under a new title. It was last played here by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Arturo Toscanini in March, 1930.

In Mozart's unfamiliar Sinfonia Concertante for oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horn with orchestra, the soloists will be the Philharmonic's respective principal instrumentalists, Bruno Labate, Simeon Bellison, Benjamin Kohon and Bruce Jaenicke.

On Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, January 2 and 3, Josef Szigeti, in his first appearance here this season, and John Amans, first flutist of the orchestra, will be the soloists, the former in the Beethoven violin concerto and the latter in a concertino for flute and orchestra by Cécile Chaminade. Mr. Barbirolli will conduct his last concerts of the season on Wednesday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday, January 6, 8, 9 and 10. Igor Stravinsky will conduct the first concert of his fortnight's stay here on Thursday night, January 14.

Mr. Stassevitch's Program

Paul Stassevitch will conduct the second orchestra concert in his series of three at Town Hall on Wednesday night, December 30. The program, differing considerably from the list originally announced, will include the first performance in this country of a symphony in C by Muzio Clementi, which is one of two reassembled and revised by Alfredo Casella from fragments which he had found in the Library of Congress and abroad. The other symphony, in D, was performed by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky on December 4. Another item in the program is Beethoven's Great Fugue, Op. 133, originally planned as the finale for the string quartet in B flat, Op. 130.

Philadelphia Orchestra

For the fifth concert of its Carnegie Hall series on Tuesday night, January 5, in Carnegie Hall, the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy's direction will give an all-Rachmaninoff program including the choral symphony "The Bells" and the second piano concerto, in C minor, with the composer as soloist. In "The Bells" the assisting chorus will be the University of Pennsylvania Choral Society, of which Hare McDonald is director, with Agnes Davis, soprano; Fritz Krueger, tenor, and Elwood Hawkins, barytone, as the soloists. It was first presented here in February, 1920, by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Leopold Stokowski. The text is a Russian version of Edgar Allan Poe's poem, "The Bells." In 1920, an English translation of the Russian text was used, as Poe's poem did not fit the music.

Alfredo Casella's reconstruction of Clementi's symphony will have its first performance in New York in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's next concert in Carnegie Hall, Thursday night, January 7, in a program opening with Arthur Foote's suite for strings in E, Op. 63, and closing with Brahms's fourth symphony.

On Saturday afternoon, January 9, Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce here a divertimento in four parts from his allegorical ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee." Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the soloist in MacDowell's second piano concerto, played in honor of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the composer's birth (December 18). Cesar Franck's symphony will follow.

The third symphony of the Russian-American composer, Nicolai Berezowsky, will have its first public performance on Thursday afternoon, January 7, by the Rochester Philharnomic Orchestra under Jose Iturbi's direction at the Eastman Theater. Mr. Iturbi will appear as piano soloist with the Cincinnati Symphony next Friday and Saturday, with Vladimir Bakaleinikoff conducting during Eugene Goossens's mid-season vacation.

The Cleveland Orchestra, under Artur Rodzinski, will give Verdi's Requiem next Friday and Saturday, with Rosa Tentoni, Rose Bampton, Mario Chamlee and Chase Baromeo as the soloists.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

DEC 27 1936

A New Symphony To Be Performed On Thursday

A NEW symphony by Anis Fuleihan will have its premiere at Thursday night's Philharmonic-Symphony concert, on a program which will also include the Weber Overture. "The Ruler of the Spirits," a Mozart Sinfonia Concertante for Solo Oboe, Clarinet, Bassoon and Horn, with orchestral accompaniment, and the Polka and Fugue from Weinberger's opera "Schwanda." The soloists in the Mozart work will be Bruno Labate, Simeon Bellison, Benjamin Kohon and Bruno Jaenicke. The program will be repeated Friday afternoon.

Anis Fuleihan is a young composer, a naturalized American, born 35 years ago on the island of Cyprus. He came to the United States in 1915 and has lived here ever since. He received most of his musical education in this country. The symphony, in four movements lasting about 20 minutes, was started last August and finished in October. Other works of Mr. Fuleihan's are his Suite "Mediterranean," which has been performed by the Cincinnati, St. Louis and Detroit Orchestras and which Ernest Schelling plans for one of his Young People's Concerts this season, a "Preface to a Child's Story Book," which Leon Barzin and the National Orchestral Association did last year, and "Symphonic Episode," which Jose Iturbi hopes to do in Rochester later this Winter.

* * *

A work of importance to be performed at the second of a series of three orchestral concerts at Town Hall on Wednesday evening of this week, under the direction of Paul Stassevitch, will be Clementi's Sinfonia in C major, recently discovered and revised by Alfredo Casella. This is one of the two Clementi symphonies, fragments of which were found abroad and in the Library of Congress here and laboriously reassembled by Casella. The other, the Symphony in D major, was given on Dec. 4 in Boston by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. The first American performance of the C major opus was promised Stassevitch by Casella last March . . . Also of interest on Mr. Stassevitch's program will be a performance by string orchestra of Beethoven's Grosse Fuge. The conductor believes that this work has not been given before in this country except in its original form, for string quartet.

GREENFIELD, MASS.
Recorder-Gazette

DEC 24 1936

MUSIC APPRECIATION

by HAROLD LESLIE

EARLY DEVELOPMENT OF MUSIC

Music developed very slowly in comparison with the other arts until the nineteenth century. Its development may be divided historically, into three main periods:

900 A. D.
(a) the melodic—4000 B. C. (Egyptian) to
(b) the polyphonic—900 A. D. to 1600 A. D.
(c) the harmonic—1600 A. D. to the present time.

Melodic means, in this case, a one voice melody. Polyphonic means that two or more melodies are combined, each voice being of equal importance. Harmonic means that one voice is more important and that the others form an accompaniment.

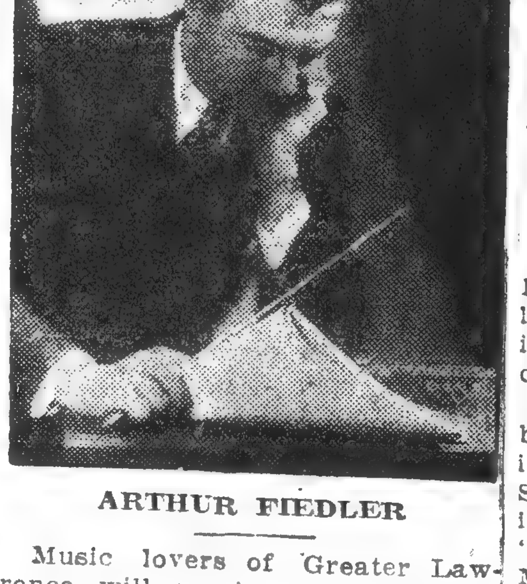
We know that the Egyptians used music a great deal. They were not allowed by the government to develop new music and much of it was considered sacred and used only in the temples. Through the discovery of an Egyptian flute, we have found that they used a scale of several octaves similar to our own. They used lyres, a kind of harp, in different forms, pipes, and rattles. They also used trumpets and tambourines in the army. We know that at times they had orchestras of 600 players. (Our Boston Symphony is comprised of about 112 performers.)

ETC.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM

DEC 23 1936

FIEDLER GUEST CONDUCTOR HERE



ARTHUR FIEDLER

Music lovers of Greater Lawrence will receive another great personage on Sunday, January 3, when Arthur Fiedler, director of the Boston Symphony "Pops" orchestra, will be guest conductor at a program to be presented by the Alumni orchestra in the Oliver school hall.

The success of the "Pops" in Boston is largely due to Mr. Fiedler's magnetic personality, and his interpretation of the popular classics.

The entire program which has been arranged by the guest, will include Mozart's "E Flat Major Symphony;" the first performance in this country of A. Tscherpnin's "Danses Russes" and Rameau Mottl's "Battle Suite.' The program will include conditions of a lighter nature.

The Alumni orchestra has been successful in procuring guest artists of the highest calibre. It is hoped that a large attendance will be on hand to honor its efforts.

BULLETIN

DEC 17 1936

symphonic

JUST BECAUSE THE VOCAL END of your radio boasts a high forehead tonight, the musical side follows suite. Two full-hour symphony concerts grace your dial.

The first will come from the Sanders theater in Cambridge, Mass., at an early hour. There the Boston Symphony will be playing one of its regular Harvard University subscription concerts. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is to conduct. (KECA, 5)

Program details follow:

"Romeo and Juliet"............Tchaikovsky
Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra ....Edward Dowell
Howard Goding, soloist

SANTA MONICA, CALIF.
OUTLOOK

DEC 17 1936

symphonic

JUST BECAUSE THE VOCAL END of your radio boasts a high forehead tonight, the musical side follows suite. Two full-hour symphony concerts grace your dial.

The first will come from the Sanders theater in Cambridge, Mass., at an early hour. There the ~~Boston~~ Symphony will be playing one of its regular Harvard University subscription concerts. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is to conduct. (KECA, 5)

Program details follow:

"Romeo and Juliet"...........Tchaikovsky
Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra ....Edward Dowell
Howard Goding, soloist

The other symphonic offering is one of your regular Thursday favorites—the Standard Symphony Hour. (KFI, 8:15)

Members of the Los Angeles Philharmonic orchestra will play from NBC's Hollywood studios. Batoning will be Henri Svedrovsky. An interesting program is puromised:

Overture: "In Springtime"..Goldmark
Fantastic Symphony.......................Berlioz
a. Pastorale
b. March to the Scaffold
Midsummer Night's Dream...Mendelssohn
a. Nocturne
Enter of the Gods into Valhalla—"Das Rhinegold"...................Wagner
Tales from the Vienna Woods..Strauss

146

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 28 1936

P. L. STACKPOLE DIES; LAWYER IN BOSTON

During War He Served as Gen. Liggett's Personal Aide—Held Colonel's Rank.

DECORATED FOR HIS WORK

Trustee of the Boston Symphony and of the New England Conservatory of Music.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Dec. 27.—Pierpont Langley Stackpole, senior active member of the law firm of Warner, Stackpole & Bradlee, died last evening at Phillips House after a brief illness at the age of 61.

Born in Brookline, he was graduated from Harvard University in 1897 and from Harvard Law School in 1900. He became associated in law with Joseph B. and Henry E. Warner and after a few years became a member of his present firm.

In the World War Mr. Stackpole was for one and a half years personal aide to General Hunter Liggett, commanding officer of the First Army and of the Army of Occupation. He reached the rank of colonel and received the Distinguished Service medal from General Pershing, the Order of the Crown of Belgium and the French Legion of Honor.

Mr. Stackpole was vice president and a member of the board of trustees of the New England Conservatory of Music, trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and ~~treasurer~~ of the South End House Association. He had served in various capacities with the Community Federation of Boston.

He was a director of the Merchants National Bank of Boston and a member of the Union and Somerset Clubs of Boston and Knickerbocker Club of New York.

Surviving are his widow and two brothers, the Rev. Markham W. Stackpole of Milton and Stephen T. Stackpole of Detroit.

NEW YORK MIRROR
DEC 28 1936

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. ~~Serge~~ Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its second visit of the season to New York for a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 9.

At the Thursday evening concert, Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce to New York the symphony in D major by Muzio Clementi, the celebrated contemporary of Beethoven. The symphony, with many others which were highly praised in Clementi's time, disappeared at his death and were not discovered until almost a hundred years later.

Mr. Alfredo Casella has restored this and another in C major, and performed them last Winter in Italy. The symphony in D major was given its first American performances in Boston by this orchestra. The program will also include Mr. Arthur Foote's Suite for String Orchestra in E major, and the fourth symphony of Brahms in E minor.

At the Saturday matinee, Dr. Koussevitzky will give the first performance in New York of the music from Stravinsky's ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee," based on themes of Tschaikowsky. The second pianoforte concerto of Mr. Edward MacDowell, the 75th anniversary of whose death occurred this month, also will be performed. The soloist will be Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma, the Puerto Rican-American pianist. The closing number will be the symphony of Cesar Franck in D minor.

* * *

Two contemporary operas are to be produced for the 1936-37 season by the Opera School of the Juilliard School of Music: "Gar~~rick,~~ a romantic comedy-opera, by Robert A. Simon and Albert Stoessel, will be offered Feb. 24 to 27; "The Poisoned Kiss," a romantic extravaganza, by Evelyn Sharp and R. Vaughan Williams, April 21 to 24.

PAGANINI THE VIOLINIST

The Legends and the Man

Paganini, the Romantic Virtuoso. By Jeffrey Pulver. (Herbert Joseph. 12s. 6d.)

Sun. Times

By J. M. BULLOCH

FOUR strings and a hank of horsehair. That, in Mr. Pulver's phrase, was the spell by which Nicolo Paganini brought the world to his feet. There was even less in it than that, for one string, the G, was enough for him at times, and with two he could do marvels. But, although he calls for no elaborate psychological analysis, there was also more in it all, for he possessed dramatic and emotional power and versatility as well, and he will be matched only when a personality like his appears, endowed with his physical, mental, and spiritual attributes.

Mr. Pulver, as a professional violinist, knows what he is speaking about when he says this. But the tragedy of all actors and musical artists is that their gift vanishes with them, and we can judge of them merely by reading of the impression they made on those who actually heard them, though in Paganini's case we have the scores of the very difficult music he composed to show what he could achieve in point of technique. What Mr. Pulver, therefore, has been mainly content to do is to present him largely in the terms of his background, which explains and excuses much of his amazing musical achievement and his character as a man. Mr. Pulver is peculiarly well equipped for the survey, for he has already given us, inter alia, a dictionary of old English music and also a biography of Brahms, while his general intelligence helps him to interpret the complexities of Europe's psychology in one of the most pregnant phases of the world's history.

The Genius of Genoa

Between the day in 1782, not 1784 as usually given, when Paganini was born in Genoa, and 1840 when he died at Nice—and between then and 1926 when his mortal remains were brought back to be buried at Genoa—the world changed almost out of recognition, in striking contrast to the permanence of his fame. Even in his own early years there were enough changes, including the escape from Napoleonism, to make it seem a new place, and to account in its clamour after liberty for much in Paganini's complete unconventionality as a man and as a musician. His nondescript father Antonio kept him at it when as a mere child he began to play. He had several teachers, but Mr. Pulver decides that he was self-made and self-taught. "Aided by his natural aptitude, he leaped over three or four stages of normal development and reached the zenith of his power a century before his time."

His emotional adventures make a movie, but certainly not a moving picture in the big sense, beginning seriously and valuably with his three years with the gentlewoman "Dida," whose identity, to his credit, he never disclosed. Then came the three years at the court of Napoleon's difficult sister Elise, grotesquely created Princess of Lucca, for whom he composed a sonata, on the G string alone, on the Corsican—though he was not the first composer to use one string. He found his greatest difficulty with Antonia Bianchi, "the singing spitfire," whom he ultimately paid off.

The portrait of Paganini bequeathed by tradition pictures a sort of desperado sheik, for, as Mr. Pulver says, it asks us to regard him as incurably dissipated, an inveterate gambler, eccentric, selfish, cruel, morbid, avaricious. It declares he led a band of brigands, that he seduced any maid whose eye chanced to meet his glance, that he abducted noble women and killed their husbands: last of all, that he secured his mastery of mankind and his pre-eminence in his art from the devil in exchange for a soul already sufficiently blasted and damned.

London, which he first visited in May, 1831, "preceded by the speedy posthorses of scandal and the glamorous expresses of Satan." The talk of the high prices for his concerts made him a marked man whenever he showed himself in the street:—

> People followed him, crowded before him and behind him, so that often he could not move at all: they spoke to him in English, of which he understood not one syllable: they even touched his clothes and pinched his arms to make sure that he was real.

He made a fortune in our midst on this and other occasions, and, having ended his professional career at Turin in July, 1837, indulged in his old passion for gambling in building a casino in Paris, which was refused a licence and failed. The phthisis which affected his larynx grew worse and worse, and at last he flickered out in 1840 at Nice, a shadow of his former self.

Where Paganini Scored

Although, as noted, Mr. Pulver is a professional violinist, he has reserved till the last chapter, headed "For Violinists Only," his estimate of Paganini's contribution to violin playing. He knows how difficult it is to decide who "invented" certain features of music, but he decides that he added new effects to the violinist's materia technica in the domain of bowing, left hand pizzicato, and single and double harmonics. It is very much to be doubted if his marvellous technical facility was, to as great an extent as is generally supposed, the result only of frantic practising, which, by the way, few people ever heard him do. What was of even greater aid to him was "the peculiar adaptability of his body, the suitability of his organs, and the ease with which his mental processes and his physical reactions collaborated." Dr. Francesco Bennati, the physiologist who examined him thoroughly, pointed out that his left shoulder was higher than the other. His hand was no larger than the normal, but thanks to the elasticity peculiar to all its parts, his span was doubled. By that means he could bend the upper joints of the fingers of his left hand in a lateral direction, and with the greatest ease and rapidity.

Nicolo Paganini

Philharmonic Plays Barbirolli Arrangements

N. Y. Tribune

Interpretations of Suite by Purcell for Strings Presented by Orchestra

Dec. 25/36

Josef Hofmann Soloist

Is Head in Fifth Piano Concerto by Beethoven

John Barbirolli's program with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra last night began with his own arrangement of a suite of pieces by Purcell for strings which he had directed here early in November, continued with Debussy's three symphonic sketches, "La Mer," and closed with the fifth piano concerto in E flat of Beethoven, in which the solo part was performed by Josef Hofmann.

Purcell's music evidently has a strong appeal for Mr. Barbirolli and it was in the six short pieces from the "Gordian Knot Untied," "Distressed Innocence," "The Married Man" and from a choral anthem, that he accomplished his most satisfying interpretations.

The conductor's approach to Debussy's superb evocation of the sea was forthright. It was obvious that he had spared no pains in his efforts to do justice to the composer's intentions. But this score needs greater subtlety in the employment of the dynamic palette, as well as an enkindling imagination if Debussy's ideas are to be unfolded with all of their teeming fantasy.

Of Mr. Hofmann's superb achievement in the realization of the contents of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, it is impossible to speak too warmly. This was more than the piano playing of a great virtuoso. For, in addition to the magnificent mastery of the technical problems to be encountered in this, the most puissant of the master's concerti, Mr. Hofmann set forth the music with tonal splendor and with profound insight into the master's creative mind.

J. D. B.

The Symphonies Of Brahms

THERE is but one way to account for the frequent performance of the Brahms symphonies today wherever there is a first-rate orchestra and a public thoroughly conversant with symphonic music. These symphonies, quite as much as Beethoven's nine and the two that are about all the world hears of Schubert's equally extended series, are precisely that "music of humanity, mysterious but still infinitely expressive and comprehensible" that the worthy conductor [Felix Weingartner] said they were not. While the Tchaikovsky symphonies and the once universally popular "From the New World" of Dvořák were gradually sating the public that formerly adored them (which is not to be construed as a denial either of their inspiration or their splendid workmanship) the Brahms symphonies were building a more lasting affection, slowly but certainly. They did not build this affection as "scientific music"; they built it because of a human appeal that today may fairly challenge that of the Beethoven symphonies. . . .

What has brought about this change of attitude on the part of those who listen primarily to enjoy? There is one very simple answer. The melodies that escaped the ears of multitudes of listeners when these symphonies were relatively young are now readily grasped and eagerly awaited. For those who know these symphonies even casually (in the sense that the knowledge which comes from hearing occasional or even frequent performances is a casual knowledge) the Brahms four are among the most melodious of symphonies. Indeed, the charge has been heard in certain quarters that Brahms permitted himself to be led astray by the German Lied; that because his symphonies are too songful they are not symphonies! To grasp the Brahms melodies is to open the door to other qualities of these symphonies, their harmonic richness, their rhythmic variety, their still somewhat peculiar instrumental coloring, and their structural strength and cohesiveness. But the grasp of the melody must come first.

The controversy that raged about the Brahms symphonies when they were new made much of his right to succeed to the mantle of Beethoven. In referring to the Brahms First Symphony as "The Tenth," thereby associating it with the Beethoven Ninth, the conductor and piano virtuoso, Hans von Bülow, brought down on the head of the composer the wrath of many a worshiper of Beethoven. Today, the mot about "The Tenth" has no such particular concern for us, in spite of the somewhat obvious resemblance between the principal melody of the last movement of Beethoven's Ninth and the melody which occupies a similar position in the Brahms First. Brahms's right to stand with Beethoven as a symphonist is based on quite other considerations than a likeness of theme or of treatment here and there. It rests, rather, on the strength and nobility that his music possesses in common with that of his titanic predecessor.—OSCAR THOMPSON, in "How to Understand Music." (New York: Dial Press.)

Here With Poker Ballet

N. Y. Tribune Dec. 25/36

Igor Stravinsky

Poker Ballet Brought Here By Stravinsky

(Continued from page one)

poker, or whether deuces would be wild.

Having completed this work, Mr. Stravinsky plans to rest a while from composition, but he has a busy schedule ahead for this, his third American tour. He will pass the Christmas week end at the Sulgrave Hotel with Samuel Dushkin, American violinist, who came here with him, and has specialized as an interpreter of his music for many years. Next week he will go to Toronto to conduct an orchestral concert, and then return here to begin rehearsals for his six concerts with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. A few recitals in various towns will intervene before he takes up the Philharmonic baton for his first concert on Thursday, January 14, at Carnegie Hall.

His Philharmonic programs will include the first performance here of his capriccio for piano and orchestra, with Beveridge Webster, young American pianist, as the soloist, and the violin concerto with Mr. Dushkin as soloist. Mr. Stravinsky said that he looked forward eagerly to conducting the Philharmonic, with which he had made some guest appearances on his first trip here in 1925, and admired as one of the world's foremost orchestras. He also expressed admiration for the work of John Barbirolli, the Philharmonic's new permanent conductor.

After his last orchestral appearance here on January 24, and a Town Hall recital with Mr. Dushkin the next week, Mr. Stravinsky will conduct in Montreal and then appear in Cleveland and on tour, with the Cleveland Orchestra. He will work gradually westward during February, reaching the Pacific Coast in March, where the programs under his direction will include a large-scale production of "Petrouchka" in ballet form in Los Angeles. He plans to sail for Europe early in April, but may stay over for the American Ballet's series.

The Russian composer, who is a naturalized French citizen, said that the voyage of the Normandie had been notably rough for the first two days, but then relatively calm.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

Music

PROGRAM CORRECTED.

"Fantasie Americana," by Milton Rosen, young composer now residing in Cincinnati, announced for the symphony concerts this week, will be played on the program of the following pair, January 8 and 9. Vladimir Bakaleinikoff, assistant conductor of the orchestra, will be director. The piano solo of the work, performed originally by the Boston Symphony, will be played ~~by John~~ Quincy Bass. Joseph Szigeti will be violin soloist and will be heard in the Mendelssohn concerto.

146

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 28 1936

P. L. STACKPOLE DIES; LAWYER IN BOSTON

During War He Served as Gen. Liggett's Personal Aide—Held Colonel's Rank.

DECORATED FOR HIS WORK

Trustee of the Boston Symphony and of the New England Conservatory of Music.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Dec. 27.—Pierpont Langley Stackpole, senior active member of the law firm of Warner, Stackpole & Bradlee, died last evening at Phillips House after a brief illness at the age of 61.

Born in Brookline, he was graduated from Harvard University in 1897 and from Harvard Law School in 1900. He became associated in law with Joseph B. and Henry E. Warner and after a few years became a member of his present firm.

In the World War Mr. Stackpole was for one and a half years personal aide to General Hunter Liggett, commanding officer of the First Army and of the Army of Occupation. He reached the rank of colonel and received the Distinguished Service medal from General Pershing, the Order of the Crown of Belgium and the French Legion of Honor.

Mr. Stackpole was vice president and a member of the board of trustees of the New England Conservatory of Music, trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and [redacted] of the South End House Association. He had served in various capacities with the Community Federation of Boston.

He was a director of the Merchants National Bank of Boston and a member of the Union and Somerset Clubs of Boston and Knickerbocker Club of New York.

Surviving are his widow and two brothers, the Rev. Markham W. Stackpole of Milton and Stephen T. Stackpole of Detroit.

NEW YORK MIRROR
DEC 28 1936

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. [redacted] Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its second visit of the season to New York for a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 9.

At the Thursday evening concert, Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce to New York the symphony in D major by Muzio Clementi, the celebrated contemporary of Beethoven. The symphony, with many others which were highly praised in Clementi's time, disappeared at his death and were not discovered until almost a hundred years later.

Mr. Alfredo Casella has restored this and another in C major, and performed them last Winter in Italy. The symphony in D major was given its first American performances in Boston by this orchestra. The program will also include Mr. Arthur Foote's Suite for String Orchestra in E major, and the fourth symphony of Brahms in E minor.

At the Saturday matinee, Dr. Koussevitzky will give the first performance in New York of the music from Stravinsky's ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee," based on themes of Tschaikowsky. The second pianoforte concerto of Mr. Edward MacDowell, the 75th anniversary of whose death occurred this month, also will be performed. The soloist will be Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma, the Puerto Rican-American pianist. The closing number will be the symphony of Cesar Franck in D minor.

* * *

Two contemporary operas are to be produced for the 1936-37 season by the Opera School of the Juilliard School of Music: "Gar[redacted] romantic comedy-opera, by Robert A. Simon and Albert Stoessel, will be offered Feb. 24 to 27; "The Poisoned Kiss," a romantic extravaganza, by Evelyn Sharp and R. Vaughan Williams, April 21 to 24.

PAGANINI THE VIOLINIST

The Legends and the Man

Paganini, the Romantic Virtuoso. By Jeffrey Pulver. (Herbert Joseph. 12s. 6d.)

Sun. Times Dec. 13/36

By J. M. BULLOCH

FOUR strings and a hank of horsehair. That, in Mr. Pulver's phrase, was the spell by which Nicolo Paganini brought the world to his feet. There was even less in it than that, for one string, the G, was enough for him at times, and with two he could do marvels. But, although he calls for no elaborate psychological analysis, there was also more in it all, for he possessed dramatic and emotional power and versatility as well, and he will be matched only when a personality like his appears, endowed with his physical, mental, and spiritual attributes.

Mr. Pulver, as a professional violinist, knows what he is speaking about when he says this. But the tragedy of all actors and musical artists is that their gift vanishes with them, and we can judge of them merely by reading of the impression they made on those who actually heard them, though in Paganini's case we have the scores of the very difficult music he composed to show what he could achieve in point of technique. What Mr. Pulver, therefore, has been mainly content to do is to present him largely in the terms of his background, which explains and excuses much of his amazing musical achievement and his character as a man. Mr. Pulver is peculiarly well equipped for the survey, for he has already given us, inter alia, a dictionary of old English music and also a biography of Brahms, while his general intelligence helps him to interpret the complexities of Europe's psychology in one of the most pregnant phases of the world's history.

The Genius of Genoa

Between the day in 1782, not 1784 as usually given, when Paganini was born in Genoa, and 1840 when he died at Nice—and between then and 1926 when his mortal remains were brought back to be buried at Genoa—the world changed almost out of recognition, in striking contrast to the permanence of his fame. Even in his own early years there were enough changes, including the escape from Napoleonism, to make it seem a new place, and to account in its clamour after liberty for much in Paganini's complete unconventionality as a man and as a musician. His nondescript father Antonio kept him at it when as a mere child he began to play. He had several teachers, but Mr. Pulver decides that he was self-made and self-taught. "Aided by his natural aptitude, he leaped over three or four stages of normal development and reached the zenith of his power a century before his time."

His emotional adventures make a movie, but certainly not a moving picture in the big sense, beginning seriously and valuably with his three years with the gentlewoman "Dida," whose identity, to his credit, he never disclosed. Then came the three years at the court of Napoleon's difficult sister Elise, grotesquely created Princess of Lucca, for whom he composed a sonata, on the G string alone, on the Corsican—though he was not the first composer to use one string. He found his greatest difficulty with Antonia Bianchi, "the singing spitfire," whom he ultimately paid off.

The portrait of Paganini bequeathed by tradition pictures a sort of desperado sheik, for, as Mr. Pulver says, it asks us to regard him as incurably dissipated, an inveterate gambler, eccentric, selfish, cruel, morbid, avaricious. It declares he led a band of brigands, that he seduced any maid whose eye chanced to meet his glance, that he abducted noble women and killed their husbands: last of all, that he secured his mastery of mankind and his pre-eminence in his art from the devil in exchange for a soul already sufficiently blasted and damned.

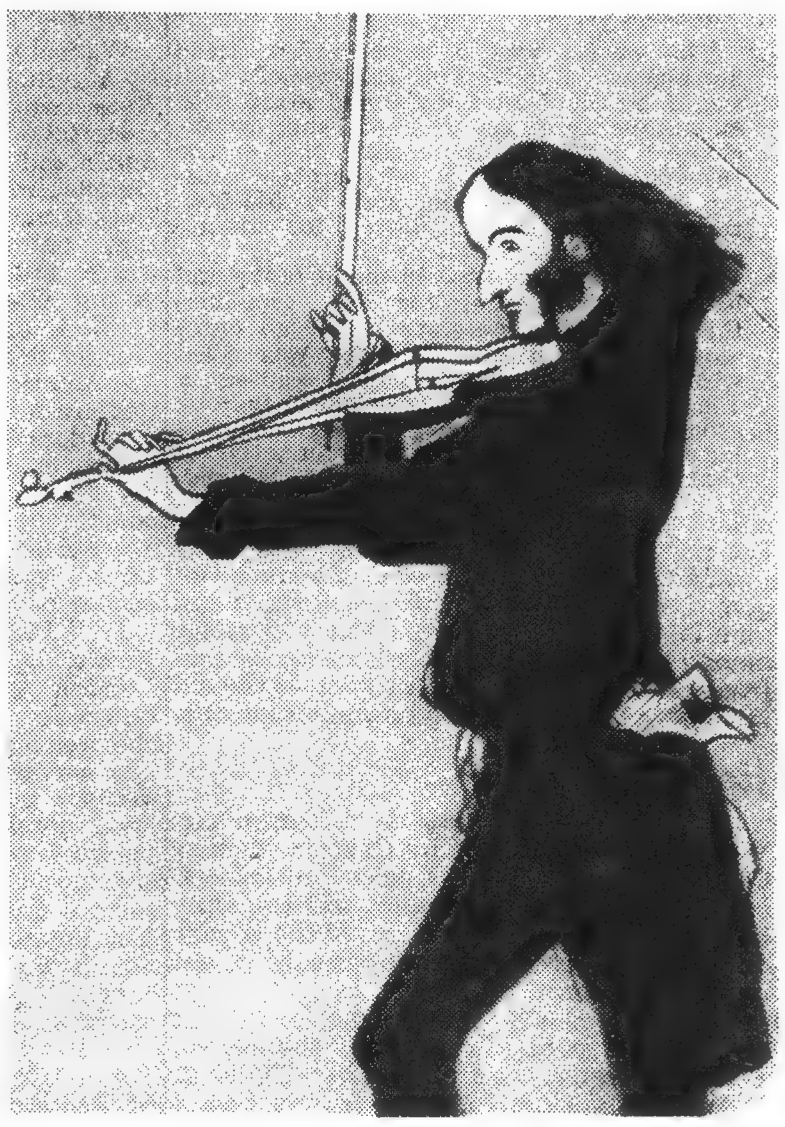
London, which he first visited in May, 1831, "preceded by the speedy posthorses of scandal and the glamorous expresses of Satan." The talk of the high prices for his concerts made him a marked man whenever he showed himself in the street:—

> People followed him, crowded before him and behind him, so that often he could not move at all: they spoke to him in English, of which he understood not one syllable: they even touched his clothes and pinched his arms to make sure that he was real.

He made a fortune in our midst on this and other occasions, and, having ended his professional career at Turin in July, 1837, indulged in his old passion for gambling in building a casino in Paris, which was refused a licence and failed. The phthisis which affected his larynx grew worse and worse, and at last he flickered out in 1840 at Nice, a shadow of his former self.

Where Paganini Scored

Although, as noted, Mr. Pulver is a professional violinist, he has reserved till the last chapter, headed "For Violinists Only," his estimate of Paganini's contribution to violin playing. He knows how difficult it is to decide who "invented" certain features of music, but he decides that he added new effects to the violinist's materia technica in the domain of bowing, left hand pizzicato, and single and double harmonics. It is very much to be doubted if his marvellous technical facility was, to as great an extent as is generally supposed, the result only of frantic practising, which, by the way, few people ever heard him do. What was of even greater aid to him was "the peculiar adaptability of his body, the suitability of his organs, and the ease with which his mental processes and his physical reactions collaborated." Dr. Francesco Bennati, the physiologist who examined him thoroughly, pointed out that his left shoulder was higher than the other. His hand was no larger than the normal, but thanks to the elasticity peculiar to all its parts, his span was doubled. By that means he could bend the upper joints of the fingers of his left hand in a lateral direction, and with the greatest ease and rapidity.



Nicolo Paganini

Philharmonic Plays Barbirolli Arrangements

N. Y. Tribune

Interpretations of Suite by Purcell for Strings Presented by Orchestra

Dec. 25/36

Josef Hofmann Soloist

Is Head in Fifth Piano Concerto by Beethoven

John Barbirolli's program with the Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra last night began with his own arrangement of a suite of pieces by Purcell for strings which he had directed here early in November, continued with Debussy's three symphonic sketches, "La Mer," and closed with the fifth piano concerto in E flat of Beethoven, in which the solo part was performed by Josef Hofmann.

Purcell's music evidently has a strong appeal for Mr. Barbirolli and it was in the six short pieces from the "Gordian Knot Untied," "Distressed Innocence," "The Married Man" and from a choral anthem, that he accomplished his most satisfying interpretations.

The conductor's approach to Debussy's superb evocation of the sea was forthright. It was obvious that he had spared no pains in his efforts to do justice to the composer's intentions. But this score needs greater subtlety in the employment of the dynamic palette, as well as an enkindling imagination if Debussy's ideas are to be unfolded with all of their teeming fantasy.

Of Mr. Hofmann's superb achievement in the realization of the contents of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, it is impossible to speak too warmly. This was more than the piano playing of a great virtuoso. For, in addition to the magnificent mastery of the technical problems to be encountered in this, the most puissant of the master's concerti, Mr. Hofmann set forth the music with tonal splendor and with profound insight into the master's creative mind.

J. D. B.

The Symphonies Of Brahms

THERE is but one way to account for the frequent performance of the Brahms symphonies today wherever there is a first-rate orchestra and a public thoroughly conversant with symphonic music. These symphonies, quite as much as Beethoven's nine and the two that are about all the world hears of Schubert's equally extended series, are precisely that "music of humanity, mysterious but still infinitely expressive and comprehensible" that the worthy conductor [Felix Weingartner] said they were not. While the Tchaikovsky symphonies and the once universally popular "From the New World" of Dvořák were gradually sating the public that formerly adored them (which is not to be construed as a denial either of their inspiration or their splendid workmanship) the Brahms symphonies were building a more lasting affection, slowly but certainly. They did not build this affection as "scientific music"; they built it because of a human appeal that today may fairly challenge that of the Beethoven symphonies. . . .

What has brought about this change of attitude on the part of those who listen primarily to enjoy? There is one very simple answer. The melodies that escaped the ears of multitudes of listeners when these symphonies were relatively young are now readily grasped and eagerly awaited. For those who know these symphonies even casually (in the sense that the knowledge which comes from hearing occasional or even frequent performances is a casual knowledge) the Brahms four are among the most melodious of symphonies. Indeed, the charge has been heard in certain quarters that Brahms permitted himself to be led astray by the German Lied; that because his symphonies are too songful they are not symphonies! To grasp the Brahms melodies is to open the door to other qualities of these symphonies, their harmonic richness, their rhythmic variety, their still somewhat peculiar instrumental coloring, and their structural strength and cohesiveness. But the grasp of the melody must come first.

The controversy that raged about the Brahms symphonies when they were new made much of his right to succeed to the mantle of Beethoven. In referring to the Brahms First Symphony as "The Tenth," thereby associating it with the Beethoven Ninth, the conductor and piano virtuoso, Hans von Bülow, brought down on the head of the composer the wrath of many a worshiper of Beethoven. Today, the mot about "The Tenth" has no such particular concern for us, in spite of the somewhat obvious resemblance between the principal melody of the last movement of Beethoven's Ninth and the melody which occupies a similar position in the Brahms First. Brahms's right to stand with Beethoven as a symphonist is based on quite other considerations than a likeness of theme or of treatment here and there. It rests, rather, on the strength and nobility that his music possesses in common with that of his titanic predecessor.—OSCAR THOMPSON, in "How to Understand Music." (New York: Dial Press.)

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
DEC 31 1936

Music

PROGRAM CORRECTED.

"Fantasie Americana," by Milton Rosen, young composer now residing in Cincinnati, announced for the symphony concerts this week, will be played on the program of the following pair, January 8 and 9. Vladimir Bakaleinikoff, assistant conductor of the orchestra, will be director. The piano solo of the work, performed originally by the Boston Symphony, will be played ~~by John Qu~~incy Bass. Joseph Szigeti will be violin soloist and will be heard in the Mendelssohn concerto.

Here With Poker Ballet

N. Y. Tribune
Dec. 25/36

Igor Stravinsky

Poker Ballet Brought Here By Stravinsky

(Continued from page one)

poker, or whether deuces would be wild.

Having completed this work, Mr. Stravinsky plans to rest a while from composition, but he has a busy schedule ahead for this, his third American tour. He will pass the Christmas week end at the Sulgrave Hotel with Samuel Dushkin, American violinist, who came here with him, and has specialized as an interpreter of his music for many years. Next week he will go to Toronto to conduct an orchestral concert, and then return here to begin rehearsals for his six concerts with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. A few recitals in various towns will intervene before he takes up the Philharmonic baton for his first concert on Thursday, January 14, at Carnegie Hall.

His Philharmonic programs will include the first performance here of his capriccio for piano and orchestra, with Beveridge Webster, young American pianist, as the soloist, and the violin concerto with Mr. Dushkin as soloist. Mr. Stravinsky said that he looked forward eagerly to conducting the Philharmonic, with which he had made some guest appearances on his first trip here in 1925, and admired as one of the world's foremost orchestras. He also expressed admiration for the work of John Barbirolli, the Philharmonic's new permanent conductor.

After his last orchestral appearance here on January 24, and a Town Hall recital with Mr. Dushkin the next week, Mr. Stravinsky will conduct in Montreal and then appear in Cleveland and on tour, with the Cleveland Orchestra. He will work gradually westward during February, reaching the Pacific Coast in March, where the programs under his direction will include a large-scale production of "Petrouchka" in ballet form in Los Angeles. He plans to sail for Europe early in April, but may stay over for the American Ballet's series.

The Russian composer, who is a naturalized French citizen, said that the voyage of the Normandie had been notably rough for the first two days, but then relatively calm.

STRAVINSKY HERE WITH NEW BALLET

N.Y. Times

Choreographic Drama Written by Russian Composer Deals With Game of Poker.

Dec. 25/36

WILL BE STAGED IN APRIL

First Performance to Be Given at Metropolitan—Designed for American Ballet.

Igor Stravinsky, who arrived in New York yesterday on the Normandie, announced that his latest composition, a ballet of which the subject is a poker game, has been written exclusively for the American Ballet which dances at the Metropolitan Opera House, and will be produced there for the first time in April.

The ballet, which was completed only two weeks ago, is in three scenes ("Jeu de cartes en trois donnes") and its action portrays by various choreographic and pantomimic devices a game of cards. The stage is set like a great clubroom, but the action, representing the card game, takes place on an elevated, smaller stage. The face cards and the joker are represented by solo dancers, costumed, of course, to the subject.

There will be much curiosity concerning this work, which is in the medium for which Stravinsky has composed all his greatest music. The ballet, or the choreographic drama, has been from first to last his most important creative achievement.

As a young pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff who had written one or two student works for orchestra and other youthful compositions in small forms, he was discovered by Sergei de Diaghileff, who might be said simultaneously to have created Stravinsky and the celebrated Ballet Russe.

Ordered to Write New Score

At first the Ballet Russe had to content itself with the choreographic interpretation of existing scores. Then Diaghileff, with the singular intuition he seemed to have for creative genius, singled out Stravinsky and ordered him to write a new score for his dancers.

That score, which made history in the domain of modern music, was "Oiseux de Feu." Within a period of six years it was followed by "Petrouchka" and "Sacre du Printemps," works in which Stravinsky not only collaborated in the invention of a new form for the ballet, but also changed the very language of modern music. His "Sacre du Printemps" is a fountain-head from which a whole school of contemporaneous composers may be said to stem.

In searching for new musical expressions engendered by choreographic movements and spectacle, Stravinsky stands as the last great master of Europe to have contributed a new movement to his art. He has since the time of "Sacre du Printemps" (1913) composed in other forms than the ballet, but even certain choral works, performed on the stage, have been accompanied by symbolic pantomime of dancers, and always Stravinsky found ways of giving expression to curious themes which might not have seemed available material for a composer of music.

Possibilities in New Theme

The subject of a card game is expected to have been very suggestive to him. The conventional designs of the cards, the dance conventions of design which could be contingent upon this, the relations that might arise in a modern musician's mind between the forms and rhythms suggested by the mystical cycle of four series of thirteen figures might well fertilize the imagination of one of the most objective of modern composers.

Mr. Stravinsky is making his third tour in this country. He will conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra for a fortnight beginning on Thursday evening, Jan. 14. He directed the Philharmonic during his first tour more than a decade ago. In his six concerts with the orchestra he will conduct programs of his own music, including the first performance in New York of the capriccio for piano and orchestra with Beveridge Webster as soloist and the violin concerto with Samuel Dushkin as soloist.

Before taking up his Philharmonic-Symphony duties Mr. Stravinsky will go to Toronto to conduct the orchestra there. After his New York orchestral programs he will appear in a concert for piano and violin at the Town Hall with Mr. Dushkin. Then he will conduct in Montreal, Cleveland and on the Pacific Coast.

Ballet Based on Poker Game Is Brought Here by Stravinsky

N.Y. Tribune - Dec. 25/36

Composer, on the Normandie, Does Not Say if Deuces Are Wild, but He Puts Joker in Deck; Work To Be Seen at Metropolitan in Spring

Igor Stravinsky, who, except for Richard Strauss, is generally regarded as Europe's most renowned contemporary composer, arrived here yesterday on the French liner Normandie with the score of his recently completed ballet, "Card Game in Three Deals" ("Jeu de Cartes en Trois Donnes"), which depicts choreographically a game of poker.

This, according to plans under consideration, is to be produced by the American Ballet under George Balanchine's direction at the Metropolitan Opera House next spring, probably in a special post-season ballet series with a repertoire including this and another Stravinsky work. Mr. Stravinsky has known Mr. Balanchine's work for several years, and recalled that the American Ballet's choreographer had staged his ballet "Apollon Musagete."

The new ballet, as its title implies, is in three scenes, and the action represents the play of the participating hands. The set will suggest a luxurious clubroom, in which the players begin their game, and the main action of the ballet, the game itself, takes place on a lower, inner stage. The soloists, naturally, represent the face cards, while the role of the joker will also be mimed by one of the principals, and the ballet ensemble will represent the rest of the pack. Exclusive performing rights for this work in this country for a year have been granted to the American Ballet.

Mr. Stravinsky did not reveal whether the game was straight or stud

(Continued on page thirteen)

'Pauper' Drillers Hit Oil Sixth Time At Ohio Poorhouse

2 Prospectors Pay County to Let Them Stay On and Share Profits

MARIETTA, Ohio, Dec. 24 (AP).—Two grizzled old prospectors today drilled in their sixth producing well on the farm of the Washington County Poorhouse, where they now pay to live.

Walter Hupp and John Yerian, old-timers at the oil prospecting business, lost all their money trying to find a paying well in the southeastern Ohio hills. Then they applied for admission to the county infimary. Two years ago the prospecting spirit persisted and they induced officials of the institution to permit them to drill.

Hupp and Yerian borrowed an old well drilling outfit and after weeks of labor struck oil at 500 feet. They organized the Pauper Oil Company and went about digging more wells. They purchased the drilling outfit. During the last year they marketed more than $1,200 worth of oil.

BEETHOVEN WORK CONCERT FEATURI

N.Y. Times

Josef Hofmann Soloist Witl Philharmonic in Presentation of 'Emperor' Concerto.

Dec. 25/36

PURCELL SUITE ALSO GIVEN

Barbirolli's Arrangement Used—Debussy's 'La Mer' Completes Carnegie Hall Bill.

The shining achievement of last night's Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall was the performance of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5, known as the "Emperor." It had the benefit of Josef Hofmann's masterly playing as soloist, and he was companioned in a vibrant interpretation by John Barbirolli and the orchestra. For the first half of the program Mr. Barbirolli directed his own arrangement of a suite of Purcell's music for strings and Debussy's "La Mer."

Mr. Hofmann invested his share of the concerto with that deceptive simplicity that is the hallmark of great art. There was no striving for effect and yet felicitous details, such as the jeweled delicacy of the trills in the cadenza, were bewitchingly effective. But details merged irresistibly into the larger pattern of the work. For Mr. Hofmann was always the self-effacing interpreter of Beethoven's music. Nowhere was this more striking than in the seraphic adagio which Mr. Hofmann played with penetrating restraint, almost austerity. No danger of sentimentality here.

By contrast Mr. Hofmann did not hesitate to sing out, in full-throated joy, the laughing pages of the rondo. This was in the spirit of Beethoven—fiery, healthy, irresistible. The broad curving arch of the first movement, played with consummate clarity and resource, had its complement in the gayety of the last.

One forgot as Mr. Hofmann played that the span of his American career reaches its golden jubilee next November. It was in November, 1887, that he was first heard in New York, "a pleasant and robust-looking boy, dressed in dark gray jacket and pair of knickerbockers, and with an enormous sailor collar to his shirt, reaching halfway down his back." So wrote H. E. Krehbiel. Also: "He acknowledged with perfect ease and self-possession the applause that greeted him." And later: "The taste of the lad is exquisite, his command of tone-coloring amazing, his reposefulness of delivery would reflect credit on any other artist," and so forth. The boy has grown older, and his art has kept pace.

Mr. Barbirolli, who is adept at following an accomplished soloist, did well by Mr. Hofmann and the concerto. The Purcell suite, which he introduced earlier in the season, was played vibrantly. As for "La Mer," the interpretation was vigorous, with climaxes whipped up to a dazzling intensity. The rhythmic life and bravura of the work were stressed to the detriment of its color, its poetry, its dreams and its passions.

Although it was the night before Christmas, the house was nearly filled. Mr. Hofmann received prolonged applause. The evening seemed to be his.

H. T.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
JAN 2 - 1937

BROOKLYN ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Albert Spalding will be the soloist of the second concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in ~~Brooklyn. The~~ concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 8. The violinist will appear with the orchestra in Mozart's Concerto in D major, K. No. 218. Richard Burgin, who is both assistant conductor and concertmaster of the orchestra, will be the conductor on this occasion and will open the program with Bach's Toccata in C major for Organ, as arranged for orchestra by Leo Weiner. The closing number will be Kalinnikov's Symphony No. 1 in G minor. The symphony of this Russian composer, which had a high vogue some years ago, attracted considerable attention when revived this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 3 - 1937

NOTES HERE AND AFIELD

SERGE PROKOFIEFF, Russian composer-pianist, who is returning to this country after several years' absence, will make a tour of four cities. He will appear with the Chicago Symphony Jan. 21 and 22, the St. Louis Symphony Jan. 29 and 30 and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Feb. 5 ~~and 6~~. The date of his New York recital is still pending. Immediately after his final concert in America, in February, he will go to Russia to participate in the Pushkin centenary, for which he has composed incidental music for special dramatic productions of "Eugen Onégin" and "Boris Godunoff" and also for a film of "The Queen of Spades." He furthermore has written recently a ballet based on "Romeo and Juliet," a 'cello concerto, an overture for large orchestra, and music for the new children's theatres in Russia's principal cities.

N.Y. Tribune
Jan. 3/37

NE, SUNDAY, JANU

Concerts

Jesus Maria Sanroma

nic-Symphony Orchestra Sat- 'nesday night in Town Hall; 'mphony Saturday afternoon

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay its second visit of the season to Carnegie Hall this week. On Thursday night Serge Koussevitzky will introduce here the symphony in D major by Muzio Clementi (1752-1832), which was restored by Alfredo Casella from fragments discovered by him both in this country and Europe. Another Clementi symphony, in C, also discovered and reassembled by Mr. Casella, had its first American performance by Paul Stassevitch's orchestra last Wednesday in Town Hall.

Boston Symphony

Dr. Koussevitzky will begin Saturday's program with a suite for strings in E major by the noted octogenarian Boston composer, Arthur Foote, and Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the soloist in Edward MacDowell's second piano concerto, played in commemoration of the composer's seventy-fifth anniversary. Cesar Franck's symphony will close this afternoon.

On Thursday evening, Ravel's Second "Daphnic et Chloe" Suite will follow the Clementi symphony.

In its concert next Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music the Boston Symphony will be conducted by its concertmaster, Richard Burgin, with Albert Spalding as the soloist in Mozart's violin concerto in D major.

In its concerts of next Thursday and Saturday, the Cleveland Orchestra will introduce "La Vie de Polichinelle," by the Russian composer, Nicholas Nabokoff, who is now head of the music department of Wells College, Aurora, N. Y. Gregor Piatigorsky will be the soloist in the Schumann cello concerto, and Artur Rodzinski will close his program with Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra."

CLAREMONT, N. H.
Dec. EAGLE 29/36

Boston Symphony Orchestra Visits Hanover on Jan. 5

Hanover, Dec. 29—Dartmouth's current musical season will reach its climax next Tuesday night when the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra appears in Webster hall in the second concert of the 1936-37 concert series. Serge Koussevitsky, who has conducted the Boston Symphony for 13 consecutive seasons, will direct the full 110-piece orchestra in its Dartmouth appearance.

Tuesday night's program will be made up of Haydn, Wagner, Sibelius, and Strauss. It will open at 8:45 with Haydn's "Symphony in B-Flat, No. 102" which is the ninth in the famous London series. Then will follow the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the tone poem "Don Juan" by Strauss. After the intermission the Orchestra will play Sibelius' "Symphony No. 5 in E-Flat Major, Opus 82."

In addition to the few reserved-seat tickets available for the Boston Symphony concert, a limited number of general-admission tickets will also be on sale this week end and early next week.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
DEC 31 1936

Stassevitch Presents Symphony by Clementi

A new name, if hardly an unfamiliar one, took its place in the program lists of the city's orchestras with the performance in Town Hall last night of a symphony credited to Muzio Clementi, whose "Gradus ad Parnassum" has tried the fingers and the souls of piano students for more than a century. Paul Stassevitch, conducting his still nameless ensemble of about fifty pieces, had the distinction of introducing a work with a history, the details of which are still subject to little odds and ends of clarification.

Just how much of this symphony was, in fact, Clementi's may be included among the questions not quite answered by the performance. Avowedly a restoration by Alfredo Casella, it had moments that raised more than passing doubt as to whether this was, indeed, a voice from the eighteenth century world of Mozart and Haydn or the later sphere of Beethoven, comprehended together in the protracted career of Clementi.

Early in the month Serge Koussevitzky played for his Boston Symphony patrons in the home city another symphony by Clementi, also restored by Casella. That one was in D; the one heard last night was in C. Together they present an interesting tale of missing manuscripts, sold at auction in London during the war and acquired for the music division of the Library of Congress in Washington during the enterprising consulship of Carl Engel. Described as a "jumble and chaos of sheets," the acquisition was identified as parts of four Clementi symphonies. Not until seventeen years later did Mr. Casella attempt his reconstructions, with the results heard in Boston and at last night's concert. These, presumably, were the first performances of symphonic music by Clementi in the annals of America.

As pieced together, the symphony in C boasted the usual four movements—an allegro vivace preceded by a brief larghetto introduction, andante con moto, minuetto, and allegro vivace. Of these, the minuetto was unusually extended and correspondingly loosely knit. The first allegro had much the sound of eighteenth century opera overtures, with no very impressive development to commend it to sticklers for form. The middle movements, in particular, were melodious, with more to suggest Haydn than Beethoven. If this was not melody of distinction, it was agreeable and refined. The scoring, however, often tended to a thickness that prompted speculation as to whether it emanated from the parent or the foster-parent of the work. Trombones were employed freely and there was some rather assertive writing for middle voices. The effect often tended toward a certain burliness of utterance, not lessened by the frequently rough playing of the orchestra. Spirit this Clementi symphony had in abundance, but something less than the preciseness, the clarity and the elegance to be expected of the man and his times.

The program, otherwise, embraced Beethoven's "Grosse Fugue," opus 133, intrusted to some thirty strings instead of the four for which it was written; two amply familiar compositions by Liadoff, "The Enchanted Lake" and "Baba-Yaga"; Ducasse's "Sarabande" for voices and orchestra, in which was utilized a small chorus from the Schola Cantorum, and the overture to Weinberger's opera, "Schwanda." An audience of good size attended and there was hearty applause for earnest performances that possessed rather more of vigor than finesse.

O. T.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram
DEC 30 1936

Sergei Rachmaninof will be soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra next Friday afternoon at the first Boston performance of his own rhapsody for piano and orchestra on a theme of Paganini. The rest of the program, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, will include Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" and "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschiakowsky. The same program will be repeated Saturday afternoon. Both performances will be in Symphony Hall.

The music projects conducted under WPA in the eastern part of the state continue to sponsor a variety of artists and compositions. The first performance of an overture by Eugenia Frothingham, Boston composer, will be presented in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge on January 6. Alexander Thiede will conduct.

Leopold Podolsky will appear as guest conductor of the State Symphony orchestra in Dorchester the same night.

Four Scores Recently Issued by the Publishers

Trans, Jan.

Bach's "Art of the Fugue" And a Concerto by Monn In New Versions

Four musical publications have recently found their way to the desk of this department. Two are revisions of scores from the eighteenth century. Two are original works. The first two are Bach's monumental "Art of the Fugue," transcribed for string quartet by Roy Harris and M. D. Herter Norton (New York: G. Schirmer, Inc.), and Arnold Schoenberg's Concerto for 'cello and orchestra after a Cembalo Concerto by Georg Matthias Monn (New York: G. Schirmer, Inc.). The two original works are Alban Berg's Violin Concerto (Vienna: Universal Edition) and "Imagery," an orchestral suite on original Hindu Themes, by the American composer, Horace Johnson (New York: J. Fischer and Bro.).

The Concerto of Monn, as it reached this department, is doubly arranged, since the present copy constitutes Schoenberg's reduction, for 'cello and piano, of his orchestral score. How much the Schoenberg version differs from the original work of Monn can only be guessed at without recourse to the two scores in question, neither of which unfortunately is available to this writer. But there is sufficient inner evidence in Schoenberg's piano arrangement pointing to considerable departure from Monn's original in the matters of harmony and part-writing.

Monn, who is allotted scarcely a dozen lines in Grove's Dictionary, was one of those mid-European composers of the first half of the eighteenth century who wrote numberless pieces in the "new" style that so effectively displaced the old contrapuntal tradition and prepared the way for Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. This does not mean that Monn necessarily composed according to the simplest harmonic and formal patterns. But it seems quite unlikely that the chromaticism, which is at once apparent in the Schoenberg arrangement, should be entirely of Monn's manufacture. It is more likely that Schoenberg has indulged in a pastiche, although by no means so radical a pastiche as, let us say, Stravinsky's "Pulcinella." The 'cello part, of course, is Schoenberg's creation, and it looks fiendishly difficult to play.

It was Monn and Stamitz and others of the time, no doubt, whom Friedrich Wilhelm Marpurg had in mind when he referred slightingly to their composing technic and musical ideas alongside those of the master, Johann Sebastian Bach, in the preface written two years after Bach's death for the second edition of the "Art of the Fugue." For Bach was not only one hundred years ahead of his time, as we are so frequently remindid, but also at least half a century in arrears of it. Thus we are enabled to understand the remarkable and eloquent defense of Bach's style and genius contained in this preface.

The latest edition of the "Art of the Fugue" carries a long foreword from Mr. Harris and Mrs. Norton, which explains, among other things, why the transcription was made for the four bowed instruments of the classical string quartet. It is unnecessary to go into this explanation now, first because it seems reasonable to the present writer and second because the subject was sufficiently discussed at the time when the phonograph records of this version appeared a year or more ago.

The present edition has a twofold new value. First, it offers students and amateurs a chance to study the wonderful work of Bach to the tune, so to say, of the phonograph. Second, there is a fairly elaborate section devoted to "analytical comment," which is intended, in the words of the authors, "to contribute, directly and without the pedantry of minute technical dissection, to an active appreciation of the work by those musicians, whether public performers or amateurs, who do not have the opportunity of carrying out a detailed analysis for themselves." This not immodest order seems to be capably filled by the authors.

* * *

The Violin Concerto of Berg was discussed in these columns from the manuscript score at some length immediately after the death of the composer, who died almost exactly a year ago, and who was here singing his swan song. A good deal has been made of the fact that the composer, writing in this Concerto a Requiem for his recently deceased friend, Manon Gropius, was unconsciously also writing his own. It was as a Requiem that the Concerto was received at the first performance in Barcelona last spring, and has been similarly regarded at each subsequent performance, including the presentation a couple of months ago in the composer's native Vienna, where the work made an extraordinary impression.

Even in London, which has not been observably prejudiced on behalf of the music of the twelve-tone school, the first (broadcast) performance elicited praise of the highest sort from critics of the standing of Ernest Newman, Constant Lambert and Richard Capell. Some have not hesitated to characterize it as Berg's greatest work as well as his last. We in Boston shall fortunately have an opportunity to express a more direct opinion when the Concerto receives the first American performances next spring at the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky, the Symphony Orchestra, and the solo violinist, Louis Krasner of this city, for whom the work was written.

Berg's Violin Concerto and Short Orchestral Work By Horace Johnson

It is no disrespect or disservice to contemporary American music to say that Horace Johnson's "Imagery" is not in the same class with the works above. Johnson writes here earnestly and honestly. He is not concerned with a revival of the past or a look into the future. He is content to set down, in the language of tones, certain immediate impressions suggested by the Orient. There are three movements: the first, "Procession to Indra," the second, "Aparasa," the third, "Urbasi." Although the tempo varies, naturally, the dance motive prevails most of the time.

In fact, an inspection of the score confirms the impression derived when this work was first presented in Boston by the Peoples Symphony Orchestra under Fabien Sevitzky. "Imagery" lends itself to performance not only in the concert hall but also in the theater, where, it would seem, a ballet might readily be made out of it. This suggestion is made the more feasible since the score, even in original form, does not require a very large orchestra—wind instruments in twos and three. Nor is it a long work—fourteen minutes in playing time.

M. S.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

27 1936

Music News and Views

by Albert Kirkpatrick

MUSIC news being at low ebb this holiday season, we have been forced to take up again the (by us) almost abandoned art of book reading. Fortunately we were able to borrow from the extensive Blakeney library a volume of the vintage of '36 which makes the old perusing process a matter of mingled pleasure and profit. "The Man With the Baton" by David Ewen, Thomas Y. Crowell company, New York, is subtitled, "The Story of Conductors and Their Orchestras." As the New Yorker would say, it tells the story of conductors and their orchestras; which, after all, is fair enough. But to our mind David Ewen does the job, by and large, better than anyone else we can recall. In some 350 pages he covers the history of the development of the orchestra in Europe and in America briefly but thoroughly, discusses the rise of the conductor as a virtuoso and the art of conducting in general with its consequent virtues and vices, and adds biographical sketches and critical comments on all of the foremost conductors past and present both here and abroad.

With references to the vices of the virtuoso conductor Ewen's comment is frequently agreeably caustic, but he has been careful to expose each offender or type of offender to as genial and unbiased an appraisal as one is likely to encounter on the printed page. Thomas, Damrosch, Toscanini, Koussetvitsky and Stokowsky steal a considerable amount of the space alloted to individuals, and the author even manages to dig up a few new anecdotes about Toscanini, which in itself is a notable achievement. For Toscanini anecdotes, however, we still think that Van Vechten holds a world's record in his crazyquilt novel, "Peter Whiffle." He tells about an American opera singer who spoke no Italian and simply could not understand the maestro's directions in one place where he wished her to turn her back to the audience. Finally a great light dawned in the diva's cerebrum, "Ah, maestro," she cried, remembering her French rashly, "Est-ce que vous voulez mon derriere?"

The numerous photographs in the Ewen book should not go by without mention. They are remarkably interesting and look as if they might have been posed especially for this volume though in the case of von Bulow and a few others that is unlikely, to say the least. Toscanini is shown with a segment of the orchestra in rehearsal, and Koussevitzky, in a striking view with part of the orchestra and part of the audience, serves as a frontispiece.

* * *

THOSE musicians particularly addicted to the performances of the Boston symphony orchestra will be interested in a small volume of charcoal drawings of the members of that organization, together with short biographical sketches both by Gerome Brush, and published by The Merrymount Press, Boston, under the title, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1936."

* * *

OUR enthusiasm for grand opera is not what it once was, but many no doubt hardier constitutions will be absorbed, as we were last year, with the Puccini letters edited by Giuseppi Adami in the translation of Ena Makin, published by L. J. Lippincott. Somehow, now that Christmas is over, we can think of any number of things which we should have been glad to get or give. And if your Christmas shopping was as ineffectual as was ours, you may yet find one of these useful come Easter.

* * *

ARE you going to Salzburg next summer? If so, the Salzburg Society in America, which exists for the purpose of promoting interest in the cultural institutions of that city, will offer to its members a 10 percent reduction on the sale of festival tickets for the performances of the coming season. Membership cards are obtainable at 630 Fifth avenue, New York City, upon payment of a fee of two dollars.

* * *

AN unprecedented number of applications for places on the program of the biennial convention of the National Federation of Music clubs, to be held in Louisville, Ky., April 23-29, has been reported by the national president. Two Oklahoma choruses will be represented on that program: The Oklahoma Tulsans, a business men's chorus, and the Redmen's glee club of Bacone college, Muskogee, under the direction of Gordon Berger.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

DEC 31 1936

Second Concert Given by Paul Stassevitch

Early this month in Boston Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony played for the first time in America Alfredo Casella's revised version of Muzio Clementi's D major symphony. This work by the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century Italian composer was one of four symphonies recently recovered and later pieced together by his twentieth century compatriot.

At the Town Hall last evening Paul Stassevitch, leading his own symphony orchestra in the second concert in this season's series, accorded a similar American premiere to the C major symphony of this group of four. It is a robust, vigorously scored (or edited) and melodically and harmonically engrossing work, eminently worth the reviving.

After that Mr. Stassevitch played Liadoff's "The Enchanted Lake," a shimmering fabric of tone suggestive of Debussyan impressionism, and then the same composer's "Baba-Yaga," which, between the opening shriek of all the instruments in unison and the concluding squeak of the woodwind, goes in for a deal of instrumental horseplay.

In the subsequent "Sarabande" of Roger-Ducasse the voices of a group of women singers from the Schola Cantorum bobbed up and down on a heaving expanse of solid tone, only to be swallowed up and to bob up again briefly at the very end. Mr. Stassevitch's orchestra gave a substantial account of it, as it did of the other numbers on the program, Weinberger's boisterous "Schwanda" overture concluded the concert.

L. B.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

27 1936

GALLI-CURCI

Galli-Curci returned to the operatic stage some weeks ago in Chicago; her appearance in "La Boheme" was rather a trial to those who recalled her glorious singing of a decade ago; the event can scarcely be set down as a success. Mme. Povla Frisjh is singing repeatedly in New York this season; after thrilling two crowded audiences during the fall, she is suddenly asked to substitute for Marian Anderson whose tour has been interrupted by an indisposition. Mme. Olga Averino, known here, but too-seldom heard, was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week in Debussy's "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien." Feodor Chaliapin returns to this country next season for opera and concert performances, notably as Boris in Moussorgsky's opera, attaining the nature of special celebration with the centenary of Pushkin whose poem formed the basis of the work.

Richard Strauss has been the honored guest of the English during the month of November, he conducted his Rosenkavalier and Ariadne auf Naxos in connection with the visit of the Dresden Opera Company. The public was decidedly cordial and impressed (if reminder was necessary) with the fact that Strauss is still the leading figure in European music, although well past 70 years of age. The honors showered upon him remind the reader of British enthusiasm for great composers of the past, notabl Weber, Spohr, Liszt, Mendelssohn and—if you must start at the beginning—Handel.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

148

JAN 2 - 1937

JESUS MARIA SANROMA

Piano soloist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 9.

The second pair of concerts this season in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening next, January 7, at 8:45 o'clock, and Saturday afternoon, January 9, at 2:30 o'clock.

An event of unusual musical interest at the Thursday evening concert will be the first performance in New York of a Symphony in D major by Muzio Clementi which, with the other symphonies of this composer, were lost for nearly a century after his death. This symphony, like the others highly praised in the composer's time, was recently acquired in London by the Library of Congress at Washington. Alfredo Casella has restored this symphony (and another in C major) and performed them last winter in Italy. In the manuscripts at Washington, he found the D major symphony complete save for the introduction, which was supplied by the discovery of a manuscript fragment long in possession of the British Museum in London. This symphony had its first American performances under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction in Boston.

On Thursday's program besides Clementi's symphony there are also Ravel's Second Suite from the Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor.

At the Saturday matinee, Koussevitzky will devote the first part of the program to two American composers—Edward MacDowell, the seventy-fifth anniversary of whose birth befell in December, and Arthur Foote, MacDowell's senior by eight years, who is still living. Mr. Foote's Suite in E major for String Orchestra will be performed, and MacDowell's Second Pianoforte Concerto. The soloist will be Jesus Maria Sanroma, the Puerto Rican-American pianist. The closing number will be the Symphony in D minor by Cesar Frank.

Article from Hartford, Conn. about Mrs. MacDowell and how Sanroma took concerto to her for advice on interpretation lost. Was written by R. L. Humphrey.

FAMOUS GREEK BACK TO DIRECT SYMPHONY

Dimitri Mitropoulos Tells of Open Air Experiments

Gl. Jan 8

Coming here to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] of Serge Kous- [illegible] nter vacation, [illegible] rrived, yesterday ~~this~~ aft- [illegible] ative Athens, Greece, by way of New York. There at Carnegie Hall he heard the Boston Symphony, which has been on tour.

"It sounded even better to me than last year, which I thought was not possible," he said, with an expansive smile.

The man who is known throughout Europe as a pianist, composer and conductor, is making his second appearance before Boston audiences, having conducted as guest artist at the Symphony last season. He was received with such enthusiasm that he was given an invitation to return immediately. It is unusual for a guest conductor to take over the Symphony programs two seasons in succession.

Located at the conductor's room at Symphony Hall, yesterday, he told a remarkable story concerning two numbers he plans to introduce here. They are his arrangement for string orchestra of Beethoven's Quartet in C Sharp minor, and his arrangement of prelude and air of Dido from the opera "Dido and Aeneas," composed by the English musician Henry Purcell in the 17th Century.

"These are the result of experiments I have been carrying out in the ancient amphitheatres of Greece," he said. His face and gestures became intensely animated.

"I made some strange discoveries. The acoustics of those structures put up centuries ago were marvelous—in fact, too much so. Actually I had to caution my musicians against turning the leaves of their music carelessly, because the sound was magnified so much as to interfere with the music.

On one of his programs with the Boston Symphony he will give the first performance here of Respighi's "Toccata," for piano and orchestra. The conductor, of course, will be Mitropoulos. And the piano soloist? He also will be Mitropoulos.

And so, with his first orchestral rehearsal on Monday, Dimitri Mitropoulos was left busily toiling over his piano and analyzing orchestral scores.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEW YORK JOURNAL

JAN 5 - 1937

Music in Review

By Harriette ~~tte~~ Weber

Boston Orchestra

This is very much orchestra week since the Boston Orchestra will also be with us for concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky, as always, promis[illegible] of unusual interest. For the first concert there will be the initial performance in New York of a symphony by Clementi which was lost for nearly a century after his death, and finally discovered and acquired by the Library of Congress in Washington.

Trans. Jan.

Four Scores Recently Issued by the Publishers

Bach's "Art of the Fugue" And a Concerto by Monn In New Versions

Four musical publications have recently found their way to the desk of this department. Two are revisions of scores from the eighteenth century. Two are original works. The first two are Bach's monumental "Art of the Fugue," transcribed for string quartet by Roy Harris and M. D. Herter Norton (New York: G. Schirmer, Inc.), and Arnold Schoenberg's Concerto for 'cello and orchestra after a Cembalo Concerto by Georg Matthias Monn (New York: G. Schirmer, Inc.). The two original works are Alban Berg's Violin Concerto (Vienna: Universal Edition) and "Imagery," an orchestral suite on original Hindu Themes, by the American composer, Horace Johnson (New York: J. Fischer and Bro.).

The Concerto of Monn, as it reached this department, is doubly arranged, since the present copy constitutes Schoenberg's reduction, for 'cello and piano, of his orchestral score. How much the Schoenberg version differs from the original work of Monn can only be guessed at without recourse to the two scores in question, neither of which unfortunately is available to this writer. But there is sufficient inner evidence in Schoenberg's piano arrangement pointing to considerable departure from Monn's original in the matters of harmony and part-writing.

Monn, who is allotted scarcely a dozen lines in Grove's Dictionary, was one of those mid-European composers of the first half of the eighteenth century who wrote numberless pieces in the "new" style that so effectively displaced the old contrapuntal tradition and prepared the way for Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. This does not mean that Monn necessarily composed according to the simplest harmonic and formal patterns. But it seems quite unlikely that the chromaticism, which is at once apparent in the Schoenberg arrangement, should be entirely of Monn's manufacture. It is more likely that Schoenberg has indulged in a pastiche, although by no means so radical a pastiche as, let us say, Stravinsky's "Pulcinella." The 'cello part, of course, is Schoenberg's creation, and it looks fiendishly difficult to play.

It was Monn and Stamitz and others of the time, no doubt, whom Friedrich Wilhelm Marpurg had in mind when he referred slightingly to their composing technic and musical ideas alongside those of the master, Johann Sebastian Bach, in the preface written two years after Bach's death for the second edition of the "Art of the Fugue." For Bach was not only one hundred years ahead of his time, as we are so frequently remindid, but also at least half a century in arrears of it. Thus we are enabled to understand the remarkable and eloquent defense of Bach's style and genius contained in this preface.

The latest edition of the "Art of the Fugue" carries a long foreword from Mr. Harris and Mrs. Norton, which explains, among other things, why the transcription was made for the four bowed instruments of the classical string quartet. It is unnecessary to go into this explanation now, first because it seems reasonable to the present writer and second because the subject was sufficiently discussed at the time when the phonograph records of this version appeared a year or more ago.

The present edition has a twofold new value. First, it offers students and amateurs a chance to study the wonderful work of Bach to the tune, so to say, of the phonograph. Second, there is a fairly elaborate section devoted to "analytical comment," which is intended, in the words of the authors, "to contribute, directly and without the pedantry of minute technical dissection, to an active appreciation of the work by those musicians, whether public performers or amateurs, who do not have the opportunity of carrying out a detailed analysis for themselves." This not immodest order seems to be capably filled by the authors.

* * *

The Violin Concerto of Berg was discussed in these columns from the manuscript score at some length immediately after the death of the composer, who died almost exactly a year ago, and who was here singing his swan song. A good deal has been made of the fact that the composer, writing in this Concerto a Requiem for his recently deceased friend, Manon Gropius, was unconsciously also writing his own. It was as a Requiem that the Concerto was received at the first performance in Barcelona last spring, and has been similarly regarded at each subsequent performance, including the presentation a couple of months ago in the composer's native Vienna, where the work made an extraordinary impression.

Even in London, which has not been observably prejudiced on behalf of the music of the twelve-tone school, the first (broadcast) performance elicited praise of the highest sort from critics of the standing of Ernest Newman, Constant Lambert and Richard Capell. Some have not hesitated to characterize it as Berg's greatest work as well as his last. We in Boston shall fortunately have an opportunity to express a more direct opinion when the Concerto receives the first American performances next spring at the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky, the Symphony Orchestra, and the solo violinist, Louis Krasner of this city, for whom the work was written.

Berg's Violin Concerto and Short Orchestral Work By Horace Johnson

It is no disrespect or disservice to contemporary American music to say that Horace Johnson's "Imagery" is not in the same class with the works above. Johnson writes here earnestly and honestly. He is not concerned with a revival of the past or a look into the future. He is content to set down, in the language of tones, certain immediate impressions suggested by the Orient. There are three movements: the first, "Procession to Indra," the second, "Aparasa," the third, "Urbasi." Although the tempo varies, naturally, the dance motive prevails most of the time.

In fact, an inspection of the score confirms the impression derived when this work was first presented in Boston by the Peoples Symphony Orchestra under Fabien Sevitzky. "Imagery" lends itself to performance not only in the concert hall but also in the theater, where, it would seem, a ballet might readily be made out of it. This suggestion is made the more feasible since the score, even in original form, does not require a very large orchestra—wind instruments in twos and three. Nor is it a long work—fourteen minutes in playing time.

M. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
DEC 31 1936

Second Concert Given by Paul Stassevitch

Early this month in Boston Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony played for the first time in America Alfredo Casella's revised version of Muzio Clementi's D major symphony. This work by the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century Italian composer was one of four symphonies recently recovered and later pieced together by his twentieth century compatriot.

At the Town Hall last evening Paul Stassevitch, leading his own symphony orchestra in the second concert in this season's series, accorded a similar American premiere to the C major symphony of this group of four. It is a robust, vigorously scored (or edited) and melodically and harmonically engrossing work, eminently worth the reviving.

After that Mr. Stassevitch played Liadoff's "The Enchanted Lake," a shimmering fabric of tone suggestive of Debussyan impressionism, and then the same composer's "Baba-Yaga," which, between the opening shriek of all the instruments in unison and the concluding squeak of the woodwind, goes in for a deal of instrumental horseplay.

In the subsequent "Sarabande" of Roger-Ducasse the voices of a group of women singers from the Schola Cantorum bobbed up and down on a heaving expanse of solid tone, only to be swallowed up and to bob up again briefly at the very end. Mr. Stassevitch's orchestra gave a substantial account of it, as it did of the other numbers on the program, Weinberger's boisterous "Schwanda" overture concluded the concert.

L. B.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
148 JAN 2 - 1937

JESUS MARIA SANROMA

Piano soloist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 9.

The second pair of concerts this season in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Kous-sevitzky, conductor, will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening next, January 7, at 8:45 o'clock, and Saturday afternoon, January 9, at 2:30 o'clock.

An event of unusual musical interest at the Thursday evening concert will be the first performance in New York of a Symphony in D major by Muzio Clementi which, with the other symphonies of this composer, were lost for nearly a century after his death. This symphony, like the others highly praised in the composer's time, was recently acquired in London by the Library of Congress at Washington. Alfredo Casella has restored this symphony (and another in C major) and performed them last winter in Italy. In the manuscripts at Washington, he found the D major symphony complete save for the introduction, which was supplied by the discovery of a manuscript fragment long in possession of the British Museum in London. This symphony had its first American performances under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction in Boston.

On Thursday's program besides Clementi's symphony there are also Ravel's Second Suite from the Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor.

At the Saturday matinee, Koussevitzky will devote the first part of the program to two American composers—Edward MacDowell, the seventy-fifth anniversary of whose birth befell in December, and Arthur Foote, MacDowell's senior by eight years, who is still living. Mr. Foote's Suite in E major for String Orchestra will be performed, and MacDowell's Second Pianoforte Concerto. The soloist will be Jesus Maria Sanroma, the Puerto Rican-American pianist. The closing number will be the Symphony in D minor by Cesar Frank.

Article from Hartford, Conn. about Mrs. McDowell and how Sanroma took concerto to her for advice on interpretation last. Was written by R. L. Humphrey.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN
27 1936

Music News and Views

by Albert Kirkpatrick

MUSIC news being at low ebb this holiday season, we have been forced to take up again the (by us) almost abandoned art of book reading. Fortunately we were able to borrow from the extensive Blakeney library a volume of the vintage of '36 which makes the old perusing process a matter of mingled pleasure and profit. "The Man With the Baton" by David Ewen, Thomas Y. Crowell company, New York, is subtitled, "The Story of Conductors and Their Orchestras." As the New Yorker would say, it tells the story of conductors and their orchestras; which, after all, is fair enough. But to our mind David Ewen does the job, by and large, better than anyone else we can recall. In some 350 pages he covers the history of the development of the orchestra in Europe and in America briefly but thoroughly, discusses the rise of the conductor as a virtuoso and the art of conducting in general with its consequent virtues and vices, and adds biographical sketches and critical comments on all of the foremost conductors past and present both here and abroad.

With references to the vices of the virtuoso conductor Ewen's comment is frequently agreeably caustic, but he has been careful to expose each offender or type of offender to as genial and unbiased an appraisal as one is likely to encounter on the printed page. Thomas, Damrosch, Toscanini, Koussetvitsky and Stokowsky steal a considerable amount of the space alloted to individuals, and the author even manages to dig up a few new anecdotes about Toscanini, which in itself is a notable achievement. For Toscanini anecdotes, however, we still think that Van Vechten holds a world's record in his crazyquilt novel, "Peter Whiffle." He tells about an American opera singer who spoke no Italian and simply could not understand the maestro's directions in one place where he wished her to turn her back to the audience. Finally a great light dawned in the diva's cerebrum, "Ah, maestro," she cried, remembering her French rashly, "Est-ce que vous voulez mon derriere?"

The numerous photographs in the Ewen book should not go by without mention. They are remarkably interesting and look as if they might have been posed especially for this volume though in the case of von Bulow and a few others that is unlikely, to say the least. Toscanini is shown with a segment of the orchestra in rehearsal, and Koussevitzky, in a striking view with part of the orchestra and part of the audience, serves as a frontispiece.

* * *

THOSE musicians particularly addicted to the performances of the Boston symphony orchestra will be interested in a small volume of charcoal drawings of the members of that organization, together with short biographical sketches both by Gerome Brush, and published by The Merrymount Press, Boston, under the title, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1936."

* * *

OUR enthusiasm for grand opera is not what it once was, but many no doubt hardier constitutions will be absorbed, as we were last year, with the Puccini letters edited by Giuseppi Adami in the translation of Ena Makin, published by L. J. Lippincott. Somehow, now that Christmas is over, we can think of any number of things which we should have been glad to get or give. And if your Christmas shopping was as ineffectual as was ours, you may yet find one of these useful come Easter.

* * *

ARE you going to Salzburg next summer? If so, the Salzburg Society in America, which exists for the purpose of promoting interest in the cultural institutions of that city, will offer to its members a 10 percent reduction on the sale of festival tickets for the performances of the coming season. Membership cards are obtainable at 630 Fifth avenue, New York City, upon payment of a fee of two dollars.

* * *

AN unprecedented number of applications for places on the program of the biennial convention of the National Federation of Music clubs, to be held in Louisville, Ky., April 23-29, has been reported by the national president. Two Oklahoma choruses will be represented on that program: The Oklahoma Tulsans, a business men's chorus, and the Redmen's glee club of Bacone college, Muskogee, under the direction of Gordon Berger.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
7 1936

GALLI-CURCI

Galli-Curci returned to the operatic stage some weeks ago in Chicago; her appearance in "La Boheme" was rather a trial to those who recalled her glorious singing of a decade ago; the event can scarcely be set down as a success. Mme. Povla Frisjh is singing repeatedly in New York this season; after thrilling two crowded audiences during the fall, she is suddenly asked to substitute for Marian Anderson whose tour has been interrupted by an indisposition. Mme. Olga Averino, known here, but too seldom heard, was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week in Debussy's "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien." Feodor Chaliapin returns to this country next season for opera and concert performances, notably as Boris in Moussorgsky's opera, attaining the nature of special celebration with the centenary of Pushkin whose poem formed the basis of the work.

Richard Strauss has been the honored guest of the English during the month of November, he conducted his Rosenkavalier and Ariadne auf Naxos in connection with the visit of the Dresden Opera Company. The public was decidedly cordial and impressed (if reminder was necessary) with the fact that Strauss is still the leading figure in European music, although well past 70 years of age. The honors showered upon him remind the reader of British enthusiasm for great composers of the past, notabl Weber, Spohr, Liszt, Mendelssohn and—if you must start at the beginning—Handel.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEW YORK JOURNAL
JAN 5 - 1937

M

Boston Orchestra

This is very much orchestra week since the Boston Orchestra will also be with us for concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky, as always, promis[illegible] of unusual interest. For the first concert there will be the initial performance in New York of a symphony by Clementi which was lost for nearly a century after his death, and finally discovered and acquired by the Library of Congress in Washington.

FAMOUS GREEK BACK TO DIRECT SYMPHONY

Dimitri Mitropoulos Tells of Open Air Experiments

Coming here to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the two weeks of Serge Koussevitzky's annual Winter vacation, Dimitri Mitropoulos arrived ~~this~~ yesterday afternoon from his native Athens, Greece, by way of New York. There at Carnegie Hall he heard the Boston Symphony, which has been on tour.

"It sounded even better to me than last year, which I thought was not possible," he said, with an expansive smile.

The man who is known throughout Europe as a pianist, composer and conductor, is making his second appearance before Boston audiences, having conducted as guest artist at the Symphony last season. He was received with such enthusiasm that he was given an invitation to return immediately. It is unusual for a guest conductor to take over the Symphony programs two seasons in succession.

Located at the conductor's room at Symphony Hall, yesterday, he told a remarkable story concerning two numbers he plans to introduce here. They are his arrangement for string orchestra of Beethoven's Quartet in C Sharp minor, and his arrangement of prelude and air of Dido from the opera "Dido and Aeneas," composed by the English musician Henry Purcell in the 17th Century.

"These are the result of experiments I have been carrying out in the ancient amphitheatres of Greece," he said. His face and gestures became intensely animated.

"I made some strange discoveries. The acoustics of those structures put up centuries ago were marvelous—in fact, too much so. Actually I had to caution my musicians against turning the leaves of their music carelessly, because the sound was magnified so much as to interfere with the music.

On one of his programs with the Boston Symphony he will give the first performance here of Respighi's "Toccata," for piano and orchestra. The conductor, of course, will be Mitropoulos. And the piano soloist? He also will be Mitropoulos.

And so, with his first orchestral rehearsal on Monday, Dimitri Mitropoulos was left busily toiling over his piano and analyzing orchestral scores.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.,
NEWS

JAN 2 - 1937

149

MUSIC BOX

The close of the holiday season finds music loving Milwaukee once more in its stride with any number of important musical events scheduled for the new calendar.

Lovers of chamber music look forward with great expectation to the concert to be presented by Harold Bauer, world-renowned pianist, and the equally famous Stradivarius String Quartet, at the Pabst theater on Monday, Jan. 11, and to be sponsored by the Arion Musical club as an important feature on its season course.

Concert reservations may be made at the Arion's headquarters.

It is interesting to learn that Mr. Bauer's first ambition was to become a concert violinist and he achieved this ambition before he switched his talents to the piano. His father was an accomplished amateur violinist and he instructed his son so well that, at nine years of age, young Harold was concertizing in London, his native city, and throughout England, as a musical prodigy.

Only when he met the great Polish pianist, Paderewski, who took a keen interest in ihs future, did Harold Bauer seek to major in the keyboard art.

His first appearance in this country was in Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, in 1901. Since then he has been steadily engaged in this country every season.

Successful in Film City.

Word comes from Hollywood that Frieda Stoll, soprano, and former Milwaukeean, has been selected by Dr. Otto Klemperer, director of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Symphony, to appear with that organization as soloist.

Frieda Stoll.

Miss Stoll has had a successful career in the film center, and she was recently heard in concert at the Beverly Hills hotel, assisted by Daniel Lehrer, flutist, and accompanied by La Verne Beal.

Born in La Crosse, Wis., of a family of famous musicians, Frieda was unusually gifted from her earliest childhood. She graduated with high honors under Hans Bruening, noted pianist of Berlin, Germany, and studied voice with Mme. Colberta Millett, of Milan, Italy, and with Richard Hageman, former conductor at the Metropolitan Opera company.

Her debut in Paris won the unstinted praise of critics, and she has been hailed as a brilliant artist wherever she has appeared in concert since.

Society of Musical Arts.

Jeanette Soffa Kinnell, soprano, and Walter Liberace, pianist, will be heard in the third concert of the Society of Musical Arts on Thursday, Jan. 7, at the Athenaeum in the following program:

Aria—Patron, das macht der Wind......Bach
(Der Streit zwischen Phoebus und Pan)
Auch Kleine Dinge..............Hugo Wolf
Die Lorelei .... Liszt
Mrs. Kinnel
Sonata Op. 31, No. 2..........Beethoven
Allegro Adagio Allegretto
Mr. Liberace
Aria—Pace, Pace, Mio Dio...... .. Verdi
(La Forza del Destino)
Mrs. Kinnel
Etude in F Minor.....................Chopin
Consolation No. 6....................Liszt
Waldesrauschen (Forest Murmurs)...Liszt
Mr. Liberace
The Time for Making Songs Has Come.
...................................Rogers
The Faltering Dusk ....Kramer
In the Silence of Night......Rachmaninoff
Nursery Rhyme: Sing a Song of Sixpence ....Hughes
The Year's at the Spring..........Beach
Mrs. Kinnel
Silver Cascade ....Niemann
The Night Winds ....Griffes
Prelude .... Florence Bettray-Kelly
Toccata .... Florence Bettray-Kelly
Mr. Liberace
Herman A. Nott will be the accompanist.

* * *

Marwood Musicale.

June Habert is in charge of the January program of the Marwood Musicale to be presented at the home of Bernadine Treis, on Monday, Jan. 4. Those participating will include Louise Eilmann, Margaret Diefenthaeler, Lorraine Fehringer, Mrs Charles Gates, Verna Zeidler and Jean Norris.

* * *

Chicago Symphony.

Brahms' well known "Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn," will be heard again when Frederick Stock next leads the Chicago Symphony orchestra at the Pabst theater on Monday.

A varied program of familiar music will include the "Scheherazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakov and the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride."

Dr. Stock will lead his symphony in one of his own compositions, "The Symphonic Waltz," which has already been recorded by his orchestra, and reveal the modernism of Paul Hindemith, German composer, in the new "Matthias the Painter."

Wisconsin Symphony.

Jerry Bojanowski, who conducted the symphony last season, will direct the first in a series of concerts to be given at the Shorewood community auditorium by the Wisconsin Symphony orchestra on Friday, Jan. 29. Guy Maier, pianist, will be soloist in a Mozart concerto.

Rudolph Ganz, Chicago pianist and teacher, will direct the program on Saturday, Feb. 27.

The third concert on Saturday, March 20, will be under the direction of Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff, former conductor of the Cleveland orchestra and now director of the national works progress administration music proect.

On Friday, April 23, Izler Solomon of Chicago will direct, with Margaret Diefenthaeler and Roland Dittl, Milwaukee pianists, as soloists.

Chamber Series.

The new 1937 chamber music series to be given at the Layton Art institute will be inaugurated on Monday. Jan. 25 when the Pearl Brice string quartet of Milwaukee will be heard in concert.

On Monday, Feb. 1 and Feb. 22, the Philharmonic string quartet of Chicago will be presented.

Wisconsin Grand Opera.

The Wisconsin Grand Opera company, which will present Verdi's "Il Trovatore" at the Milwaukee University school on Friday, Jan. 15 and Jan. 16, will present the following singers in the leading roles:

Mrs. Viola Arneman, 922 E. Circle dr.; Rose Stoll, 2976 S. Delaware av.; Mrs. Ruth Beisel, 1724 N. Prospect av.; Walter Kron, 2374 N. Fortieth st.; Ellsworth A. Riel, Kenosha; Raymond Kuhn, 3216 W. Juneau av.; Edwin W. Kappel, 1100 S. Twenty-eighth st., and Arthur Wilkinson, Chicago.

Others of the company who will be heard are Ann Nicolai, Ruth Lee, Evelyn Quammen, Mrs. Elma Niquette, Mrs. Ora Sherbrook, Augusta Missling, Marguerite Stuht, Mrs. Audrey Kopf, Annamae Jackson, Mrs. Marie Harms, Mrs. Katheryn Jakovich, E. Jean Darrah, Mrs. Lillian Traisman, Jane Burdick, Ann Wagner, Mrs. Harold Van Horn, Lois Drescher, Howard Kopf, Wilbur W. Messman, Albert Rostkowski, George Radakovich, Lou Petaschnick, John Korjan, Ernest Wild, August Schweisthal, Steven Hegji, W. A. Wenz, Josephine Wipperman, Willard Reese and Earl Thiel.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER

JAN 2 - 1937

The Critic Talks to

MUSIC LOVERS

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

TWO ANNIVERSARIES of the births of composers fell on the 18th of December, one the 150th of the advent of Carl Maria von Weber into this world in 1786 and the second, which occurred exactly seventy-five years later, was that of Edward MacDowell, in 1861, the man who still is universally conceded to have been the most important composer that the United States has yet produced. Not much notice was taken in Philadelphia of either event, Mr. Ormandy playing the "Freischuetz" overture of Weber and the Civic Symphony Orchestra performing three movements of the "Indian Suite" of MacDowell. Boston, where MacDowell lived for a period within the memory of many still living, gave the largest recognition to the anniversary.

To judge from the programs of orchestral conductors who occasionally perform the works of MacDowell, it would appear that the "Indian State" was the only orchestral work which he wrote. While it is probably his best and in some ways the most original, it was by no means the only one. At an early age, after seeing a particularly impressive performance of "Hamlet" by Sir Henry Irving and Ellen Terry, he wrote two "poems" for orchestra, entitled "Hamlet" and "Ophelia." There are also the symphonic poems, "Launcelot and Elaine" and "Lamia,"; "The Saracens" and "Lovely Alda," two "fragments" from "The Song of Roland" and a suite in A minor, besides the two piano concertos and a romanza for violoncello and orchestra.

* * *

THE "INDIAN SUITE" is the last of these works in point of composition. "Lamia" was not published until after the death of the composer, although it retains its proper place in the opus numbers. MacDowell in the suite was contemporaneous with Dvorak in "From the New World" symphony in calling attention to the fact that there existed in the United States native American folk-song elements capable of use in artistic music, although he never used the Negro idiom. As a matter of fact, the "Indian Suite" was fully sketched three years before the first production of the Dvorak symphony, although it was performed three years later, MacDowell desiring to become better acquainted with what was to him (and the musical world) a new kind of music. In the "Indian Suite" authentic Indian themes form its basis.

But in spite of this MacDowell was essentially a composer for the piano, and, like Grieg and Schumann, was at his best in the smaller forms, although his musical personality was both as distinct and different from theirs. In his early years, when MacDowell first went abroad to study, it was with the sole idea of becoming a piano virtuoso, and with this in mind worked for four years in Paris and in Frankfort, becoming one of the best American pianists of his time.

* * *

IT WAS Joachim Raff, then head of the Conservatory of Frankfort and his teacher of composition. who first noted the creative powers of his pupil, and after much urging MacDowell completed his first (A minor) piano concerto, and in 1882 Raff sent him to Liszt with it. The great master was congratulatory about the work, commending the boldness and originality of the harmonic treatment, a characteristic which MacDowell retained throughout his whole creative life. It may be remarked that fourteen years previously another youthful composer appeared before Liszt, also with a piano concerto in A minor, and was warmly commended, this being Edvard Grieg. The concerto was not MacDowell's first work, although he had written nothing previously employing the orchestra. He refused to allow his first eight works to be published and later destroyed them. The earlier published works (the concerto is op. 15) were songs and short piano numbers among them the "First Modern Suite."

It was MacDowell's original purpose to remain in Germany as a country then (in the early 80s) being more congenial to his artistic nature than his native land. But after the death of Raff he decided to return to the United States, which he did in 1887, and made his home in Boston. By this time the second piano concerto (D minor) had been completed, and MacDowell performed both concertos with the Boston Symphony, with himself as soloist. From that time until he went to New York to become head of the music department of Columbia University, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played all his works for orchestra as fast as they were completed, and the compositions were also making headway elsewhere in the country, largely through his appearances as a recitalist.

* * *

IN ADDITION to this, appreciation of MacDowell's music was also largely due to the fiery Teresa Carreno, Venezuelan pianist, who was the first artist except the composer publicly to perform works of MacDowell. and this writer well remembers a tremendous interpretation by her of the second concerto in this city years ago. Mme. Carreno had been the piano teacher of MacDowell as a child and the concerto is dedicated to her. Due to these happy circumstances MacDowell, unlike so many musical creative talents cut off in their prime, lived to enjoy in a large measure the recognition due to his talent. The unhappy circumstances which led to the severance of his relations with Columbia University have been largely glossed over by his biographers, although Sinclair Lewis, who studied with him there, did some plain speaking in an article in the American Mercury ten years ago.

As a composer, MacDowell was of closer kin to Schumann than to any other of the older masters. Both were fond of titles for even their smaller works, although the influence of Raff on MacDowell may again be traced in this; both were pre-eminently poets whose exquisite fancies find their finest expressions in the smaller forms, especially for piano. MacDowell's most pronounced gift was a fertile melodic invention. His themes are usually short but always clearly defined, very expressive and logically developed, while his feeling for proportion, symmetry and artistic unity compares favorably with composers who popularly are ranked above him. On his return to America he exerted a highly beneficial influence as to the proper treatment of the American composer by the public and press, expressing himself as bitterly opposed to any segregation either for laudation or condemnation — an attitude which not all of his fellow countrymen composers have followed.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 1 - 1937

Serge Rachmaninoff Ill.

New York, Dec. 31.—(AP.)—Serge Rachmaninoff, pianist and composer, is ill with a cold, his agents announced today, and has cancelled an appearance in Boston with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on advice of his physician. He is expected to be able to play with the Philadelphia Orchestra in New York January 5.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

1/3/37

NOTES ON PROGRAMS

Koussevitsky Conducts

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in one of its regular subscription concerts here at Carnegie Hall Thursday at 8:45 p. m. over WJZ. The first performance of Alfredo Casella's revision of Clementi's Symphony in D in New York will be given during the concert. The orchestra will play the Suite in E major for String Orchestra, Opus 63, by Foote, and the Symphony in D by Clementi.

DAVENPORT, IA.
Democrat & Leader

JAN 7 - 1937

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in one of its regular subscription concerts at Carnegie hall New York. NBC—WLS.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

JAN 3 - 1937

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct a concert at 7:45 p. m. Thursday on the WJZ network (8 o'clock on KWK) by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Music to be played will include Casella's revision of Clementi's Symphony in D and Foote's Suite in E-major for string orchestra.

Walter Damrosch will resume his Music Appreciation Hour on KSD at 1 p. m. Friday, when he will conduct performances of the Scotch Idyl from Saint-Saens "Henry VIII," the Andante from Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, two pieces by Saint-Saens and Taylor's "The White Knight."

Eugene Ormandy has programmed the Prelude to Act III of "Lohengrin," Handel's "Largo," Schumann's Dance of the Nymphs and Satyrs, and Sibelius' "Finlandia" for the concert by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra at 9 p. m. Friday.

N. J.
COURIER

JAN 1 - 1937

Ormandy to Direct All - Rachmaninoff Weekend Program

W. of P. Choral Society Will Sing 'The Bells' Symphony At 2 Concerts

Eugene Ormandy, Conducting
RACHMANINOFF..............
........Symphony "The Bells"
(Poem by Edgar Allen Poe)
Agnes Davis, soprano: Fritz Krueger, tenor, Elwood Hawkins, baritone
UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA CHORAL SOCIETY
Harl McDonald, Director
Intermission
RACHMANINOFF...Concerto No. 2 in C minor for Piano and Orchestra

An all-Rachmaninoff program which presents the great Russian composer as soloist playing his own Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra on Friday afternoon, January 8, and Saturday evening, January 9.

Eugene Ormandy who is conducting, will devote the entire first half of the program to Rachmaninoff's four part choral symphony "The Bells" which he wove about the celebrated poem of Edgar Allen Poe.

The mixed chorus of 150 voices will be provided by the University of Pennsylvania Choral Society of which Harl McDonald is director.

Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto, the most familiar of the four he has composed for piano and orchestra, was written in 1899; published in 1902; and dedicated to N. Dahl. The work is in three movements.

The work was performed for the first time at a concert of the Philharmonic Society of Moscow; on October 14, 1901, with the composer as the pianist. Raoul Pugne disclosed the work in New York at a Russian Symphony Concert, November 18, 1905.

The Concerto had won for Rachmaninoff in the previous year (1904) the Glinka prize of 500 rubles, founded by Belaieff, the plutocratic and incredibly generous publisher who helped so many of the younger Russian music-makers. The work was produced in a period toward the end of 1899 when Rachmaninoff began writing again, after two years in which his activity as a composer was relaxed.

In 1897 Rachmaninoff had turned aside from composition to undertake the conductorship of Marmantoff's "Private" Opera at Moscow. But the unremitting work of rehearsal and leadership warned him that if he continued in the position, he would be obliged to abandon entirely his creative work, he therefore gave up his post after a single season.

Rachmaninoff himself divides the quarter century of his musical activity into three periods of approximately eight years each—composing, concert work and conducting. His musical training began at the St Petersburg Conservatory when he was nine years old, and for three years he remained there studying chiefly piano. In 1885 he entered the Conservatory at Moscow where he studied piano with Zvierev and with Siloti, his cousin.

For theory and composition Rachmaninoff's instructors were Taneieff and Arensky. As a pianist he was graduated summa cum laude in 1891, and in 1892 he received the gold medal for composition, a reward for his opera "Aleko" which was produced at the Imperial Opera House, Moscow, in the same year. Leaving the Conservatory he made a long concert tour through Russia.

Going to London for the first time in 1899, Rachmaninoff appeared as composer, conductor and pianist at the Philharmonic Concert, April 19, and his orchestral fantasia "The Cliff" was performed. Visits to Vienna and Paris followed, and in 1903 he was appointed professor of piano at the Maryinsky Institute for Girls at Moscow. The following year he became first conductor of Russian opera at the Imperial Theatre of Moscow, and later became conductor of the Moscow Symphony Orchestra. He was once offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony.

The Russian revolution forced him from his native land, and his estates were confiscated. Escaping with his family into Sweden, Rachmaninoff, his wife and two beautiful daughters came to New York where they make their home.

Just before the war, while Rachmaninoff was living in Rome he began work upon a choral symphony—not from the sounds of bells, but suggestions of them, achieved by the use of different combinations of orchestral sonorities. He wished to evoke by his music these moods and emotions, those images and associations, which the sound of bells can bring to the minds of the imaginative—merriment and joy, terrors and alarms, sorrow and mourning.

Finishing the symphony in 1913 when he returned to Russia, Rachmaninoff actually set his music to the version of Poe's poem made by the distinguished Russian poet Constantin Balmont. The present English version used by the singers however, has been made by Fanny S. Copeland from Berthold Feiwel's German version of Balmont's Russian translation.

When the work was given its American premiere with the Orchestra at the concerts of February 6-7, 1920, with Mr. Stokowski conducting, there was some discussion as to whether "The Bells" was actually a choral symphony or a cantata.

Following certain symphonic elements in its construction, the work divides naturally into the four parts of the poem—the joyous silver sleigh bells, the mellow wedding bells, the loud alarm bells and the mournful iron bells.

In his buoyant first movement, the composer has found an ideal subject for modern dissonance, with the shimmering tang of parallel fifths in the high wood and the fin ecstacy of calls that is lost in tempest of tintinnabulation.

The tender second movement "mellow wedding bells" is a p lyric episode.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
NEWS

149

JAN 2 - 1937

MUSIC BOX

The close of the holiday season finds music loving Milwaukee once more in its stride with any number of important musical events scheduled for the new calendar.

Lovers of chamber music look forward with great expectation to the concert to be presented by Harold Bauer, world-renowned pianist, and the equally famous Stradivarius String Quartet, at the Pabst theater on Monday, Jan. 11, and to be sponsored by the Arion Musical club as an important feature on its season course.

Concert reservations may be made at the Arion's headquarters.

It is interesting to learn that Mr. Bauer's first ambition was to become a concert violinist and he achieved this ambition before he switched his talents to the piano. His father was an accomplished amateur violinist and he instructed his son so well that, at nine years of age, young Harold was concertizing in London, his native city, and throughout England, as a musical prodigy.

Only when he met the great Polish pianist, Paderewski, who took a keen interest in ihs future, did Harold Bauer seek to major in the keyboard art.

His first appearance in this country was in Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, in 1901. Since then, he has been steadily engaged in this country every season.

Successful in Film City.

Word comes from Hollywood that Frieda Stoll, soprano, and former Milwaukeean, has been selected by Dr. Otto Klemperer, director of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Symphony, to appear with that organization as soloist.

Miss Stoll has had a successful career in the film center, and she was recently heard in concert at the Beverly Hills hotel, assisted by Daniel Lehrer, flutist, and accompanied by La Verne Beal.

Frieda Stoll.

Born in La Crosse, Wis., of a family of famous musicians, Frieda was unusually gifted from her earliest childhood. She graduated with high honors under Hans Bruening, noted pianist of Berlin, Germany, and studied voice with Mme. Colberta Millett, of Milan, Italy, and with Richard Hageman, former conductor at the Metropolitan Opera company.

Her debut in Paris won the unstinted praise of critics, and she has been hailed as a brilliant artist wherever she has appeared in concert since.

Society of Musical Arts.

Jeanette Soffa Kinnell, soprano, and Walter Liberace, pianist, will be heard in the third concert of the Society of Musical Arts on Thursday, Jan. 7, at the Athenaeum in the following program:

Aria—Patron, das macht der Wind...[illegible]ch
(Der Streit zwischen Phoebus und Pan)
Auch Kleine Dinge..............Hugo Wolf
Die Lorelei .... Liszt
Mrs. Kinnel
Sonata Op. 31, No. 2...........Beethoven
Allegro Adagio Allegretto
Mr. Liberace
Aria—Pace, Pace, Mio Dio...........Verdi
(La Forza del Destino)
Mrs. Kinnel
Etude in F Minor...................Chopin
Consolation No. 6....................Liszt
Waldesrauschen (Forest Murmurs)....Liszt
Mr. Liberace
The Time for Making Songs Has Come.
.................................Rogers
The Faltering Dusk .... Kramer
In the Silence of Night......Rachmaninoff
Nursery Rhyme: Sing a Song of Sixpence .... Hughes
The Year's at the Spring...........Beach
Mrs. Kinnel
Silver Cascade .... Niemann
The Night Winds .... Griffes
Prelude .... Florence Bettray-Kelly
Toccata .... Florence Bettray-Kelly
Mr. Liberace

Herman A. Nott will be the accompanist.

* * *

Marwood Musicale.

June Habert is in charge of the January program of the Marwood Musicale to be presented at the home of Bernadine Treis, on Monday, Jan. 4. Those participating will include Louise Eilmann, Margaret Diefenthaeler, Lorraine Fehringer, Mrs Charles Gates, Verna Zeidler and Jean Norris.

* * *

Chicago Symphony.

Brahms' well known "Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn," will be heard again when Frederick Stock next leads the Chicago Symphony orchestra at the Pabst theater on Monday.

A varied program of familiar music will include the "Scheherazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakov and the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride."

Dr. Stock will lead his symphony in one of his own compositions, "The Symphonic Waltz," which has already been recorded by his orchestra, and reveal the modernism of Paul Hindemith, German composer, in the new "Matthias the Painter."

Wisconsin Symphony.

Jerry Bojanowski, who conducted the symphony last season, will direct the first in a series of concerts to be given at the Shorewood community auditorium by the Wisconsin Symphony orchestra on Friday, Jan. 29. Guy Maier, pianist, will be soloist in a Mozart concerto.

Rudolph Ganz, Chicago pianist and teacher, will direct the program on Saturday, Feb. 27.

The third concert on Saturday, March 20, will be under the direction of Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff, former conductor of the Cleveland orchestra and now director of the national works progress administration music proect.

On Friday, April 23, Izler Solomon of Chicago will direct, with Margaret Diefenthaeler and Roland Dittl, Milwaukee pianists, as soloists.

Chamber Series.

The new 1937 chamber music series to be given at the Layton Art institute will be inaugurated on Monday, Jan. 25 when the Pearl Brice string quartet of Milwaukee will be heard in concert.

On Monday, Feb. 1 and Feb. 22, the Philharmonic string quartet of Chicago will be presented.

Wisconsin Grand Opera.

The Wisconsin Grand Opera company, which will present Verdi's "Il Trovatore" at the Milwaukee University school on Friday, Jan. 15 and Jan. 16, will present the following singers in the leading roles:

Mrs. Viola Arneman, 922 E. Circle dr.; Rose Stoll, 2976 S. Delaware av.; Mrs. Ruth Beisel, 1724 N. Prospect av.; Walter Kron, 2374 N. Fortieth st.; Ellsworth A. Riel, Kenosha; Raymond Kuhn, 3216 W. Juneau av.; Edwin W. Kappel, 1100 S. Twenty-eighth st., and Arthur Wilkinson, Chicago.

Others of the company who will be heard are Ann Nicolai, Ruth Lee, Evelyn Quammen, Mrs. Elma Niquette, Mrs. Ora Sherbrook, Augusta Missling, Marguerite Stuht, Mrs. Audrey Kopf, Annamae Jackson, Mrs. Marie Harms, Mrs. Katheryn Jakovich, E. Jean Darrah, Mrs. Lillian Traisman, Jane Burdick, Ann Wagner, Mrs. Harold Van Horn, Lois Drescher, Howard Kopf, Wilbur W. Messman, Albert Rostkowski, George Radakovich, Lou Petaschnick, John Korjan, Ernest Wild, August Schweisthal, Steven Hegji, W. A. Wenz, Josephine Wipperman, Willard Reese and Earl Thiel.

DAVENPORT, IA.
Democrat & Leader
JAN 7 - 1937

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in one of its regular subscription concerts at Carnegie hall New York. NBC—WLS.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER

JAN 2 - 1937

The Critic Talks to

MUSIC LOVERS

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

TWO ANNIVERSARIES of the births of composers fell on the 18th of December, one the 150th of the advent of Carl Maria von Weber into this world in 1786 and the second, which occurred exactly seventy-five years later, was that of Edward MacDowell, in 1861, the man who still is universally conceded to have been the most important composer that the United States has yet produced. Not much notice was taken in Philadelphia of either event, Mr. Ormandy playing the "Freischuetz" overture of Weber and the Civic Symphony Orchestra performing three movements of the "Indian Suite" of MacDowell. Boston, where MacDowell lived for a period within the memory of many still living, gave the largest recognition to the anniversary.

To judge from the programs of orchestral conductors who occasionally perform the works of MacDowell, it would appear that the "Indian State" was the only orchestral work which he wrote. While it is probably his best and in some ways the most original, it was by no means the only one. At an early age, after seeing a particularly impressive performance of "Hamlet" by Sir Henry Irving and Ellen Terry, he wrote two "poems" for orchestra, entitled "Hamlet" and "Ophelia." There are also the symphonic poems, "Launcelot and Elaine" and "Lamia,"; "The Saracens" and "Lovely Alda," two "fragments" from "The Song of Roland" and a suite in A minor, besides the two piano concertos and a romanza for violoncello and orchestra.

* * *

THE "INDIAN SUITE" is the last of these works in point of composition. "Lamia" was not published until after the death of the composer, although it retains its proper place in the opus numbers. MacDowell in the suite was contemporaneous with Dvorak in "From the New World" symphony in calling attention to the fact that there existed in the United States native American folk-song elements capable of use in artistic music, although he never used the Negro idiom. As a matter of fact, the "Indian Suite" was fully sketched three years before the first production of the Dvorak symphony, although it was performed three years later, MacDowell desiring to become better acquainted with what was to him (and the musical world) a new kind of music. In the "Indian Suite" authentic Indian themes form its basis.

But in spite of this MacDowell was essentially a composer for the piano, and, like Grieg and Schumann, was at his best in the smaller forms, although his musical personality was both as distinct and different from theirs. In his early years, when MacDowell first went abroad to study, it was with the sole idea of becoming a piano virtuoso, and with this in mind worked for four years in Paris and in Frankfort, becoming one of the best American pianists of his time.

* * *

IT WAS Joachim Raff, then head of the Conservatory of Frankfort and his teacher of composition, who first noted the creative powers of his pupil, and after much urging MacDowell completed his first (A minor) piano concerto, and in 1882 Raff sent him to Liszt with it. The great master was congratulatory about the work, commending the boldness and originality of the harmonic treatment, a characteristic which MacDowell retained throughout his whole creative life. It may be remarked that fourteen years previously another youthful composer appeared before Liszt, also with a piano concerto in A minor, and was warmly commended, this being Edvard Grieg. The concerto was not MacDowell's first work, although he had written nothing previously employing the orchestra. He refused to allow his first eight works to be published and later destroyed them. The earlier published works (the concerto is op. 15) were songs and short piano numbers among them the "First Modern Suite."

It was MacDowell's original purpose to remain in Germany as a country then (in the early 80s) being more congenial to his artistic nature than his native land. But after the death of Raff he decided to return to the United States, which he did in 1887, and made his home in Boston. By this time the second piano concerto (D minor) had been completed, and MacDowell performed both concertos with the Boston Symphony, with himself as soloist. From that time until he went to New York to become head of the music department of Columbia University, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played all his works for orchestra as fast as they were completed, and the compositions were also making headway elsewhere in the country, largely through his appearances as a recitalist.

* * *

IN ADDITION to this, appreciation of MacDowell's music was also largely due to the fiery Teresa Carreno, Venezuelan pianist, who was the first artist except the composer publicly to perform works of MacDowell. and this writer well remembers a tremendous interpretation by her of the second concerto in this city years ago. Mme. Carreno had been the piano teacher of MacDowell as a child and the concerto is dedicated to her. Due to these happy circumstances MacDowell, unlike so many musical creative talents cut off in their prime, lived to enjoy in a large measure the recognition due to his talent. The unhappy circumstances which led to the severance of his relations with Columbia University have been largely glossed over by his biographers, although Sinclair Lewis, who studied with him there, did some plain speaking in an article in the American Mercury ten years ago.

As a composer, MacDowell was of closer kin to Schumann than to any other of the older masters. Both were fond of titles for even their smaller works, although the influence of Raff on MacDowell may again be traced in this; both were pre-eminently poets whose exquisite fancies find their finest expressions in the smaller forms, especially for piano. MacDowell's most pronounced gift was a fertile melodic invention. His themes are usually short but always clearly defined, very expressive and logically developed, while his feeling for proportion, symmetry and artistic unity compares favorably with composers who popularly are ranked above him. On his return to America he exerted a highly beneficial influence as to the proper treatment of the American composer by the public and press, expressing himself as bitterly opposed to any segregation either for laudation or condemnation — an attitude which not all of his fellow countrymen composers have followed.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

JAN 3 - 1937

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct a concert at 7:45 p. m. Thursday on the WJZ network (8 o'clock on KWK) by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Music to be played will include Casella's revision of Clementi's Symphony in D and Foote's Suite in E-major for string orchestra.

Walter Damrosch will resume his Music Appreciation Hour on KSD at 1 p. m. Friday, when he will conduct performances of the Scotch Idyl from Saint-Saens "Henry VIII," the Andante from Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, two pieces by Saint-Saens and Taylor's "The White Knight."

Eugene Ormandy has programmed the Prelude to Act III of "Lohengrin," Handel's "Largo," Schumann's Dance of the Nymphs and Satyrs, and Sibelius' "Finlandia" for the concert by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra at 9 p. m. Friday.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 1 - 1937

Serge Rachmaninoff Ill.

New York, Dec. 31.—(AP.)—Serge Rachmaninoff, pianist and composer, is ill with a cold, his agents announced today, and has cancelled an appearance in Boston with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on advice of his physician. He is expected to be able to play with the Philadelphia Orchestra in New York January 5.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOTES ON PROGRAMS

Koussevitsky Conducts

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in one of its regular subscription concerts here at Carnegie Hall Thursday at 8:45 p. m. over WJZ. The first performance of Alfredo Casella's revision of Clementi's Symphony in D in New York will be given during the concert. The orchestra will play the Suite in E major for String Orchestra, Opus 63, by Foote, and the Symphony in D by Clementi.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

JAN 1 - 1937

Ormandy to Direct All - Rachmaninoff Weekend Program

W. of P. Choral Society Will Sing 'The Bells' Symphony At 2 Concerts

Eugene Ormandy, Conducting
RACHMANINOFF..............
........Symphony "The Bells"
(Poem by Edgar Allen Poe)
Agnes Davis, soprano; Fritz Krueger, tenor, Elwood Hawkins, baritone
UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA CHORAL SOCIETY
Harl McDonald, Director
Intermission
RACHMANINOFF...Concerto No. 2 in C minor for Piano and Orchestra

An all-Rachmaninoff program which presents the great Russian composer as soloist playing his own Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra on Friday afternoon, January 8, and Saturday evening, January 9.

Eugene Ormandy who is conducting, will devote the entire first half of the program to Rachmaninoff's four part choral symphony "The Bells" which he wove about the celebrated poem of Edgar Allen Poe.

The mixed chorus of 150 voices will be provided by the University of Pennsylvania Choral Society of which Harl McDonald is director.

Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto, the most familiar of the four he has composed for piano and orchestra, was written in 1899; published in 1902; and dedicated to N. Dahl. The work is in three movements.

The work was performed for the first time at a concert of the Philharmonic Society of Moscow; on October 14, 1901, with the composer as the pianist. Raoul Pugne disclosed the work in New York at a Russian Symphony Concert, November 18, 1905.

The Concerto had won for Rachmaninoff in the previous year (1904) the Glinka prize of 500 rubles, founded by Belaieff, the plutocratic and incredibly generous publisher who helped so many of the younger Russian music-makers. The work was produced in a period toward the end of 1899 when Rachmaninoff began writing again, after two years in which his activity as a composer was relaxed.

In 1897 Rachmaninoff had turned aside from composition to undertake the conductorship of Marmantoff's "Private" Opera at Moscow. But the unremitting work of rehearsal and leadership warned him that if he continued in the position, he would be obliged to abandon entirely his creative work, he therefore gave up his post after a single season.

Rachmaninoff himself divides the quarter century of his musical activity into three periods of approximately eight years each—composing, concert work and conducting. His musical training began at the St. Petersburg Conservatory when he was nine years old, and for three years he remained there studying chiefly piano. In 1885 he entered the Conservatory at Moscow where he studied piano with Zvierev and with Siloti, his cousin.

For theory and composition Rachmaninoff's instructors were Taneieff and Arensky. As a pianist he was graduated summa cum laude in 1891, and in 1892 he received the gold medal for composition, a reward for his opera "Aleko" which was produced at the Imperial Opera House, Moscow, in the same year. Leaving the Conservatory he made a long concert tour through Russia.

Going to London for the first time in 1899, Rachmaninoff appeared as composer, conductor and pianist at the Philharmonic Concert, April 19, and his orchestral fantasia "The Cliff" was performed. Visits to Vienna and Paris followed, and in 1903 he was appointed professor of piano at the Maryinsky Institute for Girls at Moscow. The following year he became first conductor of Russian opera at the Imperial Theatre of Moscow, and later became conductor of the Moscow Symphony Orchestra. He was once offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony.

The Russian revolution forced him from his native land, and his estates were confiscated. Escaping with his family into Sweden, Rachmaninoff, his wife and two beautiful daughters came to New York where they make their home.

Just before the war, while Rachmaninoff was living in Rome he began work upon a choral symphony —not from the sounds of bells, but suggestions of them, achieved by the use of different combinations of orchestral sonorities. He wished to evoke by his music these moods and emotions, those images and associations, which the sound of bells can bring to the minds of the imaginative —merriment and joy, terrors and alarms, sorrow and mourning.

Finishing the symphony in 1913 when he returned to Russia, Rachmaninoff actually set his music to the version of Poe's poem made by the distinguished Russian poet Constantin Balmont. The present English version used by the singers however, has been made by Fanny S. Copeland from Berthold Feiwel's German version of Balmont's Russian translation.

When the work was given its American premiere with the Orchestra at the concerts of February 6-7, 1920, with Mr. Stokowski conducting, there was some discussion as to whether "The Bells" was actually a choral symphony or a cantata.

Following certain symphonic elements in its construction, the work divides naturally into the four parts of the poem—the joyous silver sleigh bells, the mellow wedding bells, the loud alarm bells and the mournful iron bells.

In his buoyant first movement, the composer has found an ideal subject for modern dissonance, with the shimmering tang of parallel fifths in the high wood and the final ecstacy of calls that is lost in a tempest of tintinnabulation.

The tender second movement of "mellow wedding bells" is a pure lyric episode.

KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR

JAN 1 - 1937

Exaggerations in Art.

One result of the development of a midwestern school of painters has been the almost simultaneous appearance of a regional school of critics. Those of us who belong to this second group, of course, would be the first to disclaim any professional status. We freely admit we are laymen. Indeed, we insist upon the fact. But our position in the matter, while doing credit to our modesty, is slightly ingenuous. Because, although we begin invariably with some such formula as, "I know nothing about art," with the next breath we add, "but I do know what I like." And thereby land ourselves in the middle of the exercise of our critical faculties.

As long as our best midwestern painters remained in Paris or even New York, we could ignore them. And as long as they continued, like their colleagues from every other part of the country, to paint St. Mark's cathedral in the moonlight or fishing boats at anchor in Gloucester harbor, with, perhaps, now and then, a venture into surrealism or some other artistic fashion of the moment, we could—and did—pay practically no attention to their work. But since many of them have come home and begun painting our own farms and tornadoes, our miners and our hill-billies, our shacks and our skyscrapers, we have had to alter our policy. If our painters are going to talk about us, we are forced to talk about them.

The difficulty with our approach is that while we may know what we like today, we cannot be sure that we will like, or dislike, the same thing tomorrow. Familiarity in art, as the professional critics might tell us, may quite as easily breed pleasure as contempt. It is reported, for example, that when Brahm's first symphony was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first few times, so many Bostonians walked out of Symphony hall that a music critic of the day suggested the signs over the safety doors should be changed to read, "Exit in case of Brahms." Brahms might be a great musician, it was said, but what he wrote would never live, because it was ugly.

Today that particular symphony is regularly voted in audience polls as one of the three most popular symphonies ever written, and Brahms is recognized, even in Boston, as one of the world's greatest masters of melody.

And so it may with some of our contemporary

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

3 - 1937

WEDNESDAY

The Chamber Music Ensemble of the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia broadcasts a program of famous classics under the direction of Dr. Louis Bailly. WABC, 4-4:45 p.m.

Quintet in D Major	Arensky
Brandenburg Concerto No. 5	Bach
Symphony in D Major (oboe, bassoon, strings) (First performance)	Abel

"Symphonic Strings," a concert by an all-string orchestra under the direction of Alfred Wallenstein. WOR, 10-10:30 p.m.

Concerto Grosso No. 12	Handel
Londonderry Air	Grainger
Turkey in the Straw	Steiner
Quartette	Debussy

THURSDAY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in one of its regular subscription concerts at Carnegie Hall. The first performance of Alfredo Casella's revision of Clementi's Symphony in D in New York will be given during the concert. WJZ, 8:45-9:30 p.m.

Suite in E Major for String Orchestra, Opus 63	Foote
Symphony in D	Clementi

MT. PLEASANT, TEXAS
TIMES

JAN 6 - 1937

In pre-war days Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was both conductor and financial backer of his own symphony orchestra in Rusia.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

JAN 2 - 1937

Ormandy to Direct
All
W

W. of P
Sing 'T
At 2 Concerts

◆

Eugene Ormandy, Conducting
RACHMANINOFF ....Symphony "The Bells"
(Poem by Edgar Allen Poe)
Agnes Davis, soprano: Fritz Krueger, tenor, Elwood Hawkins, baritone
UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA CHORAL SOCIETY
Harl McDonald, Director
Intermission
RACHMANINOFF...Concerto No. 2 in C minor for Piano and Orchestra

An all-Rachmaninoff program which presents the great Russian composer as soloist playing his own Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra on Friday afternoon, January 8, and Saturday evening, January 9.

Eugene Ormandy who is conducting, will devote the entire first half of the program to Rachmaninoff's four part choral symphony "The Bells" which he wove about the celebrated poem of Edgar Allen Poe.

The mixed chorus of 150 voices will be provided by the University of Pennsylvania Choral Society of which Harl McDonald is director.

Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto, the most familiar of the four he has composed for piano and orchestra, was written in 1899; published in 1902; and dedicated to N. Dahl. The work is in three movements.

The work was performed for the first time at a concert of the Philharmonic Society of Moscow; on October 14, 1901, with the composer as the pianist. Raoul Pugne disclosed the work in New York at a Russian Symphony Concert, November 18, 1905.

The Concerto had won for Rachmaninoff in the previous year (1904) the Glinka prize of 500 rubles, founded by Belaieff, the plutocratic and incredibly generous publisher who helped so many of the younger Russian music-makers. The work was produced in a period toward the end of 1899 when Rachmaninoff began writing again, after two years in which his activity as a composer was relaxed.

In 1897 Rachmaninoff had turned aside from composition to undertake the conductorship of Marmantoff's "Private" Opera at Moscow. But the unremitting work of rehearsal and leadership warned him that if he continued in the position, he would be obliged to abandon entirely his creative work, he therefore gave up his post after a single season.

Rachmaninoff himself divides the quarter century of his musical activity into three periods of approximately eight years each—composing, concert work and conducting. His musical training began at the St. Petersburg Conservatory when he was nine years old, and for three years he remained there studying chiefly piano. In 1885 he entered the Conservatory at Moscow where he studied piano with Zvierev and with Siloti, his cousin.

For theory and composition Rachmaninoff's instructors were Taneief and Arensky. As a pianist he was graduated summa cum laude in 1891, and in 1892 he received the gold medal for composition, a reward for his opera "Aleko" which was produced at the Imperial Opera House Moscow, in the same year. Leaving the Conservatory he made a long concert tour through Russia.

Going to London for the first time in 1899, Rachmaninoff appeared as composer, conductor and pianist at the Philharmonic Concert, April 1 and his orchestral fantasia "The Cliff" was performed. Visits to Vienna and Paris followed, and in 1903 he was appointed professor of piano at the Maryinsky Institute for Girls at Moscow. The following year he became first conductor of Russian opera at the Imperial Theatre of Moscow, and later became conductor of the Moscow Symphony Orchestra. He was once offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony.

The Russian revolution forced him from his native land, and his estates were confiscated. Escaping with his family into Sweden, Rachmaninoff his wife and two beautiful daughters came to New York where they make their home.

Just before the war, while Rachmaninoff was living in Rome he began work upon a choral symphony—not from the sounds of bells, but suggestions of them, achieved by the use of different combinations of orchestral sonorities. He wished to evoke by his music these moods and emotions, those images and associations, which the sound of bells can bring to the minds of the imaginative—merriment and joy, terrors and alarms, sorrow and mourning.

Finishing the symphony in 191 when he returned to Russia, Rachmaninoff actually set his music to the version of Poe's poem made by the distinguished Russian poet Constantin Balmont. The present English version used by the singers however, has been made by Fanny S. Copeland from Berthold Feiwel's German version of Balmont's Russian translation.

When the work was given its American premiere with the Orchestra at the concerts of February 6-7, 1920, with Mr. Stokowski conducting, there was some discussion as to whether "The Bells" was actually a choral symphony or a cantata.

Following certain symphonic elements in its construction, the work divides naturally into the four parts of the poem—the joyous silver sleigh bells, the mellow wedding bells, the loud alarm bells and the mournful iron bells.

In his buoyant first movement, the composer has found an ideal subject for modern dissonance, with the shimmering tang of parallel fifths in the high wood and the final ecstacy of calls that is lost in a tempest of tintinnabulation.

The tender second movement of 'mellow wedding bells" is a pure lyric episode.

[illegible] monthly recital given

JACKSONVILLE, ILL.
COURIER

JAN 2 - 1937

Concert Artist

HAROLD BAUER

Great Pianist Began Career As a Violinist

Harold Bauer to Present Concert Here Friday Night

It has been said that the world lost a great pianist when Fritz Kreisler decided to become a violinist. The career of Harold Bauer, the distinguished pianist who plays here on Friday, January 8, at the High school auditorium, forms an interesting parallel, only the line is drawn in the opposite direction. Mr. Bauer's first ambition was to become a concert violinist, and that ambition was achieved before fate decreed that he win greater fame as a pianist.

In London, home of his birth, music was a familiar art. His father was a gifted amateur violinist and his mother a pianist of considerable skill. It was the instrument of his father that caught Mr. Bauer's childhood fancy. Under the guidance of his father he had progressed by his ninth year to a degree of proficiency that promised a brilliant future. Within a year the young prodigy was concertizing throughout England. During his youth London heard him frequently as a soloist and ensemble player.

It was in Glasgow that Mr. Bauer first met Paderewski. The Polish pianist, learning that the violinist had some skill as a pianist, invited Mr. Bauer to assist him in preparing some piano concertos by playing the orchestral part on a second instrument. So interested did Paderewski become that he advised and instructed the young artist.

The Turning Point

During a period of financial stress Mr. Bauer was asked to accompany a soprano on a concert tour through Russia. The acceptance of that invitation marked the turning point in his career. Through force of circumstances the violinist became an accomplished pianist, and when he was invited to appear at an informal musicale in London, it was the piano he chose to play. That event Mr. Bauer regards as his debut as a pianist.

Once decided that his gifts were better adopted for keyboard expression he set himself diligently to the task of becoming an expert. Within three years he made his Berlin debut, playing a Beethoven, and a Saint-Saens piano concerto and the Liszt Hungarian Fantasy with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. Two months later Paris heard him with as much acclaim. So busily was he then engaged as soloist throughout Europe that he did not make his public debut as a pianist in his native London until six years later.

Comes to U. S.

Mr. Bauer's first appearance in this country was in Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in 1901. American audiences were prompt to recognize his rare gifts and demand his appearance. Every second year he toured the United States until his world tour in 1914. He has been steadily engaged in this country every season since.

Today Mr. Bauer is one of the most popular pianists appearing before the public, a fact which may be explained by the programs he chooses to play as much as his masterly style of interpreting them—for Mr. Bauer's programs are famous for sounding as good as they are.

The artist comes to Jacksonville as the third attraction of the MacMurray Community concert series.

HARTFORD DAILY TIMES, SATURDAY, JANUARY

FOR POWERFUL PITT

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 2 - 1937

/55

Boston Symphony Will

Koussevitzky Giving Foote, MacDowell

Rimsky-Korsakoff Scheduled with Americans

TWO BRILLIANT American compositions and a world-famous Russian work are included in the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial Wednesday evening.

This concert, the fifth event of the current Bushnell Concert Series, will be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who announces his program as follows:

"Suite in E major, Opus 63, for String Orchestra", by Arthur Foote; "Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 2 in D Minor, Opus 23", by Edward MacDowell; Symphonic suite, "Scheherezade", by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

In his program notes, Commentator John N. Burk writes:

"Arthur Foote is numbered among the New England composers who took their first musical instruction under John Knowles Paine at Harvard College. After graduation he studied organ and piano with B. J. Lang. From 1878 until 1910 he was organist of the First Unitarian Church in Boston. As pianist, also, he has appeared publicly on many occasions. But his principal interest has always been in the realm of composition.

Much Chamber Music

"His list of works is considerable, including besides orchestral scores a large amount of chamber music: Violin Sonata in G minor (1890); Piano Quartet (1891); String Quartet (1894); Quintet (1898); Piano Trio (1909). His songs, which have enjoyed a considerable popularity, almost reach the number of 150. There are several works for chorus and orchestra, notably 'The Farewell of Hiawatha,' 'The Wreck of the Hesperus,' and 'The Skeleton in Armor'; also music for chorus with piano accompaniment or a cappella, showing an interest in this field which dates perhaps from the time when, as an undergraduate, he conducted the Harvard Glee Club.

"Orchestral works which have been performed at these concerts are: the overture, 'In the Mountains'; Suite for Strings in D Major, No. 2; Symphonic Prologue, 'Francesca da Rimini'; Suite in D Minor; four character pieces; and 'A Night Piece' for flute and strings.

Praised by Howard

"In 'Our American Music', John Tasker Howard makes this estimate of the man and his music:

"He has made a handsome contribution to American music. He has been substantial, reliable, workmanlike and, most important, agreeable. As a writer in 'The Art of Music puts it. 'His music is the pure and perfectly formed expression of a nature at once refined and imaginative.' He has been at work for many years, and he has written much. He has belonged to the Boston of the '90's, where most of the composers of that time worked and met each other for exchange of ideas—Chadwick, Parker, Whiting, MacDowell, Nevin, Mrs. Beach, Converse, Johns and their artistic parent John K. Paine.

"He has seen the musical idols of one period after another thrown down and broken. Why, in his later years, should he become excited over Schoenberg or Stravinsky? As an early devotee of Brahms and Wagner, he had his fill of innovations in his youth. He at least has the satisfaction of knowing that confidence in his early gods was well placed."

MacDowell Taught Sinclair

When Edward MacDowell gave a course of lectures on music at Columbia University in New York, one of the small group of students who sat under him was Upton Sinclair. The writer has remembered his experience with great vividness, and recorded it in an article, paragraphs of which are here quoted:

"Edward MacDowell was the first man of genius I had ever met. I was going in for that business myself, or thought I was, so I lost nothing about him; I watched his appearance, his mannerisms, his every gesture. I listened to every word he said and thought it over and pondered it.

"He was a man of striking appearance, in spite of his efforts to avoid it. He was robust and solidly built, and his moustache did its best to make him look like a Viking or a Berserker. His eye-brows also wanted to stand out—he could easily have been an old style musician with a mop of wild hair, slightly tinged with red; but he kept it carefully trimmed, and was extremely neat in his dress, trying in every way to look like an American banker.

Mobile Face

"He had an expresive face, and his lips, I remember were especially sensitive. He had some difficulty in restraining his gestures, and he could not help making faces at things he did not like—musical sounds, and also words. There were words that affected him as physical pain, he said, and cited the word 'nostrils', and showed with a face how much it hurt him.

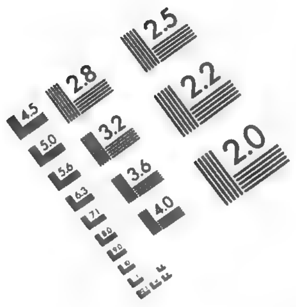
"He differed from most musicians whom I have since met in being a man of wide general culture. He had read good literature and talked wisely about books. I got the impression that he was something of a rebel in his political thinking, but I cannot recall a single specific saying upon this subject. But he was certainly a friend of every freedom, and of every beautiful and generous impulse. He hated pretense and formalism, and all things which repress the free creative spirit."

REDUCTION
RATIO
16x

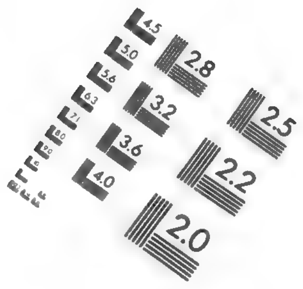
2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

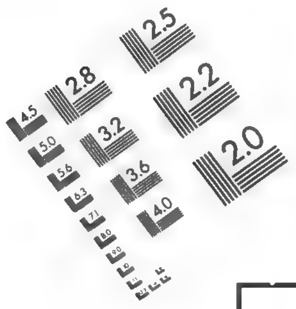


2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0

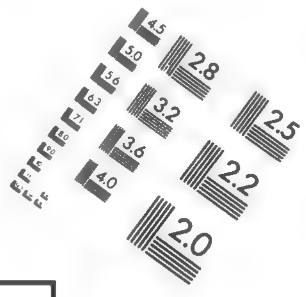


4.5
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

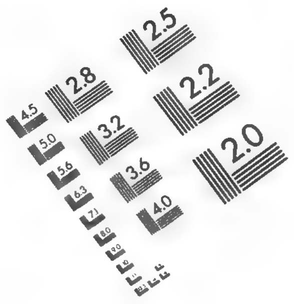
PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



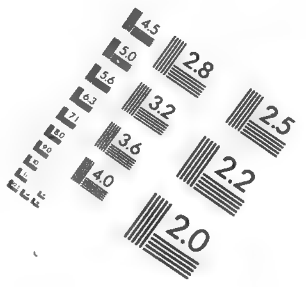
2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0



4.5
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0

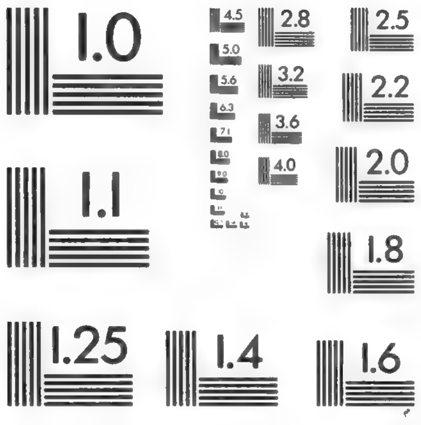


4.5
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
2.8
2.5
5.0
3.2
5.6
2.2
6.3
3.6
7.1
8.0
4.0
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

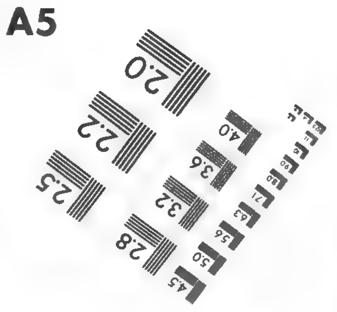
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm 1.5 mm 2.0 mm 2.5 mm

A5

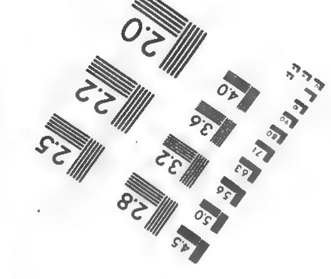


2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
4.5

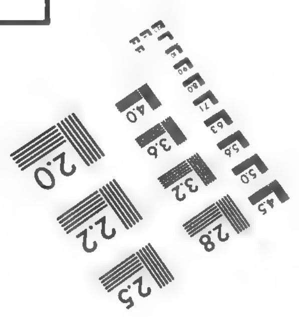
4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
2.2
2.8
4.5
2.5

A4

A3



2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
4.5

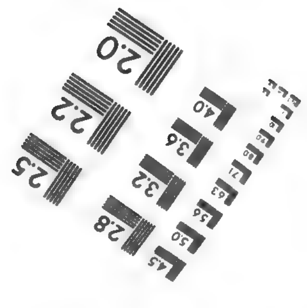


4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
2.2
2.8
4.5
2.5

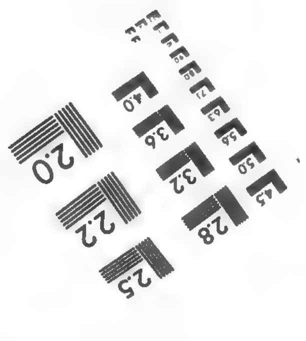
PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119



2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
4.5



4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
2.2
2.8
4.5
2.5

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR

Exaggerations in Art.

One result of the development of a midwestern school of painters has been the almost simultaneous appearance of a regional school of critics. Those of us who belong to this second group, of course, would be the first to disclaim any professional status. We freely admit that we are laymen. Indeed, we insist upon the fact. But our position in the matter, while doing credit to our modesty, is slightly ingenuous. Because, although we begin invariably with some such formula as, "I know nothing about art," with the next breath we add, "but I do know what I like." And thereby land ourselves in the middle of the exercise of our critical faculties.

As long as our best midwestern painters remained in Paris or even New York, we could ignore them. And as long as they continued, like their colleagues from every other part of the country, to paint St. Mark's cathedral in the moonlight or fishing boats at anchor in Gloucester harbor, with, perhaps, now and then, a venture into surrealism or some other artistic fashion of the moment, we could—and did—pay practically no attention to their work. But since many of them have come home and begun painting our own farms and tornadoes, our miners and our hill-billies, our shacks and our skyscrapers, we have had to alter our policy. If our painters are going to talk about us, we are forced to talk about them.

The difficulty with our approach is that while we may know what we like today, we cannot be sure that we will like, or dislike, the same thing tomorrow. Familiarity in art, as the professional critics might tell us, may quite as easily breed pleasure as contempt. It is reported, for example, that when Brahm's first symphony was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first few times, so many Bostonians walked out of Symphony hall that a music critic of the day suggested the signs over the safety doors should be changed to read, "Exit in case of Brahms." Brahms might be a great musician, it was said, but what he wrote would never live, because it was ugly.

Today that particular symphony is regularly voted in audience polls as one of the three most popular symphonies ever written, and Brahms is recognized, even in Boston, as one of the world's greatest masters of melody.

And so it may with some of our contemporary

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

3 - 1937

WEDNESDAY

The Chamber Music Ensemble of the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia broadcasts a program of famous classics under the direction of Dr. Louis Bailly. WABC, 4-4:45 p.m.

Quintet in D Major	Arensky
Brandenburg Concerto No. 5	Bach
Symphony in D Major (oboe, bassoon, strings) (First performance)	Abel

"Symphonic Strings," a concert by an all-string orchestra under the direction of Alfred Wallenstein. WOR, 10-10:30 p.m.

Concerto Grosso No. 12	Handel
Londonderry Air	Grainger
Turkey in the Straw	Steiner
Quartette	Debussy

THURSDAY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in one of its regular subscription concerts at Carnegie Hall. The first performance of Alfredo Casella's revision of Clementi's Symphony in D in New York will be given during the concert. WJZ, 8:45-9:30 p.m.

Suite in E Major for String Orchestra, Opus 63	Foote
Symphony in D	Clementi

MT. PLEASANT, TEXAS
TIMES

JAN 6 - 1937

In pre-war days Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was both conductor and financial backer of his own symphony orchestra in Rusia.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST
JAN 2 - 1937

Ormandy to Direct All - Rachmaninoff Weekend Program

W. of P. Choral Society Will Sing 'The Bells' Symphony At 2 Concerts

Eugene Ormandy, Conducting
RACHMANINOFF..............
........Symphony "The Bells"
(Poem by Edgar Allen Poe)
Agnes Davis, soprano; Fritz Krueger, tenor, Elwood Hawkins, baritone
UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA CHORAL SOCIETY
Harl McDonald, Director
Intermission
RACHMANINOFF...Concerto No. 2 in C minor for Piano and Orchestra

An all-Rachmaninoff program which presents the great Russian composer as soloist playing his own Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra on Friday afternoon, January 8, and Saturday evening, January 9.

Eugene Ormandy who is conducting, will devote the entire first half of the program to Rachmaninoff's four part choral symphony "The Bells" which he wove about the celebrated poem of Edgar Allen Poe.

The mixed chorus of 150 voices will be provided by the University of Pennsylvania Choral Society of which Harl McDonald is director.

Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto, the most familiar of the four he has composed for piano and orchestra, was written in 1899; published in 1902; and dedicated to N. Dahl. The work is in three movements.

The work was performed for the first time at a concert of the Philharmonic Society of Moscow; on October 14, 1901, with the composer as the pianist. Raoul Pugne disclosed the work in New York at a Russian Symphony Concert, November 18, 1905.

The Concerto had won for Rachmaninoff in the previous year (1904) the Glinka prize of 500 rubles, founded by Belaieff, the plutocratic and incredibly generous publisher who helped so many of the younger Russian music-makers. The work was produced in a period toward the end of 1899 when Rachmaninoff began writing again, after two years in which his activity as a composer was relaxed.

In 1897 Rachmaninoff had turned aside from composition to undertake the conductorship of Marmantoff's "Private" Opera at Moscow. But the unremitting work of rehearsal and leadership warned him that if he continued in the position, he would be obliged to abandon entirely his creative work, he therefore gave up his post after a single season.

Rachmaninoff himself divides the quarter century of his musical activity into three periods of approximately eight years each—composing, concert work and conducting. His musical training began at the St. Petersburg Conservatory when he was nine years old, and for three years he remained there studying chiefly piano. In 1885 he entered the Conservatory at Moscow where he studied piano with Zvierev and with Siloti, his cousin.

For theory and composition Rachmaninoff's instructors were Taneieff and Arensky. As a pianist he was graduated summa cum laude in 1891, and in 1892 he received the gold medal for composition, a reward for his opera "Aleko" which was produced at the Imperial Opera House Moscow, in the same year. Leaving the Conservatory he made a long concert tour through Russia.

Going to London for the first time in 1899, Rachmaninoff appeared as composer, conductor and pianist at the Philharmonic Concert, April 19 and his orchestral fantasia "The Cliff" was performed. Visits to Vienna and Paris followed, and in 1903 he was appointed professor of piano at the Maryinsky Institute for Girls at Moscow. The following year he became first conductor of Russian opera at the Imperial Theatr of Moscow, and later became con ductor of the Moscow Symphon Orchestra. He was once offered th conductorship of the Boston Symphony.

The Russian revolution forced hi from his native land, and his estate were confiscated. Escaping with h family into Sweden, Rachmaninoff his wife and two beautiful daugh ters came to New York where the make their home.

Just before the war, while Rachmaninoff was living in Rome he began work upon a choral symphon —not from the sounds of bells, bu suggestions of them, achieved b the use of different combinations c orchestral sonorities. He wished t evoke by his music these moods an emotions, those images and associa tions, which the sound of bells ca bring to the minds of the imaginativ —merriment and joy, terrors an alarms, sorrow and mourning.

Finishing the symphony in 191 when he returned to Russia, Rachmaninoff actually set his music to the version of Poe's poem made by the distinguished Russian poet Constantin Balmont. The present English version used by the singers however, has been made by Fanny S. Copeland from Berthold Feiwel's German version of Balmont's Russian translation.

When the work was given its American premiere with the Orchestra at the concerts of February 6-7, 1920, with Mr. Stokowski conducting, there was some discussion as to whether "The Bells" was actually a choral symphony or a cantata.

Following certain symphonic elements in its construction, the work divides naturally into the four parts of the poem—the joyous silver sleigh bells, the mellow wedding bells, the loud alarm bells and the mournful iron bells.

In his buoyant first movement, the composer has found an ideal subject for modern dissonance, with the shimmering tang of parallel fifths in the high wood and the final ecstacy of calls that is lost in a tempest of tintinnabulation.

The tender second movement of 'mellow wedding bells" is a pure lyric episode.

JACKSONVILLE, ILL.
COURIER
JAN 2 - 1937

Concert Artist

HAROLD BAUER

Great Pianist Began Career As a Violinist

Harold Bauer to Present Concert Here Friday Night

It has been said that the world lost a great pianist when Fritz Kreisler decided to become a violinist. The career of Harold Bauer, the distinguished pianist who plays here on Friday, January 8, at the High school auditorium, forms an interesting parallel, only the line is drawn in the opposite direction. Mr. Bauer's first ambition was to become a concert violinist, and that ambition was achieved before fate decreed that he win greater fame as a pianist.

In London, home of his birth, music was a familiar art. His father was a gifted amateur violinist and his mother a pianist of considerable skill. It was the instrument of his father that caught Mr. Bauer's childhood fancy. Under the guidance of his father he had progressed by his ninth year to a degree of proficiency that promised a brilliant future. Within a year the young prodigy was concertizing throughout England. During his youth London heard him frequently as a soloist and ensemble player.

It was in Glasgow that Mr. Bauer first met Paderewski. The Polish pianist, learning that the violinist had some skill as a pianist, invited Mr. Bauer to assist him in preparing some piano concertos by playing the orchestral part on a second instrument. So interested did Paderewski become that he advised and instructed the young artist.

The Turning Point

During a period of financial stress Mr. Bauer was asked to accompany a soprano on a concert tour through Russia. The acceptance of that invitation marked the turning point in his career. Through force of circumstances the violinist became an accomplished pianist, and when he was invited to appear at an informal musicale in London, it was the piano he chose to play. That event Mr. Bauer regards as his debut as a pianist.

Once decided that his gifts were better adopted for keyboard expression he set himself diligently to the task of becoming an expert. Within three years he made his Berlin debut, playing a Beethoven, and a Saint-Saens piano concerto and the Liszt Hungarian Fantasy with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. Two months later Paris heard him with as much acclaim. So busily was he then engaged as soloist throughout Europe that he did not make his public debut as a pianist in his native London until six years later.

Comes to U. S.

Mr. Bauer's first appearance in this country was in Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in 1901. American audiences were prompt to recognize his rare gifts and demand his appearance. Every second year he toured the United States until his world tour in 1914. He has been steadily engaged in this country every season since.

Today Mr. Bauer is one of the most popular pianists appearing before the public, a fact which may be explained by the programs he chooses to play as much as his masterly style of interpreting them—for Mr. Bauer's programs are famous for sounding as good as they are.

The artist comes to Jacksonville as the third attraction of the MacMurray Community concert series.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 2 - 1937. 150

lay Two American Works Here Wednesday

Koussevitzky Giving Foote, MacDowell

Rimsky - Korsakoff Scheduled with Americans

TWO BRILLIANT American compositions and a world-famous Russian work are included in the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial Wednesday evening.

This concert, the fifth event of the current Bushnell Concert Series, will be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who announces his program as follows:

"Suite in E major, Opus 63, for String Orchestra", by Arthur Foote; "Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 2 in D Minor, Opus 23", by Edward MacDowell; Symphonic suite, "Scheherezade", by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

In his program notes, Commentator John N. Burk writes:

"Arthur Foote is numbered among the New England composers who took their first musical instruction under John Knowles Paine at Harvard College. After graduation he studied organ and piano with B. J. Lang. From 1878 until 1910 he was organist of the First Unitarian Church in Boston. As pianist, also, he has appeared publicly on many occasions. But his principal interest has always been in the realm of composition.

Much Chamber Music

"His list of works is considerable, including besides orchestral scores a large amount of chamber music: Violin Sonata in G minor (1890); Piano Quartet (1891); String Quartet (1894); Quintet (1898); Piano Trio (1909). His songs, which have enjoyed a considerable popularity, almost reach the number of 150. There are several works for chorus and orchestra, notably 'The Farewell of Hiawatha,' 'The Wreck of the Hesperus,' and 'The Skeleton in Armor'; also music for chorus with piano accompaniment or a cappella, showing an interest in this field which dates perhaps from the time when, as an undergraduate, he conducted the Harvard Glee Club.

"Orchestral works which have been performed at these concerts are: the overture, 'In the Mountains'; Suite for Strings in D Major, No. 2; Symphonic Prologue, 'Francesca da Rimini'; Suite in D Minor; four character pieces; and 'A Night Piece' for flute and strings.

Praised by Howard

"In 'Our American Music', John Tasker Howard makes this estimate of the man and his music:

"He has made a handsome contribution to American music. He has been substantial, reliable, workmanlike and, most important, agreeable. As a writer in 'The Art of Music puts it. 'His music is the pure and perfectly formed expression of a nature at once refined and imaginative.' He has been at work for many years, and he has written much. He has belonged to the Boston of the '90's, where most of the composers of that time worked and met each other for exchange of ideas—Chadwick, Parker, Whiting, MacDowell, Nevin, Mrs. Beach, Converse, Johns and their artistic parent John K. Paine.

"He has seen the musical idols of one period after another thrown down and broken. Why, in his later years, should he become excited over Schoenberg or Stravinsky? As an early devotee of Brahms and Wagner, he had his fill of innovations in his youth. He at least has the satisfaction of knowing that confidence in his early gods was well placed."

MacDowell Taught Sinclair

When Edward MacDowell gave a course of lectures on music at Columbia University in New York, one of the small group of students who sat under him was Upton Sinclair. The writer has remembered his experience with great vividness, and recorded it in an article, paragraphs of which are here quoted:

"Edward MacDowell was the first man of genius I had ever met. I was going in for that business myself, or thought I was, so I lost nothing about him; I watched his appearance, his mannerisms, his every gesture. I listened to every word he said and thought it over and pondered it.

"He was a man of striking appearance, in spite of his efforts to avoid it. He was robust and solidly built, and his moustache did its best to make him look like a Viking or a Berserker. His eye-brows also wanted to stand out—he could easily have been an old style musician with a mop of wild hair, slightly tinged with red; but he kept it carefully trimmed, and was extremely neat in his dress, trying in every way to look like an American banker.

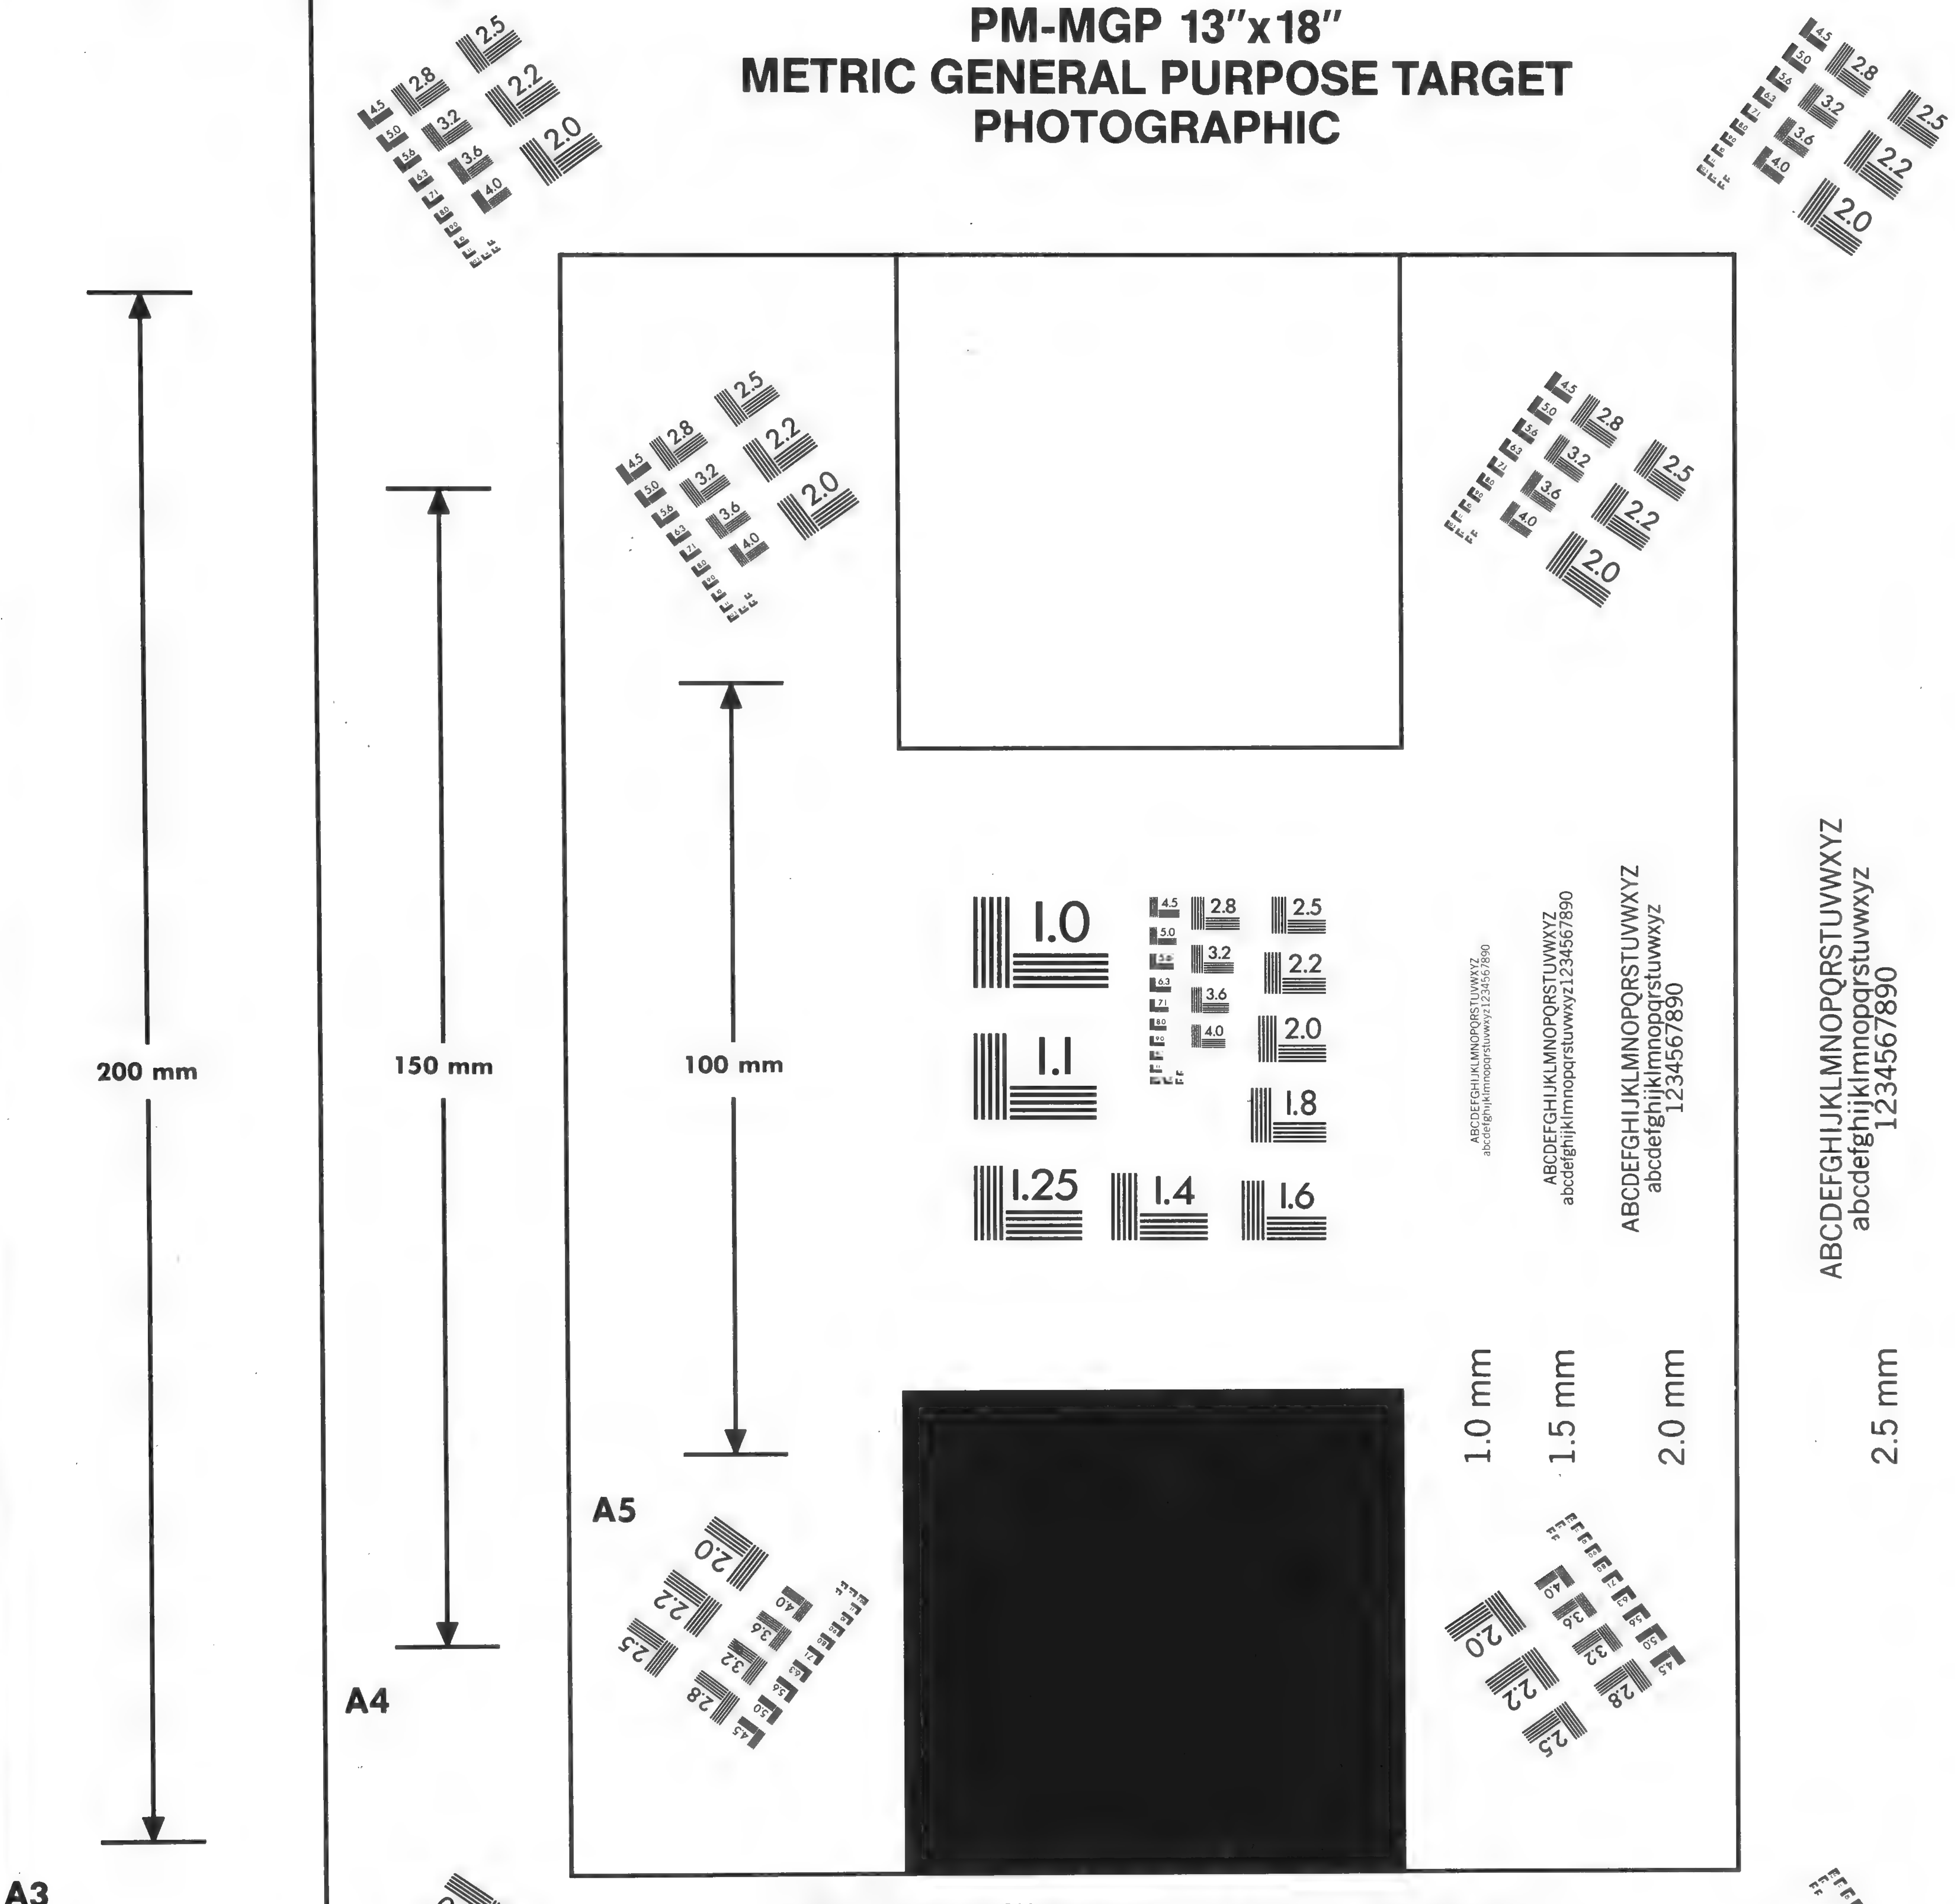
Mobile Face

"He had an expresive face, and his lips, I remember were especially sensitive. He had some difficulty in restraining his gestures, and he could not help making faces at things he did not like—musical sounds, and also words. There were words that affected him as physical pain, he said, and cited the word 'nostrils', and showed with a face how much it hurt him.

"He differed from most musicians whom I have since met in being a man of wide general culture. He had read good literature and talked wisely about books. I got the impression that he was something of a rebel in his political thinking, but I cannot recall a single specific saying upon this subject. But he was certainly a friend of every fredom, and of every beautiful and generous impulse. He hated pretense and formalism, and all things which repress the free creative spirit."

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR

JAN 1 1937

Exaggerations in Art.

One result of the development of a midwestern school of painters has been the almost simultaneous appearance of a regional school of critics. Those of us who belong to this second group, of course, would be the first to disclaim any professional status. We freely admit we are laymen. Indeed, we insist upon the fact. But our position in the matter, while doing credit to our modesty, is slightly ingenuous. Because, although we begin invariably with some such formula as, "I know nothing about art," with the next breath we add, "but I do know what I like." And thereby land ourselves in the middle of the exercise of our critical faculties.

As long as our best midwestern painters remained in Paris or even New York, we could ignore them. And as long as they continued, like their colleagues from every other part of the country, to paint St. Mark's cathedral in the moonlight or fishing boats at anchor in Gloucester harbor, with, perhaps, now and then, a venture into surrealism or some other artistic fashion of the moment, we could—and did—pay practically no attention to their work. But since many of them have come home and begun painting our own farms and tornadoes, our miners and our hill-billies, our shacks and our skyscrapers, we have had to alter our policy. If our painters are going to talk about us, we are forced to talk about them.

The difficulty with our approach is that while we may know what we like today, we cannot be sure that we will like, or dislike, the same thing tomorrow. Familiarity in art, as the professional critics might tell us, may quite as easily breed pleasure as contempt. It is reported, for example, that when Brahm's first symphony was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first few times, so many Bostonians walked out of Symphony hall that a music critic of the day suggested the signs over the safety doors should be changed to read, "Exit in case of Brahms." Brahms might be a great musician, it was said, but what he wrote would never live, because it was ugly.

Today that particular symphony is regularly voted in audience polls as one of the three most popular symphonies ever written, and Brahms is recognized, even in Boston, as one of the world's greatest masters of melody.

And so it may with some of our contemporary

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

3 - 1937

WEDNESDAY

The Chamber Music Ensemble of the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia broadcasts a program of famous classics under the direction of Dr. Louis Bailly. WABC, 4-4:45 p.m.

Quintet in D Major	Arensky
Brandenburg Concerto No. 5	Bach
Symphony in D Major (oboe, bassoon, strings) (First performance)	Abel

"Symphonic Strings," a concert by an all-string orchestra under the direction of Alfred Wallenstein. WOR, 10-10:30 p.m.

Concerto Grosso No. 12	Handel
Londonderry Air	Grainger
Turkey in the Straw	Steiner
Quartette	Debussy

THURSDAY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in one of its regular subscription concerts at Carnegie Hall. The first performance of Alfredo Casella's revision of Clementi's Symphony in D in New York will be given during the concert. WJZ, 8:45-9:30 p.m.

Suite in E Major for String Orchestra, Opus 63	Foote
Symphony in D	Clementi

MT. PLEASANT, TEXAS
TIMES

JAN 6 - 1937

In pre-war days Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was both conductor and financial backer of his own symphony orchestra in Rusia.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST
JAN 2 - 1937

Ormandy to Direct All-Rachmaninoff Weekend Program

W. of P. Choral Society Will Sing 'The Bells' Symphony At 2 Concerts

◆

Eugene Ormandy, Conducting
RACHMANINOFF..............
........Symphony "The Bells"
(Poem by Edgar Allen Poe)
Agnes Davis, soprano: Fritz Krueger, tenor, Elwood Hawkins, baritone
UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA CHORAL SOCIETY
Harl McDonald, Director
Intermission
RACHMANINOFF...Concerto No. 2 in C minor for Piano and Orchestra

An all-Rachmaninoff program which presents the great Russian composer as soloist playing his own Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra on Friday afternoon, January 8, and Saturday evening, January 9.

Eugene Ormandy who is conducting, will devote the entire first half of the program to Rachmaninoff's four part choral symphony "The Bells" which he wove about the celebrated poem of Edgar Allen Poe. The mixed chorus of 150 voices will be provided by the University of Pennsylvania Choral Society of which Harl McDonald is director.

Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto, the most familiar of the four he has composed for piano and orchestra, was written in 1899; published in 1902; and dedicated to N. Dahl. The work is in three movements.

The work was performed for the first time at a concert of the Philharmonic Society of Moscow; on October 14, 1901, with the composer as the pianist. Raoul Pugne disclosed the work in New York at a Russian Symphony Concert, November 18, 1905.

The Concerto had won for Rachmaninoff in the previous year (1904) the Glinka prize of 500 rubles, founded by Belaieff, the plutocratic and incredibly generous publisher who helped so many of the younger Russian music-makers. The work was produced in a period toward the end of 1899 when Rachmaninoff began writing again, after two years in which his activity as a composer was relaxed.

In 1897 Rachmaninoff had turned aside from composition to undertake the conductorship of Marmantoff's "Private" Opera at Moscow. But the unremitting work of rehearsal and leadership warned him that if he continued in the position, he would be obliged to abandon entirely his creative work, he therefore gave up his post after a single season.

Rachmaninoff himself divides the quarter century of his musical activity into three periods of approximately eight years each—composing, concert work and conducting. His musical training began at the St. Petersburg Conservatory when he was nine years old, and for three years he remained there studying chiefly piano. In 1885 he entered the Conservatory at Moscow where he studied piano with Zvierev and with Siloti, his cousin.

For theory and composition Rachmaninoff's instructors were Taneieff and Arensky. As a pianist he was graduated summa cum laude in 1891, and in 1892 he received the gold medal for composition, a reward for his opera "Aleko" which was produced at the Imperial Opera House Moscow, in the same year. Leaving the Conservatory he made a long concert tour through Russia.

Going to London for the first time in 1899, Rachmaninoff appeared as composer, conductor and pianist at the Philharmonic Concert, April 1 and his orchestral fantasia "The Cliff" was performed. Visits to Vienna and Paris followed, and in 1903 he was appointed professor of piano at the Maryinsky Institute for Girls at Moscow. The following year he became first conductor of Russian opera at the Imperial Theatre of Moscow, and later became conductor of the Moscow Symphony Orchestra. He was once offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony.

The Russian revolution forced him from his native land, and his estate were confiscated. Escaping with his family into Sweden, Rachmaninoff his wife and two beautiful daughters came to New York where they make their home.

Just before the war, while Rachmaninoff was living in Rome he began work upon a choral symphony—not from the sounds of bells, but suggestions of them, achieved by the use of different combinations of orchestral sonorities. He wished to evoke by his music these moods and emotions, those images and associations, which the sound of bells can bring to the minds of the imaginative—merriment and joy, terrors and alarms, sorrow and mourning.

Finishing the symphony in 191 when he returned to Russia, Rachmaninoff actually set his music to the version of Poe's poem made by the distinguished Russian poet Constantin Balmont. The present English version used by the singers however, has been made by Fanny S. Copeland from Berthold Feiwel's German version of Balmont's Russian translation.

When the work was given its American premiere with the Orchestra at the concerts of February 6-7, 1920, with Mr. Stokowski conducting, there was some discussion as to whether "The Bells" was actually a choral symphony or a cantata.

Following certain symphonic elements in its construction, the work divides naturally into the four parts of the poem—the joyous silver sleigh bells, the mellow wedding bells, the loud alarm bells and the mournful iron bells.

In his buoyant first movement, the composer has found an ideal subject for modern dissonance, with the shimmering tang of parallel fifths in the high wood and the final ecstacy of calls that is lost in a tempest of tintinnabulation.

The tender second movement of 'mellow wedding bells" is a pure lyric episode.

JACKSONVILLE, ILL.
COURIER
JAN 2 - 1937

Concert Artist

HAROLD BAUER

Great Pianist Began Career As a Violinist

Harold Bauer to Present Concert Here Friday Night

It has been said that the world lost a great pianist when Fritz Kreisler decided to become a violinist. The career of Harold Bauer, the distinguished pianist who plays here on Friday, January 8, at the High school auditorium, forms an interesting parallel, only the line is drawn in the opposite direction. Mr. Bauer's first ambition was to become a concert violinist, and that ambition was achieved before fate decreed that he win greater fame as a pianist.

In London, home of his birth, music was a familiar art. His father was a gifted amateur violinist and his mother a pianist of considerable skill. It was the instrument of his father that caught Mr. Bauer's childhood fancy. Under the guidance of his father he had progressed by his ninth year to a degree of proficiency that promised a brilliant future. Within a year the young prodigy was concertizing throughout England. During his youth London heard him frequently as a soloist and ensemble player.

It was in Glasgow that Mr. Bauer first met Paderewski. The Polish pianist, learning that the violinist had some skill as a pianist, invited Mr. Bauer to assist him in preparing some piano concertos by playing the orchestral part on a second instrument. So interested did Paderewski become that he advised and instructed the young artist.

The Turning Point

During a period of financial stress Mr. Bauer was asked to accompany a soprano on a concert tour through Russia. The acceptance of that invitation marked the turning point in his career. Through force of circumstances the violinist became an accomplished pianist, and when he was invited to appear at an informal musicale in London, it was the piano he chose to play. That event Mr. Bauer regards as his debut as a pianist.

Once decided that his gifts were better adopted for keyboard expression he set himself diligently to the task of becoming an expert. Within three years he made his Berlin debut, playing a Beethoven, and a Saint-Saens piano concerto and the Liszt Hungarian Fantasy with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. Two months later Paris heard him with as much acclaim. So busily was he then engaged as soloist throughout Europe that he did not make his public debut as a pianist in his native London until six years later.

Comes to U. S.

Mr. Bauer's first appearance in this country was in Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in 1901. American audiences were prompt to recognize his rare gifts and demand his appearance. Every second year he toured the United States until his world tour in 1914. He has been steadily engaged in this country every season since.

Today Mr. Bauer is one of the most popular pianists appearing before the public, a fact which may be explained by the programs he chooses to play as much as his masterly style of interpreting them—for Mr. Bauer's programs are famous for sounding as good as they are.

The artist comes to Jacksonville as the third attraction of the MacMurray Community concert series.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 2 - 1937 155

lay Two American Works Here

Koussevitzky Giving Foote, MacDowell

Rimsky-Korsakoff Scheduled with Americans

TWO BRILLIANT American compositions and a world-famous Russian work are included in the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial Wednesday evening.

This concert, the fifth event of the current Bushnell Concert Series, will be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who announces his program as follows:

"Suite in E major, Opus 63, for String Orchestra", by Arthur Foote; "Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 2 in D Minor, Opus 23", by Edward MacDowell; Symphonic suite, "Scheherezade", by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

In his program notes, Commentator John N. Burk writes:

"Arthur Foote is numbered among the New England composers who took their first musical instruction under John Knowles Paine at Harvard College. After graduation he studied organ and piano with B. J. Lang. From 1878 until 1910 he was organist of the First Unitarian Church in Boston. As pianist, also, he has appeared publicly on many occasions. But his principal interest has always been in the realm of composition.

Much Chamber Music

"His list of works is considerable, including besides orchestral scores a large amount of chamber music: Violin Sonata in G minor (1890); Piano Quartet (1891); String Quartet (1894); Quintet (1898); Piano Trio (1909). His songs, which have enjoyed a considerable popularity, almost reach the number of 150. There are several works for chorus and orchestra, notably 'The Farewell of Hiawatha,' 'The Wreck of the Hesperus,' and 'The Skeleton in Armor'; also music for chorus with piano accompaniment or a cappella, showing an interest in this field which dates perhaps from the time when, as an undergraduate, he conducted the Harvard Glee Club.

"Orchestral works which have been performed at these concerts are: the overture, 'In the Mountains'; Suite for Strings in D Major, No. 2; Symphonic Prologue, 'Francesca da Rimini'; Suite in D Minor; four character pieces; and 'A Night Piece' for flute and strings.

Praised by Howard

"In 'Our American Music', John Tasker Howard makes this estimate of the man and his music:

"He has made a handsome contribution to American music. He has been substantial, reliable, workmanlike and, most important, agreeable. As a writer in 'The Art of Music puts it. 'His music is the pure and perfectly formed expression of a nature at once refined and imaginative.' He has been at work for many years, and he has written much. He has belonged to the Boston of the '90's, where most of the composers of that time worked and met each other for exchange of ideas—Chadwick, Parker, Whiting, MacDowell, Nevin, Mrs. Beach, Converse, Johns and their artistic parent John K. Paine.

"He has seen the musical idols of one period after another thrown down and broken. Why, in his later years, should he become excited over Schoenberg or Stravinsky? As an early devotee of Brahms and Wagner, he had his fill of innovations in his youth. He at least has the satisfaction of knowing that confidence in his early gods was well placed."

MacDowell Taught Sinclair

When Edward MacDowell gave a course of lectures on music at Columbia University in New York, one of the small group of students who sat under him was Upton Sinclair. The writer has remembered his experience with great vividness, and recorded it in an article, paragraphs of which are here quoted:

"Edward MacDowell was the first man of genius I had ever met. I was going in for that business myself, or thought I was, so I lost nothing about him; I watched his appearance, his mannerisms, his every gesture. I listened to every word he said and thought it over and pondered it.

"He was a man of striking appearance, in spite of his efforts to avoid it. He was robust and solidly built, and his moustache did its best to make him look like a Viking or a Berserker. His eye-brows also wanted to stand out—he could easily have been an old style musician with a mop of wild hair, slightly tinged with red; but he kept it carefully trimmed, and was extremely neat in his dress, trying in every way to look like an American banker.

Mobile Face

"He had an expresive face, and his lips, I remember were especially sensitive. He had some difficulty in restraining his gestures, and he could not help making faces at things he did not like—musical sounds, and also words. There were words that affected him as physical pain, he said, and cited the word 'nostrils', and showed with a face how much it hurt him.

"He differed from most musicians whom I have since met in being a man of wide general culture. He had read good literature and talked wisely about books. I got the impression that he was something of a rebel in his political thinking, but I cannot recall a single specific saying upon this subject. But he was certainly a friend of every fredom, and of every beautiful and generous impulse. He hated pretense and formalism, and all things which repress the free creative spirit."

in Art.
ent of a midwest-een the almost ional school to this sec-
to dis-
W freely ad-
we insist upon er, while htly in-we begin in-
as. "I know breath we
And thereof the exercise

ern painters re-
York, we could they continued,
y other part of cathedral in at anchor in haps, now and or some other we could—and to their work.
come home and and tornadoes,
our shacks and to alter our g to talk about hem.
proach is that like today, we or dislike the rity in art, as tell us, may contempt. It when Brahm's
by the Boston
few times, so
Symphony hall
suggested the ld be changed
ms." Brahms said, but what it was ugly.
y is regularly
the three most and Brahms
s one of the y. contemporary able of sic in ogram direc-

WABC,

Arensky
..Bach
...Abel

oncert er the stein.

Handel
rainger
Steiner ebussy

con-rchesscrip-
The asel-phony dur-
p.m.

Foote

menti,

AS

ousse-
Boston both acker hestra

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST
JAN 2 - 1937

Ormandy to Direct All - Rachmaninoff Weekend Program

W. of P. Choral Society Will Sing 'The Bells' Symphony At 2 Concerts

Eugene Ormandy, Conducting
RACHMANINOFF..............
........Symphony "The Bells"
(Poem by Edgar Allen Poe)
Agnes Davis, soprano; Fritz Krueger, tenor, Elwood Hawkins, baritone
UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA
CHORAL SOCIETY
Harl McDonald, Director
Intermission
RACHMANINOFF...Concerto No. 2 in
C minor for Piano and Orchestra

An all-Rachmaninoff program which presents the great Russian composer as soloist playing his own Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra on Friday afternoon, January 8, and Saturday evening, January 9.

Eugene Ormandy who is conducting, will devote the entire first half of the program to Rachmaninoff's four part choral symphony "The Bells" which he wove about the celebrated poem of Edgar Allen Poe. The mixed chorus of 150 voices will be provided by the University of Pennsylvania Choral Society of which Harl McDonald is director.

Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto, the most familiar of the four he has composed for piano and orchestra, was written in 1899; published in 1902; and dedicated to N. Dahl. The work is in three movements.

The work was performed for the first time at a concert of the Philharmonic Society of Moscow; on October 14, 1901, with the composer as the pianist. Raoul Pugne disclosed the work in New York at a Russian Symphony Concert, November 18, 1905.

The Concerto had won for Rachmaninoff in the previous year (1904) the Glinka prize of 500 rubles, founded by Belaieff, the plutocratic and incredibly generous publisher who helped so many of the younger Russian music-makers. The work was produced in a period toward the end of 1899 when Rachmaninoff began writing again, after two years in which his activity as a composer was relaxed.

In 1897 Rachmaninoff had turned aside from composition to undertake the conductorship of Marmantoff's "Private" Opera at Moscow. But the unremitting work of rehearsal and leadership warned him that if he continued in the position, he would be obliged to abandon entirely his creative work, he therefore gave up his post after a single season.

Rachmaninoff himself divides the quarter century of his musical activity into three periods of approximately eight years each—composing, concert work and conducting. His musical training began at the St. Petersburg Conservatory when he was nine years old, and for three years he remained there studying chiefly piano. In 1885 he entered the Conservatory at Moscow where he studied piano with Zvierev and with Siloti, his cousin.

For theory and composition Rachmaninoff's instructors were Taneieff and Arensky. As a pianist he was graduated summa cum laude in 1891, and in 1892 he received the gold medal for composition, a reward for his opera "Aleko" which was produced at the Imperial Opera House Moscow, in the same year. Leaving the Conservatory he made a long concert tour through Russia.

Going to London for the first time in 1899, Rachmaninoff appeared as composer, conductor and pianist at the Philharmonic Concert, April 19 and his orchestral fantasia "The Cliff" was performed. Visits to Vienna and Paris followed, and in 1903 he was appointed professor of piano at the Maryinsky Institute for Girls at Moscow. The following year he became first conductor of Russian opera at the Imperial Theatre of Moscow, and later became conductor of the Moscow Symphony Orchestra. He was once offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony.

The Russian revolution forced him from his native land, and his estates were confiscated. Escaping with his family into Sweden, Rachmaninoff his wife and two beautiful daughters came to New York where they make their home.

Just before the war, while Rachmaninoff was living in Rome he began work upon a choral symphony —not from the sounds of bells, but suggestions of them, achieved by the use of different combinations of orchestral sonorities. He wished to evoke by his music these moods and emotions, those images and associations, which the sound of bells can bring to the minds of the imaginative —merriment and joy, terrors and alarms, sorrow and mourning.

Finishing the symphony in 1913 when he returned to Russia, Rachmaninoff actually set his music to the version of Poe's poem made by the distinguished Russian poet Constantin Balmont. The present English version used by the singers however, has been made by Fanny S. Copeland from Berthold Feiwel's German version of Balmont's Russian translation.

When the work was given its American premiere with the Orchestra at the concerts of February 6-7, 1920, with Mr. Stokowski conducting, there was some discussion as to whether "The Bells" was actually a choral symphony or a cantata.

Following certain symphonic elements in its construction, the work divides naturally into the four parts of the poem—the joyous silver sleigh bells, the mellow wedding bells, the loud alarm bells and the mournful iron bells.

In his buoyant first movement, the composer has found an ideal subject for modern dissonance, with the shimmering tang of parallel fifths in the high wood and the final ecstacy of calls that is lost in a tempest of tintinnabulation.

The tender second movement of "mellow wedding bells" is a pure lyric episode.

JACKSONVILLE, ILL.
COURIER
JAN 2 - 1937

Concert Artist

HAROLD BAUER

Great Pianist Began Career As a Violinist

Harold Bauer to Present Concert Here Friday Night

It has been said that the world lost a great pianist when Fritz Kreisler decided to become a violinist. The career of Harold Bauer, the distinguished pianist who plays here on Friday, January 8, at the High school auditorium, forms an interesting parallel, only the line is drawn in the opposite direction. Mr. Bauer's first ambition was to become a concert violinist, and that ambition was achieved before fate decreed that he win greater fame as a pianist.

In London, home of his birth, music was a familiar art. His father was a gifted amateur violinist and his mother a pianist of considerable skill. It was the instrument of his father that caught Mr. Bauer's childhood fancy. Under the guidance of his father he had progressed by his ninth year to a degree of proficiency that promised a brilliant future. Within a year the young prodigy was concertizing throughout England. During his youth London heard him frequently as a soloist and ensemble player.

It was in Glasgow that Mr. Bauer first met Paderewski. The Polish pianist, learning that the violinist had some skill as a pianist, invited Mr. Bauer to assist him in preparing some piano concertos by playing the orchestral part on a second instrument. So interested did Paderewski become that he advised and instructed the young artist.

The Turning Point

During a period of financial stress Mr. Bauer was asked to accompany a soprano on a concert tour through Russia. The acceptance of that invitation marked the turning point in his career. Through force of circumstances the violinist became an accomplished pianist, and when he was invited to appear at an informal musicale in London, it was the piano he chose to play. That event Mr. Bauer regards as his debut as a pianist.

Once decided that his gifts were better adopted for keyboard expression he set himself diligently to the task of becoming an expert. Within three years he made his Berlin debut, playing a Beethoven, and a Saint-Saens piano concerto and the Liszt Hungarian Fantasy with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. Two months later Paris heard him with as much acclaim. So busily was he then engaged as soloist throughout Europe that he did not make his public debut as a pianist in his native London until six years later.

Comes to U. S.

Mr. Bauer's first appearance in this country was in Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in 1901. American audiences were prompt to recognize his rare gifts and demand his appearance. Every second year he toured the United States until his world tour in 1914. He has been steadily engaged in this country every season since.

Today Mr. Bauer is one of the most popular pianists appearing before the public, a fact which may be explained by the programs he chooses to play as much as his masterly style of interpreting them—for Mr. Bauer's programs are famous for sounding as good as they are.

The artist comes to Jacksonville as the third attraction of the MacMurray Community concert series.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 2 - 1937

150 lay Two American Works Here Wednesday

Koussevitzky Giving Foote, MacDowell

Rimsky-Korsakoff Scheduled with Americans

TWO BRILLIANT American compositions and a world-famous Russian work are included in the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial Wednesday evening.

This concert, the fifth event of the current Bushnell Concert Series, will be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who announces his program as follows:

"Suite in E major, Opus 63, for String Orchestra", by Arthur Foote; "Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 2 in D Minor, Opus 23", by Edward MacDowell; Symphonic suite, "Scheherezade", by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

In his program notes, Commentator John N. Burk writes:

"Arthur Foote is numbered among the New England composers who took their first musical instruction under John Knowles Paine at Harvard College. After graduation he studied organ and piano with B. J. Lang. From 1878 until 1910 he was organist of the First Unitarian Church in Boston. As pianist, also, he has appeared publicly on many occasions. But his principal interest has always been in the realm of composition.

Much Chamber Music

"His list of works is considerable, including besides orchestral scores a large amount of chamber music: Violin Sonata in G minor (1890); Piano Quartet (1891); String Quartet (1894); Quintet (1898); Piano Trio (1909). His songs, which have enjoyed a considerable popularity, almost reach the number of 150. There are several works for chorus and orchestra, notably 'The Farewell of Hiawatha,' 'The Wreck of the Hesperus,' and 'The Skeleton in Armor'; also music for chorus with piano accompaniment or a cappella, showing an interest in this field which dates perhaps from the time when, as an undergraduate, he conducted the Harvard Glee Club.

"Orchestral works which have been performed at these concerts are: the overture, 'In the Mountains'; Suite for Strings in D Major, No. 2; Symphonic Prologue, 'Francesca da Rimini'; Suite in D Minor; four character pieces; and 'A Night Piece' for flute and strings.

Praised by Howard

"In 'Our American Music', John Tasker Howard makes this estimate of the man and his music:

"He has made a handsome contribution to American music. He has been substantial, reliable, workmanlike and, most important, agreeable. As a writer in 'The Art of Music puts it. 'His music is the pure and perfectly formed expression of a nature at once refined and imaginative.' He has been at work for many years, and he has written much. He has belonged to the Boston of the '90's, where most of the composers of that time worked and met each other for exchange of ideas—Chadwick, Parker, Whiting, MacDowell, Nevin, Mrs. Beach, Converse, Johns and their artistic parent John K. Paine.

"He has seen the musical idols of one period after another thrown down and broken. Why, in his later years, should he become excited over Schoenberg or Stravinsky? As an early devotee of Brahms and Wagner, he had his fill of innovations in his youth. He at least has the satisfaction of knowing that confidence in his early gods was well placed."

MacDowell Taught Sinclair

When Edward MacDowell gave a course of lectures on music at Columbia University in New York, one of the small group of students who sat under him was Upton Sinclair. The writer has remembered his experience with great vividness, and recorded it in an article, paragraphs of which are here quoted:

"Edward MacDowell was the first man of genius I had ever met. I was going in for that business myself, or thought I was, so I lost nothing about him; I watched his appearance, his mannerisms, his every gesture. I listened to every word he said and thought it over and pondered it.

"He was a man of striking appearance, in spite of his efforts to avoid it. He was robust and solidly built, and his moustache did its best to make him look like a Viking or a Berserker. His eye-brows also wanted to stand out—he could easily have been an old style musician with a mop of wild hair, slightly tinged with red; but he kept it carefully trimmed, and was extremely neat in his dress, trying in every way to look like an American banker.

Mobile Face

"He had an expresive face, and his lips, I remember were especially sensitive. He had some difficulty in restraining his gestures, and he could not help making faces at things he did not like—musical sounds, and also words. There were words that affected him as physical pain, he said, and cited the word 'nostrils', and showed with a face how much it hurt him.

"He differed from most musicians whom I have since met in being a man of wide general culture. He had read good literature and talked wisely about books. I got the impression that he was something of a rebel in his political thinking, but I cannot recall a single specific saying upon this subject. But he was certainly a friend of every fredom, and of every beautiful and generous impulse. He hated pretense and formalism, and all things which repress the free creative spirit."

KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR

JAN 1 1937

Exaggerations in Art.

One result of the development of a midwestern school of painters has been the almost simultaneous appearance of a regional school of critics. Those of us who belong to this second group, of course, would be the first to disclaim any professional status. We freely admit we are laymen. Indeed, we insist upon the fact. But our position in the matter, while doing credit to our modesty, is slightly ingenuous. Because, although we begin invariably with some such formula as, "I know nothing about art," with the next breath we add, "but I do know what I like." And thereby land ourselves in the middle of the exercise of our critical faculties.

As long as our best midwestern painters remained in Paris or even New York, we could ignore them. And as long as they continued, like their colleagues from every other part of the country, to paint St. Mark's cathedral in the moonlight or fishing boats at anchor in Gloucester harbor, with, perhaps, now and then, a venture into surrealism or some other artistic fashion of the moment, we could—and did—pay practically no attention to their work. But since many of them have come home and begun painting our own farms and tornadoes, our miners and our hill-billies, our shacks and our skyscrapers, we have had to alter our policy. If our painters are going to talk about us, we are forced to talk about them.

The difficulty with our approach is that while we may know what we like today, we cannot be sure that we will like, or dislike, the same thing tomorrow. Familiarity in art, as the professional critics might tell us, may quite as easily breed pleasure as contempt. It is reported, for example, that when Brahm's first symphony was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first few times, so many Bostonians walked out of Symphony hall that a music critic of the day suggested the signs over the safety doors should be changed to read, "Exit in case of Brahms." Brahms might be a great musician, it was said, but what he wrote would never live, because it was ugly.

Today that particular symphony is regularly voted in audience polls as one of the three most popular symphonies ever written, and Brahms is recognized, even in Boston, as one of the world's greatest masters of melody.

And so it may with some of our contemporary

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

13 - 1937

WEDNESDAY

The Chamber Music Ensemble of the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia broadcasts a program of famous classics under the direction of Dr. Louis Bailly. WABC, 4-4:45 p.m.

Quintet in D Major............Arensky
Brandenburg Concerto No. 5........Bach
Symphony in D Major
(oboe, bassoon, strings)............Abel
(First performance)

"Symphonic Strings," a concert by an all-string orchestra under the direction of Alfred Wallenstein. WOR, 10-10:30 p.m.

Concerto Grosso No. 12........Handel
Londonderry Air................Grainger
Turkey in the Straw............Steiner
Quartette........................Debussy

THURSDAY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in one of its regular subscription concerts at Carnegie Hall. The first performance of Alfredo Casella's revision of Clementi's Symphony in D in New York will be given during the concert. WJZ, 8:45-9:30 p.m.

Suite in E Major for String
Orchestra, Opus 63..............Foote

Symphony in D..............Clementi

MT. PLEASANT, TEXAS
TIMES

JAN 6 - 1937

In pre-war days Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was both conductor and financial backer of his own symphony orchestra in Rusia.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST
JAN 2 - 1937

Ormandy to Direct All - Rachmaninoff Weekend Program

W. of P. Choral Society Will Sing 'The Bells' Symphony At 2 Concerts

Eugene Ormandy, Conducting
RACHMANINOFF.............
.......Symphony "The Bells"
(Poem by Edgar Allen Poe)
Agnes Davis, soprano; Fritz Krueger, tenor, Elwood Hawkins, baritone
UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA CHORAL SOCIETY
Harl McDonald, Director
Intermission
RACHMANINOFF...Concerto No. 2 in C minor for Piano and Orchestra

An all-Rachmaninoff program which presents the great Russian composer as soloist playing his own Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra on Friday afternoon, January 8, and Saturday evening, January 9.

Eugene Ormandy who is conducting, will devote the entire first half of the program to Rachmaninoff's four part choral symphony "The Bells" which he wove about the celebrated poem of Edgar Allen Poe.

The mixed chorus of 150 voices will be provided by the University of Pennsylvania Choral Society of which Harl McDonald is director.

Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto, the most familiar of the four he has composed for piano and orchestra, was written in 1899; published in 1902; and dedicated to N. Dahl. The work is in three movements.

The work was performed for the first time at a concert of the Philharmonic Society of Moscow; on October 14, 1901, with the composer as the pianist. Raoul Pugne disclosed the work in New York at a Russian Symphony Concert, November 18, 1905.

The Concerto had won for Rachmaninoff in the previous year (1904) the Glinka prize of 500 rubles, founded by Belaieff, the plutocratic and incredibly generous publisher who helped so many of the younger Russian music-makers. The work was produced in a period toward the end of 1899 when Rachmaninoff began writing again, after two years in which his activity as a composer was relaxed.

In 1897 Rachmaninoff had turned aside from composition to undertake the conductorship of Marmantoff's "Private" Opera at Moscow. But the unremitting work of rehearsal and leadership warned him that if he continued in the position, he would be obliged to abandon entirely his creative work, he therefore gave up his post after a single season.

Rachmaninoff himself divides the quarter century of his musical activity into three periods of approximately eight years each—composing, concert work and conducting. His musical training began at the St. Petersburg Conservatory when he was nine years old, and for three years he remained there studying chiefly piano. In 1885 he entered the Conservatory at Moscow where he studied piano with Zvierev and with Siloti, his cousin.

For theory and composition Rachmaninoff's instructors were Taneieff and Arensky. As a pianist he was graduated summa cum laude in 1891, and in 1892 he received the gold medal for composition, a reward fo his opera "Aleko" which was pro duced at the Imperial Opera House Moscow, in the same year. Leaving the Conservatory he made long concert tour through Russia.

Going to London for the first tim in 1899, Rachmaninoff appeared a composer, conductor and pianist a the Philharmonic Concert, April 1 and his orchestral fantasia "Th Cliff" was performed. Visits t Vienna and Paris followed, and i 1903 he was appointed professor piano at the Maryinsky Institute f Girls at Moscow. The following yea he became first conductor of Ru sian opera at the Imperial Theat of Moscow, and later became co ductor of the Moscow Symphon Orchestra. He was once offered th conductorship of the Boston Syn phony.

The Russian revolution forced hi from his native land, and his estat were confiscated. Escaping with h family into Sweden, Rachmanino his wife and two beautiful daug ters came to New York where the make their home.

Just before the war, while Rac maninoff was living in Rome he b gan work upon a choral symphon —not from the sounds of bells, bu suggestions of them, achieved b the use of different combinations orchestral sonorities. He wished t evoke by his music these moods an emotions, those images and associa tions, which the sound of bells ca bring to the minds of the imaginativ —merriment and joy, terrors an alarms, sorrow and mourning.

Finishing the symphony in 191 when he returned to Russia, Rachmaninoff actually set his music to the version of Poe's poem made by the distinguished Russian poet Constantin Balmont. The present English version used by the singers however, has been made by Fanny S. Copeland from Berthold Feiwel's German version of Balmont's Russian translation.

When the work was given its American premiere with the Orchestra at the concerts of February 6-7, 1920, with Mr. Stokowski conducting, there was some discussion as to whether "The Bells" was actually a choral symphony or a cantata.

Following certain symphonic elements in its construction, the work divides naturally into the four parts of the poem—the joyous silver sleigh bells, the mellow wedding bells, the loud alarm bells and the mournful iron bells.

In his buoyant first movement, the composer has found an ideal subject for modern dissonance, with the shimmering tang of parallel fifths in the high wood and the final ecstacy of calls that is lost in a tempest of tintinnabulation.

The tender second movement of 'mellow wedding bells" is a pure lyric episode.

JACKSONVILLE, ILL.
COURIER

JAN 2 - 1937

Concert Artist

HAROLD BAUER

Great Pianist Began Career As a Violinist

Harold Bauer to Present Concert Here Friday Night

It has been said that the world lost a great pianist when Fritz Kreisler decided to become a violinist. The career of Harold Bauer, the distinguished pianist who plays here on Friday, January 8, at the High school auditorium, forms an interesting parallel, only the line is drawn in the opposite direction. Mr. Bauer's first ambition was to become a concert violinist, and that ambition was achieved before fate decreed that he win greater fame as a pianist.

In London, home of his birth, music was a familiar art. His father was a gifted amateur violinist and his mother a pianist of considerable skill. It was the instrument of his father that caught Mr. Bauer's childhood fancy. Under the guidance of his father he had progressed by his ninth year to a degree of proficiency that promised a brilliant future. Within a year the young prodigy was concertizing throughout England. During his youth London heard him frequently as a soloist and ensemble player.

It was in Glasgow that Mr. Bauer first met Paderewski. The Polish pianist, learning that the violinist had some skill as a pianist, invited Mr. Bauer to assist him in preparing some piano concertos by playing the orchestral part on a second instrument. So interested did Paderewski become that he advised and instructed the young artist.

The Turning Point

During a period of financial stress Mr. Bauer was asked to accompany a soprano on a concert tour through Russia. The acceptance of that invitation marked the turning point in his career. Through force of circumstances the violinist became an accomplished pianist, and when he was invited to appear at an informal musicale in London, it was the piano he chose to play. That event Mr. Bauer regards as his debut as a pianist.

Once decided that his gifts were better adopted for keyboard expression he set himself diligently to the task of becoming an expert. Within three years he made his Berlin debut, playing a Beethoven, and a Saint-Saens piano concerto and the Liszt Hungarian Fantasy with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. Two months later Paris heard him with as much acclaim. So busily was he then engaged as soloist throughout Europe that he did not make his public debut as a pianist in his native London until six years later.

Comes to U. S.

Mr. Bauer's first appearance in this country was in Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in 1901. American audiences were prompt to recognize his rare gifts and demand his appearance. Every second year he toured the United States until his world tour in 1914. He has been steadily engaged in this country every season since.

Today Mr. Bauer is one of the most popular pianists appearing before the public, a fact which may be explained by the programs he chooses to play as much as his masterly style of interpreting them—for Mr. Bauer's programs are famous for sounding as good as they are.

The artist comes to Jacksonville as the third attraction of the MacMurray Community concert series.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 2 - 1937

155 lay Two American Works He

Koussevitzky Giving Foote, MacDowell

Rimsky - Korsakoff Scheduled with Americans

TWO BRILLIANT American compositions and a world-famous Russian work are included in the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial Wednesday evening.

This concert, the fifth event of the current Bushnell Concert Series, will be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who announces his program as follows:

"Suite in E major, Opus 63, for String Orchestra", by Arthur Foote; "Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 2 in D Minor, Opus 23", by Edward MacDowell; Symphonic suite, "Scheherezade", by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

In his program notes, Commentator John N. Burk writes:

"Arthur Foote is numbered among the New England composers who took their first musical instruction under John Knowles Paine at Harvard College. After graduation he studied organ and piano with B. J. Lang. From 1878 until 1910 he was organist of the First Unitarian Church in Boston. As pianist, also, he has appeared publicly on many occasions. But his principal interest has always been in the realm of composition.

Much Chamber Music

"His list of works is considerable, including besides orchestral scores a large amount of chamber music: Violin Sonata in G minor (1890); Piano Quartet (1891); String Quartet (1894); Quintet (1898); Piano Trio (1909). His songs, which have enjoyed a considerable popularity, almost reach the number of 150. There are several works for chorus and orchestra, notably 'The Farewell of Hiawatha,' 'The Wreck of the Hesperus,' and 'The Skeleton in Armor'; also music for chorus with piano accompaniment or a cappella, showing an interest in this field which dates perhaps from the time when, as an undergraduate, he conducted the Harvard Glee Club.

"Orchestral works which have been performed at these concerts are: the overture, 'In the Mountains'; Suite for Strings in D Major, No. 2; Symphonic Prologue, 'Francesca da Rimini'; Suite in D Minor; four character pieces; and 'A Night Piece' for flute and strings.

Praised by Howard

"In 'Our American Music', John Tasker Howard makes this estimate of the man and his music:

"He has made a handsome contribution to American music. He has been substantial, reliable, workmanlike and, most important, agreeable. As a writer in 'The Art of Music puts it. 'His music is the pure and perfectly formed expression of a nature at once refined and imaginative.' He has been at work for many years, and he has written much. He has belonged to the Boston of the '90's, where most of the composers of that time worked and met each other for exchange of ideas—Chadwick, Parker, Whiting, MacDowell, Nevin, Mrs. Beach, Converse, Johns and their artistic parent John K. Paine.

"He has seen the musical idols of one period after another thrown down and broken. Why, in his later years, should he become excited over Schoenberg or Stravinsky? As an early devotee of Brahms and Wagner, he had his fill of innovations in his youth. He at least has the satisfaction of knowing that confidence in his early gods was well placed."

MacDowell Taught Sinclair

When Edward MacDowell gave a course of lectures on music at Columbia University in New York, one of the small group of students who sat under him was Upton Sinclair. The writer has remembered his experience with great vividness, and recorded it in an article, paragraphs of which are here quoted:

"Edward MacDowell was the first man of genius I had ever met. I was going in for that business myself, or thought I was, so I lost nothing about him; I watched his appearance, his mannerisms, his every gesture. I listened to every word he said and thought it over and pondered it.

"He was a man of striking appearance, in spite of his efforts to avoid it. He was robust and solidly built, and his moustache did its best to make him look like a Viking or a Berserker. His eye-brows also wanted to stand out—he could easily have been an old style musician with a mop of wild hair, slightly tinged with red; but he kept it carefully trimmed, and was extremely neat in his dress, trying in every way to look like an American banker.

Mobile Face

"He had an expresive face, and his lips, I remember were especially sensitive. He had some difficulty in restraining his gestures, and he could not help making faces at things he did not like—musical sounds, and also words. There were words that affected him as physical pain, he said, and cited the word 'nostrils', and showed with a face how much it hurt him.

"He differed from most musicians whom I have since met in being a man of wide general culture. He had read good literature and talked wisely about books. I got the impression that he was something of a rebel in his political thinking, but I cannot recall a single specific saying upon this subject. But he was certainly a friend of every fredom, and of every beautiful and generous impulse. He hated pretense and formalism, and all things which repress the free creative spirit."

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

151 JAN 3 - 1937

Pianist

HAROLD BAUER.
The famous pianist will be presented in concert at the Pabst theater on Monday night, Jan. 11, under auspices of the Arion Musical club.

Arions Bringing Bauer, Quartet

THE Arion Musical club will offer a double treat on Jan. 11 at the Pabst theater. On that night, the Arions will sponsor a recital by Harold Bauer, pianist, and the Stradivarius string quartet.

Here, the sponsors believe, is a rare program for lovers of chamber music for whom concerts of this type are few and far between here. Teachers and students of the piano are also showing considerable interest in the coming program.

Though Mr. Bauer's fame as a pianist today has circled the globe, he started out as a child to become a great concert violinist. He actually achieved his ambition under the guidance of his father, a gifted amateur violinist, and at nine years of age he was concertizing in London, his native city, and throughout England as a child prodigy.

Then he met Paderewski, the Polish pianist, who learned that he had talent at the piano as well as with the violin. Paderewski took an interest in the young violinist and gave him some of his earliest piano instruction. When Bauer realized that the piano offered him an opportunity to express his greater talent he set out studiously to develop his piano art. Soon, he was winning acclaim in Paris, in Berlin, and elsewhere in Europe. He became so busy that it was a good while before he found time to make his debut in his home city, London. His first American appearance was in Boston, as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, in 1901. Since 1914 he has been steadily engaged in the United States each season.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JAN 3 - 1937

PLAN ORCHESTRA SERIES

The WPA Federal Music Project announces that the Civic Symphony Orchestra will inaugurate a new series of popular Sunday concerts in Irvine Auditorium, 34th and Spruce sts., on January 10, at 3.30. These concerts, sponsored by the University of Pennsylvania, will have guest conductors, soloists, choruses and other attractions.

The concert of January 10, to be directed by J. W. F. Leman, lists G. Lee Berger as soloist in the Grieg A minor piano concerto. Mr. Leman will also lead on January 17. On January 24 Arthur Fiedler, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and leader of the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, is to direct. January 31, Chalmers Clifton, American conductor, will occupy the podium.

Early in February the Bach Society of Delaware County, James Allen Dash, conductor, will join with the Civic Orchestra in a program devoted in part to works of Bach for chorus and orchestra, and later there are to be other concerts in which choral ensembles of the Philadelphia area will participate.

Another program will present compositions for organ and orchestra. In February the Civic Orchestra is to present Liza Lehmann's song cycle "In a Persian Garden," arranged for vocal quartet and orchestra by Samuel L. Laciar. An all-American program, to honor Washington's Birthday, is scheduled for February 21.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 3 - 1937

Jésus Maria Sanromá, piano soloist with the Boston Symphony.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE

JAN 3 - 1937

MUSICAL MISCELLANY

About Music and People Who Make It

More About Mexican Native Music

Monteux as Musical Pioneer

MONTEUX One needs to converse only a few minutes with Pierre Monteux, the distinguished conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, to realize what a vital and constructive force he is in the music world. He has persuaded Austrian and German musicians to play French music; he introduced the Parisians to English orchestra music; and now here in America he is playing American music, which, strange as it may seem, is rarely done.

He tells us that years ago when he was conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra he carried home to Paris with him one Summer the score of Vaughn Williams' "London Symphony," and gave the first Paris performance of that work. He discovered the French composer, Messien, long before Koussevitsky found him last Summer in Paris and brought his music to Boston (this season). He directed the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra the past Summer in a program of French works at Salzburg; and so introduced the Cesar Franck Symphony to orchestra players who had never seen it before. And now in America he is playing music by Daniel Gregory Mason, the MacDowell Professor of Music at Columbia University, who is among native composers enjoying slight encouragement at the hands of orchestra leaders. Also he will introduce to San Francisco Gershwin's Piano Concerto and the suite from "Porgy and Bess."

Symphony patrons who have heard Monteux's superb interpretations of his native French music would be glad to have him discuss French works and the possibility of their performance this season; but modesty is not the least of Monteux's characteristics.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

JAN 5 - 1937

Dr. Serg Koussevitzky, whose Boston symphony orchestra will present a revival of the long-lost "Symphony in D Major" of Muzio Clementi in New York this week, received the following telegram from Bronxville, N. Y., last night. "Cannot get seats for Thursday. Will you please help me. (Signed) Cecilia Clementi Pitman." Mrs. Pitman is a great-granddaughter of the famed Italian composer.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SUNDAY AMERICAN

JAN 3 - 1937

Rich Land O' Music

An Appendectomy Results In The Discovery of Other Melodious Magic

By David Kessler

Al Smith (remember him?) has always called it the "raddio."

In all English drawing room plays written by Americans from Nebraska, it is referred to as the "wiahless."

In most of this nation it is merely the "radio."

But, no matter what you call it, the sound is just as sweet and heavenly to one who is confined to a hospital bed. The writer never realized it before his current experience with an unruly appendix gave him a week of enforced confinement to a little room.

The question that naturally occurs to me is: "What did hospital convalescents do to pass the time before radio was perfected?"

Aside from the personal pleasure derived from that bedside radio, there was the revelation of the richness of the country's musical resources.

Orchestras Everywhere

[illegible] symphony orchestras of all descriptions. Soloists, both instrumental and vocal, abounded.

But most amazing of all was the discovery that there are so many really fine choral groups in all parts of this vast nation—organizations that sing good music with near-professional skill.

Yet the most thoroughly satisfying broadcasts to me were the Metropolitan Opera Company's Christmas presentation of "Haensel and Gretel" and the Saturday matinee of "Samson and Delilah."

Quite naturally, I realize that all of these discoveries about the extent of radio's musical wonderland are not exactly new. Probably millions of Americans were aware of them for several years. It took a week as a shut-in to place me in their company.

Plea for An Encore

Reverting to the broadcast of Humperdinck's imaginative musical fairy tale, "Haensel and Gretel," I was reminded once more of a wish expressed in these colums three weeks ago. It was to the effect that a production of this opera be made an annual affair in Rochester beginning next year.

The delighted comments of the children at intermission were evidence that both music and story appealed to them as well as to the adults in the audience.

A Christmas without Dickens' "Carol" and "Haensel and Gretel" seems barren to me. Doubtless there are many others who feel the same, judging by comments received by this department after the first mention of the suggested production.

Unforgettable musical moments of 1936 in Rochester, ranked in order of their "unforgettableness" in my memory:

1. Kirsten Flagstad's singing of the Liebestod in "Tristan und Isolde."
2. The Boston Symphony's playing of the Brahms' First.
3. Sergei Rachmaninoff's playing of Chopin.
4. Jose Iturbi and the Rochester Philharmonic playing Stravinsky's "Firebird."
5. Carlos Salzedo and his harp.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 3 - 1937

THURSDAY

Royal Nuptials—A broadcast description of the royal wedding uniting Juliana, Crown Princess of the ... nce Bernhard ... ld at The ... to America ... spots. Com... e departure ... the Royal ... Hall, where ... ll take place, and the scene at the Great Church, where the religious marriage, the first held there in thirty-five years, will be celebrated. The scene in the Kerk Plein, filled with troops and thousands of loyal Hollanders waiting to cheer their future Queen and her Prince Consort, also will be covered by observers. The National Broadcasting Company and Columbia Broadcasting System will open the networks one and one-half hours earlier than usua in order that the international broadcast may be heard here: WABC, WEAF, WJZ, 6-7:20 A. M.

Boston Symphony, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, broadcast from Carnegie Hall in New York WJZ, 8:45-9:30 P. M.

Suite in E Major for string orchestra, Opus 63	Foot
Symphony in D	Clemen

FRIDAY

Music Appreciation Hour for school children resumes, following a holiday vacation of two weeks with Dr. Walter Damrosch lecturing on the double-reed instrument and illustrating their application in an orchestra: WEAF, WJZ, 2 P. M.

Scotch Idyl, from "Henry VIII"	Saint-Saen
Minuet	Beethove
Symphony in D Minor (Part 2)	Franc
Andante, "Surprise" Symphony	Hayd
Gentleman with Long Ears	Saint-Sae
Hens and Roosters	Saint-Saen
Perpetual Motion	Straus
The White Knight	Taylo
Golliwog's Cake Walk	Debuss

Philadelphia Orchestra performs under the baton of Eugene Ormandy: WABC, 10-10:30 P. M.

Prelude, Act III, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Largo	Hande
Dance of the Nymphs and Satyrs	Schumann
Finlandia	Sibelius

Concert Music in the style of old Vienna; Alfred Wallenstein directs: WOR, 10:30-11 P. M.

Selections, "The Debutante"	Herbert
The Old Refrain	Kreisler
Hungarian Dance No. 5	Brahms
Selections, "The Quaker Girl"	Monckton

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR

JAN 5 - 1937

RECORDED CONCERT SCHEDULED AT U. C.

Three great American and English symphony orchestras will be heard on the program of the twelfth weekly campus recorded concert Wednesday, at 11:30 a. m., in 11 Swift Hall, under auspices of the University of Cincinnati student branch, American Institute of Electrical Engineers.

The program, which will be free to the general public, was announced Tuesday as follows: Wagner's prelude to the first act of the opera "Lohengrin," played by Arturo Toscanini and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra; Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," played by Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Orchestra, and Borodin's "Polovetzian Dances," played by Sir Thomas Beecham and the London Philharmonic Orchestra, assisted by the Leeds Festival Choir.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 3 - 1937

SOCIAL CALENDA

Jan. 26—Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra, Metropolitan Theatre, 8:15. Causeries by Mme. Albert Noyes for members of the Alliance Francaise, home of Mrs. Henry S. Chafee on Bowen street, 3:30.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 3 - 1937

Soloist Will Appear With Koussevitsky

J. M. Sanroma, Brilliant Pianist, in Boston Symphony Concert at Bushnell Memorial Wednesday

With Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, Edward MacDowell's "Second Piano Concerto" will be presented on the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial this Wednesday evening. The program, which will be directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will include another American work, the "Suite for String Orchestra in E major," by Arthur Foote, and will close with Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

Considerable excitement attended the preparations for the first performance of the MacDowell Concerto at the hands of Sanroma, scintillant young Boston pianist.

Last summer, during the Pop Concerts season, there came an urgent request for a performance of the MacDowell Concerto for a "special night." Sanroma, a favorite soloist at the Pops, as well as the regular winter symphony concerts, was asked to play this work. At the time, he was busy preparing a recital for a Western engagement, but felt he could work it into these other preparations.

He returned from his tour, however, without having had time to even look at the concerto. Only ten days remaining before the scheduled performance, he recommended another soloist whom he thought would do well. He was told that the special night group insisted on hearing only Sanroma, and he promised to see what progress he could make.

In ten days he memorized the 77 pages of the concerto. But he was not content merely at accomplishing a remarkable feat of memory. Knowing that Mrs. Marian Nevins MacDowell, widow of the composer, was expected to come to Boston for the performance, he asked through a mutual friend that she attend the rehearsal with the orchestra in the morning, and guide his interpretation according to the wishes of her husband.

Until time for him to go on stage to rehearse, Sanroma eagerly looked for and inquired for Mrs. MacDowell about the offices and corridors of Symphony Hall. The search was fruitless. After the rehearsal still modestly intent on criticism, he continued his search with no greater success.

A message arrived, to the effect that:

"Mrs. MacDowell arrived in Boston in time for the rehearsal, but stayed away because she says she's always considers it very distracting for a concert artist to have to rehearse while he thinks someone wishes to meddle with his interpretation.'"

Mr. Sanroma was not to be discouraged. He traced the message back to the Hotel where Mrs. MacDowell was staying, and went to her with the score of the concerto ucked under his arm. Against her protests that she would not think of ntruding on his thought before the erformance a few hours away, Sanroma spent an hour going through he score with her, and checking is own conception of the interpreation with the views of the composer as known in every detail by his widow.

Then the pianist walked around for another hour, "running over the keyboard in his mind"—a favorite adjunct to his preparations for any concert.

That night Sanroma gave a technically dazzling performance of the 77 pages memorized in 10 days. And at the end, Mrs. MacDowell informed him that in addition to all else, it was an authentic interpretation. Since then, many more than ten days have been added by Sanroma to his study of the concerto, which, by the way, has recently been issued in a phonograph recording with himself and the Boston Pops Orchestra playing.

BERKELEY, CALIF.
GAZETTE

JAN 7 - 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Alfredo Casella's revision of Clementi's Symphony in D will be performed for the first time by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening (KGO, 6 o'clock).

17

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

JAN 3 - 1937

Pianist

HAROLD BAUER.
The famous pianist will be presented in concert at the Pabst theater on Monday night, Jan. 11, under auspices of the Arion Musical club.

Arions Bringir Bauer, Quar

THE Arion Musical clul offer a double treat on Ja at the Pabst theater. On that night, the Arions will sponsor a recital by Harold Bauer, pianist, and the Stradivarius string quartet.

Here, the sponsors believe, is a rare program for lovers of chamber music for whom concerts of this type are few and far between here. Teachers and students of the piano are also showing considerable interest in the coming program.

Though Mr. Bauer's fame as a pianist today has circled the globe, he started out as a child to become a great concert violinist. He actually achieved his ambition under the guidance of his father, a gifted amateur violinist, and at nine years of age he was concertizing in London, his native city, and throughout England as a child prodigy.

Then he met Paderewski, the Polish pianist, who learned that he had talent at the piano as well as with the violin. Paderewski took an interest in the young violinist and gave him some of his earliest piano instruction. When Bauer realized that the piano offered him an opportunity to express his greater talent he set out studiously to develop his piano art. Soon, he was winning acclaim in Paris, in Berlin, and elsewhere in Europe. He became so busy that it was a good while before he found time to make his debut in his home city, London. His first American appearance was in Boston, as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, in 1901. Since 1914 he has been steadily engaged in the United States each season.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 3 - 1937

Jésus Maria Sanromá, piano soloist with the Boston Symphony.

---

today, in the tail-end of the worst depression in history, nearly one-quarter of the voters think that reliefers would have an easy time finding work if they were forced to look for it.

DEFICIENCY: Congress

belt Congressmen was combat any reduction of shot was that when th again met reporters la said that while he was to his original idea of a appropriation, this woul

---

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE

JAN 3 - 1937

MONTEUX One needs to converse only a few minutes with Pierre Monteux, the distinguished conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, to realize what a vital and constructive force he is in the music world. He has persuaded Austrian and German musicians to play French music; he introduced the Parisians to English orchestra music; and now here in America he is playing American music, which, strange as it may seem, is rarely done.

He tells us that years ago when he was conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra he carried home to Paris with him one Summer the score of Vaughn Williams' "London Symphony," and gave the first Paris performance of that work. He discovered the French composer, Messien, long before Koussevitsky found him last Summer in Paris and brought his music to Boston (this season). He directed the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra the past Summer in a program of French works at Salzburg; and so introduced the Cesar Franck Symphony to orchestra players who had never seen it before. And now in America he is playing music by Daniel Gregory Mason, the MacDowell Professor of Music at Columbia University, who is among native composers enjoying slight encouragement at the hands of orchestra leaders. Also he will introduce to San Francisco Gershwin's Piano Concerto and the suite from "Porgy and Bess."

Symphony patrons who have heard Monteux's superb interpretations of his native French music would be glad to have him discuss French works and the possibility of their performance this season; but modesty is not the least of Monteux's characteristics.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JAN 3 - 1937

PLAN ORCHESTRA SERIES

The WPA Federal Music Project announces that the Civic Symphony Orchestra will inaugurate a new series of popular Sunday concerts in Irvine Auditorium, 34th and Spruce sts., on January 10, at 3.30. These concerts, sponsored by the University of Pennsylvania, will have guest conductors, soloists, choruses and other attractions.

The concert of January 10, to be directed by J. W. F. Leman, lists G. Lee Berger as soloist in the Grieg A minor piano concerto. Mr. Leman will also lead on January 17. On January 24 Arthur Fiedler, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and leader of the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, is to direct. January 31, Chalmers Clifton, American conductor, will occupy the podium.

Early in February the Bach Society of Delaware County, James Allen Dash, conductor, will join with the Civic Orchestra in a program devoted in part to works of Bach for chorus and orchestra, and later there are to be other concerts in which choral ensembles of the Philadelphia area will participate.

Another program will present compositions for organ and orchestra. In February the Civic Orchestra is to present Liza Lehmann's song cycle "In a Persian Garden," arranged for vocal quartet and orchestra by Samuel L. Laciar. An all-American program, to honor Washington's Birthday, is scheduled for February 21.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

JAN 5 - 1937

Dr. Serg Koussevitzky, whose Boston symphony orchestra will present a revival of the long-lost "Symphony in D Major" of Muzio Clementi in New York this week, received the following telegram from Bronxville, N. Y., last night. "Cannot get seats for Thursday. Will you please help me. (Signed) Cecilia Clementi Pitman." Mrs. Pitman is a great-granddaughter of the famed Italian composer.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SUNDAY AMERICAN

JAN 3 - 1937

Rich Land O' Music

An Appendectomy Results In The Discovery of Other Melodious Magic

By David Kessler

Al Smith (remember him?) has always called it the "raddio."

In all English drawing room plays written by Americans from Nebraska, it is referred to as the "wiahless."

In most of this nation it is merely the "radio."

But, no matter what you call it, the sound is just as sweet and heavenly to one who is confined to a hospital bed. The writer never realized it before his current experience with an unruly appendix gave him a week of enforced confinement to a little room.

The question that naturally occurs to me is: "What did hospital convalescents do to pass the time before radio was perfected?"

Aside from the personal pleasure derived from that bedside radio, there was the revelation of the richness of the country's musical resources.

Orchestras Everywhere

I heard symphony orchestras from Portland, Oregon, and Los Angeles, California; from Cincinnati, St. Louis, Detroit, Minneapolis, Chicago and Cleveland; and, of course, from New York and Rochester. There were chamber music ensembles of all descriptions. Soloists, both instrumental and vocal, abounded.

But most amazing of all was the discovery that there are so many really fine choral groups in all parts of this vast nation—organizations that sing good music with near-professional skill.

Yet the most thoroughly satisfying broadcasts to me were the Metropolitan Opera Company's Christmas presentation of "Haensel and Gretel" and the Saturday matinee of "Samson and Delilah."

Quite naturally, I realize that all of these discoveries about the extent of radio's musical wonderland are not exactly new. Probably millions of Americans were aware of them for several years. It took a week as a shut-in to place me in their company.

Plea for An Encore

Reverting to the broadcast of Humperdinck's imaginative musical fairy tale, "Haensel and Gretel," I was reminded once more of a wish expressed in these colums three weeks ago. It was to the effect that a production of this opera be made an annual affair in Rochester beginning next year.

The delighted comments of the children at intermission were evidence that both music and story appealed to them as well as to the adults in the audience.

A Christmas without Dickens' "Carol" and "Haensel and Gretel" seems barren to me. Doubtless there are many others who feel the same, judging by comments received by this department after the first mention of the suggested production.

Unforgettable musical moments of 1936 in Rochester, ranked in order of their "unforgettableness" in my memory:

1. Kirsten Flagstad's singing of the Liebestod in "Tristan und Isolde,"
2. The Boston Symphony's playing of the Brahms' First.
3. Sergei Rachmaninoff's playing of Chopin.
4. Jose Iturbi and the Rochester Philharmonic playing Stravinsky's "Firebird."
5. Carlos Salzedo and his harp.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 3 - 1937

THURSDAY

Royal Nuptials—A broadcast description of the royal wedding uniting Juliana, Crown Princess of the Netherlands, and Prince Bernhard von Lippe-Biesterfeld at The Hague, will be relayed to America from various vantage spots. Commentators will describe departure of the procession from the Royal Palace, arrival at City Hall, where the civil marriage will take place, and the scene at the Great Church, where the religious marriage, the first held there in thirty-five years, will be celebrated. The scene in the Kerk Plein, filled with troops and thousands of loyal Hollanders waiting to cheer their future Queen and her Prince Consort, also will be covered by observers. The National Broadcasting Company and Columbia Broadcasting System will open the networks one and one-half hours earlier than usual in order that the international broadcast may be heard here WABC, WEAF, WJZ, 6-7:20 A. M.

Boston Symphony, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, broadcast from Carnegie Hall in New York WJZ, 8:45-9:30 P. M.

Suite in E Major for string orchestra, Opus 63 ....Foot
Symphony in D..................Clemen

FRIDAY

Music Appreciation Hour for school children resumes, following a holiday vacation of two weeks with Dr. Walter Damrosch lecturing on the double-reed instrument and illustrating their application in an orchestra: WEAF, WJZ, 2 P. M.

Scotch Idyl, from "Henry VIII".Saint-Saen
Minuet ....Beethove
Symphony in D Minor (Part 2)....Franc
Andante, "Surprise" Symphony......Hayd
Gentleman with Long Ears....Saint-Saen
Hens and Roosters.............Saint-Saen
Perpetual Motion ....Straus
The White Knight.....................Taylo
Golliwog's Cake Walk............Debuss

Philadelphia Orchestra performs under the baton of Eugene Ormandy: WABC, 10-10:30 P. M.

Prelude, Act III, "Lohengrin"......Wagner
Largo ....Hande
Dance of the Nymphs and Satyrs.Schumann
Finlandia ....Sibelius

Concert Music in the style of old Vienna; Alfred Wallenstein directs: WOR, 10:30-11 P. M.

Selections, "The Debutante" ......Herbert
The Old Refrain ....Kreisler
Hungarian Dance No. 5............Brahms
Selections, "The Quaker Girl".....Monckton

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR

JAN 5 - 1937

RECORDED CONCERT SCHEDULED AT U. C.

Three great American and English symphony orchestras will be heard on the program of the twelfth weekly campus recorded concert Wednesday, at 11:30 a. m., in 11 Swift Hall, under auspices of the University of Cincinnati student branch, American Institute of Electrical Engineers.

The program, which will be free to the general public, was announced Tuesday as follows: Wagner's prelude to the first act of the opera "Lohengrin," played by Arturo Toscanini and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra; Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," played by Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Orchestra, and Borodin's "Polovetzian Dances," played by Sir Thomas Beecham and the London Philharmonic Orchestra, assisted by the Leeds Festival Choir.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 3 - 1937

SOCIAL CALENDA

Jan. 26—Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra, Metropolitan Theatre, 8:15. Causeries by Mme. Albert Noyes for members of the Alliance Francaise, home of Mrs. Henry S. Chafee on Bowen street, 3:30.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 3 - 193

Soloist Will Appear With Koussevitsky

J. M. Sanroma, Brilliant Pianist, in Boston Symphony Concert at Bushnell Memorial Wednesday

With Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, Edward MacDowell's "Second Piano Concerto" will be presented on the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial this Wednesday evening. The program, which will be directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will include another American work, the "Suite for String Orchestra in E major," by Arthur Foote, and will close with Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

Considerable excitement attended the preparations for the first performance of the MacDowell Concerto at the hands of Sanroma, scintillant young Boston pianist.

Last summer, during the Pop Concerts season, there came an urgent request for a performance of the MacDowell Concerto for a "special night." Sanroma, a favorite soloist at the Pops, as well as the regular winter symphony concerts, was asked to play this work. At the time, he was busy preparing a recital for a Western engagement, but felt he could work it into these other preparations.

He returned from his tour, however, without having had time to even look at the concerto. Only ten days remaining before the scheduled performance, he recommended another soloist whom he thought would do well. He was told that the special night group insisted on hearing only Sanroma, and he promised to see what progress he could make.

In ten days he memorized the 77 pages of the concerto. But he was not content merely at accomplishing a remarkable feat of memory. Knowing that Mrs. Marian Nevins MacDowell, widow of the composer, was expected to come to Boston for the performance, he asked through a mutual friend that she attend the rehearsal with the orchestra in the morning, and guide his interpretation according to the wishes of her husband.

Until time for him to go on stage to rehearse, Sanroma eagerly looked for and inquired for Mrs. MacDowell about the offices and corridors of Symphony Hall. The search was fruitless. After the rehearsal still modestly intent on criticism, he continued his search with no greater success.

A message arrived, to the effect that:

"Mrs. MacDowell arrived in Boston in time for the rehearsal, but stayed away because she says she's always considers it very distracting for a concert artist to have to rehearse while he thinks someone wishes to meddle with his interpretation.' "

Mr. Sanroma was not to be discouraged. He traced the message back to the Hotel where Mrs. MacDowell was staying, and went to her with the score of the concerto tucked under his arm. Against her protests that she would not think of intruding on his thought before the performance a few hours away, Sanroma spent an hour going through the score with her, and checking his own conception of the interpretation with the views of the composer as known in every detail by his widow.

Then the pianist walked around for another hour, "running over the keyboard in his mind"—a favorite adjunct to his preparations for any concert.

That night Sanroma gave a technically dazzling performance of the 77 pages memorized in 10 days. And at the end, Mrs. MacDowell informed him that in addition to all else, it was an authentic interpretation. Since then, many more than ten days have been added by Sanroma to his study of the concerto, which, by the way, has recently been issued in a phonograph recording with himself and the Boston Pops Orchestra playing.

BERKELEY, CALIF.
GAZETTE

JAN 7 - 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Alfredo Casella's revision of Clementi's Symphony in D will be perperformed for the first time by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening (KGO, 6 o'clock).

17

15.2

TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD
JAN 3 - 1937

Business Is Better With Symphonies

Philadelphia Maintains Its New York Packed House Record

By JOHN SELBY

NEW YORK, Jan. 2 (AP)—New York hears its young-old philharmonic-symphony society throughout the winter. It also hears 10 concerts each per winter from Serge Koussevitzky's Boston symphony, and from Leopold Stokowski's Philadelphia orchestra.

Two of these three orchestras have undergone major operations this fall. Many patrons and many observers and most managers stroked their beards in the spring, and came out with the idea that these major operations would most likely reduce audiences this winter. They were wrong.

Philadelphia's noble band "lost" Stokowski. That is, Stokowski became so enamored of the movies and their mass possibilities that he asked his directors to elect a permanent conductor for three years, leaving him free to conduct as little as he chose.

Ormandy Popular.

They picked Eugene Ormandy. Hitherto, the Philadelphia has played to packed houses in New York. This winter it is doing the same. And last Tuesday, when Stokowski came to town with an all-Russian program which included Sergei Rachmaninoff's brand-new third symphony, the last-minute people just didn't get into Carnegie hall.

The Philharmonic is, however, even more astonished. Last spring Arturo Toscanini departed these shores forever, saying among other things, it is declared, that the Philharmonic is the greatest orchestra ever assembled. The Philharmonic directors at once set their sails to fit what they thought would be a period of calm—they cut down the season six weeks, and expected reduced business.

But they didn't get reduced business; business is better. Subscription sales are actually ahead of last winter. John Barbirolli, the young Italian-French-English conductor, is not only doing well at the box office, he is doing well on the podium.

Barbirolli Draws.

Partly this is musical ability, partly the public's curiosity, and (oddly enough) partly tact. No musician ever stood in hotter shoes than Barbirolli a week and three days ago when he began the first piece he ever conducted on American soil—Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture. Many thoughtless persons, even a reviewer or so, had spoken of him as an "unknown" chosen to "replace" Toscanini.

Barbirolli extricated himself from his hot spot neatly by frankly admitting wonder at being chosen, by disclaiming any intention of "replacing" anybody, by declaring that he was a young man trying to make a living. He had won the men of the orchestra. Now he seems to be winning the public.

Koussevitzky brings his Bostonese to town for the first time this season next Thursday. He always plays to packed houses, and he never yet has engineered a publicity stunt to pack them. By now he is accustomed to being pointed out as the supreme American example of what a superlative orchestra can accomplish when left to one conductor through a period of years.

CONCORD, N. H.
Monitor & N. H. Patriot
JAN 5 - 1937

One of the events of the musical season in New Hampshire is the appearance at Hanover tonight of the full Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 pieces, directed by Serge Koussevitsky. The first "winter music festival" at Little Boar's Head was held recently on the opera field on the Hobson estate, with Norman M. Leavitt conducting. A Model H Wurlitzer organ, installed in the Albert theater at Berlin four years ago at a cost of $23,000, has been presented by Manager Edward O. Gilbert to the city of Berlin and has been placed in the Senior High school auditorium.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 3 - 1937

Soloist in Brooklyn

Albert Spalding, appearing with the Boston Symphony at the Academy of Music Friday night.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 3 - 1937

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Give Second Concert of Season at Academy on Friday

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S second concert of the season will be given Friday evening at the Academy of Music. Mrs. Charles Franklin will be the hostess in the committee box at the concert, at which Albert Spalding, violinist, will be the soloist. He also will appear with orchestra in Mozart's Concerto in D Major, K. No. 218.

Other boxholders are Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Dr. and Mrs. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives and Mrs. Joseph A. Bennett. Rear Admiral Harris Laning, commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, will be host in Box 7.

The 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman.

Taking an active part in furthering interest in the only series of philharmonie concerts given by a major orchestra in Brooklyn are Mrs. Blum, chairman of boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, membership chairman of the Brooklyn Committee, and Miss Virginia Marvin, chairman of the Junior League committee.

Richard Burgin, who is both assistant conductor and concert master of the orchestra, will be the conductor on this occasion. Mr. Burgin will open the program with Bach's Toccata in C major for organ, as arranged for orchestra by Leo Weiner. The Toccata consists of a Prelude, Adagio and Fugue. The closing number will be Kalinnikov's Symphony No. 1 in G minor.

Occupying the seats assigned to the Junior League of Brooklyn through the Junior League committee, of which Miss Virginia Marvin is chairman, will be Miss Mary Thayer, Miss Arrietta Smith, Miss Harriet Underwood, Miss Catherine Recknagel, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Ormond Gove, Mrs. Carson Brevoort, Miss Catherine Van Brunt, Miss Louise A. Wilson, Mrs. Tracy Voorhees and the Misses Louise and Emily Goetz.

Members of the Junior League committee include Miss Marvin, Miss Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz Randolph, Miss Louise Goetz, Miss Smith, Miss Hollis Thayer, Miss Van Brunt and Miss Edith Warren.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 3 - 1937

SPALDING TO PLAY IN CONCERT SERIES

He Will Be Soloist Friday With Boston Symphony at Academy of Music.

NEXT OPERA ON JAN. 12

'Samson et Delilah' Is Next on Metropolitan Program—Recitals Are Planned.

Albert Spalding, the violinist, will be the soloist at the second of this season's Brooklyn series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 8:30 P. M. on Friday in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. He will play Mozart's Concerto in D major, K. No. 218.

Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, will conduct. The program will include Bach's Toccata in C major for the organ, transcribed for full orchestra by Leo Weiner, and Kalinnikov's First symphony in G minor.

Mrs. Charles W. Franklin will be hostess in the committee box. Boxholders for the concert include Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Dr. and Mrs. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Robert F. Ives and Mrs. Joseph A. Bennett. Box No. 7 will be occupied by Rear Admiral Harris Laning, commandant of the navy yard in Brooklyn.

Occupying the seats assigned to the Junior League of Brooklyn through the Junior League Committee, of which Miss Virginia Marvin is chairman, will be Miss Mary Thayer, Miss Arrietta Smith, Miss Harriet Underwood, Miss Catherine Recknagel, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Ormond Gove, Mrs. Carson Brevoort, Miss Catherine Van Brunt, Miss Louise A. Wilson, Mrs. Tracy Voorhees, and the Misses Louise and Emily Goetze.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
JAN 3 - 1937

Boston Symphony Concert on Friday

Mrs. Charles Franklin will be the hostess in the committee box at the second concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 8, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman of the Brooklyn committee, announces.

Box holders for this second concert of the series of five will be: Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Dr. and Mrs. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Robert F. Ives, and Mrs. Joseph A. Bennett. Box 7 will be occupied by Rear Admiral Harris Laning, commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

The 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is president of the Board of Trustees, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committée of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

Taking an active part in furthering interest in the only series of philharmonic concerts given by a major orchestra in Brooklyn are the following chairmen: Mrs. Blum, chairman of boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, membership chairman of the Brooklyn Committee, and Miss Virginia Marvin, chairman of the Junior League Committee.

The great American violinist, Albert Spalding, will be the distinguished soloist on Friday evening. Mr. Spalding will appear with the orchestra in Mozart's Concerto in D. major, K. No. 218. Richard Burgin, who is both assistant conductor and concert master of the orchestra, will be the conductor on this occasion. Mr. Burgin will open the program with Bach's Toccata in C major for organ, as arranged for orchestra by Leo Weiner. The Toccata consists of a Prelude, Adagio and Fugue.

The closing number will be Kalinnikov's Symphony No. 1 in G. minor. The symphony of this Russian composer, which had a high vogue some years ago, attracted considerable attention when revived this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Occupying the seats assigned to the Junior League of Brooklyn through the Junior League Committee of which Miss Virginia Marvin is chairman, will be: Miss Mary Thayer, Miss Arietta Smith, Miss Harriet Underwood, Miss Catherine Pecknagel, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Ormond Gove, Mrs. Garson Brevoort, Miss Catherine Van Brunt, Miss Louise A. Wilson, Mrs. Tracy Voorhees, and the Misses Louise and Emily Goetz.

Members of the Junior League Committee include: Miss Marvin, Miss Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz Randolph, Miss Louise Goetze, Miss Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer, Miss Van Brunt, and Miss Edith Warren.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN - 1937

Soloist Will Appear At Bushnell Concert

JESUS MARIA SANROMA.

Mr. Sanroma, distinguished pianist, will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its performance of Edward MacDowell's "Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 2," at the Bushnell Memorial tomorrow evening. Other numbers of the program include Arthur Foote's "Suite in E major for String Orchestra" and the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD

JAN 3 - 1937

Business Is Better With Symphonies

Philadelphia Maintains Its New York Packed House Record

By JOHN SELBY

NEW YORK, Jan. 2 (AP)—New York hears its young-old philharmonic-symphony society throughout the winter. It also hears 10 concerts each per winter from Serge Koussevitzky's Boston symphony, and from Leopold Stokowski's Philadelphia orchestra.

Two of these three orchestras have undergone major operations this fall. Many patrons and many observers and most managers stroked their beards in the spring, and came out with the idea that these major operations would most likely reduce audiences this winter. They were wrong.

Philadelphia's noble band "lost" Stokowski. That is, Stokowski became so enamored of the movies and their mass possibilities that he asked his directors to elect a permanent conductor for three years, leaving him free to conduct as little as he chose.

Ormandy Popular.

They picked Eugene Ormandy. Hitherto, the Philadelphia has played to packed houses in New York. This winter it is doing the same. And last Tuesday, when Stokowski came to town with an all-Russian program which included Sergei Rachmaninoff's brand-new third symphony, the last-minute people just didn't get into Carnegie hall.

The Philharmonic is, however, even more astonished. Last spring Arturo Toscanini departed these shores forever, saying among other things, it is declared, that the Philharmonic is the greatest orchestra ever assembled. The Philharmonic directors at once set their sails to fit what they thought would be a period of calm—they cut down the season six weeks, and expected reduced business.

But they didn't get reduced business; business is better. Subscription sales are actually ahead of last winter. John Barbirolli, the young Italian-French-English conductor, is not only doing well at the box office, he is doing well on the podium.

Barbirolli Draws.

Partly this is musical ability, partly the public's curiosity, and (oddly enough) partly tact. No musician ever stood in hotter shoes than Barbirolli a week and three days ago when he began the first piece he ever conducted on American soil—Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture. Many thoughtless persons, even a reviewer or so, had spoken of him as an "unknown" chosen to "replace" Toscanini.

Barbirolli extricated himself from his hot spot neatly by frankly admitting wonder at being chosen, by disclaiming any intention of "replacing" anybody, by declaring that he was a young man trying to make a living. He had won the men of the orchestra. Now he seems to be winning the public.

Koussevitzky brings his Bostonese to town for the first time this season next Thursday. He always plays to packed houses, and he never yet has engineered a publicity stunt to pack them. By now he is accustomed to being pointed out as the supreme American example of what a superlative orchestra can accomplish when left to one conductor through a period of years.

CONCORD, N. H.
Monitor & N. H. Patriot

JAN 5 - 1937

One of the events of the musical season in New Hampshire is the appearance at Hanover tonight of the full Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 pieces, directed by Serge Koussevitsky. The first "winter music festival" at Little Boar's Head was held recently on the opera field on the Hobson estate, with Norman M. Leavitt conducting. A Model H Wurlitzer organ, installed in the Albert theater at Berlin four years ago at a cost of $23,000, has been presented by Manager Edward O. Gilbert to the city of Berlin and has been placed in the Senior High school auditorium.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 3 - 1937

Soloist in Brooklyn

Albert Spalding, appearing with the Boston Symphony at the Academy of Music Friday night.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 3 - 1937

SPALDING TO PLAY IN CONCERT SERIES

He Will Be Soloist Friday With Boston Symphony at Academy of Music.

NEXT OPERA ON JAN. 12

'Samson et Delilah' Is Next on Metropolitan Program—Recitals Are Planned.

Albert Spalding, the violinist, will be the soloist at the second of this season's Brooklyn series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 8:30 P. M. on Friday in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. He will play Mozart's Concerto in D major, K. No. 218.

Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, will conduct. The program will include Bach's Toccata in C major for the organ, transcribed for full orchestra by Leo Weiner, and Kalinnikov's First symphony in G minor.

Mrs. Charles W. Franklin will be hostess in the committee box. Boxholders for the concert include Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Dr. and Mrs. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Robert F. Ives and Mrs. Joseph A. Bennett. Box No. 7 will be occupied by Rear Admiral Harris Laning, commandant of the navy yard in Brooklyn.

Occupying the seats assigned to the Junior League of Brooklyn through the Junior League Committee, of which Miss Virginia Marvin is chairman, will be Miss Mary Thayer, Miss Arrietta Smith, Miss Harriet Underwood, Miss Catherine Recknagel, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Ormond Gove, Mrs. Carson Brevoort, Miss Catherine Van Brunt, Miss Louise A. Wilson, Mrs. Tracy Voorhees, and the Misses Louise and Emily Goetze.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JAN 3 - 1937

Boston Symphony Concert on Friday

Mrs. Charles Franklin will be the hostess in the committee box at the second concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 8, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman of the Brooklyn committee, announces.

Box holders for this second concert of the series of five will be: Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Dr. and Mrs. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Robert F. Ives, and Mrs. Joseph A. Bennett. Box 7 will be occupied by Rear Admiral Harris Laning, commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

The 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is president of the Board of Trustees, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

Taking an active part in furthering interest in the only series of philharmonic concerts given by a major orchestra in Brooklyn are the following chairmen: Mrs. Blum, chairman of boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, membership chairman of the Brooklyn Committee, and Miss Virginia Marvin, chairman of the Junior League Committee.

The great American violinist, Albert Spalding, will be the distinguished soloist on Friday evening. Mr. Spalding will appear with the orchestra in Mozart's Concerto in D. major, K. No. 218. Richard Burgin, who is both assistant conductor and concert master of the orchestra, will be the conductor on this occasion. Mr. Burgin will open the program with Bach's Toccata in C major for organ, as arranged for orchestra by Leo Weiner. The Toccata consists of a Prelude, Adagio and Fugue.

The closing number will be Kalinnikov's Symphony No. 1 in G. minor. The symphony of this Russian composer, which had a high vogue some years ago, attracted considerable attention when revived this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Occupying the seats assigned to the Junior League of Brooklyn through the Junior League Committee of which Miss Virginia Marvin is chairman, will be: Miss Mary Thayer, Miss Arietta Smith, Miss Harriet Underwood, Miss Catherine Pecknagel, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Ormond Gove, Mrs. Garson Brevoort, Miss Catherine Van Brunt, Miss Louise A. Wilson, Mrs. Tracy Voorhees, and the Misses Louise and Emily Goetz.

Members of the Junior League Committee include: Miss Marvin, Miss Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz Randolph, Miss Louise Goetze, Miss Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer, Miss Van Brunt, and Miss Edith Warren.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 3 - 1937

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Give Second Concert of Season at Academy on Friday

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S second concert of the season will be given Friday evening at the Academy of Music. Mrs. Charles Franklin will be the hostess in the committee box at the concert, at which Albert Spalding, violinist, will be the soloist. He also will appear with orchestra in Mozart's Concerto in D Major, K. No. 218.

Other boxholders are Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Dr. and Mrs. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives and Mrs. Joseph A. Bennett. Rear Admiral Harris Laning, commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, will be host in Box 7.

The 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman.

Taking an active part in furthering interest in the only series of philharmonic concerts given by a major orchestra in Brooklyn are Mrs. Blum, chairman of boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, membership chairman of the Brooklyn Committee, and Miss Virginia Marvin, chairman of the Junior League committee.

Richard Burgin, who is both assistant conductor and concert master of the orchestra, will be the conductor on this occasion. Mr. Burgin will open the program with Bach's Toccata in C major for organ, as arranged for orchestra by Leo Weiner. The Toccata consists of a Prelude, Adagio and Fugue. The closing number will be Kalinnikov's Symphony No. 1 in G minor.

Occupying the seats assigned to the Junior League of Brooklyn through the Junior League committee, of which Miss Virginia Marvin is chairman, will be Miss Mary Thayer, Miss Arrietta Smith, Miss Harriet Underwood, Miss Catherine Recknagel, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Ormond Gove, Mrs. Carson Brevoort, Miss Catherine Van Brunt, Miss Louise A. Wilson, Mrs. Tracy Voorhees and the Misses Louise and Emily Goetz.

Members of the Junior League committee include Miss Marvin, Miss Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz Randolph, Miss Louise Goetz, Miss Smith, Miss Hollis Thayer, Miss Van Brunt and Miss Edith Warren.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

1937

Soloist Will Appear At Bushnell Concert

JESUS MARIA SANROMA.

Mr. Sanroma, distinguished pianist, will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its performance of Edward MacDowell's "Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 2," at the Bushnell Memorial tomorrow evening. Other numbers of the program include Arthur Foote's "Suite in E major for String Orchestra" and the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 3 - 1937

—The Week—

THE opening night spectacle at the Academy of Music last Tuesday, on the occasion of the first Metropolitan Opera performance of the season, was heartening in the extreme. Two hundred people paid for standing room and the occasion was festive in more than one sense, with both the Borough President and the Mayor in attendance.

But the mood of extreme self-congratulation which was occasioned by the premiere should not be allowed to militate against consideration of a problem that is truly serious. That problem is this: that unless the popular response to such events is augmented in no uncertain fashion Brooklyn is likely to witness a steady decline of its cultural sustenance.

The Brooklyn Academy of Music has had ample reason to fear such a decline in popular patronage. The New York-Philharmonic Orchestra used to appear regularly at the Academy; it has not been heard in some years. The Metropolitan Opera Company, too, has curtailed the number of performances it still continues to offer the residents of the borough, and now there is some danger that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will do likewise.

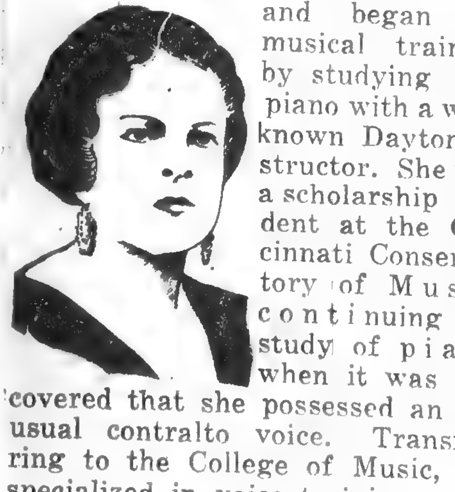
It should not be forgotten that, with the retirement of Arturo Toscanini, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has regained the position it formerly held under the leadership of Karl Muck—that of the finest orchestral organization in the East. Nor should Brooklyn music-lovers find any reason to demur at the absence from the initial concert this Friday night of Mr. Koussevitsky, the orchestra's regular conductor. Richard Burgin, who will replace him on the podium for this particular evening, is a conductor of skill and accomplishment, who is familiar to the orchestra's Boston audience as Mr. Koussevitsky's relief. The Boston Symphony does not function on a multiple-conductor basis, but Mr. Koussevitsky must occasionally rest from his arduous duties. Mr. Burgin occupies the podium capably in such emergencies.

Further curtailment of the Boston Symphony's schedule for Brooklyn cannot be regarded with equanimity, and such curtailment in the past always has been the result of a lack of popular support. Since past attendance upon musical events in Brooklyn has definitely proven that there is no dearth of people ready and anxious to listen to the finest musical events that are presently available, this editorial is in the nature of a plea for an augmented popular support of the Boston Symphony as well as of those of other institutions which have not stinted to send their finest artists to the borough in the past. Brooklyn should want them and welcome them.

DAYTON, O.
NEWS

Among Other Things

BY EVE



SHE has made 150 appearances as contralto soloist with major symphonic orchestras throughout the country.

She was born in Franklin, O., and began her musical training by studying the piano with a well-known Dayton instructor. She was a scholarship student at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music, continuing her study of piano when it was discovered that she possessed an unusual contralto voice. Transferring to the College of Music, she specialized in voice training.

After her formal training she went to New York, where she spent approximately eight years in concert work under a New York management.

She has appeared as soloist with the New York Symphony orchestra under the direction of Walter Damrosch, and at various times with the orchestras of Boston, St. Louis, Detroit, Philadelphia, Toronto, Cincinnati and other cities.

During several summer seasons she sang at Bigwin Inn, Lake-of-Bays, Can., accompanied by an orchestra made up of members of the Toronto Symphony orchestra.

Critics have described her vocal performance as "brilliant," and have said that she possessed rare pictorial gifts and artistic attainment.

Pierre V. R. Key, editor and publisher of Musical Digest, commented that, at the height of her career, she "had no peer as a contralto on the concert stage, and her only competitor was Sigrid Onegon."

She is now living in Franklin.

She is Marjorie Hankinson Squires (Mrs. Gerald Humphrey).

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 5 - 1937

Brooklyn Day Program Includes Talk by Borough President At Woman's Club

A program devoted to Brooklyn and its part in the World's Fair was held yesterday afternoon at the Brooklyn Woman's Club, No. 114 Pierrepont street, under the auspices of the education-civics department, of which Mrs. E. Otis Houghton is chairman. The speakesr were: Borough President Raymond V. Ingersoll, Sanitation Commissioner William F. Carey, Deputy Sanitation Commissioner William A. Powell, William Slater, headmaster of Adelphi Academy, and Mrs. Thomas F. Casey, member of the Women's Division of the fair.

Nelson Sprackling spoke briefly, urging support of the Boston Symphony concert series being given this season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEW YORK JOURNAL

JAN 5 - 1937

MRS. CHARLES FRANKLIN will be the hostess in the committee box at the second concert of the season of music which is being presented at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Its moody melodies will haunt the Academy again Friday night, brought here in great part by the efforts of Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman of the Brooklyn committee.

The fifty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman.

* * *

COMMITTEE BUSY.

AN ACTIVE PART IN FURthering the interest of the only series of Philharmonic concerts given by a major orchestra in Brooklyn is being taken by the following committee chairmen:

Mrs. Blum, chairman of boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, membership chairman of the Brooklyn Committee, and Virginia Marvin, chairman of the Junior League Committee.

Soloist Friday night will be Albert Spalding, distinguished violinist. He will appear with the orchestra in Mozart's "Concerto in D Major."

Richard Burgin, who is both assistant conductor and concertmaster of the orchestra, will be the conductor.

Occupying the seats assigned to the Junior League of Brooklyn through the Junior League Committee, will be Mary Thayer, Arietta Smith, Harriet Underwood, Catherine Recknagel, Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Ormond Gove, Mrs. Carson Brevoort, Catherine Van Brunt, Louise A. Wilson, Mrs. Tracy A. Voorhees and Louise and Emily Goetz.

Members of the Junior League Committee include Miss Marvin, Miss Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz Randolph, Louise Goetz, Miss Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer, Miss Van Brunt and Edith Warren.

Boxholders for the second concert will be Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Dr. and Mrs. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Robert F. Ives, and Mrs. Joseph A. Bennett.

Box seven will be occupied by Rear Admiral Harris Laning, commandant of the Navy Yard.

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Vladimir Bakaleinikoff again will conduct this week's symphony program, the seventh in the season's series, in Music Hall, Friday at 2:45 p. m. and Saturday at 8:30 p. m.

Joseph Szigeti, eminent Hungarian violinist, will be the soloist. He has chosen Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor for Violin and Orchestra, for his local appearances.

Bakaleinikoff will present the first Cincinnati performance of Sibelius's Fourth Symphony, and will introduce a composition by a Cincinnati composer—"Fantasie Americana," by Milton Rosen, which was given its premiere in 1935 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program follows:

Symphony No. 4, A minor, Op. 63 Sibelius
I. Tempo molto moderato, quasi adagio.
II. Allegro molto vivace.
III. Il tempo largo.
IV. Allegro.
Concerto for Violin, E minor, Op. 64 Mendelssohn
Allegro molto appassionata.
Andante.
Allegro molto vivace.
Soloist, Joseph Szigeti
Fantasie Americana......Milton Rosen
1. In a moderate tempo.
2. In a blues tempo.
3. In a lively tempo.
Piano soloist, John Quincy Bass
Tone Poem—Death and Transfiguration............Richard Strauss
Entrance of the Emperor and His Court, from "Hary Janos"...Kodaly

The sale of tickets will open Tuesday at the Symphony ticket office, 121 East Fourth street. Prices range from 50 cents to $2.25.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 4 - 1937

FIEDLER LEADS SYMPHONY HERE

Brilliant Concert Given Last Night in Oliver School Hall

Dominating completely the members of the Alumni Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, who has been the conductor of the Boston Symphony Pops for the past ~~six~~ years, brought a new spirit to the local organization and proved to many that the local organization had possibilities and should receive the unqualified endorsement of music lovers in this city.

The concert presented in Oliver school hall last night was not too heavy and yet was actually balanced with colorful selections Robert E. Sault, the regular program conductor, relinquished his position last night and handed the baton to Mr. Fiedler.

The program for last evening was as follows:

1. Euryanthe Overture ... Weber
2. Symphony in E Flat Major.. Mozart
   Adagio-Allegro
   Andante can moto
   Minueto
   Allegro
   (Intermission)
3. Ballet Suite .. Rameau-Matto
   Minuet
   Musette
   Tambourin
4. Danses Russes A. Tscherepnin
   Allegro moderato
   Vivace
   Allegro

Marche Slave ..... Tschaikowsky

Beset on all sides by lack of support, the personnel of the Alumni Orchestra has weathered severe storms and will undoubtedly benefit greatly by the experiences of the past. Last night's program was given with a higher plane of perfection; no doubt influenced by the presence of Mr. Fiedler. Under Mr. Fiedler's skilful guidance, a new orchestra was heard last evening, influenced by Fiedler's dynamic skill.

Weber's Euryanthe Overture, a colorful piece of musical art, was presented with finesse and as the orchestra warned up to the enthusiastic applause of the audience a noticeable response developed to the finer points of Mr. Fiedler's conducting.

It is sincerely hoped that music lovers in this city will respond to the call and will assist the work of this group of seventy-odd persons in attaining the goal for which they have striven for the past four years.

Rudolphe Janson - LaPalme, chairman of the Alumni Association, briefly addressed the audience during intermission and told of the work that is being attempted by the local group. He asked for the unqualified support of the music lovers in this city.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

Music

U. C. CONCERT.

Continuing its weekly series of campus recorded concerts, the University of Cincinnati student branch of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers will present its twelfth program at 11:30 o'clock this morning in 11 Swift Hall. The program follows: Wagner's prelude to the first act of "Lohengrin," played by Arturo Toscanini and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra; Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Borodin's "Polovetzian Dances," played by Sir Thomas Beecham and the London Philharmonic Orchestra, assisted by the Leeds Festival Choir.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 6 - 1937

YOUNG MAESTRO

Richard Burgin

Burgin to Wield Baton at Second Academy Concert

Assistant Conductor Will Be Heard Here on Friday With Boston Orchestra

Richard Burgin, assistant conductor and concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will wave the baton at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, when the distinguished orchestra gives its second concert of the 51st Brooklyn season.

Music lovers will have the opportunity in Mr. Burgin's conducting to observe the brilliant talents of the young maestro who was a pupil of Leopold Auer in Petragrad for four years, and before that a pupil of the great Joseph Joachim, in Berlin. This was on a scholarship he had won after playing before Joachim at the age of 10.

Mr. Burgin joined the Boston Symphony when only 28 and shared with the late Franz Kneisel the distinction of having entered as one of the two youngest concert masters in the history of the organization. He became assistant conductor four years ago.

Possessing rare musicianship and also leadership, Mr. Burgin is able to "be one of the boys in the orchestra" and yet wield the baton with such authority that the musicians buckle down as though he were the most despotic of strangers.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

[illegible] - 1937

Plan to Give Bruckner Work Draws Wide Commendation

Congratulatory messages from many music critics have been received by Lajos Shuk, conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic orchestra, on his decision to give the first local performance of Anton Bruckner's "Third Symphony," it was announced today. The orchestra will play the symphony tomorrow evening in Elmwood Music hall.

The Bruckner Society of America, which numbers Arthur Bodansky, Serge Koussevitsky, Arturo Toscanini and other distinguished musicians in its membership, has written that the society is taking a keen interest in the performance and its results. Bruckner has been honored in Germany with festivals much as Bach and Beethoven have been honored.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

[illegible] 8 - 1937

Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe entertained today at a tea at her home on Prospect street for the Friends of the Boston Symphony, to meet Edward A. Taft of Boston. The latter, a member of the Symphony Board, told about the drawings of each member of the orchestra, done by George De Forest Brush.

154

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 6 - 1937

Boston Symphony Is Presented At Bushnell Tonight

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Explanation of 'Scheherazade' Suite Quoted

With Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as conductor and Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present at the Bushnell Memorial this evening a program including Arthur Foote's "Suite in E major for String Orchestra," Edward MacDowell's "Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Mr. Sanroma will appear during the MacDowell number.

Of "Scheherazade," the composer wrote in part as follows:

"The Sultan Schahriar, persuaded of the falseness and the faithlessness of women, has sworn to put to death each one of his wives after the first night. But the Sultana Scheherazade saved her life by interesting him in tales which she told him during one thousand and one nights. Pricked by curiosity, the Sultan put off his wife's execution from day to day, and at last gave up entirely his bloody plan.

"Many marvels were told Schahriar by the Sultana Scheherazade. For her stories the Sultana borrowed from poets their verses, from folk-songs their words; and she strung together tales and adventures.

"The program I had been guided by in composing 'Scheherazade' consisted of separate, unconnected episodes and pictures from 'The Arabian Nights': The fantastic narrative of the Prince Kalandar, the Prince and the Princess, the Baghdad festival, and the ship dashing against the rock with the bronze rider upon it. The unifying thread consisted of the brief introductions to Movements 1, 2 and 4 and the intermezzo in Movement 3, written for violin solo, and delineating Scheherazade herself as telling her wondrous tales to the stern Sultan. The conclusion of Movement 4 serves the same artistic purpose.

"In vain do people seek in my suite leading motives linked always and unvaryingly with the same poetic ideas and conceptions. On the contrary, in the majority of cases, all these seeming leit-motifs are nothing but purely musical material, or the given motives for symphonic development. These given motives thread over all the movements of the suite, alternating and intertwining each with the other. Appearing as they do each time under different moods, the self-same motives and themes correspond each time to different images, actions, and pictures.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 6 - 1937

Concerto Pianist

Jesus Maria Sanroma

With Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as conductor and Jesus Maria Sanroma, distinguished pianist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its second program of the season at the Bushnell Memorial at 8:15 this evening.

Mr. Sanroma will appear in the solo part of Edward MacDowell's Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 2.

Symphony Soloist From Puerto Rico

Jesus Maria Sanroma, who will appear at Bushnell tonight, was born in 1903 in Puerto Rico, of Catalonian parents.

He was sent to this country in 1917 by the Puerto Rican government to complete his musical education at the New England Conservatory. Graduating, he won the Mason & Hamlin prize, and subsequently studied with Mme. Antoinette Szumowska. He toured the country with Jacques Thibaud as his accompanist, and in 1926 became pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sanroma then went abroad, made an interpretative study of the piano with Artur Schnabel in Berlin and Alfred Cortot in Paris.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 5 - 1937

Handel Oboe Concerto Heard

Hans Lange Offers Long-Buried Composition in Chamber Music Program.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Interest in the concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Chamber Orchestra conducted by Hans Lange in Town Hall last evening was enlivened by the production of a new composition by Mr. Handel, the well-known composer of "The Messiah."

Happily for the cause of music, the poverty of the present time in the creation of musical works possessed of even a respectable expectancy of life is atoned for by the frequent discovery of worthy relics of deceased musicians. Clementi is to figure as one of the resurrected at the Boston Symphony concert of Thursday night. Meanwhile Mr. Handel's fondness for the oboe was demonstrated last evening by the first performance here of his concerto in E flat for that instrument.

According to the official accounts, this score slept unknown in the Landesbibliothek of Mecklenburg-Schwerin for 225 years. In 1935 Dr. Hans David, a German musicologist now laboring in the music division of the public library of this city, edited the work for contemporaneous concert use, and last evening Bruno Labate, first oboe of the Philharmonic, performed it with the aid of Mr. Lange and his little orchestra. That Mr. Handel bestowed much of his august attention on the faithful pitch pipe of the orchestra was due to the fact that it was the principal woodwind soprano of his time, to which clarinets were unknown, while flutes were employed in proportionately smaller numbers than in today's symphonic bodies. For example, in the famous Handel festival orchestra in Westminster Abbey in 1784 there were six flutes, twenty-six oboes and twenty-six bassoons.

Mr. Handel's first set of Concerti Grossi (1734) were popularly called "Oboe Concertos" by reason of the prominence accorded the instrument, but in the second set (1741) he treated the oboe more in the modern manner. Georges Longy, long the first oboeist of the Boston orchestra, played one of these in this city December 11, 1909. The long-buried work heard last evening was well worthy of reanimation. It is constructed according to a familiar pattern of the old concerto grosso—four movements, slow, fast, slow, fast—all written with Handel's unfailing command of style and his easy fecundity of melody. Mr. Labate played the solo part admirably. His tone was particularly pleasing and his taste was impeccable. Naturally the concerto does not contain passages of dazzling agility because the oboe is not an acrobatic instrument, but in the first allegro there was need for fluency and certainty in florid sequences, and this Mr. Labate met not only with dexterity but with artistry. The audience was very enthusiastic and recalled him several times.

The concerto was preceded by a symphony in E flat from the treasury of Johann Stamitz, whose labors in Mannheim developed orchestral playing to a level not previously known. He laid great emphasis on precision, on the molding of phrases and on nice gradations of piano and forte. Mozart was much impressed by the playing of his orchestra. His symphonies are perhaps not of great moment, but they are not entirely uninteresting. They possess certain characteristics which could have been imparted to them only by a specialist in orchestral performance. The one heard last night was fluent and ingratiating, and it was well played. The first part of the program ended with Haydn's symphony known as "La Passione," No. 49 in the Breitkopf & Haertel catalogue. It is noteworthy for its long and emotional introductory adagio, which is unquestionably the most original and forward looking portion of the composition. Mr. Lange and his men gave it an excellent performance.

After the intermission the concert continued with music by contemporaneous French musicians, Arthur Honegger's "Pastorale d'Ete" and Darius Milhaud's second and third symphonies. Lest this seem a monstrous feast, let it be remembered that the true modernist says all that he has to say in a symphony in from five to ten minutes, and that you have to keep your mind concentrated on the music lest it get by you without leaving any impression at all.

Mr. Lange's chamber music concerts have brought much pleasure

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JAN 7 - 1937

SUCCESS OF DRIVE SEEN BY INSTITUTE

Leaders Confident Membership Campaign, to Open at Ball, Will Reach Goal.

Success of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences membership drive, which will be formally opened by Mayor LaGuardia and Borough President Ingersoll at a reception and ball in the Academy of Music on Thursday night, Jan. 14, was presaged at a meeting of members of the Institute and its council last night in the Hotel St. George.

"The Institute initiated the program of adult education now being carried out in the United States and throughout the world," declared Ben Howe, council member, who served as chairman. "Its contributors have been legion—too numerous to name in one night—and to name any one would be to slight all the others.

"Must Push Forward"

"We must push the Institute forward," Mr. Howe continued. "In doing so, we shall have to run very fast to maintain our lead. We now own our own home. Let us keep it and pay off our debt."

He referred to Dr. Charles D. Atkins, director of the Institute, as "one of the world's great geniuses" on the basis of Dr. Atkins' "stick-to-it-ive-ness, which is in harmony with the recognized definition of genius." Mr. Howe introduced Miss Irene Miles, assistant director, with the words, "Her smile is the smile of the Institute."

"As a Manhattanite and not a Brooklynite I wish to assure you that you have the most elaborate, complex and ambitious cultural institute in the country, if not in the entire world," asserted Dr. Houston Peterson, director of a series of Institute lectures entitled "The Arts and Their Critics."

Asks Aid For Concerts

An appeal for greater upport of the five concerts given annually at the Academy by the Boston Symphony Ochestra was urged by Nelson Sprackling after he had sung Handel's "Largo" and several modern numbers to the piano accompaniment of Mrs. Sprackling.

An entertaining explanation of the origin of a plot of ane of her novels was given by Mrs. Rebecca Hooper Eastman, daughter of the late Prof. Franklin W. Hooper, whom Dr. Atkin succeeded as director of the Institute.

After the meeting Miss Miles revealed that Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt is chairman of a city-wide committee now being formed in connection with the Institute's coming campaign.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE

JAN 6 - 1937

Gershwin to Play With S. F. Symphony

George Gershwin's Piano Concerto in F Major, with the composer at the piano, will be one of the numbers on the program of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra to be conducted by Pierre Monteux in the Gymnasium for Men, Berkeley, on Sunday, January 17 at 3:15 p. m. Gershwin also will conduct the orchestra in selections from his operatic version of "Porgy and Bess." Portions of this opera have been already played under Gershwin's baton by the Boston Symphony and the New [redacted]rmonic orchestras.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JAN 6 - 1937

S. R. O.

BOSTON, Jan. 5.—Dr. Serge K[redacted], whose Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a revival of the long-lost "Symphony in D Major" of Muzio Clementi in New York this week, received the following telegram from Bronxville, N. Y., last night:

"Cannot get seats for Thursday. Will you please help me. (Signed) Cecilia Clementi Pitman."

Mrs. Pitman is a great-granddaughter of the famed Italian composer.

DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD

937

Heifetz Will Be Symphony Guest

The Beethoven concerto will be played by Jascha Heifetz, world-famous violinist, when he appears as guest artist with the Duluth Symphony orchestra Jan. 21 in the Armory.

Mr. Heifetz is one of the outstanding violinists in the world and is particularly noted for his renditions of the works of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms.

He has traveled around the world four times and has been heard in every cultured part of the world.

The concerto which he will present in Duluth will be repeated later when he appears as guest soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The orchestral program for this concert, arranged by Paul Lemay, conductor, will include the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," by Wagner, and the Symphony No. 1 by Goldmark, known as the "Country Wedding Symphony."

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

Dr. Koussevitzky Ill, Burgin Conducts Sanroma Brilliant Soloist in Concerto

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

The return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night for the second of its appearances in the current Bushnell Series unexpectedly brought another conductor, Richard Burgin.

As announced to the audience by Managing Director William H. Mortenson, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was ill and although he made the trip to Hartford, hoping to make an appearance, his condition did not permit the exertion of taking up the taxing duties of the podium.

Human Nature

The result was a commentary on the reactions of human nature, which at its best runs pathetically true to form. Except for those apparently few persons who had learned to admire the Trojan manner in which R. Burgin has officered the post of concert master these many years, and who knew that as assistant conductor he was no stranger to the dais in Boston, the audience seemed to feel that it was being treated to an Ersatz batonist.

Since there was a large measure of human nature on the platform as well, it followed that a spirit of the-boss-is-away-we'll-take-it-easy was permitted to dull the edge of much of the evening's music. There was no bad playing, but according to Boston Symphony standards Arthur Foote's Suite for String Orchestra, Opus 63 and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" were merely passable.

It would be idle to pick out sluggish attacks and anemic tone production for the ground is completely covered by reporting that the performance lacked esprit. Mr. Burgin deserved better of his men. His musicianly grasp of the material and his sterling intentions were clearly apparent and if a leader in whom authority has been delegated cannot make his authority felt it is his own fault; yet it can also be offered that a man cannot turn martinet on a moment's notice in maneuvering colleagues with whom he ordinarily sits shoulder to shoulder.

The Concert

Fortunately a concert which on the whole was decidely mediocre afforded one shining virtue which redeemed all the sins of nonfeasance. It was the MacDowell piano Concerto in D minor, performed in such a way that one might say the evening's glory and honor went to the soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, except that it was impossible to dissociate him from the body of the orchestra. Perhaps even the credit for this, too, must go to him.

Mr. Sanroma is a regular member of the Boston Symphony, one of the few orchestras which counts a pianist in its roster. He has as a quotidian duty a task in which, it is safe to say, the majority of concert pianists, even the great ones, would come a cropper, namely the translation of orchestral scores at the keyboard. This is due to Dr. Koussevitzky's method of imparting to the entire body of players a unified conception of the work under rehearsal instead of thinking in terms of individual parts.

To say though, that Mr. Sanroma is a pianist who is orchestral in his tone coloring and general treatment is only half the story. As a soloist he has dazzling brilliance of tone and a rhythmic sense which is electric in its reflexes. He commands an extraordinary range of coloring up to the very extremes of piano sonority and his finger technique is unerring.

Not Often Thus

The amazing part of his performance was the rapport which he maintained with leader and orchestra. The manner in which he almost continually eyed the baton is practically without parallel for a concerto soloist. The result was superb. Perhaps that is the way concertos should be played. They certainly never have been before, and probably will not be often in the future. Usually the artist is so absorbed with his solo that the orchestra must shift for itself, like an accompanist playing guessing games with a temperamental soprano.

The concert was refreshing in that it brought the first soloist to the Bushnell Series since the late Ossip Gabrilowitsch played Mozart's D minor concerto with the Detroit Orchestra in December, 1934. It was also good to hear American scores as substantially wrought as the Arthur Foote suite and the MacDowell Concerto, both of which, while stylistically dated, attest that sincere musical thought always gratifies and sustains. The Concerto had moments of sweeping grandeur and impressive recitative-like utterance.

While in some respects so disappointing, the concert was unique in that the Boston Orchestra, without its great leader, produced from its own ranks not only an amazing soloist but a conductor whose worth was obscured by the fact that he valued too lightly the clap-trap theatricalism which counts for so much with an audience and, more regrettably, even with any symphony players you may wish to name.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 7 - 1937

Philharmonic In Mid-Week Series Finale

John Barbirolli Conducts Unfamiliar Concertos of Vivaldi and Pergolesi

Bruno Labate Soloist

Same Numbers Tomorrow EndAfternoon Programs

By Francis D. Perkins

John Barbirolli conducted his last concert of the season for the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra's mid-week evening subscribers last night in Carnegie Hall. The program with which he will also bid farewell tomorrow to the Friday afternoon Philharmonic patrons began with an unfamiliar concerto for strings in E minor by Antonio Vivaldi and continued with the first performance of a concerto for oboe and strings composed by Mr. Barbirolli on themes by another memorable Italian musician of Vivaldi's time, Giovanni Battista Pergolesi. Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" and Brahms's second symphony completed the well-diversified list. The soloist of the evening was the Society's incomparable first oboist, Bruno Labate.

Regarding the concerto, Mr. Barbirolli explained in a program note that the idea of constructing this work occurred to him the summer before last, while he was looking over various compositions by Pergolesi. Finding some of the melodies of that short-lived genius suitable for the oboe, he saw the possibility of adding simultaneously both to the limited list of available works for oboe solo, and to the public's opportunity for acquaintance with Pergolesi's music.

Third Movement Best Known

Of the four movements, the first comes from Pergolesi's "stabat Mater" and the melody of the third is the best-known of his songs, "Se tu m'ami." The others are drawn from a set of twelve sonatas originally written for two violins and bass.

In doing this the Philharmonic's new permanent conductor has earned the thanks of all good symphonic oboists and also of their hearers, both because of the essential poetic charm of the melodies themselves and because of the taste and discretion of the string accompaniment he has devised for them with faithfulness to their style and atmosphere. Most patrons of song recitals know "Se tu m'ami," but the melody from the "Stabat Mater," with its long-breathed, plangent eloquence, unfamiliar to most of its hearers, proved exceptionally well suited to the characteristic color and timber of the solo instrument. Mr. Labate gave a highly laudable performance, marked by artistry of style and phrasing, and was warmly applauded by an audience that probably was inclined to agree with Mr. Barbirolli's statement that the world of music had suffered an untimely loss when Pergolesi died at the age of twenty-six.

Vivaldi Concerto Played in '26

The Vivaldi concerto, edited by A. Mistowski, is new to the Philharmonic repertoire, but was played here in March, 1926, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The form can be regarded as that of the concerto grosso, with three leaders of the string choirs as the solo group. With the contrast of two spirited allegros and an adagio of marked beauty, and the fertility of melodic invention which characterized the early eighteenth century red-headed Venetian composer, it seemed to merit hearings at more frequent intervals than once a decade. The performance was sonorous, while praiseworthy for clarity and polish, and there were plaudits for Mishel Piastro, the concertmaster, and the solo violist and cellest, Zolten Kurthy and Josef Schuster.

The reading of the Ravel rhapsody did not lack for color or effectiveness; the "Feria," with marked contrasts of pace and a high-spirited close, sometimes suggested incomplete clarity of detail in a generally praiseworthy orchestral performance, but the Habanera, interpreted with unusual subtlety in instrumental hues, volume and variations of pace, had an exceptional imaginative appeal. Mr. Barbirolli will make his two final appearances of the season next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, with John Corigliano, assistant concert master of the orchestra, and the English two-piano team composed of Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson as the respective soloists.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 8 - 1937

Dinner Parties to Be Given Preceding Second Symphony Concert at Academy Tonight

There will be many dinner parties this evening prior to the second of the season's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the Academy of Music. Richard Burgin will conduct and Albert Spalding, violionist, will be the soloist.

Miss Marion Ingersoll, daughter of Borough President and Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll of 380 Clinton Ave. will entertain at a buffet supper at her parents' home for a group of girls from Packer Collegiate Institute who later will attend the concert. The guests will be the Misses Janice and June Baker, Sally Sloan, Marion Carpenter, Lillian Kraus, Jean McMurray, Janet Hulburt, Kathleen Barron and Dorothy Bristow.

Miss Elizabeth Truslow whose engagement to Thomas Melvill Pope has been announced by her parents, Dr. and Mrs. Walter Truslow, will be honored by them at a dinner party at their home, 11 Schermerhorn St., prior to the concert. The guests will include Col. and Mrs. Allan Melvill Pope, Miss Polly Pope and John Truslow. They will occupy a box at the Academy of Music.

Rear Admiral and Mrs. Harris M. Laning will entertain at dinner for their box guests, Mrs. Ralston Holmes, Miss Sally Holmes and Miss Hester Laning.

Mrs Frederick B. Pratt's box guests will be Mr. and Mrs. Luke Vincent Lockwood and Mr. and Mrs. Philip N. Youtz.

The Misses Mary and Katherine Bennett will be guests of their mother, Mrs. Joseph A. Bennett in her box. Dr. and Mrs. Frank L. Babbott and Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives also will occupy boxes.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 8 - 1937

Society

Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe will entertain at tea this afternoon at her home on Prospect street for the Friends of the Boston Symphony to meet Mr. Edward A. Taft of Boston. Mr. Taft, a member of the Symphony Board, will tell about the drawings of each member of the orchestra done by George De Forest Brush.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 8 - 1937

PARTIES FOR CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dinners Will Be Given Tonight Preceding Second in the Brooklyn Season.

A notable audience is expected this evening at the second of five concerts in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifty-first season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Richard Burgin, assistant conductor and concert master, will conduct. Albert Spalding, violinist, will appear as soloist with the orchestra.

Mrs. Charles W. Franklin will be hostess in the committee box and will have as her guests Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Dr. and Mrs. Charles C. Leiv, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Rogers Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport and Mr. Franklin.

Rear Admiral and Mrs. Harris M. Laning will give a dinner party for their box guests before the concert. Their guests will be Mrs. Ralston Holmes and Miss Sally Holmes and Miss Hester Laning.

Dr. and Mrs. Walter Truslow will give a dinner at their home, 11 Schermerhorn Street, in honor of their daughter, Miss Elizabeth Truslow, whose engagement to Thomas Pope has been announced. Other guests wil be Colonel and Mrs. Allan Melville Pope, Miss Polly Pope and John Truslow. Later they will attend the concert in the Truslow box.

Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt will have as her box guests Mr. and Mrs. Luke Vincent Lockwood and Mr. and Mrs. Philip N. Youtz.

With Mrs. Joseph A. Bennett in her box will be the Misses Mary and Catherine Bennett. Other boxholders include Dr. and Mrs. Frank L. Babbot and Mrs. Robert F. Ives.

The concerts are under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and the Brooklyn committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman.

Clementi Symphony Is Heard

N. Y. Sun Jan. 8/37

Performance by Bostonians Is First Heard Here of Lost Composition.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening began with a number of special interest. This was a symphony in D major by Muzio Clementi, the eminent Italian composer who passed most of his life in England and whose sonatas won the admiration of Beethoven.

The symphony, however, had been lost for nearly a century after the composer's death and came to light only when the possessions of Dr. William H. Cummings, a musicologist deceased in 1917, were put on the market. But all the Clementi manuscripts left by him were in a sad state of disorder. When they were sold some of them were acquired for the Library of Congress through the enlightened efforts of Carl Engel, editor of the Musical Quarterly. The one heard last evening had been edited, some missing portions found and restored and the whole reorchestrated to impart the fullness demanded by the contemporaneous ear, by Alfredo Cassella, the distinguished Italian composer and musical scholar.

The work was lately produced by the Boston organization in its home town and was heard last night for the first time here. It is well worth the pains that were bestowed upon it. The symphony is no subservient copy of the idioms of its time, though in general outline and structure it follows the conventional symphony of the beginning of the nineteenth century. But Clementi had melodic invention of his own, a fresh and ingratiating style, no small degree of fancy, and a notable firmness in design. His music proved to be decidedly pleasing and compared favorably with the secondary creations of a period in which Haydn and Mozart works still were in the van of the procession and Beethoven had given the world the mighty "Eroica." Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it with evident satisfaction and accomplished a performance delightful in its simplicity and directness of style and in its high level of technical finish.

It was, however, in the second umber that he and his musicians emonstrated what a modern or-hestra can do in the tuosity. The number was the second "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet suite of Ravel. This score is a bewildering piece of orchestration, gorgeous in its infinite variety of instrumental tints and opulent in its pictorial splendors. The Boston men played it magnificently. In richness, luminosity, subtle and almost inexplicable gradations, in perfection of balance, in flawlessness of articulation and magic of tonal blending, it was beyond description.

Mr. Koussevitzky's appreciation of the style and methods of the composer was authoritative and it would be difficult, if not impossible, to name any other performance of a work by this gifted Frenchman so completely satisfying, so exhilarating, and so exhaustive. The audience received it with prolonged applause. The concert was brought to its finish with the fourth symphony of Brahms, a work well chosen to provide restful contrast to the flaming and exciting creation of Ravel. W. J. H.

Films Held Over a Week.

Films continuing their runs include "That Girl From Paris" at the Radio City Music Hall; "Great Guy," at the Criterion; "Beloved Enemy," at the Rivoli; "Lloyds of London," at the Astor; "After the Thin Man," at the Capitol; "Janosik," at the Filmarte; "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town," at the Little Carnegie; "Slalom," at the Fifty-fifth Street Playhouse; "Yiddle With His Fiddle," at the Ambassador; "College Holiday," at the Paramount; "Der Bettelstudent," at the Eighty-sixth Street Garden Theater, and "One in a Million," at the Roxy.

"Caruso," based on a play by Burnet Hershey and Lyon Mearson, will e first production of the newly

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
JAN 8 - 1937

Clementi Symphony Is Heard

Performance by Bostonians Is First Heard Here of Lost Composition.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening began with a number of special interest. This was a symphony in D major by Muzio Clementi, the eminent Italian composer who passed most of his life in England and whose sonatas won the admiration of Beethoven.

The symphony, however, had been lost for nearly a century after the composer's death and came to light only when the possessions of Dr. William H. Cummings, a musicologist deceased in 1917, were put on the market. But all the Clementi manuscripts left by him were in a sad state of disorder. When they were sold some of them were acquired for the Library of Congress through the enlightened efforts of Carl Engel, editor of the Musical Quarterly. The one heard last evening had been edited, some missing portions found and restored and the whole reorchestrated to impart the fullness demanded by the contemporaneous ear, by Alfredo Cassella, the distinguished Italian composer and musical scholar.

The work was lately produced by the Boston organization in its home town and was heard last night for the first time here. It is well worth the pains that were bestowed upon it. The symphony is no subservient copy of the idioms of its time, though in general outline and structure it follows the conventional symphony of the beginning of the nineteenth century. But Clementi had melodic invention of his own, a fresh and ingratiating style, no small degree of fancy, and a notable firmness in design. His music proved to be decidedly pleasing and compared favorably with the secondary creations of a period in which Haydn and Mozart works still were in the van of the procession and Beethoven had given the world the mighty "Eroica." Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it with evident satisfaction and accomplished a performance delightful in its simplicity and directness of style and in its high level of technical finish.

It was, however, in the second number that he and his musicians demonstrated what a modern orchestra can do in the way of virtuosity. The number was the second "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet suite of Ravel. This score is a bewildering piece of orchestration, gorgeous in its infinite variety of instrumental tints and opulent in its pictorial splendors. The Boston men played it magnificently. In richness, luminosity, subtle and almost inexplicable gradations, in perfection of balance, in flawlessness of articulation and magic of tonal blending, it was beyond description.

Mr. Koussevitzky's appreciation of the style and methods of the composer was authoritative and it would be difficult, if not impossible, to name any other performance of a work by this gifted Frenchman so completely satisfying, so exhilarating, and so exhaustive. The audience received it with prolonged applause. The concert was brought to its finish with the fourth symphony of Brahms, a work well chosen to provide restful contrast to the flaming and exciting creation of Ravel. W. J. H.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN
JAN 7 - 1937

A single six-year term for the President will be discussed at the WJZ Town Meeting, and others of interest include Alexander Woollcott's return, Ma and Pa, the Boston symphony, the 10:30 Chicago jamboree, the Royalists, John B. Kennedy, Ralph Lawton with the Hageman symphony (WOR at 8) and the 9:30 WOR Melody Treasure Hunt.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 8 - 1937

Koussevitzky Offers D-Major Clementi Work

Boston Orchestra Plays Symphony Which Exists Intact in Original Form

Music of Grave Beauty

Surpassing Interpretation of Ravel Suite Presented

By Jerome D. Bohm

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. There was a novelty on the program in the shape of a symphony in D major by Muzio Clementi. Like its companion in C major performed here last week by Paul Stassevitch and his orchestra, this work was given in the arrangement of Alfredo Casella.

But unlike the C major symphony, which had to be reconstructed from scattered fragments of the incomplete manuscript, the D major symphony exists in its original form in the Congressional Library in Washington almost intact. Only the introductory measures and the beginning of the first allegro are missing there, and Mr. Casella discovered these missing pages in the British Museum.

Consequently, the composition heard on this occasion was in all respects, both structurally and in its instrumentation, a more authentic example of Clementi's creative activity than the one heard last Wednesday. There were, here and there, indications that Casella had enriched his predecessor's scoring; this was most apparent at the close of the final movement. But there was little to offend the purist in whatever emendations had been undertaken.

This D major symphony is a worthwhile addition to the orchestral repertoire. The introductory andante sostenuto is music of grave beauty and the following allegro vivace contains a romantic episode which might easily have stemmed from the pen of Weber. The Larhetto is more Mozartean in character and of a thoroughly disarming naivete. The menuet is strikingly original in form and the syncopated theme of the finale is forcefully developed. The performance was a highly stimulating one.

The ensuing offering, the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," is one of Mr. Koussevitzky's most celebrated interpretations, and both he and his great orchestra excelled themselves in setting it forth on this occasion. For sheer magnificence of tone and virtuosity this was an unsurpassable achievement.

The evening was brought to a close with the fourth symphony in E minor of Brahms. Here again, the ear was ravished by the unfailing vibrant warmth and transparency of the orchestral texture. But more than this, Mr. Koussevitzky gave us the essential Brahms. Never has the final passacaglia, which contains some of the composer's most overwhelming utterances sounded more impressive. The audience, which occupied every available seat, was justly highly demonstrative in its expressions of appreciation.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

PHILHARMONIC PLAYS TONIGHT

Conductor congratulated for presenting Bruckner

Lajos Shuk, conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, which will give the first Buffalo performance of the Bruckner Third Symphony this evening at 8.30 o'clock in Elmwood Music Hall, has been receiving congratulatory letters on his enterprise.

The Bruckner Society of America, which numbers among its members such distinguished musicians as Artur Bodansky, Serge Koussevitsky, Arturo Toscanini, Fritz Reiner, Otto Klemperer, Bruno Walter and William Mengelberg, most of whom have given Bruckner performances has written to Mr. Shuk, expressing an interest in this performance and its results.

A letter has also been received from F. W. Riesberg of the Musical Courier, congratulating Mr. Shuk on taking the opportunity of making this work familiar to a Buffalo audience. While European audiences and those in the larger American cities long have acclaimed Bruckner, there are many others which have had little or no opportunity of hearing his music. The Germans have celebrated him in Bach, Beethoven and Bruckner festivals.

In the United States, when Bruckner has been played, he has been liked. The press reports confirm this.

155

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 7 - 1937

Philharmonic In Mid-Week Series Finale

John Barbirolli Conducts Unfamiliar Concertos of Vivaldi and Pergolesi

Bruno Labate Soloist

Same Numbers Tomorrow EndAfternoon Programs

By Francis D. Perkins

John Barbirolli conducted his last concert of the season for the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra's mid-week evening subscribers last night in Carnegie Hall. The program with which he will also bid farewell tomorrow to the Friday afternoon Philharmonic patrons began with an unfamiliar concerto for strings in E minor by Antonio Vivaldi and continued with the first performance of a concerto for oboe and strings composed by Mr. Barbirolli on themes by another memorable Italian musician of Vivaldi's time, Giovanni Battista Pergolesi. Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" and Brahms's second symphony completed the well-diversified list. The soloist of the evening was the Society's incomparable first oboist, Bruno Labate.

Regarding the concerto, Mr. Barbirolli explained in a program note that the idea of constructing this work occurred to him the summer before last, while he was looking over various compositions by Pergolesi. Finding some of the melodies of that short-lived genius suitable for the oboe, he saw the possibility of adding simultaneously both to the limited list of available works for oboe solo, and to the public's opportunity for acquaintance with Pergolesi's music.

Third Movement Best Known

Of the four movements, the first comes from Pergolesi's "stabat Mater" and the melody of the third is the best-known of his songs, "Se tu m'ami." The others are drown from a set of twelve sonatas originally written for two violins and bass.

In doing this the Philharmonic's new permanent conductor has earned the thanks of all good symphonic oboists and also of their hearers, both because of the essential poetic charm of the melodies themselves and because of the taste and discretion of the string accompaniment he has devised for them with faithfulness to their style and atmosphere. Most patrons of song recitals know "Se tu m'ami," but the melody from the "Stabat Mater," with its long-breathed, plangent eloquence, unfamiliar to most of its hearers, proved exceptionally well suited to the characteristic color and timber of the solo instrument. Mr. Labate gave a highly laudable performance, marked by artistry of style and phrasing, and was warmly applauded by an audience that probably was inclined to agree with Mr. Barbirolli's statement that the world of music had suffered an untimely loss when Pergolesi died at the age of twenty-six.

Vivaldi Concerto Played in '26

The Vivaldi concerto, edited by A. Mistowski, is new to the Philharmonic repertoire, but was played here in March, 1926, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The form can be regarded as that of the concerto grosso, with three leaders of the string choirs as the solo group. With the contrast of two spirited allegros and an adagio of marked beauty, and the fertility of melodic invention which characterized the early eighteenth century red-headed Venetian composer, it seemed to merit hearings at more frequent intervals than once a decade. The performance was sonorous, while praiseworthy for clarity and polish, and there were plaudits for Mishel Piastro, the concertmaster, and the solo violist and cellest, Zolten Kurthy and Josef Schuster.

The reading of the Ravel rhapsody did not lack for color or effectiveness; the "Feria," with marked contrasts of pace and a high-spirited close, sometimes suggested incomplete clarity of detail in a generally praiseworthy orchestral performance, but the Habanera, interpreted with unusual subtlety in instrumental hues, volume and variations of pace, had an exceptional imaginative appeal. Mr. Barbirolli will make his two final appearances of the season next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, with John Corigliano, assistant concert master of the orchestra, and the English two-piano team composed of Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson as the respective soloists.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 8 - 1937

Society

Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe will entertain at tea this afternoon at her home on Prospect street for the Friends of the Boston Symphony to meet Mr. Edward A. Taft of Boston. Mr. Taft, a member of the Symphony Board, will tell about the drawings of each member of the orchestra done by George De Forest Brush.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 8 - 1937

Dinner Parties to Be Given Preceding Second Symphony Concert at Academy Tonight

There will be many dinner parties this evening prior to the second of the season's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the Academy of Music. Richard Burgin will conduct and Albert Spalding, violionist, will be the soloist.

Miss Marion Ingersoll, daughter of Borough President and Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll of 380 Clinton Ave. will entertain at a buffet supper at her parents' home for a group of girls from Packer Collegiate Institute who later will attend the concert. The guests will be the Misses Janice and June Baker, Sally Sloan, Marion Carpenter, Lillian Kraus, Jean McMurray, Janet Hulburt, Kathleen Barron and Dorothy Bristow.

Miss Elizabeth Truslow whose engagement to Thomas Melvill Pope has been announced by her parents, Dr. and Mrs. Walter Truslow, will be honored by them at a dinner party at their home, 11 Schermerhorn St., prior to the concert. The guests will include Col. and Mrs. Allan Melvill Pope, Miss Polly Pope and John Truslow. They will occupy a box at the Academy of Music.

Rear Admiral and Mrs. Harris M. Laning will entertain at dinner for their box guests, Mrs. Ralston Holmes, Miss Sally Holmes and Miss Hester Laning.

Mrs Frederick B. Pratt's box guests will be Mr. and Mrs. Luke Vincent Lockwood and Mr. and Mrs. Philip N. Youtz.

The Misses Mary and Katherine Bennett will be guests of their mother, Mrs. Joseph A. Bennett in her box. Dr. and Mrs. Frank L. Babbott and Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives also will occupy boxes.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 8 - 1937

PARTIES FOR CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dinners Will Be Given Tonight Preceding Second in the Brooklyn Season.

A notable audience is expected this evening at the second of five concerts in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifty-first season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Richard Burgin, assistant conductor and concert master, will conduct. Albert Spalding, violinist, will appear as soloist with the orchestra.

Mrs. Charles W. Franklin will be hostess in the committee box and will have as her guests Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Dr. and Mrs. Charles C. Leiv, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Rogers Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport and Mr. Franklin.

Rear Admiral and Mrs. Harris M. Laning will give a dinner party for their box guests before the concert. Their guests will be Mrs. Ralston Holmes and Miss Sally Holmes and Miss Hester Laning.

Dr. and Mrs. Walter Truslow will give a dinner at their home, 11 Schermerhorn Street, in honor of their daughter, Miss Elizabeth Truslow, whose engagement to Thomas Pope has been announced. Other guests wil be Colonel and Mrs. Allan Melville Pope, Miss Polly Pope and John Truslow. Later they will attend the concert in the Truslow box.

Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt will have as her box guests Mr. and Mrs. Luke Vincent Lockwood and Mr. and Mrs. Philip N. Youtz.

With Mrs. Joseph A. Bennett in her box will be the Misses Mary and Catherine Bennett. Other boxholders include Dr. and Mrs. Frank L. Babbot and Mrs. Robert F. Ives.

The concerts are under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and the Brooklyn committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman.

Clementi Symphony Is Heard

N. Y. Sun Jan. 8/37

Performance by Bostonians Is First Heard Here of Lost Composition.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening began with a number of special interest. This was a symphony in D major by Muzio Clementi, the eminent Italian composer who passed most of his life in England and whose sonatas won the admiration of Beethoven.

The symphony, however, had been lost for nearly a century after the composer's death and came to light only when the possessions of Dr. William H. Cummings, a musicologist deceased in 1917, were put on the market. But all the Clementi manuscripts left by him were in a sad state of disorder. When they were sold some of them were acquired for the Library of Congress through the enlightened efforts of Carl Engel, editor of the Musical Quarterly. The one heard last evening had been edited, some missing portions found and restored and the whole reorchestrated to impart the fullness demanded by the contemporaneous ear, by Alfredo Cassella, the distinguished Italian composer and musical scholar.

The work was lately produced by the Boston organization in its home town and was heard last night for the first time here. It is well worth the pains that were bestowed upon it. The symphony is no subservient copy of the idioms of its time, though in general outline and structure it follows the conventional symphony of the beginning of the nineteenth century. But Clementi had melodic invention of his own, a fresh and ingratiating style, no small degree of fancy, and a notable firmness in design. His music proved to be decidedly pleasing and compared favorably with the secondary creations of a period in which Haydn and Mozart works still were in the van of the procession and Beethoven had given the world the mighty "Eroica." Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it with evident satisfaction and accomplished a performance delightful in its simplicity and directness of style and in its high level of technical finish.

It was, however, in the second number that he and his musicians demonstrated what a modern orchestra can do in the way of virtuosity. The number was the second "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet suite of Ravel. This score is a bewildering piece of orchestration, gorgeous in its infinite variety of instrumental tints and opulent in its pictorial splendors. The Boston men played it magnificently. In richness, luminosity, subtle and almost inexplicable gradations, in perfection of balance, in flawlessness of articulation and magic of tonal blending, it was beyond description.

Mr. Koussevitzky's appreciation of the style and methods of the composer was authoritative and it would be difficult, if not impossible, to name any other performance of a work by this gifted Frenchman so completely satisfying, so exhilarating, and so exhaustive. The audience received it with prolonged applause. The concert was brought to its finish with the fourth symphony of Brahms, a work well chosen to provide restful contrast to the flaming and exciting creation of Ravel. W. J. H.

Films Held Over a Week.

Films continuing their runs include "That Girl From Paris" at the Radio City Music Hall; "Great Guy," at the Criterion; "Beloved Enemy," at the Rivoli; "Lloyds of London," at the Astor; "After the Thin Man," at the Capitol; "Janosik," at the Filmarte; "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town," at the Little Carnegie; "Slalom," at the Fifty-fifth Street Playhouse; "Yiddle With His Fiddle," at the Ambassador; "College Holiday," at the Paramount; "Der Bettelstudent," at the Eighty-sixth Street Garden Theater, and "One in a Million," at the Roxy.

"Caruso," based on a play by Burnet Hershey and Lyon Mearson, will e first production of the newly

NEW N.
SUN
JAN 8 - 1937

Clementi Symphony Is Heard

Performance by Bostonians Is First Heard Here of Lost Composition.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening began with a number of special interest. This was a symphony in D major by Muzio Clementi, the eminent Italian composer who passed most of his life in England and whose sonatas won the admiration of Beethoven.

The symphony, however, had been lost for nearly a century after the composer's death and came to light only when the possessions of Dr. William H. Cummings, a musicologist deceased in 1917, were put on the market. But all the Clementi manuscripts left by him were in a sad state of disorder. When they were sold some of them were acquired for the Library of Congress through the enlightened efforts of Carl Engel, editor of the Musical Quarterly. The one heard last evening had been edited, some missing portions found and restored and the whole reorchestrated to impart the fullness demanded by the contemporaneous ear, by Alfredo Cassella, the distinguished Italian composer and musical scholar.

The work was lately produced by the Boston organization in its home town and was heard last night for the first time here. It is well worth the pains that were bestowed upon it. The symphony is no subservient copy of the idioms of its time, though in general outline and structure it follows the conventional symphony of the beginning of the nineteenth century. But Clementi had melodic invention of his own, a fresh and ingratiating style, no small degree of fancy, and a notable firmness in design. His music proved to be decidedly pleasing and compared favorably with the secondary creations of a period in which Haydn and Mozart works still were in the van of the procession and Beethoven had given the world the mighty "Eroica." Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it with evident satisfaction and accomplished a performance delightful in its simplicity and directness of style and in its high level of technical finish.

It was, however, in the second number that he and his musicians demonstrated what a modern orchestra can do in the way of virtuosity. The number was the second "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet suite of Ravel. This score is a bewildering piece of orchestration, gorgeous in its infinite variety of instrumental tints and opulent in its pictorial splendors. The Boston men played it magnificently. In richness, luminosity, subtle and almost inexplicable gradations, in perfection of balance, in flawlessness of articulation and magic of tonal blending, it was beyond description.

Mr. Koussevitzky's appreciation of the style and methods of the composer was authoritative and it would be difficult, if not impossible, to name any other performance of a work by this gifted Frenchman so completely satisfying, so exhilarating, and so exhaustive. The audience received it with prolonged applause. The concert was brought to its finish with the fourth symphony of Brahms, a work well chosen to provide restful contrast to the flaming and exciting creation of Ravel. W. J. H.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN
JAN 7 - 1937

A single six-year term for the President will be discussed at the WJZ Town Meeting, and others of interest include Alexander Woollcott's return, Ma and Pa, the Boston symphony, the 10:30 Chicago jamboree, the Royalists, John B. Kennedy, Ralph Lawton with the Hageman symphony (WOR at 8) and the 9:30 WOR Melody Treasure Hunt.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 8 - 1937

Koussevitzky Offers D-Major Clementi Work

Boston Orchestra Plays Symphony Which Exists Intact in Original Form

Music of Grave Beauty

Surpassing Interpretation of Ravel Suite Presented

By Jerome D. Bohm

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. There was a novelty on the program in the shape of a symphony in D major by Muzio Clementi. Like its companion in C major performed here last week by Paul Stassevitch and his orchestra, this work was given in the arrangement of Alfredo Casella.

But unlike the C major symphony, which had to be reconstructed from scattered fragments of the incomplete manuscript, the D major symphony exists in its original form in the Congressional Library in Washington almost intact. Only the introductory measures and the beginning of the first allegro are missing there, and Mr. Casella discovered these missing pages in the British Museum.

Consequently, the composition heard on this occasion was in all respects, both structurally and in its instrumentation, a more authentic example of Clementi's creative activity than the one heard last Wednesday. There were, here and there, indications that Casella had enriched his predecessor's scoring; this was most apparent at the close of the final movement. But there was little to offend the purist in whatever emendations had been undertaken.

This D major symphony is a worthwhile addition to the orchestral repertoire. The introductory andante sostenuto is music of grave beauty and the following allegro vivace contains a romantic episode which might easily have stemmed from the pen of Weber. The Larhetto is more Mozartean in character and of a thoroughly disarming naivete. The menuet is strikingly original in form and the syncopated theme of the finale is forcefully developed. The performance was a highly stimulating one.

The ensuing offering, the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," is one of Mr. Koussevitzky's most celebrated interpretations, and both he and his great orchestra excelled themselves in setting it forth on this occasion. For sheer magnificence of tone and virtuosity this was an unsurpassable achievement.

The evening was brought to a close with the fourth symphony in E minor of Brahms. Here again, the ear was ravished by the unfailing vibrant warmth and transparency of the orchestral texture. But more than this, Mr. Koussevitzky gave us the essential Brahms. Never has the final passacaglia, which contains some of the composer's most overwhelming utterances sounded more impressive. The audience, which occupied every available seat, was justly highly demonstrative in its expressions of appreciation.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

PHILHARMONIC PLAYS TONIGHT

Conductor congratulated for presenting Bruckner

Lajos Shuk, conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, which will give the first Buffalo performance of the Bruckner Third Symphony this evening at 8.30 o'clock in Elmwood Music Hall, has been receiving congratulatory letters on his enterprise.

The Bruckner Society of America, which numbers among its members such distinguished musicians as Artur Bodansky, Serge Koussevitsky, Arturo Toscanini, Fritz Reiner, Otto Klemperer, Bruno Walter and William Mengelberg, most of whom have given Bruckner performances has written to Mr. Shuk, expressing an interest in this performance and its results.

A letter has also been received from F. W. Riesberg of the Musical Courier, congratulating Mr. Shuk on taking the opportunity of making this work familiar to a Buffalo audience. While European audiences and those in the larger American cities long have acclaimed Bruckner, there are many others which have had little or no opportunity of hearing his music. The Germans have celebrated him in Bach, Beethoven and Bruckner festivals.

In the United States, when Bruckner has been played, he has been liked. The press reports confirm this.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 8 - 1937

Music of the Day

By B. H. HAGGIN

'Flying Dutchman' Revived at Metropolitan in Excellent Production — Koussevitzky Conducts Clementi Symphony

Wagner's early romantic opera, "The Flying Dutchman," was given at the Metropolitan yesterday afternoon for the first time in five years or so, the performance being a benefit for the Florence Crittenton League. The production is a fine one, compounded of much the same elements as combined to produce this season's "Walkuere" and "Tristan."

There is, to begin with, the cast—and this despite the weakness introduced by the impaired singing of Friedrich Schorr as the Dutchman. For there are, on the other hand, Charles Kullman, exhibiting impressive vocal and dramatic powers in the role of Erik; Kerstin Thorborg, excellent as Mary; Emanuel List, not in his best voice yesterday as Daland; but above all, dwarfing all excellences and reducing defects to insignificance, Kirsten Flagstad as Senta, charmingly un[redacted]like in the role of a young girl, and producing yesterday, when she had sung a while, those tones that one cannot believe are of a human throat.

In addition, there is the playing of the orchestra, the singing of the chorus. There is the musical ensemble into which these elements are welded, exhibiting a precision in which one hears evidence of Atur Bodanzky's careful preparation and control. And there is evidence of similar care on the part of Leopold Sachse in the well co-ordinated stage direction and lighting.

But as before in the case of "Samson et Dalila," so now one must regret that all this talent and effort and care, which might have gone into a production of one of the master works that are lamentably missing from the Metropolitan's repertory, has gone, instead, into a demonstration of a fact in musical history—the fact that Wagner's second opera is not without flashes of imaginative and musical power, but is on the whole a stodgy, immature work. Facts of this sort it is enough to know in the abstract; all that concrete experience can do is to provide a dull afternoon.

Boston Symphony

Making its second visit of the season to this neighborhood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Carnegie Hall last night. Serge Koussevitzky conducted, seemingly in full possession of his faculties and powers.

The concert began with the Symphony in D major by Muzio Clementi, about which there was an excited news item from Boston in the papers recently. "This symphony," wrote John N. Burk in the notes for last night's concert, "was first performed in London in 1819. . . . It disappeared, together with the other symphonies of Clementi's maturer years, at the composer's death. The manuscript of this symphony (and three others) turned up in London in 1917. They were acquired by the Library of Congress at Washington. Alfredo Casella has restored the symphonies in D major and in C major for publication and performance. In the case of the D major symphony he has been able by careful piecing together to preserve the original orchestration and notation virtually intact." And Mr. Burk concluded with the statement of Mr. Casella that "a fundamentally classic spirit, severely trained, and the possesor of a truly exceptional constructive and polyphonic technique, Clementi in these symphonies aims visibly to renew the great classic heredity with the new aspirations of the century. And this profoundly Italian genius happily achieves this synthesis. In these works we find a new and more potent assertion of the music, at once grandiose and witty, tragic but more often serene, of his best piano sonatas."

This is not the first time we have heard about a classic spirit and a profound Italian genius renewing the great classic heredity with the new aspirations of a century. Nor is it the first time that this language has turned out, with a hearing of the music, to be pretentious nonsense.

Having made an antiquarian gesture, Mr. Koussevitzky felt free to indulge himself in such familiar matters as the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" and Brahms' Fourth Symphony. Familiar, too, were his miraculous performance of Ravel's music and the qualities of his performance of Brahms' symphony. The first movement he makes too light-footed; the second he takes in the tempo of the third movement of the Second Symphony—that is, Allegretto—when every measure cries out for the pre-

'Der Fliegende Hollaender'

Romantic opera in three acts. Book and music by Richard Wagner. Artur Bodanzky, conductor. Leopold Sachse, stage manager.

Senta	Kirsten Flagstad
Mary	Kerstin Thorborg
The Dutchman	Friedrich Schorr
Erik	Charles Kullman
Daland	Emanuel List
A Steersman	Hans Clemens

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 8 - 1937

Boston Symphony Concert Tonight To Be Preceded by Many Dinners; Program Is Second in Series

The second of five concerts in the Boston Symphony's Orchestra's fifty-first borough season, to be given to-night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, will be preceded by many dinner parties. Richard Burgin, assistant conductor and concert master, will conduct the program, which will include the appearance of Albert Spalding, violinist, as soloist.

Mrs. Charles W. Franklin, hostess in the committe box, will have as her guests: Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Dr. and Mrs. Charles C. Levi, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Rogers, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport and Mr. Franklin.

Rear Admiral and Mrs. Harris M. Laning will give a dinner party for their box guests before the concert. In their party will be: Mrs. Ralston Holmes and Miss Sally Holmes and Miss Hester Laning.

Dr. and Mrs. Walter Truslow will give a dinner at their home, No. 11 Schermerhorn street, in honor of their daughter Miss Elizabeth Truslow, whose engagement to Thomas Pope has been announced. Other guests will be: Colonel and Mrs. Alan Melville Pope, Miss Polly Pope and John Truslow. Later they will attend the concert in the Truslow box.

Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt will have as her box guests Mr. and Mrs. Luke Vincent Lockwood and Mr. and Mrs. Philip N. Youtz.

With Mrs. Joseph A. Bennett in her box will be the Misses Mary and Catherine Bennett. Other boxholders include: Dr. and Mrs. Frank L. Babbot and Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives.

The concerts are presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman and the Brooklyn commitee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

JAN 8 - 1937

* * *

The Boston Symphony recently played "Epitaph," a new composition by Vladimir Dukelski, Dukelski is Vernon Duke, who wrote most of the music for "The Show Is On." . . . Theatrical press agents, most of whom never completed their grammar-school courses, are being invited by the University of Pennsylvania faculty to help map out theatrical courses for the young ladies there . . . Le Mirage is following the trend towards dusky entertainment. Ada Ward starts an engagement there Friday . . . One of Broadway's famous and much-imitated dancers is destitute now. Only one season ago he was headlined in the very cafes he visits these nights —borrowing half-dollars to sustain him from day to day.

* * *

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

JAN 8 - 1937

KOUSSEVITZKY SCORES IN CARNEGIE CONCERT

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra last night paid its second visit to Carnegie Hall and tendered a wildly acclaiming, capacity audience an exhibition of orchestral performance unsurpassable today. The concert offered the first local hearing of Muzio Clementi's Symphony No. 2 in D major, the Second Suite of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," and the Brahms Fourth.

The Clementi Symphony is one of two that, after a mysterious interment of over a century, have been exhumed and resuscitated by the zealous labors of Alfred Casella. Finding all but the first few pages of the D major opus in the Library of Congress, he followed a hunch that sent him across the sea to the British Museum where, sure enough, were hibernating the missing fragments. We have Mr. Casella's own word for it that, unlike the C major Symphony (heard here recently), the manuscript of the D major is "complete to the last detail, and entirely ready for performance." It is gratifying to report that Mr. Casella's labors have not been in vain, for the work bids fair to make itself at home in the established orchestral repertoire. It is in spirited classic style, with a freedom and resourcefulness of development that indicate a knowing hand. It has meaty musical substance, often real force of utterance. If it is not the music of another Beethoven—as some have bravely suggested—it may be heard more than once with genuine pleasure. Last night's audience took to it very cordially.

The Ravel came next, and it would be sheer folly to attempt a verbal description of the downright gorgeousness of tone in which it gloried: its myriad hues shifting incessantly, and as subtly tinted as colors refracted from a prism. It was a tone so ductile, so richly sensuous that it seemed almost as if one could feel it with the hand.

Dr. Koussevitzky's Brahms was mettlesome, full-throated and nobly conceived. One might take exception to a rather quick-paced andante moderato, but the reading as a whole was beautifully proportioned by one who saw the work as a single organism whose component parts grew one from the other.

The conclusion of the concert brought an ovation from an assemblage whose enthusiasm increased steadily during the evening. G. G.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 7 - 1937

Dr. Koussevitzky Ill, Stays on Board Train

Although Dr. Serge Koussevitzky came to Hartford with his orchestra yesterday, in preparation for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Bushnell, he did not get off the train, because of illness.

When the train reached this city, he was in bed in his compartment, remained there until he reached New York and immediately retired at his hotel. This afternoon, he was still resting in an effort to recuperate sufficiently to conduct the concert this evening in Carnegie Hall.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEW YORK JOURNAL

JAN 8 - 1937

Boston Orchestra

That superlative orchestra, the Boston Symphony, is here this week for its second visit this season. Mr. Kroussevitzky conducted with his accustomed insight and authority to the vast delight of the distinguished audience gathered at Carnegie Hall.

Whether it be novelty or thrice familiar classic that the Bostonians present, it always means an impeccable performance.

Last evening's concert brought forward an old symphony by Clementi, lost for a hundred years and now restored in quite as romantic a fashion as old paintings once lost, are rediscovered for the world to enjoy.

We are apt to think of Clementi as a nice old professor who died in 1832 at 80 and thus spanned an important age of musical development, and whom music students know best by his inexorable piano studies. But he wrote much fine music of a more human sort; he vied in concert with Mozart, rivalled Haydn and even Beethoven in popularity as a symphonist, and then upon his death many of his later works were lost.

The D major played last evening turned up in 1917 and was acquired by the Library of Congress in Washington. Alfred Casella restored it for publication, performed it in Rome a year ago and it had its first American hearing last month in Boston under Mr. Koussevitsky. It is a vigorous work, rich in harmonic effects, strict in form, and sounded somewhat fuller in scoring than the usual Haydn scoring. It was well liked.

The Boston Orchestra plays in Brooklyn tonight and here again on Saturday afternoon.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 9 - 1937

Symphony Orchestra at Brooklyn Academy

At the Brooklyn Academy of Music last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert to the evident pleasure of a capacity house. Bach's organtoccata in C major, as transcribed for orchestra by Leo Weiner, opened the tripartite program and Kalinnikoff's symphony No. 1, in G minor, concluded it. But what gave particular pleasure was Mozart's violin concerto in D major (K. 218), with Albert Spalding as soloist. This concert was conducted by Richard Burgin, concert-master of the orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 9 - 1937

Boston Symphony List Altered

The program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon in Carnegie Hall will not include Stravinsky's ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee," which was erroneously listed in the announcement of this concert in the music page of last Sunday's issue. Dr. Koussevitzky's revised program consists of Arthur Foote's suite for strings in E major; MacDowell's second piano concerto, with J. M. Sanroma as soloist, and Cesar Franck's symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
Jan. DAILY NEWS 8/37

. . . Musically, the peak of the evening, of course, was the concert of the Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky (WJZ—8:45 to 9:30) . . . a ★★★★ performance . . . The Showboat (WEAF—9 to 10) underwent a

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 8 - 1937

New Symphony Is Heard

Muzio Clementi Work Is Performed in Masterly Fashion by Boston Orchestra.

Under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its second evening appearance of the season yesterday in Carnegie Hall. Offering a tripartite program, consisting of the symphony in D major by Muzio Clementi, as revised by Alfredo Casella, the second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite by Ravel and the fourth symphony of Brahms, the visitors from Boston won the enthusiastic approval of the large audience.

The Clementi symphony, which is one of two that have been restored for publication and performance by the noted Italian composer, Alfredo Casella, received its first local hearing last evening. It had been given its American premiere in Boston last December by the same organization.

Extremely well knit, judiciously and effectively orchestrated and possessing that economy and grace of utterance characteristic not only of Clementi's sonatas, but also of many orchestral works by contemporaries, the work, divided into four shortish movements, had the advantage of a thoroughly communicative interpretation by the admirable Boston forces.

And, as if this had been but a mere beginning, they delivered themselves of a stunning account of the luscious Ravel piece. The precision, the unanimity of expression, the remarkable technic, the perfect blending of tone upon tone by the several choirs, the subtlety of shading and beautifully realized contrasts engaged one's attention so completely as almost to overshadow the actual music, such was the virtuosity of the performance.

It would have been, perhaps, too much to expect a repetition of these matters in the following Brahms symphony. Yet, with the exception of several minor details, as, for instance, a slight inaccuracy in the announcement of the first theme by the violins divisi, or the quasi-lethargic spots that cropped up infrequently enough in the second movement, all these qualities were again in gratifying evidence.

Needless to state, there was a veritable torrent of applause to reward conductor and musicians alike at the conclusion of the concert.

R. C. B.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN

JAN 9 - 1937

Boston Orchestra Offers Premiere Of 1819 Symphony

By GRENA BENNETT.

(Reprinted from Yesterday's late Edition.)

One of the ambitions of every orchestral conductor is to present a novelty in his programs, and last evening Serge Koussevitsky realized this in the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. He began his list with Clementi's D major Symphony, a work with a curious history and which was played here for the first time last night.

Clementi was an Anglicized Italian, born in Rome in 1752, died in London in 1832 and was famous as a composer, pianist and piano manufacturer.

The symphony had its initial performance in London in 1819 and after that the manuscript was lost sight of for almost a century. Through an unchronicled circumstance it turned up in 1917 in the British Capital, was brought to this country and acquired by the Library of Congress in Washington. In the form that it was presented last evening, it owes much to the able restoration and revision made by Alfred Casella, Italian composer.

The symphony is a charming and mellifluous work following the classic style and frequently resembles both the melodic invention and development favored by Beethoven. The orchestration is ornate and homogeneous and proved an excellent vehicle for the display of the splendid ensemble work of the instrumentalists. Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting was meticulous in its designation of cues and emphases and the performance was one of superlative merit.

Later in the evening the orchestra was heard in excerpts from Ravel's "Daphis et Chloe" Ballet Suite and Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

* * *

"Rigoletto" was repeated at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening with the same cast, with one exception, that was heard at its earlier performance. Frederick Jagel again sang the role of the Duke, substituting for Nino Martini, who was scheduled to appear. Except for Irra Petina, who sang Maddalena instead of Bruno Castagna, who is still indisposed, the leading roles were in familiar hands.

N. Y. Post - Jan. 8/37

KOUSSEVITZKY SCORES IN CARNEGIE CONCERT

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra last night paid its second visit to Carnegie Hall and tendered a wildly acclaiming, capacity audience an exhibition of orchestral performance unsurpassable today. The concert offered the first local hearing of Muzio Clementi's Symphony No. 2 in D major, the Second Suite of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," and the Brahms Fourth.

The Clementi Symphony is one of two that, after a mysterious interment of over a century, have been exhumed and resuscitated by the zealous labors of Alfred Casella. Finding all but the first few pages of the D major opus in the Library of Congress, he followed a hunch that sent him across the sea to the British Museum where, sure enough, were hibernating the missing fragments. We have Mr. Casella's own word for it that, unlike the C major Symphony (heard here recently), the manuscript of the D major is "complete to the last detail, and entirely ready for performance." It is gratifying to report that Mr. Casella's labors have not been in vain, for the work bids fair to make itself at home in the established orchestral repertoire. It is in spirited classic style, with a freedom and resourcefulness of development that indicate a knowing hand. It has meaty musical substance, often real force of utterance. If it is not the music of another Beethoven—as some have bravely suggested—it may be heard more than once with genuine pleasure. Last night's audience took to it very cordially.

The Ravel came next, and it would be sheer folly to attempt a verbal description of the downright gorgeousness of tone in which it gloried: its myriad hues shifting incessantly, and as subtly tinted as colors refracted from a prism. It was a tone so ductile, so richly sensuous that it seemed almost as if one could feel it with the hand.

Dr. Koussevitzky's Brahms was mettlesome, full-throated and nobly conceived. One might take exception to a rather quick-paced andante moderato, but the reading as a whole was beautifully proportioned by one who saw the work as a single organism whose component parts grew one from the other.

The conclusion of the concert brought an ovation from an assemblage whose enthusiasm increased steadily during the evening. G. G.

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS

JAN 9 - 1937

MITROPOULOS IS BOSTON SYMPHONY GUEST CONDUCTOR

BOSTON, Jan. 8—(AP)—Dimitri Mitropoulos, Athenian conductor, arrived here today to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the next two weeks, during the mid-winter vacation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

He was guest conductor of the orchestra a year ago also, becoming the first Greek to direct an American Symphonic orchestra. He will begin rehearsals Monday, particularly of his new arrangements for a familiar air from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas," and Beethoven's string quartet in C-sharp minor.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 9 - 1937

GREEK CONDUCTOR ARRIVES

Boston, Jan. 8.—(AP)—Dimitri Mitropoulos, Athenian conductor, arrived here today to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the next two weeks, during the mid-winter vacation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. He was guest conductor of the orchestra a year ago also, becoming the first Greek to direct an American symphony orchestra. He will begin rehearsals Monday.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 8 - 1937

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AT CARNEGIE HAL

Serge Koussevitzky Conduct Program That Includes a Suite by Ravel.

CLEMENTI WORK IS GIVE

Symphony in D Major, Only O Existing as Written, Heard Here for First Time.

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, returned last night to Carnegie Hall and to an audience that applauded and cheered the magnificent performances. The sheer splendor, fullness and brilliancy of the orchestral tone would have been enough to have delighted connoisseurs, outside of qualities of masterly interpretation.

The orchestra played, let us say, with a certain precision of intonation, a perfect balance, a fusion of all the rich colors of the palette only to be obtained by an organization of the very highest technical development, presided over by a conductor who has proved himself beyond refutation a superlative virtuoso and musician.

The program was again testimony to Mr. Koussevitzky's eclecticism and it tested him in many facets of his art. It began with the first New York performance of Clementi D major symphony. THE TIMES, when the symphony in C major by the same composer was played here recently, told the involved and curious tale of the scores of four Clementi symphonies which arrived by long and roundabout ways at the Library of Congress in Washington, the pages of two of these works to be assembled and pieced together two years ago by Alfredo Casella. The symphony heard last night is the only one of these four works which exists exactly as Clementi wrote it.

Received With Satisfaction

The symphony was received with much satisfaction and with surprise by many musicians who had thought of Clementi as the composer of the "Gradus" and of innumerable sonatas but not as a symphonist who was rated by many as second only to Haydn and Mozart in his lifetime. And it was felt that Clementi had something of his own to say, that was not Mozart or Haydn, or mere derivation from any other composer. This "novelty" was an original and fortunate departure in program making.

The performance of Ravel's Second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe," for sheer virtuoso and élan, and for the most sympathetic and distinguished treatment of the music, stands by itself. It is one of the chefs d'oeuvres of the conductor and his unsurpassed band. It is in one sense regrettable that no other leader and no other orchestra heard in New York in twelve years has done this particular work in this particularly brilliant and beautiful way, and it is reasonable to remark that if this performance of the "Daphnis and Chloe" music has not been heard, the composition can hardly be fully valued.

This is in the best sense a show piece for modern orchestras, and it offers two different and contrasting effects, in the slow and the fast movements. The first is the effect that accompanies that of sunrise on the ballet stage, and it is a passage of fabulously beautiful sonorities. The fusion of the different choirs in this place and the glow of the brass that underlies the flowing figures of the wind instruments is a sheer tonal satisfaction past the description. Nor is the splendor of the tone less conspicuous than its remarkable clarity and the precision of each instrumental detail.

Whirl of Color at End

The Bacchanale at the end is a whirl of color and scintillation, but never, at any moment, is there the slightest suggestion of a loss of accent or of an ugly or forced tone. It may be that the day of the most brilliant orchestration has passed—that we are, indeed, moving in the direction of a certain neoclassic clearness and simplicity of tint. However taste may change, this score of a Ravel is a monument to the orchestral colorist's resources of the early twentieth century.

The Brahms Fourth Symphony came last, and it was read in the virile and Brahmsian fashion. Some times a conductor emphasizes one aspect of a work he interprets, some times another, and every interpreter of authority and sincerity will find nuances of his own in a given masterpiece. The reflective and even pessimistic aspects of this symphony, with its wonderful autumnal coloring, are paramount with certain interpretations.

Last night Mr. Koussevitzky presented the symphony with unusual ruggedness, power and formal cohesion. In places where he could easily have been tempted to wander somewhat from the tradition, or to interpose special colorings, he not only refrained from doing so, but emphasized the objectivity of the music, its structural line and its vigorous masculinity. By so much was the Gothic quality of certain pages the more plainly manifested.

This was a conycert of superlative deeds, from an orchestra that has never been in finer form than this season, and a conductor who constantly shows new aspects of his art.

Hartford Times

Jan. 7/37

Dr. Koussevitzky Ill, Stays on Board Train

Although Dr. Serge Koussevitzky came to Hartford with his orchestra yesterday, in preparation for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Bushnell, he did not get off the train, because of illness.

When the train reached this city, he was in bed in his compartment, remained there until he reached New York and immediately retired at his hotel. This afternoon, he was still resting in an effort to recuperate sufiiciently to conduct the concert this evening in Carnegie Hall.

News of Music

Clementi's Symphony in C major, companion piece to the D major that was played for the first times in America recently by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky, will be presented by an orchestra under Paul Stassevitch in Town Hall, New York, on Dec. 30—also an American premiere.

Gaspar Cassado, the eminent Spanish 'cellist, made his first appearances with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society last week to great acclaim, both from the reviewers and the audiences. He chose, for the occasion of his debut on Thursday night, the Haydn D major Concerto. On Saturday night he presented his arrangement of the Weber Concerto in the same key. All of the reviews at hand speak of the 'cellist in terms of high praise. In addition, Samuel Chotzinoff goes to some length to describe the evident pleasure Cassado takes in his "work."

Another 'cellist of the first class, Emanuel Feuermann, gave a recital in Manhattan at about the same time, presenting, for novel work, a 'cello sonata by Hindemith. This Sonata, according to O. T. in the New York Sun, is not of the later Hindemith, the Hindemith, that is, of "Mathis der Maler." It is "cryptic and at times harsh." It "crowds five short movements into the space of perhaps two of a traditional sonata. But the designation, sonata, is here to be construed in the older sense, the movements taking on the character of those of a suite, though not of dance suggestion."

New Symphony Is Heard

N. Y. Telegram — Jan. 8/37

Muzio Clementi Work Is Performed in Masterly Fashion by Boston Orchestra.

Under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its second evening appearance of the season yesterday in Carnegie Hall. Offering a tripartite program, consisting of the symphony in D major by Muzio Clementi, as revised by Alfredo Casella, the second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite by Ravel and the fourth symphony of Brahms, the visitors from Boston won the enthusiastic approval of the large audience.

The Clementi symphony, which is one of two that have been restored for publication and performance by the noted Italian composer, Alfredo Casella, received its first local hearing last evening. It had been given its American premiere in Boston last December by the same organization.

Extremely well knit, judiciously and effectively orchestrated and possessing that economy and grace of utterance characteristic not only of Clementi's sonatas, but also of many orchestral works by contemporaries, the work, divided into four shortish movements, had the advantage of a thoroughly communicative interpretation by the admirable Boston forces.

And, as if this had been but a mere beginning, they delivered themselves of a stunning account of the luscious Ravel piece. The precision, the unanimity of expression, the remarkable technic, the perfect blending of tone upon tone by the several choirs, the subtlety of shading and beautifully realized contrasts engaged one's attention so completely as almost to overshadow the actual music, such was the virtuosity of the performance.

It would have been, perhaps, too much to expect a repetition of these matters in the following Brahms symphony. Yet, with the exception of several minor details, as, for instance, a slight inaccuracy in the announcement of the first theme by the violins divisi, or the quasi-lethargic spots that cropped up infrequently enough in the second movement, all these qualities were again in gratifying evidence.

Needless to state, there was a veritable torrent of applause to reward conductor and musicians alike at the conclusion of the concert.

R. C. B.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 9 - 1937

Second Boston Symphony Concert Given Last Evening at Academy; Parties Given Before Event

The second of the five concerts of the Brooklyn season of the Boston Symphonyq Orchestra took place last evening at the Academy of Music and was attended by a large audience. The concerts are under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and the Brooklyn commitee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman. The conductor of the concert was Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor of the orchestra. Albert Spalding, the great American violinist, was the guest artist.

Many entertained last evening at the concert and at dinner parties before the event.

Mrs. Charles W. Franklin was the hostess in the committee box and her guests included Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Dr. and Mrs. Charles C. Leib, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Rogers Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, and Mr. Franklin.

Also entertaining in boxes last night were Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Dr. and Mrs. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Robert F. Ives, Mrs. Joseph A. Bennett and Rear Admiral Harris Laning, comadant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

In Admiral Laning's box were Mrs. Laning, Mrs. Ralston Holmes and Miss Sally Holmes, wife and daughter of Admiral Holmes who are sailing for Europe today, and Miss Hester Laning. Mrs. Laning was the hostess at a dinner party preceding the concert.

Dr. and Mrs. Truslow also entertained at a dinner party at their home, 11 Schermerhorn St., in honor of their daughter, Miss Elizabeth Truslow, whose engagement to Thomas Pope was announced recently. Guests at the dinner party and the box were: Col. and Mrs. Allan Melville Pope, Miss Polly Pope, Miss Truslow, Mr. Pope and John Truslow.

Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt entertained Mr. and Mrs. Luke Vincent Lockwood and Mr. and Mrs. Philip N. Youtz in her box party. Occupying the box with Mrs. Bennett were the Misses Mary and Catherine Bennett.

Occupying the seats assigned to the Junior League of Brooklyn through the Junior League committee of which Miss Virginia Marvin is chairman, were: Miss Mary Thayer, Miss Arrietta Smith, Miss Harriet Underwood, Miss Catherine Recknagel, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Ormond Gove, Mrs. Carson Brevoort, Miss Catherine Van Brunt, Miss Louise A. Wilson, Mrs. Tracy Voorhees and the Misses Louise and Emily Goetze.

Members of the Junior League committee include: Miss Marvin, Miss Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz Randolph, Miss Louise Goetze, Miss Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer, Miss Van Brunt and Miss Edith Warren.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JAN 8 - 1937

Society Attends Second Boston Symphony Concert At Academy of Music

A notable audience last night filled the Academy of Music for the second of the five concerts of the Brooklyn season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is prresident of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

Mrs. Charles W. Franklin was the hostess in the committee box and her guests included Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Dr. and Mrs. Charles C. Leib, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Rogers, jr., Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport and Mr. Franklin.

Also entertaining in boxes last night were Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Dr. and Mrs. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Robert F. Ives, Mrs. Joseph A. Bennett and Rear Admiral Harris Laning, commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

The conductor of the evening was Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor of the orchestra. Mr. Burgin's skill with the baton was warmly applauded by the large audience. Albert Spalding, the great American violinist, gave a brilliant performance of Mozart's Concerto in D Major, K. No. 218. The concert opened with Bach's Toccata in C Major for organ, as arranged for the orchestra by Leo Weiner. The Toccata consists of a prelude, adagio and fugue The closing number was the Spmphony No. 1 in G Minor by Basil Kalinnikov, 1856-1901, the modern Russian composer.

In Admiral Laning's box were Mrs. Laning, Mrs. Ralston Holmes and Miss Sally Holmes, wife and daughter of Admiral Holmes who are sailing for Europe today, and Miss Hester Laning. Mrs. Laning was the hostess at a dinner party preceding the concert.

Dr. and Mrs. Truslow also entertained at a dinner party at their home, 11 Schermerhorn st., in honor of their daughter, Miss Elizabeth Truslow, whose engagement to Thomas Pope was announced recently. Guests at the dinner party and the box were: Col. and Mrs. Allan Melville Pope, Miss Polly Pope, Miss Truslow, Mr. Pope and John Truslow. Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt entertained Mr. and Mrs. Luke Vincent Lockwood and Mr. and Mrs. Philip N. Youtz in her box party. Occupying the box with Mrs. Bennett were the Misses Mary and Catherine Bennett.

Occupying the seats assigned to the Junior League of Brooklyn through the Junior League Committee of which Miss Virginia Marvin is chairman were Miss Mary Thayer, Miss Arietta Smith, Miss Harriet Underwood, Miss Catherine Recknagel, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Ormond Gove, Mrs. Carson Brevoort, Miss Catherine Van Brunt, Miss Louise A. Wilson, Mrs. Tracy Voorhees and the Misses Louise and Emily Goetze.

Members of the Junior League Committee include: Miss Marvin, Miss Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz Randolph, Miss Louise Goetze, Miss Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer, Miss Van Brunt and Miss Edith Warren.

Taking an active part in furthering the interest of the only series of symphony concerts given by a major orchestra in Brooklyn are the following committee chairmen: Mrs. Edward C. Blum, chairman of boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, membership committee of the Brooklyn Committee, and Miss Virginia Marvin, chairman of the Junior League Committee.

* * *

158

WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

JAN 9 1937

Civic Association Concert Monday

Two Petite Young Artists Will Give Program

By INEZ M. EAMES

Two blonde, petite, young artists will be presented in the fourth concert of the Civic Music series next Monday night in the Auditorium. Although new to Worcester audiences, both have established reputations throughout Europe, and have met with such success in this country that they are making a heavily booked coast-to-coast tour.

Before it was possible for either of these girls to study their respective instruments, they had parental objections to overcome. Like many gifted musicians of renown, their goal has been attained only after hard struggles.

Poldi Mildner, pianist, born in Vienna during the early part of the war, would sit in the window of her home patiently waiting for the daily visit of the organ grinders. It was not many weeks before she could pick out on the piano all the tunes she had heard. She was three years old by the time her father, who had been off righting, returned home. An aunt, who was living with them at the time, realized the child's rhythmical sense and her power to memorize, so she began to teach her systematically. Many arguments followed, but Miss Mildner won. At the age of 11 she appeared in public, playing a Beethoven sonata.

After making sensational appearances all over Europe, arrangements were made to have her come to this country in 1932.

When she arrived the immigration men tried to hold her up, doubting that such a girl could be a professional pianist. Immediately Miss Poldi broke into an unaccustomed storm of temperament, rushed to the piano and burst into the opening chords of a Chopin Polonaise. As she finished the men applauded heartily and passed her into the country without further questioning.

In appearance Miss Mildner is a shy, quiet young girl, full of fun. To her it is enjoyable to go on a concert tour.

Miss Mildner practises four or five hours each day during the winter, when she is touring, and is always accompanied on her trips by her mother.

'Cello Soloist

Raya Garbousova has been playing the somewhat cumbersome instrument, as some people call the 'cello, ever since she was a child of seven. Music was an important factor in the daily life of the Garbousova family, and at the age of four Raya was making rapid progress on the piano. However, one day she heard Serge Koussevitzky give a concert on a double-bass, at which time she decided upon her career. Realizing she would never be able to manage such a large instrument as a double-bass, she pleaded with her father to buy her a 'cello. Her father objected, but for the next three years she kept at him, until finally members of the orchestra, in which her father then played the trumpet, coaxed him to humor her. As soon as he had bought her a cheap, antiquated 'cello, the girl begged her uncle to instruct her. Being a busy man, he put her off with the promise that he would do so as soon as her hands were large enough. Whether it was the prayer that Miss Garbousova said every night, or the exercise of pulling her fingers when she went to bed that made her hands grow faster than the rest of her, she does not know, but the lessons were started at the age of seven. At 9 she gave her first public recital. That same year she was admitted to the Triflis Conservatory, where the next five years were spent.

A reputation as one of the really significant 'cellists of the day had been established in Europe before she came to this country two years ago, at the age of 24.

This young artist now owns a splendid Gofrilla 'cello, valued at $16,000, and it is on this instrument she will perform when she comes to Worcester Monday.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JAN 9 - 1937

Music in Review

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

Burgin and Spalding.

For the first time in the history of its Brooklyn series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a new ~~conductor~~ last night in the person of its concertmeister, Richard Burgin. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky failed to appear on the podium here for the first time in some twelve years.

For the second in the current series of five programs, Mr. Burgin elected nothing of novelty, if one excepts the first symphony of Kalinnikov, for his program opened withh the Leo Weiner transcription of the C Major Toccata for organ of Bach and included also the second of the series of D Major violin concertos of Mozart, listed now as No. 218 in the Koechel series and in which the American violinist, Albert Spalding, assisted.

Unlike many conductors who, when given an opportunity to substitute for an ill or absent regular leader, Mr. Burgin refrained from any ostentatious appeal. On the other hand, he seemed to bend backwards, gave only the necessary directions as required of a kappelmeister, and permitted the orchestra to carry on as it probably had been trained in the program by his superior. The usual Koussevitzky verve was missing and the concert became largely a routine affair.

In these times of discussion regarding the conductor injecting his own personality too much to the detriment of the program, a definite answer was accorded last night. Dr. Koussevitzky provides a vital spark to which his players are evidently accustomed, for yester-evening, they obeyed his substitute, but little spontaneity was present. The Weiner-Bach work has been heard on other programs and little remains to be said concerning it. The more recent Teutonic composer has simply used the orchestra as a massive pipe organ, intensifying what Bach provided and embellishing it comparatively little. Mr. Burgin was thoroughly familiar with it and his men followed his instructions.

Mr. Spalding and Mozart apparently are not entirely familiar to each other. The American violinist played with his accustomed technical skill and suavity of manner, but it was not Mozartean in style if we except the second movement. Technically and tonally, he was in typical form, his double-stop work in the cadenzas being truly notable, but it was not the vibrant, effervescent Mozart and Mr. Spalding never appeared to recognize this fact. The orchestra, reduced in size in accordance with tradition, nevertheless at times was too forceful for the soloist.

The result was a Teutonic presentation, but not a Mozartean.

The Kalinnikov symphony, last heard locally in the Damroschian era, proved a pot-pourri of Beethoven, Brahms, Travinsky and Tschaikovsky. It is a lyric work and is not lacking in some colorful episodes. The orchestra was plainly in its best form in it.

Jascha Heifetz at Carnegie

In his third ~~violin recital~~ this season Jascha Heifetz was heard by a large and enthusiastic audience at Carnegie Hall last evening. the program he chose to present being perhaps the most ambitious of the three. Beginning with the Faure sonata, Op. 13 in A major, with inspiring rendition of its four movements, he followed with the B minor partita of Bach for violin alone, also superbly performed.

The feature piece of the evening, played after the intermission was the Erst concerto, which calls for all the skill of a master, and Mr. Heifetz met its exacting requirements brilliantly. The program closed with a group of briefer selections, including "Narcisse," from Szymanowski's "Mythes." Op. 30. Prokofieff's "Allegretto;" Ravel's "Tzigane" and others by Tchaikovsky and de Falla.

Clementi Symphony Is Heard

N. Y. Sun — Jan: 8/37

Performance by Bostonians Is First Heard Here of Lost Composition.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening began with a number of special interest. This was a symphony in D major by Muzio Clementi, the eminent Italian composer who passed most of his life in England and whose sonatas won the admiration of Beethoven.

The symphony, however, had been lost for nearly a century after the composer's death and came to light only when the possessions of Dr. William H. Cummings, a musicologist deceased in 1917, were put on the market. But all the Clementi manuscripts left by him were in a sad state of disorder. When they were sold some of them were acquired for the Library of Congress through the enlightened efforts of Carl Engel, editor of the Musical Quarterly. The one heard last evening had been edited, some missing portions found and restored and the whole reorchestrated to impart the fullness demanded by the contemporaneous ear, by Alfredo Cassella, the distinguished Italian composer and musical scholar.

The work was lately produced by the Boston organization in its home town and was heard last night for the first time here. It is well worth the pains that were bestowed upon it. The symphony is no subservient copy of the idioms of its time, though in general outline and structure it follows the conventional symphony of the beginning of the nineteenth century. But Clementi had melodic invention of his own, a fresh and ingratiating style, no small degree of fancy, and a notable firmness in design. His music proved to be decidedly pleasing and compared favorably with the secondary creations of a period in which Haydn and Mozart works still were in the van of the procession and Beethoven had given the world the mighty "Eroica." Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it with evident satisfaction and accomplished a performance delightful in its simplicity and directness of style and in its high level of technical finish.

It was, however, in the second number that he and his musicians demonstrated what a modern orchestra can do in the way of virtuosity. The number was the second "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet suite of Ravel. This score is a bewildering piece of orchestration, gorgeous in its infinite variety of instrumental tints and opulent in its pictorial splendors. The Boston men played it magnificently. In richness, luminosity, subtle and almost inexplicable gradations, in perfection of balance, in flawlessness of articulation and magic of tonal blending, it was beyond description.

Mr. Koussevitzky's appreciation of the style and methods of the composer was authoritative and it would be difficult, if not impossible, to name any other performance of a work by this gifted Frenchman so completely satisfying, so exhilarating, and so exhaustive. The audience received it with prolonged applause. The concert was brought to its finish with the fourth symphony of Brahms, a work well chosen to provide restful contrast to the flaming and exciting creation of Ravel. W. J. H

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 9 - 1937

Second Boston Symphony Concert Is Preceded by Dinner Parties

A notable audience last night filled the Brooklyn Academy of Music for the second of the five concerts of the borough season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

Mrs. Charles W. Franklin was the hostess in the committee box. Others entertaining in boxes were: Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Dr. and Mrs. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Robert F. Ives, Mrs. Joseph A. Bennett and Rear Admiral Harris Laning, Commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

Admiral and Mrs. Laning gave a dinner for their guests before the concert. Dr. and Mrs. Truslow were dinner hosts at their home, No. 11 Schermerhorn street, in honor of their daughter, Miss Elizabeth Truslow and Thomas Pope, whose engagement has been announced.

Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor, was the director of the evening. Albert Spalding, violinist, was the soloist.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 9 - 1937

Academy Dates Dot Brooklyn Calendar

The Brooklyn Academy of Music takes precedence this month over all other Brooklyn centers for cultural entertainment, lectures and dances. Last night Albert Spaulding, violinist, was heard in the second concert of the Brooklyn series presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and today ~~the Brooklyn~~ Institute of Arts and Sciences is presenting Sir Wilmott Lewis, Washington correspondent of the London Times, who lectures on "Vision in World Affairs."

During the coming week the Academy schedule includes Saint-Saens' opera, "Samson et Dalila," which the Metropolitan Opera Assn. gives Tuesday night as the second of the five operas scheduled for the Brooklyn season; and the following evening, a presentation of "The Three Bears," by the Drama Guild of St. John's Hospital. The comedy, by ~~Edward Childs~~ Carpenter, is to be staged for the benefit of the Church Charity Foundation of Long Island. Percival Vivian is director and Mrs. Cameron Duncan heads the volunteer committee.

More than 250 subscriptions have been received for the Friday evening program, a benefit motion picture entertainment scheduled by the Brooklyn Children's Museum under ~~the auspices~~ of the museum auxiliary. "Nine Days a Queen," and several nature films, one of them the gift of Chiropean in memory of Mrs. Charles E. Porter, will be shown. Mrs. Frank E. Simmons heads an arrangement committee of fifty.

Hospital Opera Benefit.

Later in the month the Cardiac Division of the Social Service Auxiliary of Kings County Hospital takes over the Academy for an Opera Day, to be held Saturday, January 30. "Hansel and Gretel" is to be the matinee and "Martha" will be presented in the evening, with a reception following in honor of the executive board, directors and the artist advisory board of the National Music League. Mrs. Joseph W. Ferris is chairman for the event, planned in connection with work on convalescent and foster home care for cardiac patients.

A simple ceremony in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, next Saturday afternoon, will mark the wedding of Miss Letitia Groehl, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. H. M. Groehl, of 527 Bedford Ave., and John Shepardson McGovern, of the Hotel Pierrepont, son of Mr. and Mrs. John T. McGovern, Manhattan. The Rev. Lockhart Amerman, assistant pastor of the church, will perform the ceremony at 3 o'clock. A reception for seventy-five will follow at Sherry's.

Koussevitzky Offers D-Major Clementi Work

Jan. N.Y.T. 9/37

Boston Orchestra Plays Symphony Which Exists Intact in Original Form

By Jerome D. Bohm

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall Thursday under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. There was a novelty on the program in the shape of a symphony in D major by Muzio Clementi. Like its companion in C major performed here last week by Paul Stassevitch and his orchestra, this work was given in the arrangement of Alfredo Casella.

But unlike the C major symphony, which had to be reconstructed from scattered fragments of the incomplete manuscript, the D major symphony exists in its original form in the Congressional Library in Washington almost intact. Only the introductory measures and the beginning of the first allegro are missing there, and Mr. Casella discovered these missing pages in the British Museum.

Consequently, the composition heard on this occasion was in all respects, both structurally and in its instrumentation, a more authentic example of Clementi's creative activity than the one heard last Wednesday. There were, here and there, indications that Casella had enriched his predecessor's scoring; this was most apparent at the close of the final movement. But there was little to offend the purist in whatever emendations had been undertaken.

This D major symphony is a worthwhile addition to the orchestral repertoire. The introductory andante sostenuto is music of grave beauty and the following allegro vivace contains a romantic episode which might easily have stemmed from the pen of Weber. The Larhetto is more Mozartean in character and of a thoroughly disarming naivete. The menuet is strikingly original in form and the syncopated theme of the finale is forcefully developed. The performance was a highly stimulating one.

The ensuing offering, the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," is one of Mr. Koussevitzky's most celebrated interpretations, and both he and his great orchestra excelled themselves in setting it forth on this occasion. For sheer magnificence of tone and virtuosity this was an unsurpassable achievement.

The evening was brought to a close with the fourth symphony in E minor of Brahms. Here again, the ear was ravished by the unfailing vibrant warmth and transparency of the orchestral texture. But more than this, Mr. Koussevitzky gave us the essential Brahms. Never has the final passacaglia, which contains some of the composer's most overwhelming utterances sounded more impressive. The audience, which occupied every available seat, was justly highly demonstrative in its expressions of appreciation.

Music Notes

By RUTH MARSTERS

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the celebrated Athenian conductor, began rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this morning in preparation for his two weeks' engagement as guest conductor.

In addition to the concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, January 15 and 16, 22 and 23, Mr. Mitropoulos will conduct the concert in Sanders Theater on Thursday evening of this week, and the third concert of the Monday evening series on January 18.

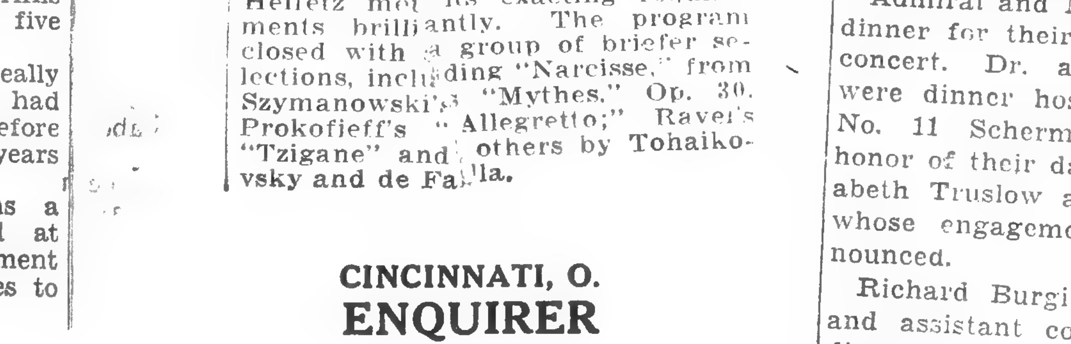
The program, alike for the three concerts of this week, will include two of Mr. Mitropoulos' transcriptions for string orchestra, that of the introduction and the final air of Dido, "When I Am Laid in Earth," from Henry Purcell's opera "Dido and Aeneas"; and the arrangement of Beethoven's great String Quartet in C sharp minor, Op. 131.

Castagnone's Prelude Giocoso, the Second Suite from Alfredo Casella's opera, "La Donna Serpente," and Respighi's Toccata for Piano and Orchestra, in which the conductor will perform the piano part, will be presented on this program.

* * *

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

JAN 7 - 1937



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the ~~Boston Symphony~~ Orchestra in its weekly concert at 8:45 o'clock tonight over NBC and WCKY. Among tonight's selections will be Alfredo Casella's revision of Clementi's Symphony in D, and Foote's Suite in E Major for String Orchestra, Opus 63.

Brooklyn Eagle - Jan. 9/37

Music of the Day

By B. H. HAGGIN

Burgin Conducts Boston Symphony at Academy, With Spalding as Soloist — Marjorie Lawrence Returns in 'Walkuere' —Heifetz in Last Recital

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard for the second time this season at the Academy of Music last night, with Richard Burgin conducting and Albert Spalding as violin soloist. The audience was said to be even larger than at the first concert, and gave loud evidence of its pleasure in the music and the performances.

The concert began with Bach's Organ Toccata in C major in the orchestral transcription of Leo Weiner. It is the deeply affecting Adagio of this work that is best known in various transcriptions; but it is the Prelude that is one of the most magnificent of Bach's creations; and this magnificence is carried out in Weiner's brilliant orchestration. The same weight of orchestral sound becomes excessive, however, for the quiet Adagio.

Next came Mozart's Violin Concerto in D major (Koechel Catalogue No. 218). This is an early work, but one that exhibits characteristic loveliness and formal perfection. And the second half of the concert was given to Kallinikov's Symphony No. 1 in G minor, in which charming melody of folk character is made to follow the pattern of symphonic form.

As for the performances, they were such as a superb orchestra would give under a competent conductor, and lacked only the finish, the incandescence, the impress of a commanding personality that performances have when a superb orchestra plays under a Toscanini or a Koussevitzky. And as some one observed, it was a good thing to have Mr. Burgin conduct and give the audience a living demonstration of this truth.

There was a great deal in Mr. Spalding's playing that gave the audience pleasure and, honesty compels me to add, a certain amount that gave me pain. He did his best—that is, his simplest, least mannered and most reposeful—playing in the slow movement, but in the first and last movements I was disturbed by the lapses of intonation and the unsteadiness of pace.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

159

JAN 9 - 1937

Greeting Artists at Symphony Concert

Eagle Staff Photo

Edward C. Blum, president of Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences (left), greets Richard Burgin, conductor (center), and Albert Spalding, soloist (right), at Boston Symphony concert last night in Academy of Music.

Music of the Day

By B. H. HAGGIN

Burgin Conducts Boston Symphony at Academy, With Spalding as Soloist—Marjorie Lawrence Returns in 'Walkuere' —Heifetz in Last Recital

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard for the second time this season at the Academy of Music last night, with Richard Burgin conducting and Albert Spalding as violin soloist. The audience was said to be even larger than at the first concert, and gave loud evidence of its pleasure in the music and the performances.

The concert began with Bach's Organ Toccata in C major in the orchestral transcription of Leo Weiner. It is the deeply affecting Adagio of this work that is best known in various transcriptions; but it is the Prelude that is one of the most magnificent of Bach's creations; and this magnificence is carried out in Weiner's brilliant orchestration. The same weight of orchestral sound becomes excessive, however, for the quiet Adagio.

Next came Mozart's Violin Concerto in D major (Koechel Catalogue No. 218). This is an early work, but one that exhibits characteristic loveliness and formal perfection. And the second half of the concert was given to Kallinikov's Symphony No. 1 in G minor, in which charming melody of folk character is made to follow the pattern of symphonic form.

As for the performances, they were such as a superb orchestra would give under a competent conductor, and lacked only the finish, the incandescence, the impress of a commanding personality, that performances have when a superb orchestra plays under a Toscanini or a Koussevitzky. And as some one observed, it was a good thing to have Mr. Burgin conduct and give the audience a living demonstration of this truth.

There was a great deal in Mr Spalding's playing that gave the audience pleasure and, honesty compels me to add, a certain amount that gave me pain. He did his best—that is, his simplest, least mannered and most reposeful—playing in the slow movement; but in the first and last movements I was disturbed by the lapses of intonation and the unsteadiness of pace.

Jascha Heifetz

Last night, before an unusually large audience, Jascha Heifetz gave his second and last Carnegie Hall recital of this season. For the opening selection he played the seldom heard Violin Sonata Op. 13 of Gabriel Faure. All the ineffable charm of this work with its elegant melodic turns, and the tender and touching Andante, were present in the beautiful interpretation of Mr. Heifetz, who was ably assisted by Emanuel Bay at the piano.

The prodigious unaccompanied Partita in B minor by Bach, which followed, was played in its entirety. All the breadth and massiveness of its architecture was revealed with the most eloquent tone and without any visible effort in the surmounting of the technical difficulties. This was but a forecast of the brilliant playing that was to come in the F sharp minor Concerto of Ernst. This concerto, which combines its Paganini-like virtuosity with a noble tone reminiscent of Spohr, marked the climax of the evening's concert.

The group of short numbers which concluded the printed program included Narcisse from Szymanowski's Mythes Op. 30, a Scherzo by Tschaikowsky, Nana by De Falla (which was repeated), and Tzigane by Ravel. In response to the many plaudits, Mr. Heifetz played four encores. F. E. P.

'Die Walkuere'

The season's third performance of "Die Walkuere" (the second in Manhattan) took place at the Metropolitan Opera House last night. Mme. Flagstad was in the cast, but not in ~~the~~ role of Bruennhilde, which she sang earlier, relinquishing it last night to Marjorie Lawrence. Mme. Flagstad's assignment was Sieglinde. The Siegmund was Mr. Melchior; the Wotan Mr. Hoffman ~~and~~ the Fricka Miss Thorberg. Miss Lawrence's appearance was her first on the Metropolitan stage this season. The Australian soprano was cordially received by the audience, but its attention was obviously concentrated on its favorite singer. Mr. Bodanzky conducted. T. B. W.

The Russian Trio

A new arrival, and a happy one, augmented New York's season of chamber music at Town Hall last night. The newcomers were the Russian Trio, the collective title for three distinct musical individualities: Nina Mesirow-Minchin, pianist; Michel Wilkomarski, violinist, and Ennio Bolognini, 'cellist. Their somewhat laconic program comprised the Brahms Trio in C Minor, Op. 101, and the "Elegaique" of Rachmaninoff, Op. 9.

After hearing many string quar-

THE MICROPHONE
BOSTON, MASS.

JAN 8 - 1937

"Serious Music Seriously, Or Not At All"

By MORRIS HASTINGS

SEVERAL WEEKS ago in my column I quoted the reasons the great violinist, FRITZ KREISLER, recently gave for his aversion to appearing on the radio.

Mr. KREISLER'S most important reason was that the broadcasting artist is in the hands of the man in the control room, that this man may, by turning a gadget, so distort the tone of the artist that what the radio audience hears is nothing like the artist's performance.

Nowadays, I pointed out, there is very little danger of that sort of thing as considerable pains are taken by conscientious radio men as well as by artists themselves to see that the broadcast performance reaches the radio audience with as nearly complete fidelity as possible.

Since the publication of the column quoting Mr. KREISLER, I have received an interesting letter from Mrs. RAY MILLER of 5 Clifton Road, Wellesley Hills, Massachusetts, a letter which, although it seems to me to evade Mr. KREISLER'S point, does bring up several others of considerable importance.

Mrs. MILLER writes:

"I am inclined to agree with FRITZ KREISLER rather than with you in his judgment of what radio broadcasts may do to serious music. One of the really notable series of the year has been the BRAHMS cycle given in recent weeks by the COOLIDGE Foundation over CBS.

"It is inconceivable that anyone listening could not have waited with perfect ease until the hour was over for news of the British situation.

"Yet the last concert was cut off half-way through (in the midst of the lovely string sextet, and with FRANK SHERIDAN waiting to play a sonata that didn't even start) to make way for—of all things—a dramatization of the life of the Duke of York.

"People who care for chamber music simply do not prefer their current events dramatized, and even if they did, would not have BRAHMS interrupted for something that would quite well wait.

"I suppose that the good will of its listeners is the chief asset of a broadcasting chain, and that it knows when it aims at a limited chamber music audience that the millions of variety show enthusiasts will not be tuned in. Hence I cannot see how Columbia gained a thing by interrupting the BRAHMS.

"The incident I relate is not the only, but only the most recent, of its sort, and Mr. KREISLER could not be certain that he would not be a victim of a similar one.

"I still remember the Saturday evening last Winter when the Boston Symphony concert (over NBC), directed by KOUSSEVITZKY, was cut off in the middle of the last movement of BEETHOVEN'S Ninth Symphony. (I've always hoped that Dr. KOUSSEVIT- Symphony. I grant that the allotted time had expired. But why not be adult and stop after the third movement, or even more adult, cut out the trivial program that followed?

"That is, either give serious music seriously, or not at all."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 10 1937

Revival of 'Le Coq d'Or' on Feb. 4 To Aid Schola Cantorum Chorus

Performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff Opera Taken Over to Assist Maintenance Fund—Mrs. William C. Breed Chairman of Committee in Charge of Sale of Tickets.

The first performance of the revival of Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Le Coq d'Or," with Lily Pons and Ezio Pinza in the leading rôles, the afternoon of Feb. 4 at the Metropolitan Opera has been taken over to augment the maintenance fund of the chorus of the Schola Cantorum.

Mrs. William C. Breed is chairman of the committee on musicales of the Schola Cantorum and heads the group in charge of the sale of boxes and seats for the benefit.

Serving with her are Wadsworth R. Lewis, vice chairman; Mrs. Henry Martyn Alexander, Mrs. Henry F. du Pont, Countess Mercati, Mrs. Reginald Fincke, Mrs. Walter E. Maynard, Mrs. Charles J. Nourse, Countess Colloredo-Mannsfeld, Mrs. Frank Gray Griswold, Mrs. Philip W. Livermore, Mrs. Otto H. Kahn, Mrs. John Jacob Astor, Mrs. Gordon Auchincloss, Mrs. Frederick H. Prince Jr., Mrs. George Eustis Paine, Mrs. Reginald T. Townsend, Mrs. Walter J. Salmon and Mrs. Robert H. Thayer.

Assisting are members of a junior committee headed by Mrs. Maitland A. Edey and including Mrs. John Holbrook, Mrs. Walter Maynard, Mrs. C. Alonso Irigoyen, Mrs. F. Vinton Lindley, Mrs. Christopher T. E. Rand, the Misses Virginia Thaw, Beatrice Kellogg, Lesley Bogert, Martha Hutcheson, Julia Macy, Mary Josephine Cutting, Priscilla Potts, C. Leslie Hadden, Rose Weld and Margaret Hallowell.

The chorus of the Schola Cantorum, one of the largest and best-known choruses in the country, collaborates with the Philharmonic and Boston Symphony Orchestras in presenting noted choral compositions. The chorus comprises 250 members.

Serving on the board of directors of the organization, in addition to Mrs. Breed, Mrs. du Pont, Mrs. Kahn, Countess Mercati, Mrs. Thayer, Mrs. Townsend, Mrs. Paine, Mrs. Salmon and Mr. Lewis, are Mrs. Reginald Fincke, chairman; Mr. and Mrs. John S. Ellsworth, Mrs. Charles A. Stone, Mrs. Duke Biddle, Miss Mary P. Hayden, Mrs. Charles E. Miller, Mrs. E. Marshall Field, Messmore Kendall, Winfred Douglas, Winthrop W. Aldrich, Willard V. King, George Blumenthal and Charles Hayden.

Boxes or seats for the performance may be secured through the Burden-Littell Bureau at 611 Fifth Avenue.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 10 1937

RECENT RECORDINGS

There was a time when, judging from our correspondence, a healthy demand for recordings from the works of Edward MacDowell existed. If the companies caught wind of this they ignored it almost entirely, though it must be said that practically all major recording in those days was being done in Europe. Marking the seventy-fifth anniversary of his birth with an issue of the second piano concerto (in D minor, Op. 23) may not be doing MacDowell complete justice, though it must be admitted that the performance is one calculated to show the work off in its best light and the recording is excellent.

With Jesús María Sanromá as soloist and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, under Arthur Fiedler, in support, the concerto, on five disks, comes in Victor Album M-324. Augmented, in its Winter garb, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky and with the same soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will ~~have~~ played this in its Carnegie Hall concert of yesterday afternoon. Definitely transitional, the concerto tends to unevenness. Sentiment is overstressed at times and in spots there is a sort of middle-period Elgarian self-consciousness. Interspersed with these, however, are compact passages in which the serious craftsman is in evidence. By steadily eschewing all the salon music traps Sanromá projects the concerto to its best possible advantage. Incidentally, would not an album of later MacDowell piano compositions be in order?

WILMINGTON, CAL.
JOURNAL

JAN 7 - 1937

Part of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be heard over KECA at 6 p.m. when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducts the organization in one of its regular subscription concerts at Carnegie Hall, New York. Numbers programmed are Alfredo Cassella's revision of Clementi's Symphony in D, and Foote's Suite in E Major for String Orchestra.

Boston Symphony Concert

N.Y. Times

Orchestra Presents Two Unfamiliar Works by Americans in Matinee Program.

Jan. /37

By W. J. HENDERSON.

After the brilliant exhibition of virtuosity in Thursday night's concert, the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Saturday matinee turned to the less exciting, but more important, business of presenting two works by Americans. Neither was new, but one was probably unknown to the present generation of local music lovers.

This was the E major suite for strings of Arthur Foote, born in 1853, and still living in Boston. The suite was completed in 1908, but its performance demonstrated that it is music possessed of persisting vitality.

Mr. Foote belonged to the generation of musicians who began their development under Prof. John Knowles Paine of Harvard, and they all obtained from him a sound training in the fundamental principles of composition. Mr. Foote's suite, in three movements—though the second is practically two movements in one—was heard by the audience with manifest pleasure. The first and third sections of the second movement are a pizzicato ostinato resembling that in Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony. But the thematic material is Mr. Foote's own, and the contrasting adgietto, which is the central section, is a charming bit of sentimental writing in the manner of the early romantics. The first movement, with its well wrought imitations, is clearly designed and firmly constructed, and the finale is a vigorous and melodious fugue with an effective pedal point and a stirring finish. The suite was performed in true Boston Symphony style, and conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky with evident relish.

The other native work was Edward McDowell's piano concerto No. 2, in D minor. It has not been entirely neglected. It was played here February 12, 1935, by a young soloist with the National Orchestral Association, and November 11, 1934, by the promising young American pianist, Beveridge Webster, with the Philharmonic-Symphony Society under Werner Jansen. Discussion of the music of McDowell leads to delicate ground, since the often repeated assertion that he was the best of all our native composers easily advances to the claim of a place for him among the great masters of the world.

It is hardly necessary to pursue that subject, but it can be said that, if this concerto in D minor had been stamped "made in Germany" it would always be heard with grave consideration and awarded plentiful applause. It is a well knit work, uniting piano and orchestra firmly in the scheme of its development, and affording opportunities for the display of singing cantilena, sonorous chord declamation and scintillating passage work in the solo part. The player Saturday was the Puerto Rican pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, long a resident of Boston and closely associated with the orchestra of that city. His performance was opulent in tone, technically admirable and in plan and execution thoroughly musicianly. The applause at its conclusion was of the kind whose significance is unmistakable. The concert ended with the well-seasoned symphony

---

NEW YORK MIRROR

JAN 10 1937

MUSIC

—By JULIAN SEAMAN—

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Mr. Serge [illegible]itzky conducting; Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, soloist; Carnegie Hall, [illegible]terday afternoon.

THE PROGRAM

Suite in E (Opus 63)....Arthur Foote
Piano concerto No. 2 in D minor (Opus 25) ....MacDowell
Symphony in D minor..........Franck

Dr. Koussevitzky and his superlative orchestra decided to celebrate MacDowell in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, thereby correcting our neglect of one of America's most talented composers.

But I can think of more filling items in the MacDowell category that the D minor concerto, played brilliantly by Mr. Sanroma. However agreeably these flamboyant and Lisztian measures may fall upon the ear, the music itself is essentially contrived and second class.

The golden purity of the Boston strings, evident in the opening cantabile of the concerto, already had conferred a deceptive perfection upon a suite in E by Mr. Foote, a New Englander. This is solid music, ably put together, in spite of its transparently derivative nature. The Franck symphony enjoyed a superb performance.

Hartford Courant
Jan. 7, 1937

Noted Boston Symphony Heard Here

Koussevitzky Ill and Burgin Directs; Concert Highlighted by Pianist Sanroma's Playing

With Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season, this time under direction of Richard Burgin, concert master, at the Bushnell Memorial auditorium Wednesday night.

The program:

Suite in E Major, for String Orchestra, Op. 63 .... Foote
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 2, in D Minor MacDowell
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherezade" .... Rimsky-Korsakov

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony is likely to be remembered here for at least two reasons. First because Dr. Koussevitzky has missed only four performances due to illness in 12 years with his orchestra, of which one, alas, had to be in Hartford. Second, for Mr. Sanroma's performance of the MacDowell second Concerto, and that pleasure we will probably remember when the first disappointment is forgotten.

Mr. Sanroma's playing was a brilliant exploitation of a hugely virtuoso work. The spirit of Mr. Sanroma's pianism and of the composition itself are certainly kindred. They are, in the vernacular, "Like that and that." I cannot think of any better way to describe the two, than as the "official" type concerto, and the definitely "official" pianist (and that, as I remember, is what Mr. Sanroma is titled, the "official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra").

The MacDowell is exactly what any conductor might order, a fine, brave show of a piece, arrayed in brilliant effects neatly divided between orchestra and soloist, allowing both to share the limelight and to demonstrate their virtuosity. There may be more than that in the work, but it is doubtful, nor why should there be when it serves its turn so well as the standard and definitive show-concerto?

Further, Mr. Sanroma is precisely the man a conductor would order to play a brilliant work with an imposing orchestra. He is the conductor's pianist, because he knows exactly how to set out every effect to the best advantage not only of the piano score, but of the concerto as a whole. He can well weigh the effectiveness of the piano in making the concerto a unified entity. At the tip of those marvelously dextrous fingers and steel wrists are all the tricks of the trade, by means of which the last grace note of glitter can be brought from a show piece. While racing over the keyboard at breakneck speed, his hands a blur of rapidity, he can still watch every beat of the director. He knows when to dash out boldly in front of the orchestral score, and when to retreat gracefully before the swelling orchestra.

More than this, he is a pianist's pianist. Purely as a pianist he has a remarkably intelligent command of his instrument and its peculiar possibilities. He turns all technical points in a score with fine-chosen and finely executed effects. Deftness is his forte. If at times his style seems a bit hard, there are many more in which his dispassionate approach to a score imparts all the admirable qualities of restraint.

Whips Up Concerto.

Last night he whipped up the MacDowell Concerto into a glittering froth of notes. His furious speed over the keyboard threw up a spray in which every run and scale was of pellucid quality, from the strongest to the most delicate. His surges ahead in the solid sections flashed with power and technical style. The dry humor which he has so often shown in recital took him through the second movement with exceptional charm. All in all, he made you feel that if the composition is a show piece, it is a pretty amazing show at that.

It is awkward to have to report that the orchestra did less effectively with their share of the Concerto. Mr. Burgin is an excellent musician. The times when he has rehearsed the orchestra are probably without number. In the main he did competently with the emergency in to which he was thrown. His "Scheherazade" was generally effective stuff, the Foote capably delineated. But he was unable to save the orchestral section of the MacDowell from a rather loose and uneven performance. With every respect to Mr. Burgin, the imperial Dr. Koussevitzky, that grand musical tyrant, is the one who brings the orchestra to the dazzling concert pitch for which it is famed. He is the one who crams the performance with style, with blazing light and life. How could we and the orchestra help but miss him?

The Suite by Arthur Foote turned out to be a work of grace and charm, of gentleness and gentility. Its impeccable form indicated scholarly, as well as musicianly origins. It flowed ever onward with pastoral simplicity and sweetness through two movements, the first joyous, the second alternately spritely, and romantically melancholic, and ended with triumphal strains in an equally artless and engaging fugue. It is a score of refinement of taste and means throughout.

The "Scheherazade" was Mr. Burgin's orchestral achievement. He and his men made it rich in color, vibrant, even strident in temper, which is as should be. The violin soli were capably taken. It brought the evening to an animated and violent conclusion, as this work can always do, famliar old faithful though it be.

T. H. P.

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

B. Post
Jan. 10/37

About the Mitropoulos Programmes

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE first thought on seeing the programme which Dimitri Mitropoulos will direct as guest conductor at the Symphony Concerts of this week is that in one respect or another it is 100 per cent novel. The second impression, which follows the first almost as a matter of course, is that it is devoid of acknowledged masterpieces of orchestral music. In point of fact, however, it contains two masterpieces borrowed from other fields, arrangements for string orchestra made by Mr. Mitropoulos himself of the famous air of Dido, "When I Am Laid in Earth," from Purcell's opera, "Dido and Aeneas," and of Beethoven's Quartet in C-sharp minor, Opus 131.

It may be argued that since the C-sharp minor Quartet is, on the authority of Beethoven himself and of most musicians since, his greatest exercise in the form, and that since his final five quartets stand for their musical and spiritual qualities at the head of all his instrumental music, and that, since Beethoven is generally considered to be the greatest composer of instrumental music, it follows that the C-sharp minor Quartet must be the greatest piece of instrumental music in existence. In all seriousness, however, the opportunity to hear this quartet, if not exactly in the medium for which it was designed, is one for which the audiences of the Symphony Concerts should be grateful. In these remarkable works of his final years, Beethoven charted unknown seas into which no one of his successors dared to sail for nearly three-quarters of a century. Your modern composer will tell you that certain works of Bach and the last quartets of Beethoven collectively constitute his Bible.

The other numbers on this remarkable programme, as announced last week, are all Italian; a Preludio Giocoso, by Riccardo Castagnone, a young composer as yet unknown here; Respighi's Toccata, for piano and orchestra, in which Mr. Mitropoulos will be the soloist, and the Second Suite from Casella's opera, "La Donna Serpente."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 9 - 1937

SPALDING IS SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Eminent American Violinist Heard at Brooklyn Academy of Music

Brooklyn was offered a combined musical feast at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. It was the occasion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second visit in its series of five concerts to be given here this season. It also was the very happy occasion of a visit by Albert Spalding, eminent American violinist, who accompanied the orchestra in Mozart's Concert for Violin in D Major.

There might have been some disappointment that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Boston conductor, was not on the podium. Some will contend that his genius is not shared by others and that he has the unique ability of getting the best out of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But their disappointment should have been short-lived, for Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra and its assistant conductor, was more than an able substitute.. While possibly rather short for a conductor and by no means the most graceful man in the world, he did admirably. The concert was a decided success.

The first offering was Bach's Toccata in C Major for Organ. The Toccata is a strange combination, a brilliant show-piece and at the same time a most cleverly devised interweaving of melodies. Mr. Burgin got a great deal out of this work, but it was in the latter two that the greatest success was attained.

Mr. Spalding and the orchestra jointly played the second offering, that is, its string sections, the Mozart Concerto. The result was beautiful. The dominant melody, clear in its tones and eminently musical, was repeated often in its variations. Always the master of the situation, Mr. Spalding clothed the melodic arrangement with as much dignity and artistry as any virtuoso could achieve.

The closing symphony was Kalinnikov's No. 1 in G Minor. The program says that Koussevitzky attended the Moscow Conservatory with Kalinnikov, who was to die at the early age of 35. The symphony showed that he had reached both musical heights and authority. In its fourth movement, the symphony reached a sustained triumphant passage, which ended in that mood.

Second Visit Here by Boston Symphony Ends

N.Y. Jan. 10/37

Koussevitzky Is Director at Carnegie Hall; Two American Works Played

Sanroma Is Piano Soloist

MacDowell's 2d Concerto Honors His Anniversary

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, closed its second New York visit of the season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall with a program of which the first half was devoted to two American works, Arthur Foote's suite for strings, in E major, and Edward MacDowell's second piano concerto, in D minor, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as the soloist. Cesar Franck's symphony followed the intermission.

The Bostonians had already played the concerto in Boston and Cambridge a few weeks ago in observance of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the composer's birth (December 18), and yesterday's performance could be regarded as filling a similar purpose in the city where MacDowell was born and died. As the best known of MacDowell's larger works—this was its eighth appearance in a New York program in twelve years—neither its strong points nor its weak ones need extensive discussion. The composer was only twenty-three when he wrote the work in Germany, and in it his generous supply of melodic inventiveness is, not unnaturally, influenced by German romanticism of the period; for a full and distinctive expression of his musical individuality, we have to look for works of a somewhat later day, such as the four titled piano sonatas. But in its formal finish and advantageous use of its instrumental medium, it is a noteworthy work, and probably the only American composition in this form which has maintained itself in the regular repertoire for nearly fifty years.

Mr. Sanroma and the orchestra gave the concerto a well balanced performance. The pianist, who treated his share of the work as an integral part of a unified whole rather than as display music against a background, played with his customary digital deftness and artistic style and ability to distinguish fine points of shading, and gave an admirable interpretation of the strongest part of the composition, the swift-paced, light-footed presto.

Mr. Foote, born eight years before MacDowell, is probably the dean of living New England composers; his suite in E, first played twenty-eight years ago, still impresses as very viable, notably well constructed music, and in its performance yesterday spoke well for the quality and sonority of the Boston Symphony's strings. Praise also was merited by the interpretation of the Franck symphony, which had its first performance in Paris sixteen days before MacDowell first played his second concerto here on March 5, 1889.

Music Events For the Week

Am. Jan. 10/37

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

OF THE MANY important music events that fill the concert calendar for the ensuing week, the appearance of Dimitri Mitropoulos, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is perhaps the most keenly anticipated.

The celebrated Athenian conductor who so electrified his audiences during his first American engagement as guest conductor of the orchestra last season, will remain for two weeks.

During this time, in addition to the regular Friday and Saturday concerts in Symphony Hall on January 15, and 16, 22, and 23, Mr. Mitropoulos will conduct a concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on next Thursday evening, and the third concert of the Monday evening series on January 18.

• • •

THE PROGRAM will be the same for the three concerts this week. Two of Mitropoulos' own transscriptions for string orchestra will be included. These are the Introduction and the final air of Dido, "When I am Laid in Earth," from Henry Purcell's opera "Dido and Aeneas"; and an orchestral arraignment of Beethoven's great String Quartet in C sharp minor, Op 131.

Castagnone, Italian composer new to America, will be represented by his Preludio Giocoso. Respighi's Toccata for Piano and Orchestra will likewise have its first performance hereabouts, Mitropoulos taking the piano part.

The closing number will be the Second Suite from Alfred Casella's opera, "La Donna Serpente."

Gaspar Cassado, distinguished Spanish 'cellist who made his American debut with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society last month, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the performance of Schumman's Violoncello Concerto, at the concert of January 18.

Boston Symphony Concert

N.Y. Times

Orchestra Presents Two Unfamiliar Works by Americans in Matinee Program.

Jan. /37

By W. J. HENDERSON.

After the brilliant exhibition of virtuosity in Thursday night's concert, the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Saturday matinee turned to the less exciting, but more important, business of presenting two works by Americans. Neither was new, but one was probably unknown to the present generation of local music lovers.

This was the E major suite for strings of Arthur Foote, born in 1853, and still living in Boston. The suite was completed in 1908, but its performance demonstrated that it is music possessed of persisting vitality.

Mr. Foote belonged to the generation of musicians who began their development under Prof. John Knowles Paine of Harvard, and they all obtained from him a sound training in the fundamental principles of composition. Mr. Foote's suite, in three movements—though the second is practically two movements in one—was heard by the audience with manifest pleasure. The first and third sections of the second movement are a pizzicato ostinato resembling that in Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony. But the thematic material is Mr. Foote's own, and the contrasting adgietto, which is the central section, is a charming bit of sentimental writing in the manner of the early romantics. The first movement, with its well wrought imitations, is clearly designed and firmly constructed, and the finale is a vigorous and melodious fugue with an effective pedal point and a stirring finish. The suite was performed in true Boston Symphony style, and conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky with evident relish.

The other native work was Edward McDowell's piano concerto No. 2, in D minor. It has not been entirely neglected. It was played here February 12. 1935, by a young soloist with the National Orchestral Association, and November 11, 1934, by the promising young American pianist, Beveridge Webster, with the Philharmonic-Symphony Society under Werner Jansen. Discussion of the music of McDowell leads to delicate ground, since the often repeated assertion that he was the best of all our native composers easily advances to the claim of a place for him among the great masters of the world.

It is hardly necessary to pursue that subject, but it can be said that, if this concerto in D minor had been stamped "made in Germany" it would always be heard with grave consideration and awarded plentiful applause. It is a well knit work, uniting piano and orchestra firmly in the scheme of its development, and affording opportunities for the display of singing cantilena, sonorous chord declamation and scintillating passage work in the solo part. The player Saturday was the Puerto Rican pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, long a resident of Boston and closely associated with the orchestra of that city. His performance was opulent in tone, technically admirable and in plan and execution thoroughly musicianly. The applause at its conclusion was of the kind whose significance is unmistakable. The concert ended with the well-seasoned symphony of Cesar Franck.

MU

—By JULIAN SEAMAN—

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Mr. Serge [redacted]itzky conducting; Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, soloist; Carnegie Hall, [redacted]erday afternoon.

THE PROGRAM

Suite in E (Opus 63)....Arthur Foote
Piano concerto No. 2 in D minor (Opus 25) ....MacDowell
Symphony in D minor.........Franck

Dr. Koussevitzky and his superlative orchestra decided to celebrate MacDowell in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, thereby correcting our neglect of one of America's most talented composers.

But I can think of more filling items in the MacDowell category that the D minor concerto, played brilliantly by Mr. Sanroma. However agreeably these flamboyant and Lisztian measures may fall upon the ear, the music itself is essentially contrived and second class.

The golden purity of the Boston strings, evident in the opening cantabile of the concerto, already had conferred a deceptive perfection upon a suite in E by Mr. Foote, a New Englander. This is solid music, ably put together, in spite of its transparently derivative nature. The Franck symphony enjoyed a superb performance.

Hartford Courant
Jan. 7, 1937

Noted Boston Symphony Heard Here

Koussevitzky Ill and Burgin Directs; Concert Highlighted by Pianist Sanroma's Playing

With Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season, this time under direction of Richard Burgin, concert master, at the Bushnell Memorial auditorium Wednesday night.

The program:

Suite in E Major, for String Orchestra, Op. 63 .... Foote
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 2, in D Minor.MacDowell
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherezade" .... Rimsky-Korzakov

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony is likely to be remembered here for at least two reasons. First because Dr. Koussevitzky has missed only four performances due to illness in 12 years with his orchestra, of which one, alas, had to be in Hartford. Second, for Mr. Sanroma's performance of the MacDowell second Concerto, and that pleasure we will probably remember when the first disappointment is forgotten.

Mr. Sanroma's playing was a brilliant exploitation of a hugely virtuoso work. The spirit of Mr. Sanroma's pianism and of the composition itself are certainly kindred. They are, in the vernacular, "Like that and that." I cannot think of any better way to describe the two, than as the "official" type concerto, and the definitely "official" pianist (and that, as I remember, is what Mr. Sanroma is titled, the "official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra").

The MacDowell is exactly what any conductor might order, a fine, brave show of a piece, arrayed in brilliant effects neatly divided between orchestra and soloist, allowing both to share the limelight and to demonstrate their virtuosity. There may be more than that in the work, but it is doubtful, nor why should there be when it serves its turn so well as the standard and definitive show-concerto?

Further, Mr. Sanroma is precisely the man a conductor would order to play a brilliant work with an imposing orchestra. He is the conductor's pianist, because he knows exactly how to set out every effect to the best advantage not only of the piano score, but of the concerto as a whole. He can well weigh the effectiveness of the piano in making the concerto a unified entity. At the tip of those marvelously dextrous fingers and steel wrists are all the tricks of the trade, by means of which the last grace note of glitter can be brought from a show piece. While racing over the keyboard at breakneck speed, his hands a blur of rapidity, he can still watch every beat of the director. He knows when to dash out boldly in front of the orchestral score, and when to retreat gracefully before the swelling orchestra.

More than this, he is a pianist's pianist. Purely as a pianist he has a remarkably intelligent command of his instrument and its peculiar possibilities. He turns all technical points in a score with fine-chosen and finely executed effects. Deftness is his forte. If at times his style seems a bit hard, there are many more in which his dispassionate approach to a score imparts all the admirable qualities of restraint.

Whips Up Concerto.

Last night he whipped up the MacDowell Concerto into a glittering froth of notes. His furious speed over the keyboard threw up a spray in which every run and scale was of pellucid quality, from the strongest to the most delicate. His surges ahead in the solid sections flashed with power and technical style. The dry humor which he has so often shown in recital took him through the second movement with exceptional charm. All in all, he made you feel that if the composition is a show piece, it is a pretty amazing show at that.

It is awkward to have to report that the orchestra did less effectively with their share of the Concerto. Mr. Burgin is an excellent musician The times when he has rehearsed the orchestra are probably without number. In the main he did competently with the emergency in to which he was thrown. His "Scheherazade" was generally effective stuff, the Foote capably delineated. But he was unable to save the orchestral section of the MacDowell from a rather loose and uneven performance. With every respect to Mr. Burgin, the imperial Dr. Koussevitzky, that grand musical tyrant, is the one who brings the orchestra to the dazzling concert pitch for which it is famed. He is the one who crams the performance with style, with blazing light and life. How could we and the orchestra help but miss him?

The Suite by Arthur Foote turned out to be a work of grace and charm, of gentleness and gentility. Its impeccable form indicated scholarly, as well as musicianly origins. It flowed ever onward with pastoral simplicity and sweetness through two movements, the first joyous, the second alternately spritely, and romantically melancholic, and ended with triumphal strains in an equally artless and engaging fugue. It is a score of refinement of taste and means throughout.

The "Scheherazade" was Mr. Burgin's orchestral achievement. He and his men made it rich in color, vibrant, even strident in temper, which is as should be. The violin soli were capably taken. It brought the evening to an animated and violent conclusion, as this work can always do, famliar old faithful though it be.

T. H. P.

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

B. Post
Jan. 10/37

About the Mitropoulos Programmes

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE first thought on seeing the programme which Dimitri Mitropoulos will direct as guest conductor at the Symphony Concerts of this week is that in one respect or another it is 100 per cent novel. The second impression, which follows the first almost as a matter of course, is that it is devoid of acknowledged masterpieces of orchestral music. In point of fact, however, it contains two masterpieces borrowed from other fields, arrangements for string orchestra made by Mr. Mitropoulos himself of the famous air of Dido, "When I Am Laid in Earth," from Purcell's opera, "Dido and Aeneas," and of Beethoven's Quartet in C-sharp minor, Opus 131.

It may be argued that since the C-sharp minor Quartet is, on the authority of Beethoven himself and of most musicians since, his greatest exercise in the form, and that since his final five quartets stand for their musical and spiritual qualities at the head of all his instrumental music, and that, since Beethoven is generally considered to be the greatest composer of instrumental music, it follows that the C-sharp minor Quartet must be the greatest piece of instrumental music in existence. In all seriousness, however, the opportunity to hear this quartet, if not exactly in the medium for which it was designed, is one for which the audiences of the Symphony Concerts should be grateful. In these remarkable works of his final years, Beethoven charted unknown seas into which no one of his successors dared to sail for nearly three-quarters of a century. Your modern composer will tell you that certain works of Bach and the last quartets of Beethoven collectively constitute his Bible.

The other numbers on this remarkable programme, as announced last week, are all Italian; a Preludio Giocoso, by Riccardo Castagnone, a young composer as yet unknown here; Respighi's Toccata, for piano and orchestra, in which Mr. Mitropoulos will be the soloist, and the Second Suite from Casella's opera, "La Donna Serpente.".

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 9 - 1937

SPALDING IS SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Eminent American Violinist Heard at Brooklyn Academy of Music

Brooklyn was offered a combined musical feast at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. It was the occasion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second visit in its series of five concerts to be given here this season. It also was the very happy occasion of a visit by Albert Spalding, eminent American violinist, who accompanied the orchestra in Mozart's Concert for Violin in D Major.

There might have been some disappointment that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Boston conductor, was not on the podium. Some will contend that his genius is not shared by others and that he has the unique ability of getting the best out of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But their disappointment should have been short-lived, for Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra and its assistant conductor, was more than an able substitute.. While possibly rather short for a conductor and by no means the most graceful man in the world, he did admirably. The concert was a decided success.

The first offering was Bach's Toccata in C Major for Organ. The Toccata is a strange combination, a brilliant show-piece and at the same time a most cleverly devised interweaving of melodies. Mr. Burgin got a great deal out of this work, but it was in the latter two that the greatest success was attained.

Mr. Spalding and the orchestra jointly played the second offering, that is, its string sections, the Mozart Concerto. The result was beautiful. The dominant melody, clear in its tones and eminently musical, was repeated often in its variations. Always the master of the situation, Mr. Spalding clothed the melodic arrangement with as much dignity and artistry as any virtuoso could achieve.

The closing symphony was Kalinnikov's No. 1 in G Minor. The program says that Koussevitzky attended the Moscow Conservatory with Kalinnikov, who was to die at the early age of 35. The symphony showed that he had reached both musical heights and authority. In its fourth movement, the symphony reached a sustained triumphant passage, which ended in that mood.

Music Events For the Week

Am.

By Ruth Marsters Jan. 10/37
Music Editor

OF THE MANY important music events that fill the concert calendar for the ensuing week, the appearance of Dimitri Mitropoulos, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is perhaps the most keenly anticipated.

The celebrated Athenian conductor who so electrified his audiences during his first American engagement as guest conductor of the orchestra last season, will remain for two weeks.

During this time, in addition to the regular Friday and Saturday concerts in Symphony Hall on January 15, and 16, 22, and 23, Mr. Mitropoulos will conduct a concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on next Thursday evening, and the third concert of the Monday evening series on January 18.

* * *

THE PROGRAM will be the same for the three concerts this week. Two of Mitropoulos' own transcriptions for string orchestra will be included. These are the Introduction and the final air of Dido, "When I am Laid in Earth," from Henry Purcell's opera "Dido and Aeneas"; and an orchestral arraignment of Beethoven's great String Quartet in C sharp minor, Op 131.

Castagnone, Italian composer new to America, will be represented by his Preludio Giocoso. Respighi's Toccata for Piano and Orchestra will likewise have its first performance hereabouts, Mitropoulos taking the piano part.

The closing number will be the Second Suite from Alfred Casella's opera, "La Donna Serpente."

Gaspar Cassado, distinguished Spanish 'cellist who made his American debut with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society last month, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the performance of Schumman's Violoncello Concerto, at the concert of January 18.

Second Visit Here by Boston Symphony Ends

N.Y. Jan. 10/37

Koussevitzky Is Director at Carnegie Hall; Two American Works Played

Sanroma Is Piano Soloist

MacDowell's 2d Concerto Honors His Anniversary

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, closed its second New York visit of the season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall with a program of which the first half was devoted to two American works, Arthur Foote's suite for strings, in E major, and Edward MacDowell's second piano concerto, in D minor, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as the soloist. Cesar Franck's symphony followed the intermission.

The Bostonians had already played the concerto in Boston and Cambridge a few weeks ago in observance of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the composer's birth (December 18), and yesterday's performance could be regarded as filling a similar purpose in the city where MacDowell was born and died. As the best known of MacDowell's larger works—this was its eighth appearance in a New York program in twelve years—neither its strong points nor its weak ones need extensive discussion. The composer was only twenty-three when he wrote the work in Germany, and in it his generous supply of melodic inventiveness is, not unnaturally, influenced by German romanticism of the period; for a full and distinctive expression of his musical individuality, we have to look for works of a somewhat later day, such as the four titled piano sonatas. But in its formal finish and advantageous use of its instrumental medium, it is a noteworthy work, and probably the only American composition in this form which has maintained itself in the regular repertoire for nearly fifty years.

Mr. Sanroma and the orchestra gave the concerto a well balanced performance. The pianist, who treated his share of the work as an integral part of a unified whole rather than as display music against a background, played with his customary digital deftness and artistic style and ability to distinguish fine points of shading, and gave an admirable interpretation of the strongest part of the composition, the swift-paced, light-footed presto.

Mr. Foote, born eight years before MacDowell, is probably the dean of living New England composers; his suite in E, first played twenty-eight years ago, still impresses as very viable, notably well constructed music, and in its performance yesterday spoke well for the quality and sonority of the Boston Symphony's strings. Praise also was merited by the interpretation of the Franck symphony, which had its first performance in Paris sixteen days before MacDowell first played his second concerto here on March 5, 1889.

161

THE BOSTON HERALD, SUNDAY, JANUARY 10, 19

Mitropoulos at Symphony; Hess and

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
JAN 10 1937

Second Visit Here by Boston Symphony Ends

Koussevitzky Is Director at Carnegie Hall; Two American Works Played

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, closed its [redacted] York visit of the season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall with a program of which the first half was devoted to two American works, Arthur Foote's suite for strings, in E major, and Edward MacDowell's second piano concerto, in D minor, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as the soloist. Cesar Franck's [redacted]y followed the intermission.

The Bostonians had already played the concerto in Boston and Cambridge a few weeks ago in observance of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the composer's birth (December 18), and yesterday's performance could be regarded as filling a similar purpose in the city where MacDowell was born and died. As the best known of MacDowell's larger works—this was its eighth appearance in a New York program in twelve years—neither its strong points nor its weak ones need extensive discussion. The composer was only twenty-three when he wrote the work in Germany, and in it his generous supply of melodic inventiveness is, not unnaturally, influenced by German romanticism of the period; for a full and distinctive expression of his musical individuality, we have to look for works of a somewhat later day, such as the four titled piano sonatas. But in its formal finish and advantageous use of its instrumental medium, it is a noteworthy work, and probably the only American composition in this form which has maintained itself in the regular repertoire for nearly fifty years.

Mr. Sanroma and the orchestra gave the concerto a well balanced performance.

Mr. Foote, born eight years before MacDowell, is probably the dean of living New England composers; his suite in E, first played twenty-eight years ago, still impresses as very viable, notably well constructed music, and in its performance yesterday spoke well for the quality and sonority of the Boston Symphony's strings. Praise also was merited by the interpretation of the Franck symphony, which had its first performance in Paris sixteen days before MacDowell first played his second concerto here on March 5, 1889.

Barbirolli Conducts Symphony

John Barbirolli conducted the last concert but one of his season with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra yesterday evening in Carnegie Hall, beginning his program brilliantly with a Trumpet Voluntary by Purcell, arranged for organ, brass and percussion instruments by Sir Henry Wood, and last played here by the Boston Symphony in March, 1926. In the short but stirring course of this work Harry Glantz played with remarkable virtuosity as the solo trumpeter, with Melchiorre Mauro-Cottone as the organist.

John Corigliano, the orchestra's assistant concertmaster, was the soloist in Max Bruch's second violin concerto, in D minor, last played here with orchestra eleven years ago in a Metropolitan Opera concert by César Thomson. Much less known nowadays than its predecessor in G minor, this concerto still offers much likable music, while of uneven interest. Mr. Corigliano gave the solo role a praiseworthy performance, marked by an agile and accurate technique, and a tone of fluent and pleasing quality.

The orchestra was in good form for Elgar's "Enigma" variations, which also had figured in the programs of this season's first week. Mr. Barbirolli, who has been keeping his engagements this week in spite of a lingering touch of grippe, closed the program with Wagner, the Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" and excerpts from Act III of "Die Meistersinger." The same program will be given this afternoon, except for the second number, which will be Mozart's two-piano concerto in E flat, with Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson as soloists.

At the Metropolitan Opera House, Saint-Saens's "Samson et Dalila" was repeated last night in a benefit performance under the auspices of the New York Chapter of Hadassah, with Rene Maison and Gertrud Wettergren

---

Maestro Greets Boston

Dimitri Mitropoulos, distinguished Athenian conductor, practices for his appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday and Saturday. He will play a dual role, as conductor and soloist. Last year he scored a major success here.

Noted Greek Conductor in Boston for Concerts

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS
The Athenian conductor, who arrived in Boston to begin rehearsals for concerts at Sanders Theatre.

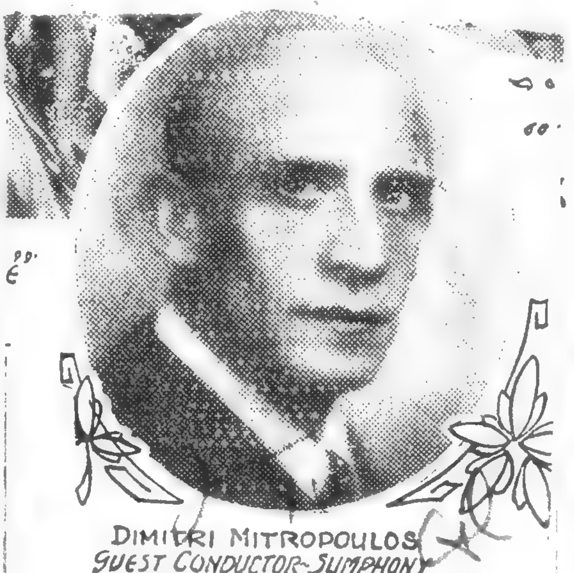
Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Athenian conductor, who a year ago as guest leader of the Symphony Orchestra set musical Boston by the ears, arrived in town yesterday afternoon. Very shortly Mr. Mitropoulos will begin rehearsals for the concerts which he will direct at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, next Thursday evening, and at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Interviewed in the latter auditorium yesterday, Mr. Mitropoulos talked chiefly about the arrangements for string orchestra which he will place on the programme designed for the concerts mentioned above. One of these is a familiar air from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas," called "the only masterpiece of English opera" and written about 1688 when Purcell was 30. The other is that of Beethoven's great string quartet in C-sharp minor, composed the year before his death and the most famous of all the works in its form.

It seems that last summer Mr. Mitropoulos gave a series of concerts in one of the old open-air theatres near Athens. We have heard a great deal about the marvelous acoustic properties of these Greek theatres and have been inclined to doubt the veracity of these stories when confronted with open-air performances in our own country, whether of music or of the drama. But according to Mr. Mitropoulos the acoustics of this theatre are so acute that he had to caution his musicians not to make unnecessary noise in turning their pages. And he found that under these conditions music too rich in color lost proportionately in effect, and that he was forced to turn to compositions in which the emphasis was on moving parts rather than on massed chords or on richness of tonal combination. Hence his recourse to the string quartets of Beethoven, and hence the impending performance in Boston of that in C-sharp minor. Under these peculiar circumstances, Mr. Mitropoulos observed that the music of Purcell was quite as effective as a selection from Wagner's "Tristan," composed more than 250 years later.

Further remarks from this gifted musician, who talks with the animation and intensity which characterize his rehearsing and conducting of an orchestra, had to do with music which he himself composed for performance in this same theatre of Sophocles' "Electra." Rather than try to re-create the ancient Greek music, of which he sagaciously says we know little or nothing, he contrived his music in the modern manner, using incidentally 20 percussion instruments, some of them associated with jazz orchestras, and the result, he was assured, was more Greek than the Greek.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, distinguished head of the Athens Conservatory, who will return to this city as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the absence of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. He will conduct the regular Friday and Saturday concerts this week and next, as well as the concert in Sanders Theater, Harvard University, on Thursday night and the third of the Monday Symphonies on Jan. 18.



DIMITRI MITROPOULOS
GUEST CONDUCTOR-SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA-JAN. 15-16-18

Audition for Choristers With Boston Symphony

The opportunity to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, awaits a selected group of men and women vocalists who succeed in passing an audition before the Cecilia Society in the parish house of the Arlington Street Church next Wednesday evening, Jan 13, at 9 o'clock. Candidates are asked to bring a solo showing quality and range of voice. They also are expected to take a sight-reading test.

To the famous mixed chorus of the Cecilia Society falls the distinction of having sung in many important works with the Boston Symphony, not only in Boston but Providence and New York. The choristers volunteer their services. The music performed is drawn chiefly from leading contemporary composers of all nations. A symphony for orchestra with chorus, by the Russian, Tschaporin, is now to be prepared.

Preliminary rehearsals of the Cecilia Society, which is non-sectarian, are held in the parish house of the Arlington Street Church every Wednesday evening, from 7:30 to 9, under the conductorship of Arthur Fiedler. Final rehearsals

---

Mitropoulos in First Guest Appearance Here

Dimitri Mitropoulos made his first appearance as current guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last night. The program consisted of the conductor's arrangement for string orchestra of the Prelude and final air of Dido from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas"; his version for string orchestra of the Beethoven String Quartet in C-sharp minor; Castagnone's "Preludio Giocoso"; Respighi's Toccata for piano and orchestra, with the conductor as soloist and the Second Suite from Casella's "La Donna Serpente." The program, repeated this afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, will be reviewed in Saturday's Transcript.

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS
Greek Conductor, Guest Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra This Week and Next 10, 193

nd

servatory, symphony
l conduct as well as day night

irst ance Here

s made his as current the Boston
in Sanders last night.
ted of the ement for the Prelude from Purneas"; his orchestra of Quartet in astagnone's
Respighi's
d orchestra,
as soloist,
Suite from Serpente."
eated this day evening will be re-
Transcript.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 10 1937

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall—Cassado in Recital.

Trust Serge Koussevitzky to remember an occasion and to observe it in the proper fashion and spirit. At yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky and his men twined a tonal wreath in memory of the late American composer, Edward MacDowell, who was born seventy-five years ago last December. It took the form of MacDowell's Second Piano Concerto, and Jesús María Sanromá assisted as the soloist. Since the Bostonians did not visit New York last month, the gesture of remembrance was carried over.

Sharing the program with the MacDowell concerto were Arthur Foote's Suite in E, for string orchestra, Op. 63, and César Franck's D minor Symphony. Mr. Foote, who is alive today at the age of 83, was a contemporary of MacDowell's, and it was fitting that the music of these two Americans should stand side by side as the first half of the program.

Under Mr. Koussevitzky's warm-hearted direction, the concerto received an enamoring performance. The score was written when MacDowell was about 25, and it is a young man's music. A romantic glow pervades the work. The first theme assigned to the piano in the opening movement, larghetto calmato, has a sweetness of feeling and gentleness of fragrance that set the tone for the work. Not that this is languishing and perfumed music. It has vigor and thrust and manliness; the sentiment is never cloying. The second movement is light-hearted but subtly so, and the last rounds out an agreeable work.

This concerto sees the light of day from time to time, but not often enough for the average concert-goer to be thoroughly acquainted with it. A performance such as Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra and Mr. Sanromá gave it might help, perhaps, to place it in the répertoire more frequently. It deserves occasional performances. Even if its inspiration draws its roots from Europe's romantic sources, MacDowell wrote with individuality in many of its pages.

Mr. Koussevitzky understood the period into which the concerto falls and imparted to it the scope and framework that set it off most happily. Mr. Sanromá played with crispness and assurance but did not overlook the tenderness and color of the music. If there is such a thing as quiet virtuosity, Mr. Sanromá exemplified it. Brilliant scale passages had snap and precision, and yet they were not greater than the whole. In songful pages, Mr. Sanromá's piano sang with a sustained cantilena. He is the orchestra's regular pianist. They knew each other. They played throughout with taste and a delightful blend of delicacy and vitality.

Mr. Foote's suite is a craftsman's work. The composer scores for strings with a knowledge of their qualities that was possible for a man who had immersed himself in the tradition of Brahms and the classics. This music has a full-bodied sweep and, at the same time, it is pared down to the essentials of its thematic material. Thus the pizzicato section of the second movement is a charming bit of writing, and the fugue that is the last movement builds up with the certainty of its great and honorable predecessors.

For the string contingent of the Boston Symphony, the suite offered opportunities to display its brilliant tone, its admirable coordination and its finely shaded nuances of color and phrasing. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted this work as if he believed in its value, which, though it may not be for all time and all men, is not inconsiderable.

The Franck symphony was resplendently played. After its first performance about five decades ago, Papa Franck was pleased that his work "sounded well." "Sounded well," indeed! The quality of the Boston's magnificent playing was something rare for orchestral concerts in any season. The tone was utterly transparent and full. Each choir had character and melted into an ensemble that was opulent and mellow and wholly memorable.

H. T.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN

JAN 10 1937

'Cello Recital By Cassado Acclaimed

By GRENA BENNETT.

Outstanding among the number of yesterday's music events was the first local 'cello recital of Gaspar Cassado in Town Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Cassado made his American debut as soloist at a recent concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra and was immediately acclaimed a musician of prime talent.

He amply qualified that impression at yesterday's event even though the acute listener discerned occasional scratchy intrusions on what were otherwise rich, luscious tones. Despite this, one recognzied the command of the instrument and the well-grounded musicianship that marked his interpretations.

Shows Mastery

The auditor was enabled to judge clearly and freely of Mr. Cassado's masterliness in his reading of Bach's Prelude, Sarabande and Gigue (from the C major Suite), played without piano accompaniment. In this, his technical equipment was superbly revealed, accomplishing florid measures and episodes of delicate tonal tracery with the fluency and faultlessness of a ranking violinist.

Besides that work he played a Toccata by Francobaldi; F major Sonata by Strauss, and pieces by Tschaikovsky, Granados, Laserna, and an original Requiebos, ably supported by Arpad Sandor at the piano.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ended its second metropolitan visit with a program of pieces by modern composers, in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon.

Difficult Pieces

In the list were Foote's E major Suite for string orchestra; MacDowells D minor Concerto, featuring Jesus Maria Sauroma at the piano; and Franck's D minor symphony.

* * *

Georges Enesco, renowned composer, ~~violinist~~ and conductor (who will shortly direct the Philharmonic) gave a recital last evening at the McMillan Theatre.

* * *

Grace Castagnetta was heard in an evening recital of piano composition at Town Hall. Her program contained works by Bach, Reger, Schubert, Haydn. Shostakovich, Weinberger and Debussy.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 11 1937

MacDowell Honored by Boston Symphony.

Commemorating—somewhat tardily—the seventy-fifth anniversary of Edward MacDowell's birth, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, played the American composer's D minor piano concerto (No. 2) in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon.

In a performance that combined brilliant virtuosity, lyric sweep, and a rich palette of tonal tints, Mr. Sanroma left little to be desired. Moreover, Mr. Koussevitzky and his men provided an opulent orchestral background. If anyone needed convincing that this is music of thrilling power, excitement, and exuberant dash, here was proof conclusive.

As companion piece on the first half of the program Mr. Koussevitzky offered the American Arthur Foote's Suite in E major for string orchestra. The massed string choirs did the work proud in an eloquent and crystal-clear reading that gave life to every detail of its craftsmanlike facture.

In Cesar Franck's D minor symphony, which ended the concert, the organization emptied all its coffers of tonal splendor.

L. B.

GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

1/7/37

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in one of its regular subscription concerts at Carnegie Hall, New York, to-night, a portion of which will be broadcast from 8.45 to 9.30 p.m., over a WJZ hook-up. The first performance in New York of Alfredo Casella's revision of Clementi's Symphony in D will be given during the concert. Foote's Suite in E Major for String Orchestra, Opus 63, will open the broadcast.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 11 1937

Boston Symphony Concert

Orchestra Presents Two Unfamiliar Works by Americans in Matinee Program.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

After the brilliant exhibition of virtuosity in Thursday night's concert, the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Saturday matinee turned to the less exciting, but more important, business of presenting two works by Americans. Neither was new, but one was probably unknown to the present generation of local music lovers.

This was the E major suite for strings of Arthur Foote, born in 1853, and still living in Boston. The suite was completed in 1908, but its performance demonstrated that it is music possessed of persisting vitality.

Mr. Foote belonged to the generation of musicians who began their development under Prof. John Knowles Paine of Harvard, and they all obtained from him a sound training in the fundamental principles of composition. Mr. Foote's suite, in three movements—though the second is practically two movements in one—was heard by the audience with manifest pleasure. The first and third sections of the second movement are a pizzicato ostinato resembling that in Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony. But the thematic material is Mr. Foote's own, and the contrasting adgietto, which is the central section, is a charming bit of sentimental writing in the manner of the early romantics. The first movement, with its well wrought imitations, is clearly designed and firmly constructed, and the finale is a vigorous and melodious fugue with an effective pedal point and a stirring finish. The suite was performed in true Boston Symphony style, and conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky with evident relish.

The other native work was Edward McDowell's piano concerto No. 2, in D minor. It has not been entirely neglected. It was played here February 12. 1935, by a young soloist with the National Orchestral Association, and November 11, 1934, by the promising young American pianist, Beveridge Webster, with the Philharmonic-Symphony Society under Werner Jansen. Discussion of the music of McDowell leads to delicate ground, since the often repeated assertion that he was the best of all our native composers easily advances to the claim of a place for him among the great masters of the world.

It is hardly necessary to pursue that subject, but it can be said that, if this concerto in D minor had been stamped "made in Germany" it would always be heard with grave consideration and awarded plentiful applause. It is a well knit work, uniting piano and orchestra firmly in the scheme of its development, and affording opportunities for the display of singing cantilena, sonorous chord declamation and scintillating passage work in the solo part. The player Saturdav was the Puerto Rican pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, long a resident of Boston and closely associated with the orchestra of that city. His performance was opulent in tone, technically admirable and in plan and execution thoroughly musicianly. The applause at its conclusion was of the kind whose significance is unmistakable. The concert ended with the well-seasoned symphony of Cesar Franck.

THE MICROPHONE
BOSTON, MASS.

Thursday, Jan 14/37

Highlights

P.M.

4.30—Metropolitan Opera Guild Program, NBC-WJZ
7.30—Alexander Woollcott, "Town Crier," CBS-WABC
8.00—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dimitri Metropoulos, conductor, NBC-WJZ
Rudy Vallee, NBC-WEAF
Walter Huston, Nan Sutherland, CBS-WABC
10.00—Music Hall, Bing Crosby, NBC-WEAF
Floyd Gibbons, CBS-WABC
10.30—March of Time, CBS-WABC

---

162 Jan.

CANTON, O.
REPOSITORY 7/37

The Boston Symphony orchestra will broadcast a 45 minute program over the Blue network at 8:45.

The new policy of guest stars on "Show Boat" will be inaugurated at 9 over the Red network with Robert Benchley, monologist, and Margaret McCrae, blues singer.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

JAN 11 1937

WORDS AND MUSIC

Koussevitzky Surprises Audience With Selections

Compositions Rarely Heard in U. S. Are "Exhumed" and Prove of Interest—Week End Offers Unusual Radio Music

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY devoted the first half of the Boston Symphony's Saturday matinee at Carnegie Hall to a couple of American composers who are not the fashion at the moment. Indeed, compared with the work of some of our atonal natives the compositions of this pair heard on Saturday are quite Victorian.

What prompted the Boston conductor to place this music before a knowing New York audience I cannot imagine, unless it was that he liked the scores. But whatever his reasons were his gesture toward our musical past proved one thing at least—that the old boys knew their business better than those who came after them.

The compositions that Mr. Kousite in ches-ward
Cons too with e the per-who e for etive tions way major Suite of this respectable Bostonian was composed as far back as 1907, but I cannot recall having heard it before Mr. Koussevitzky brought it to my attention.

I was prepared to find it a musty and innocuous imitation of the European muse of the period. Imagine my astonishment when it turned out to be a virile piece of writing, expertly fashioned! It did not, to be sure, pose anything startlingly original. But has anything startlingly original been composed in America in the last quarter of a century, outside of the realm of Jazz? What was impressive about Mr. Foote's Suite was its excellent craftsmanship, its melodic bias and the feeling it gave one that the composer was thoroughly familiar with his medium. If the "Pizzicato" section reminded one a little of a like movement in a Tchaikovsky symphony, and if the final "Fugue" seemed like a good many other fugues in the literature of music, their clarity of form and the honesty of their workmanship, as well as a complete absence of pretentiousness, made the listener, if not enthusiastic, at least respectful. Such an attitude is seldom induced by the labors of our modern frantic young men which are as derivative as Mr. Foote's Suite, but not nearly so honestly contrived.

On Sunday afternoon at the same hall Mr. Barbirolli said adieu to New York until next fall with a program that included Elgar's "Enigma" Variations, a "Trumpet Voluntary" by Pursell-Wood, Mozart's Concerto in E flat for two pianos (played by the excellent team of Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson), the Tannhauser "Bacchanale" and some excerpts from "Die Meistersinger."

For persons who suffer from influenza hangovers the radio this past week end has been both a cultural force and a musical delight. There was, for example, the Radio City Music Hall broadcast of the first act of "Die Walkuere" by Mr. Rappee and his accustomed forces. Mr. Jan Peerce, familiar to Music Hall patrons as a purveyor of popular ballads, sang the role of Siegmund, and it seemed to me that I had never heard the part sung so beautifully, so easily and so intelligently. If Mr. Peerce's voice is ample enough to fill the great spaces of the Metropolitan—and perhaps it is—there should be gold for that institution in this amazing young tenor's throat.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

JAN 7 - 1937

Good Radio Music

By JAMES THRASHER

One of the most talked-of compositions of the present season is not some startling contemporary work. Rather, it is the D Major Symphony of Muzio Clementi (1752-1832), revised by Algredo Casella and presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, not long ago for its first American hearing.

Tonight the Bostonians are to play it on a broadcast at 7:45 o'clock on NBC's Blue network (WIRE at 8 o'clock). Discerning critics have given both composer and arranger unstinted praise, and we are led to believe that the work is not, as are so many "resurrections," merely a novelty, but a symphony of serious intent and obvious worth.

Clementi's name is known to most pianists as the composer of the indispensable and often loathed studies, the Gradus ad Parnassum. Now is seems that this man, rival of Mozart, teacher of such artists as Cramer and Field, manufacturer of pianos, also found time to enrich orchestral literature.

This symphony evidently is one written for the Philharmonic Orchestra in London, where he spent his last years and in whose Westminster Abbey he is buried. Mr. Casella, we understand, has achieved the present reconstruction through great obstacles. Over a number of years he has collected scattered sheets of the manuscript from the British Museum and private collectors in the United States and Europe.

The broadcast will be from one of the Boston orchestra's regular subscription series concerts in Carnegie Hall, New York, and will afford New Yorkers their first hearing of the Clementi work.

# #

For the second time this week the master violinist, Joseph Szigeti, will be heard on Columbia network stations. Sunday he was the New York Philharmonic-Symphony's soloist, and tomorrow he will appear with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra playing the Mendelssohn Concerto in E Minor. The broadcast will be at 2 p. m. over WFBM.

Dr. Vladimir Bakaleinikoff, the associate conductor, will direct the orchestra in the last three movements of Sibelius' Fourth Symphony; a manuscript performance of Milton Rosen's fantasy, "Americana;" the Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and a movement from the "Hary Janos" Suite by Zoltan Kodaly.

# #

Proud of the fact that she was the first opera star to sing a duet with Bing Crosby Grete Stueckgold returns for her fourth guest appearance with Bing at 9 o'clock tonight over WLW. Bing gave Mme. Stueckgold a few pointers on crooning at her first appearance, and they're planning to show her improvement with another duet tonight. 5-12

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 10 1937

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall—Cassado in Recital.

Trust Serge Koussevitzky to remember an occasion and to observe it in the proper fashion and spirit. At yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, Mr, Koussevitzky and his men twined a tonal wreath in memory of the late American composer, Edward MacDowell, who was born seventy-five years ago last December. It took the form of MacDowell's Second Piano Concerto, and Jesús María Sanromá assisted as the soloist. Since the Bostonians did not visit New York last month, the gesture of remembrance was carried over.

Sharing the program with the MacDowell concerto were Arthur Foote's Suite in E, for string orchestra, Op. 63, and César Franck's D minor Symphony. Mr. Foote, who is alive today at the age of 83, was a contemporary of MacDowell's, and it was fitting that the music of these two Americans should stand side by side as the first half of the program.

Under Mr. Koussevitzky's warm-hearted direction, the concerto received an enamoring performance. The score was written when MacDowell was about 25, and it is a young man's music. A romantic glow pervades the work. The first theme assigned to the piano in the opening movement, larghetto calmato, has a sweetness of feeling and gentleness of fragrance that set the tone for the work. Not that this is languishing and perfumed music. It has vigor and thrust and manliness; the sentiment is never cloying. The second movement is light-hearted but subtly so, and the last rounds out an agreeable work.

This concerto sees the light of day from time to time, but not often enough for the average concertgoer to be thoroughly acquainted with it. A performance such as Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra and Mr. Sanromá gave it might help, perhaps, to place it in the réper-toire more frequently. It deserves occasional performances. Even if its inspiration draws its roots from Europe's romantic sources, MacDowell wrote with individuality in many of its pages.

Mr. Koussevitzky understood the period into which the concerto falls and imparted to it the scope and framework that set it off most happily. Mr. Sanromá played with crispness and assurance but did not overlook the tenderness and color of the music. If there is such a thing as quiet virtuosity, Mr. Sanromá exemplified it. Brilliant scale passages had snap and precision, and yet they were not greater than the whole. In songful pages, Mr. Sanromá's piano sang with a sustained cantilena. He is the orchestra's regular pianist. They knew each other. They played throughout with taste and a delightful blend of delicacy and vitality.

Mr. Foote's suite is a craftsman's work. The composer scores for strings with a knowledge of their qualities that was possible for a man who had immersed himself in the tradition of Brahms and the classics. This music has a full-bodied sweep and, at the same time, it is pared down to the essentials of its thematic material. Thus the pizzicato section of the second movement is a charming bit of writing, and the fugue that is the last movement builds up with the certainty of its great and honorable predecessors.

For the string contingent of the Boston Symphony, the suite offered opportunities to display its brilliant tone, its admirable coordination and its finely shaded nuances of color and phrasing. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted this work as if he believed in its value, which, though it may not be for all time and all men, is not inconsiderable.

The Franck symphony was resplendently played. After its first performance about five decades ago, Papa Franck was pleased that his work "sounded well." "Sounded well," indeed! The quality of the Boston's magnificent playing was something rare for orchestral concerts in any season. The tone was utterly transparent and full. Each choir had character and melted into an ensemble that was opulent and mellow and wholly memorable.

H. T.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN

JAN 10 1937

'Cello Recital By Cassado Acclaimed

By GRENA BENNETT.

Outstanding among the number of yesterday's music events was the first local 'cello recital of Gaspar Cassado in Town Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Cassado made his American debut as soloist at a recent concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra and was immediately acclaimed a musician of prime talent.

He amply qualified that impression at yesterday's event even though the acute listener discerned occasional scratchy intrusions on what were otherwise rich, luscious tones. Despite this, one recognzied the command of the instrument and the well-grounded musicianship that marked his interpretations.

Shows Mastery

The auditor was enabled to judge clearly and freely of Mr. Cassado's masterliness in his reading of Bach's Prelude, Sarabande and Gigue (from the C major Suite), played without piano accompaniment. In this, his technical equipment was superbly revealed, accomplishing florid measures and episodes of delicate tonal tracery with the fluency and faultlessness of a ranking violinist.

Besides that work he played a Toccata by Francobaldi; F major Sonata by Strauss, and pieces by Tschaikovsky, Granados, Laserna, and an original Requiebos, ably supported by Arpad Sandor at the piano.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ended its second metropolitan visit with a program of pieces by modern composers, in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon.

Difficult Pieces

In the list were Foote's E major Suite for string orchestra; MacDowells D minor Concerto, featuring Jesus Maria Sauroma at the piano; and Franck's D minor symphony.

* * *

Georges Enesco, renowned composer, ~~violinist~~ and conductor (who will shortly direct the Philharmonic) gave a recital last evening at the McMillan Theatre.

* * *

Grace Castagnetta was heard in an evening recital of piano composition at Town Hall. Her program contained works by Bach, Reger, Schubert, Haydn, Shostakovich, Weinberger and Debussy.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 11 1937

MacDowell Honored by Boston Symphony.

Commemorating—somewhat tardily—the seventy-fifth anniversary of Edward MacDowell's birth, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, played the American composer's D minor piano concerto (No. 2) in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon.

In a performance that combined brilliant virtuosity, lyric sweep, and a rich palette of tonal tints, Mr. Sanroma left little to be desired. Moreover, Mr. Koussevitzky and his men provided an opulent orchestral background. If anyone needed convincing that this is music of thrilling power, excitement, and exuberant dash, here was proof conclusive.

As companion piece on the first half of the program Mr. Koussevitzky offered the American Arthur Foote's Suite in E major for string orchestra. The massed string choirs did the work proud in an eloquent and crystal-clear reading that gave life to every detail of its craftsmanlike facture.

In Cesar Franck's D minor symphony, which ended the concert, the organization emptied all its coffers of tonal splendor.

L. B.

GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.

1/7/37

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in one of its regular subscription concerts at Carnegie Hall, New York, to-night, a portion of which will be broadcast from 8.45 to 9.30 p.m., over a WJZ hook-up. The first performance in New York of Alfredo Casella's revision of Clementi's Symphony in D will be given during the concert. Foote's Suite in E Major for String Orchestra, Opus 63, will open the broadcast.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 11 1937

Boston Symphony Concert

Orchestra Presents Two Unfamiliar Works by Americans in Matinee Program.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

After the brilliant exhibition of virtuosity in Thursday night's concert, the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Saturday matinee turned to the less exciting, but more important, business of presenting two works by Americans. Neither was new, but one was probably unknown to the present generation of local music lovers.

This was the E major suite for strings of Arthur Foote, born in 1853, and still living in Boston. The suite was completed in 1908, but its performance demonstrated that it is music possessed of persisting vitality.

Mr. Foote belonged to the generation of musicians who began their development under Prof. John Knowles Paine of Harvard, and they all obtained from him a sound training in the fundamental principles of composition. Mr. Foote's suite, in three movements—though the second is practically two movements in one—was heard by the audience with manifest pleasure. The first and third sections of the second movement are a pizzicato ostinato resembling that in Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony. But the thematic material is Mr. Foote's own, and the contrasting adgietto, which is the central section, is a charming bit of sentimental writing in the manner of the early romantics. The first movement, with its well wrought imitations, is clearly designed and firmly constructed, and the finale is a vigorous and melodious fugue with an effective pedal point and a stirring finish. The suite was performed in true Boston Symphony style, and conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky with evident relish.

The other native work was Edward McDowell's piano concerto No. 2, in D minor. It has not been entirely neglected. It was played here February 12. 1935, by a young soloist with the National Orchestral Association, and November 11, 1934, by the promising young American pianist, Beveridge Webster, with the Philharmonic-Symphony Society under Werner Jansen. Discussion of the music of McDowell leads to delicate ground, since the often repeated assertion that he was the best of all our native composers easily advances to the claim of a place for him among the great masters of the world.

It is hardly necessary to pursue that subject, but it can be said that, if this concerto in D minor had been stamped "made in Germany" it would always be heard with grave consideration and awarded plentiful applause. It is a well knit work, uniting piano and orchestra firmly in the scheme of its development, and affording opportunities for the display of singing cantilena, sonorous chord declamation and scintillating passage work in the solo part. The player Saturdav was the Puerto Rican pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, long a resident of Boston and closely associated with the orchestra of that city. His performance was opulent in tone, technically admirable and in plan and execution thoroughly musicianly. The applause at its conclusion was of the kind whose significance is unmistakable. The concert ended with the well-seasoned symphony of Cesar Franck.

THE MICROPHONE
BOSTON, MASS.

Thursday, Jan 14/37

Highlights

P.M.

- 4.30—Metropolitan Opera Guild Program, NBC-WJZ
- 7.30—Alexander Woollcott, "Town Crier," CBS-WABC
- 8.00—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dmitri Metropoulos, conductor, NBC-WJZ
- Rudy Vallee, NBC-WEAF
- Walter Huston, Nan Sutherland, CBS-WABC
- 10.00—Music Hall, Bing Crosby, NBC-WEAF
- Floyd Gibbons, CBS-WABC
- 10.30—March of Time, CBS-WABC

---

162 Jan.

CANTON, O.
REPOSITORY 7/37

The Boston Symphony orchestra will broadcast a 45 minute program over the Blue network at 8:45.

The new policy of guest stars on "Show Boat" will be inaugurated at 9 over the Red network with Robert Benchley, monologist, and Margaret McCrae, blues singer.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

JAN 11 1937

WORDS AND MUSIC

Koussevitzky Surprises Audience With Selections

Compositions Rarely Heard in U. S. Are "Exhumed" and Prove of Interest—Week End Offers Unusual Radio Music

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY devoted the first half of the Boston Symphony's Saturday matinee at Carnegie Hall to a couple of American composers who are not the fashion at the moment. Indeed, compared with the work of some of our atonal natives the compositions of this pair heard on Saturday are quite Victorian.

What prompted the Boston conductor to place this music before a knowing New York audience I cannot imagine, unless it was that he liked the scores. But whatever his reasons were his gesture toward our musical past proved one thing at least—that the old boys knew their business better than those who came after them.

The compositions that Mr. Koussevitzky exhumed were a Suite in E major, Op. 63, for String Orchestra, by Arthur Foote, and Edward MacDowell's Second Piano Concerto. Perhaps exhumation is too strong a term in connection with the MacDowell Concerto, since the work receives an occasional performance by American virtuosi who regard it as a suitable vehicle for their technical and interpretive gifts. Certainly, the compositions of Mr. Foote rarely find their way into our concert halls. The E major Suite of this respectable Bostonian was composed as far back as 1907, but I cannot recall having heard it before Mr. Koussevitzky brought it to my attention.

I was prepared to find it a musty and innocuous imitation of the European muse of the period. Imagine my astonishment when it turned out to be a virile piece of writing, expertly fashioned! It did not, to be sure, pose anything startlingly original. But has anything startlingly original been composed in America in the last quarter of a century, outside of the realm of Jazz? What was impressive about Mr. Foote's Suite was its excellent craftsmanship, its melodic bias and the feeling it gave one that the composer was thoroughly familiar with his medium. If the "Pizzicato" section reminded one a little of a like movement in a Tchaikovsky symphony, and if the final "Fugue" seemed like a good many other fugues in the literature of music, their clarity of form and the honesty of their workmanship, as well as a complete absence of pretentiousness, made the listener, if not enthusiastic, at least respectful. Such an attitude is seldom induced by the labors of our modern frantic young men which are as derivative as Mr. Foote's Suite, but not nearly so honestly contrived.

On Sunday afternoon at the same hall Mr. Barbirolli said adieu to New York until next fall with a program that included Elgar's "Enigma" Variations, a "Trumpet Voluntary" by Pursell-Wood, Mozart's Concerto in E flat for two pianos (played by the excellent team of Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson), the Tannhauser "Bacchanale" and some excerpts from "Die Meistersinger."

For persons who suffer from influenza hangovers the radio this past week end has been both a cultural force and a musical delight. There was, for example, the Radio City Music Hall broadcast of the first act of "Die Walkuere" by Mr. Rappee and his accustomed forces. Mr. Jan Peerce, familiar to Music Hall patrons as a purveyor of popular ballads, sang the role of Siegmund, and it seemed to me that I had never heard the part sung so beautifully, so easily and so intelligently. If Mr. Peerce's voice is ample enough to fill the great spaces of the Metropolitan—and perhaps it is—there should be gold for that institution in this amazing young tenor's throat.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

N 7 - 193

34c
81c
9c
19c
M
D
65c D. and

One some sta of Muzio by the B not long
Toni on NBC given both compos
unstinted praise, and we are led to believe that the work is not, as are so many "resurrections," merely a novelty, but a symphony of serious intent and obvious worth.

Clementi's name is known to most pianists as the composer of the indispensable and often loathed studies, the Gradus ad Parnassum. Now is seems that this man, rival of Mozart, teacher of such artists as Cramer and Field, manufacturer of pianos, also found time to enrich orchestral literature.

This symphony evidently is one written for the Philharmonic Orchestra in London, where he spent his last years and in whose Westminster Abbey he is buried. Mr. Casella, we understand, has achieved the present reconstruction through great obstacles. Over a number of years he has collected scattered sheets of the manuscript from the British Museum and private collectors in the United States and Europe.

The broadcast will be from one of the Boston orchestra's regular subscription series concerts in Carnegie Hall, New York, and will afford New Yorkers their first hearing of the Clementi work.

# #

For the second time this week the master violinist, Joseph Szigeti, will be heard on Columbia network stations. Sunday he was the New York Philharmonic-Symphony's soloist, and tomorrow he will appear with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra playing the Mendelssohn Concerto in E Minor. The broadcast will be at 2 p. m. over WFBM.

Dr. Vladimir Bakaleinikoff, the associate conductor, will direct the orchestra in the last three movements of Sibelius' Fourth Symphony; a manuscript performance of Milton Rosen's fantasy, "Americana;" the Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and a movement from the "Hary Janos" Suite by Zoltan Kodaly.

# #

Proud of the fact that she was the first opera star to sing a duet with Bing Crosby Grete Stueckgold returns for her fourth guest appearance with Bing at 9 o'clock tonight over WLW. Bing gave Mme. Stueckgold a few pointers on crooning at her first appearance, and they're planning to show her improvement with another duet tonight.

163

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 11 1937

Music of the Day

Rosa Ponselle Reappears as Carmen—Barbirolli in Farewell Concert—Boston Symphony and Recitalists Fill Weekend

For a while Rosa Ponselle's Carmen at the Metropolitan Saturday afternoon gave critics the rather unusual opportunity of sitting back and watching their opinions of last season take effect. This pleasure lasted for approximately two acts, after which both critics and audience reverted to their 1935-36 position on the edge of the Metropolitan's plush chairs, transfixed by piercing screams, the thud of falling bodies, the gleam of naked steel. Even on the operatic stage there is something disconcerting about the spectacle of a man following a woman with a drawn dagger, and the woman running away, especially if this is kept up for an appreciable period and accompanied by shrieks and gasps not indicated in the score. Last Spring Armand Tokatyan, in the process of portraying Marimee's unhappy hero, preceded the final coup-de-grace with a gratuitous lunge at Miss Castagna as Carmen, and almost fell in the orchestra pit. This should have discouraged repetitions of the device, but it was the last Saturday again, and Sidney Rayner, who executed it, made up for the absence of Mr. Tokatyan's spectacular pirouette by indifferent acting throughout.

The reviewer has not recently examined the stage directions in the score, but if these things are called for the call should, for once, be disregarded. The same goes for the arm-breaking and throwing-to-the-ground of the third act, which are required. There is no room in opera for the smack of flesh upon flesh or the impact of hurled bodies. If naturalism is desired, why not go the whole way and speak the text instead of singing it? (And Miss Ponselle answers this question by actually speaking, even though her "Escamillo's!" and "Je suis a toi's!" would be searched for in vain in the printed music). Singing is a sort of stylized glorification of speech and it should be accomplished either by a stylized glorification of action, such as ballet, or a respectful abstention from all but the most essential gestures.

When Miss Ponselle did sing, however, she revealed considerable improvement in vocal equipment and the manner of its use. Her voice appeared to be rested, and though it never achieved the gentleness occasionally demanded by her part, it did accomplish much at the other extreme when the drama called for macabre coloring. For example, the aria "En vain pour eviter les reponses ameres" was sung in sepulchral tones which were not unpleasant to the ear but which so differed from the customary timbre of the human voice that they seemed not to come from the singer.

Sidney Rayner as Don Jose made one wish that his distinctive and powerful tenor voice might be reserved for occasions whose dramatic requirements allowed him to concentrate more on singing. Time and again he missed musical opportunities because he was too busy making motions; as in act three, where the exertion of throwing Miss Ponselle to the ground and wrestling with her left him no breath for that wonderful climax, "Mais nous nous reverrons!" Julius Huehn cut an impressive figure as Escamillo, and his vocal work, except in the last act, was quite competent. Natalie Bodanya was properly petite and lyric as Micaela, earning a considerable ovation by her "C'est des contrebandiers." The rest of the cast comprised Thelma Votipka (Fransquita), Helen Olheim (Mercedes), George Cehanovsky (Dancaire), Giordano Paltrinieri (Remendado), Louis D'Angelo (Zuniga) and Wilfred Engelman (Morales).

For all its striking costumes (that of Maclovia Ruiz in the "Farucca" was especially remarkable) and its generous expenditure of physical energy, the ballet seems to have only a vague idea of what it wants to say. Gennaro Papi's conducting left much to be desired.

RALPH WINETT.

* * *

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony gave the second in its series of afternoon concerts at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky. The program included two relatively unfamiliar compositions—Arthur Foote's Suite in E Major and MacDowell's Second Piano Concerto, and concluded with a somewhat less unfamiliar work, a certain D Minor Symphony by Cesar Franck.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, the pianist in the Concerto, seems to be an ideal ensemble soloist. Though his part contained bravura passages that would have caused most soloists to bury themselves in the keyboard and let the orchestra shift for itself, Mr. Sanroma kept his eyes at all times on the conductor—so much so that one occasionally wondered how he managed to find the notes, as he did without exception. The result, of course, was perfect ensemble and the kind of rapport that makes the piano not only a solo instrument but also an integral part of the symphonic texture. The concerto itself is an interesting piece of music-making, though not an epochal one. Its ideas and the manner of their expression struck listeners as unorthodox at the end of the last century; and they remain so today, without, however, holding much temptation for composers seeking footsteps to follow.

The Foote suite amounted, apparently, to a frank declaration of its author's indebtedness to Tchaikovsky and Brahms, with here and there an appropriate original development. To both compositions Dr. Koussevitzky imparted the fire and musicianship that are his.

R. W.

* * *

Philharmonic-Symphony

For his last appearance this season with the Philharmonic John Barbirolli augmented the hundred-odd new friends he has made in the orchestra with two old ones, Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson, with whom he shared his student days. The distinguished pianists were heard in the Mozart Two Piano Concerto in E Flat K. 365, which they played with the fine musicianship, technical brilliance and consummate unity that have placed their names in the front ranks of duo-pianistic art.

The Mozart work was preceded by Purcell's "Trumpet Voluntary," in Sir Henry Wood's arrangement for brass, organ and percussion. This three-minute curiosity proved mainly an occasion for Harry Glantz, solo trumpeter, to exhibit his virtuosity. The program continued with Elgar's "Enigma" variations, a composition which seems to grow with repetition, especially under Mr. Barbirolli's sympathetic baton. For the concluding half there was a generous Wagnerian potpourri; the Bacchanale which has to start with a diminished seventh, or else drag in the entire "Tannhaeuser Overture" and excerpts from "Die Maestersinger."

At the conclusion of the concert Mr. Barbirolli; in response to prolonged applause, gave a brief speech in which he expressed gratitude and general satisfaction with the orchestra.

R. W.

Gaspar Cassado

Gaspar Cassado, Catalonian cellist and composer, was heard in his first New York recital Saturday afternoon at Town Hall. Mr. Cassado first became known to American audiences through his compositions. It may be recalled that his Catalonian Rhapsody for Orchestra received its initial performance by the Philharmonic in November, 1928. In the group of Spanish numbers that concluded this program Mr. Cassado included his own Requiebros.

The Prelude, Sarabande and Gigue from Bach's unaccompanied Suite in C constituted the major portion of the opening group. Especially lovely was the Sarabande, which he played with a rare sensitiveness and a tone rich in warmth and color. Mr. Cassado was at his best in the F major Sonata of Richard Strauss, whose early works bear the stamp of the great romanticists. Assisted at the piano by Arpad Sandor, he played this with admirable vitality and skill.

Following the intermission, Mr. Cassado rendered with his customary brilliance the Tchaikovsky Variations on a rococo theme, Op. 36. Although Mr. Cassado proved his worth as a cellist of exceptional musicianship, occasional lapses in intonation were perceptible throughout the afternoon.

F. E. P.

* * *

Grace Castagnetta

Her first public recital in her native city was given by Grace Castagnetta at Town Hall Saturday evening. For the occasion she provided most enlightening program notes. Of unusual interest are her remarks on the Esterhazy Sonata No. 6: "The Haydn Sonata in E major (written in 1773) appeared only recently for the first time with unaltered text, copied from the original prints. According to the previous editions, which had been based on a copy existing in Berlin instead of on the original manuscript in Vienna, it had been a violin sonata. This was wrong. The violin part was written in at a later date. It had been marked ad libitum." This proved to be the evening's highlight, for Miss Castagnetta, aided by her versatile technique, played this with that freshness of spirit so characteristic of Haydn.

The opening and closing selections were by Bach and transcribed by Busoni. The former consisted of two choral preludes, while the later was the familiar Chaconne from the unaccompanied Violin Sonata in D minor. Also of importance was the Variations and Fugue on a Bach theme, Op. 81, by Reger. At times the structure was not always clear in the Chaconne and Fugue. An Allegretto in E major by Schubert, Schostakowitch's Trois Danses Fantastiques, Op. 1, and Miss Castagnetta's own arrangement of the irresistible Polka from "Schwanda" were among the other numbers played. Miss Castagnetta is an exceptionally gifted young lady and should achieve notable success, especially in the realm of lighter music.

F. E. P.

* * *

Jan. 13/37 LOWELL COURIER-CITIZEN,

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters Mav Be Addressed at This Office.

Boston Programs.

The home concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge and in Symphony hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week will mark the return as guest conductor of Dimitri Mitropoulos, the young Greek musician, who made such a good impression last year This time he will be heard also as pianist. The programs will include the Prelude and Final Air of Dido from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas"; arranged by the conductor; his settings for strings of the Beethoven String Quartet in C sharp minor; Respighi's Toccata for Piano and Orchestra, for the first time in Boston; the Second Suite from Casella's "Lan Donna Serpente."

Mr. Mitropoulos will also conduct the supplementary concert in Symphony hall next Monday evening when the program will include Schumann's Cello Concerto with the Spanish cellist, Gaspar Cassado, as the assisting artist.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
JAN 11 1937

3 A. M. "I'm persistent," Abner Silver confesses at the Sapphire Room. "The radio guys banned my song 'When a King Gives Up Everything for Love.' So I go to the big broadcasts and sing it to the studio audiences after the program is over. So I got a radio audience—but not over the air"..."No, I refuse to step foot on Billy Leeds's yacht any more," Pepino vows to Hildegarde at El Morocco. "The last time he invited me aboard for cocktails, I turned around and the ship was sailing. It took me around the world for six months—me, with no clothes on"...Galli-Curci, in a radiant mood, nods to Gloria Swanson at the Rainbow Room. Both, ex-queens in their professions and seeking comebacks, are the heaviest-jeweled of all the wealthy socialites present ...Harmon Nelson, Bette Davis's husband, stares at Lupee Velez and Johnnie Weissmuller. "Hollywood," he sighs, "and Bette. Ahhh!"...At Le Mirage, one of the match promoters whispers: "Bill Tilden will substitute for Vines against Perry."

4 A. M. "This famous comic, forsaken in love, turned on the gas at our apartment," Will Morrissey relates at Lindy's. "I caught him in time, and he pleaded: 'Aw. I got nothin' to live for.' So I socked him in the nose, and he chased me to sock me in return. 'Now, you so and so,' I told him, 'I've given you something to live for!'"...A picket parades in front of the Black Cat cafe. Five minutes later another sign-carrier, employed by the cafe, parades beside him—bearing a sign—"This guy next to me is a fake!"... "Oh, what a boner I pulled," Lew Lehr laments at Leon & Eddie's. "My brother's name is Robert S. Lehr. I read where this horse named 'Robert S.' is running and place $2 on the nag to show. It comes in at about 250 to 1, and I only collect $20"..."My band will play at the Butlers' Ball," Meyer Davis announces at Mon Paris. "And I've arranged it so that four of the music numbers will be conducted—by my butler!"

5 A. M. "Here's a tip," a Washingtonian assures at Dave's. "Schenley's new Public Relations Director will be Leo Sachs, the ex-Minister to Costa Rica"..."Look at this photo of my 19-year-old boy, Alfred," Hiram Bloomingdale exhibits. "He worked in mines to reduce. He's down to 224 lbs. now..."You should've been here earlier," Herman Stark relates at the Cotton Club. "Here's what happened: John Anderson, the critic, sat next to Louis B. Mayer, who asked him: 'What's the name of that guy sitting at the next table?' Anderson answered: 'That's Serge Koussevitzky's...Mayer replied: 'What does he do?' So Anderson told him...'Yeah?' Mayer returned. 'What lot is he on?' Anderson said: 'No lot. He's the famous conductor.' So Mayer said: 'Well, on your sayso—he's got a job with me, starting tomorrow'...Five minutes later Mayer turned to the embarrassed critic and said: 'That's what you expected a Hollywood producer to say, no? Well, I was kidding you. We went to see Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall last Thursday!'"

6 A. M. "...Yes, dear, I'm taking off the NRA label from my coat...What? Of course I believe in the NRA. I think Roosevelt should bring it back...But I've simply got to remove the label. Think I want people to know that I'm wearing last year's coat?"

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

Holland Natives In Boston Orchestra Playing Here Today

With the Boston Chamber Orchestra, which will play in Portland High School Auditorium at 8 p. m. today under the auspices of the Portland Music Teachers' Association, are two natives of Holland, Jacobus C. Langendoen, cellist, and Huber Sauvet, violinist, who began their musical careers at an early age.

Mr. Langendoen, raised in South Africa, started his career with a home-made instrument, taking up the cello after hearing the great cellist Geradi. After studying at the Royal Conservatory in Holland, he came to this Country and for seven years has been solo cellist at "Pops." Mr. Sauvet, a member of a musical family, taught himself the violin and studied at the Conservatory in his native Holland. He played with the Dutch Opera Company in Amsterdam before coming to Boston in 1914 to become a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

ELIZABETH, N. J.
JOURNAL
JAN 13 1937

Club Meetings

Mrs. Mollie Holtz gave the first of a series of talks to the music appreciation group of the Council of Jewish Juniors on Monday evening at the Y. M.-Y. W. H. A. Mrs. Holtz spoke principally of the great metropolitan orchestras, including the New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony and Philadelphia ~~Symphony~~ Orchestra, and of Arturo Toscanani and Leopold Stokowski, as two of the greatest living conductors. She also spoke briefly of Betty Janes, the 15-year-old soprano who recently sprang into fame through her radio broadcasts. Those present were Miss Ethel Solomon, Miss Esther Rice, Miss Rose Cohen, Miss Naomi Holpern. Miss Vivian Grossman, Miss Miriam Kuker, Miss Carolyn Spitzer, Miss Dorothy Farlowe and Miss Nettie Handsher.

The next lecture will be on January 25.

IE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 16,

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT
By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 12th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dimitri Mitropoulos, guest conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Purcell—Prelude adn Final Air of Dido from "Dido and Aeneas," arranged for strings by Mr. Mitropoulos.
Beethoven—String Quartet in C sharp minor Op. 131, arranged for string orchestra.
Respighi—Toccata for piano and orchestra. Mr. Mitropoulos playing the solo part.
Castagnone—Preludio Giocoso.

We were certainly in no doubt last year that Mr. Mitropoulos was a remarkable musician, a conductor who could positively be described as great. It was then made evident that he had a searching insight into the score that the orchestra was to play and that, if necessary, he could embark on an interpretation of amazing penetration. We shall not soon forget his projection of the First Symphony of Mahler. A certain unconventionality in his gestures, a manner of nervous intensity, these were for some a stumbling block in the appreciation of the conductor's great talents. Yet it is the wiser course not to be disturbed by such trivialities, for Mr. Mitropoulos has so much to offer as a leader.

Mr. Mitropoulos is first of all a musician of infinite capacity for knowing the music itself, in detail and as a whole. Without this, of course, no conductor can achieve real fame in his profession. Thus Mr. Mitropoulos's ability as a pianist, so astoundingly demonstrated yesterday, is incidental and subordinate to this capacity. Obviously, he has a prodigious memory, so that he quite honestly has no need of the score at the actual performance. In the instance of some conductors this proclivity has been made a great deal too much of in the press, since the use of the score is no indication of lack of knowledge and is ordinarily advisable. We mention it only in Mr. Mitropoulos's case because his musicianship is above any suspicious circumstances of mere showmanship on that head.

The program yesterday was peculiar, but its peculiarity was justified. We shall have an opportunity after next Monday's concert to comment further on the first two numbers. So let the beauty and dignity of Purcell's music go for the moment by the board. As to the Beethoven Quartet, there must have been some lifting of eyebrows by devout lovers of chamber music. They could have saved themselves the worry. Mr. Mitropoulos can be a fearless transcriber when he wants to be, as in the Bach Organ Prelude and Fugue in G minor which he presented last year. But he has not laid desecrating hands on this work. His reason is that actually so few of the symphonic public ever hear the later quartets of Beethoven, which is perfectly true. Therefore, he felt that an edition for full string orchestra was a sensible idea.

No doubt, the Quartet loses something of transparency in the orchestral version. The lines are perhaps blurred. Yet a good performance—and yesterday's was unbelievably fine—can do much to minimize this defect. Less excellent strings than those of the Boston Symphony might make all the difference between success and failure in the experiment. On the other side the work gains in majesty and power. Beethoven so often transcended the limits of the medium which was supposed to play his music that a larger treatment of the same material is not only suggested but advisable.

Mr. Mitropoulos received an ovation for his conducting and playing the solo part in Respighi's Toccata, partly because a Boston audience, since Muck, has not been accustomed to the practice. There were a few slips on the soloist's part, but on the whole the performance was brilliant. As for the music itself, the adagio and finale are more interesting and more effectively worked out than the prelude. Finally, there was a delightfully witty Prelude by the young Italian composer—unknown here—Riccardo Castagnone, to end an unusual concert. The orchestra unquestionably responded to every demand that Mr. Mitropoulos made upon it.

Next week Mr. Mitroupoulos will also conduct Monday evening (when Casella's Suite, scheduled for this concert, will be played) and next Friday and Saturday. Malipiero's Piano Concerto will be played for the first time in America; Schumann's 2d Symphony and other works will be given.

163

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 11 1937

Music of the Day

Rosa Ponselle Reappears as Carmen—Barbirolli in Farewell Concert—Boston Symphony and Recitalists Fill Weekend

For a while Rosa Ponselle's Carmen at the Metropolitan Saturday afternoon gave critics the rather unusual opportunity of sitting back and watching their opinions of last season take effect. This pleasure lasted for approximately two acts, after which both critics and audience reverted to their 1935-36 position on the edge of the Metropolitan's plush chairs, transfixed by piercing screams, the thud of falling bodies, the gleam of naked steel. Even on the operatic stage there is something disconcerting about the spectacle of a man following a woman with a drawn dagger, and the woman running away, especially if this is kept up for an appreciable period and accompanied by shrieks and gasps not indicated in the score. Last Spring Armand Tokatyan, in the process of portraying Marimee's unhappy hero, preceded the final coup-de-grace with a gratuitous lunge at Miss Castagna as Carmen, and almost fell in the orchestra pit. This should have discouraged repetitions of the device, but it was the last Saturday again, and Sidney Rayner, who executed it, made up for the absence of Mr. Tokatyan's spectacular pirouette by indifferent acting throughout.

The reviewer has not recently examined the stage directions in the score, but if these things are called for the call should, for once, be disregarded. The same goes for the arm-breaking and throwing-to-the-ground of the third act, which are required. There is no room in opera for the smack of flesh upon flesh or the impact of hurled bodies. If naturalism is desired, why not go the whole way and speak the text instead of singing it? (And Miss Ponselle answers this question by actually speaking, even though her "Escamillo's!" and "Je suis a toi's!" would be searched for in vain in the printed music). Singing is a sort of stylized glorification of speech and it should be accomplished either by a stylized glorification of action, such as ballet, or a respectful abstention from all but the most essential gestures.

When Miss Ponselle did sing, however, she revealed considerable improvement in vocal equipment and the manner of its use. Her voice appeared to be rested, and though it never achieved the gentleness occasionally demanded by her part, it did accomplish much at the other extreme when the drama called for macabre coloring. For example, the aria "En vain pour eviter les reponses ameres" was sung in sepulchral tones which were not unpleasant to the ear but which so differed from the customary timbre of the human voice that they seemed not to come from the singer.

Sidney Rayner as Don Jose made one wish that his distinctive and powerful tenor voice might be reserved for occasions whose dramatic requirements allowed him to concentrate more on singing. Time and again he missed musical opportunities because he was too busy making motions; as in act three, where the exertion of throwing Miss Ponselle to the ground and wrestling with her left him no breath for that wonderful climax, "Mais nous nous reverrons!" Julius Huehn cut an impressive figure as Escamillo, and his vocal work, except in the last act, was quite competent. Natalie Bodanya was properly petite and lyric as Micaela, earning a considerable ovation by her "C'est des contrebandiers." The rest of the cast comprised Thelma Votipka (Fransquita), Helen Olheim (Mercedes), George Cehanovsky (Dancaire), Giordano Paltrinieri (Remendado), Louis D'Angelo (Zuniga) and Wilfred Engelman (Morales).

For all its striking costumes (that of Maclovia Ruiz in the "Farucca" was especially remarkable) and its generous expenditure of physical energy, the ballet seems to have only a vague idea of what it wants to say. Gennaro Papi's conducting left much to be desired.

RALPH WINETT.

* * *

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony gave the second in its series of afternoon concerts at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky. The program included two relatively unfamiliar compositions—Arthur Foote's Suite in E Major and MacDowell's Second Piano Concerto, and concluded with a somewhat less unfamiliar work, a certain D Minor Symphony by Cesar Franck.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, the pianist in the Concerto, seems to be an ideal ensemble soloist. Though his part contained bravura passages that would have caused most soloists to bury themselves in the keyboard and let the orchestra shift for itself, Mr. Sanroma kept his eyes at all times on the conductor—so much so that one occasionally wondered how he managed to find the notes, as he did without exception. The result, of course, was perfect ensemble and the kind of rapport that makes the piano not only a solo instrument but also an integral part of the symphonic texture. The concerto itself is an interesting piece of music-making, though not an epochal one. Its ideas and the manner of their expression struck listeners as unorthodox at the end of the last century; and they remain so today, without, however, holding much temptation for composers seeking footsteps to follow.

The Foote suite amounted, apparently, to a frank declaration of its author's indebtedness to Tchaikovsky and Brahms, with here and there an appropriate original development. To both compositions Dr. Koussevitzky imparted the fire and musicianship that are his.

R. W.

* * *

Philharmonic-Symphony

For his last appearance this season with the Philharmonic John Barbirolli augmented the hundred-odd new friends he has made in the orchestra with two old ones, Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson, with whom he shared his student days. The distinguished pianists were heard in the Mozart Two Piano Concerto in E Flat K. 365, which they played with the fine musicianship, technical brilliance and consummate unity that have placed their names in the front ranks of duo-pianistic art.

The Mozart work was preceded by Purcell's "Trumpet Voluntary," in Sir Henry Wood's arrangement for brass, organ and percussion. This three-minute curiosity proved mainly an occasion for Harry Glantz, solo trumpeter, to exhibit his virtuosity. The program continued with Elgar's "Enigma" variations, a composition which seems to grow with repetition, especially under Mr. Barbirolli's sympathetic baton. For the concluding half there was a generous Wagnerian potpourri; the Bacchanale which has to start with a diminished seventh, or else drag in the entire "Tannhaeuser Overture" and excerpts from "Die Maestersinger."

At the conclusion of the concert Mr. Barbirolli, in response to prolonged applause, gave a brief speech in which he expressed gratitude and general satisfaction with the orchestra.

R. W.

Gaspar Cassado

Gaspar Cassado, Catalonian cellist and composer, was heard in his first New York recital Saturday afternoon at Town Hall. Mr. Cassado first became known to American audiences through his compositions. It may be recalled that his Catalonian Rhapsody for Orchestra received its initial performance by the Philharmonic in November, 1928. In the group of Spanish numbers that concluded this program Mr. Cassado included his own Requiebros.

The Prelude, Sarabande and Gigue from Bach's unaccompanied Suite in C constituted the major portion of the opening group. Especially lovely was the Sarabande, which he played with a rare sensitiveness and a tone rich in warmth and color. Mr. Cassado was at his best in the F major Sonata of Richard Strauss, whose early works bear the stamp of the great romanticists. Assisted at the piano by Arpad Sandor, he played this with admirable vitality and skill.

Following the intermission, Mr. Cassado rendered with his customary brilliance the Tchaikovsky Variations on a rococo theme, Op. 36. Although Mr. Cassado proved his worth as a cellist of exceptional musicianship, occasional lapses in intonation were perceptible throughout the afternoon.

F. E. P.

* * *

Grace Castagnetta

Her first public recital in her native city was given by Grace Castagnetta at Town Hall Saturday evening. For the occasion she provided most enlightening program notes. Of unusual interest are her remarks on the Esterhazy Sonata No. 6: "The Haydn Sonata in E major (written in 1773) appeared only recently for the first time with unaltered text, copied from the original prints. According to the previous editions, which had been based on a copy existing in Berlin instead of on the original manuscript in Vienna, it had been a violin sonata. This was wrong. The violin part was written in at a later date. It had been marked ad libitum." This proved to be the evening's highlight, for Miss Castagnetta, aided by her versatile technique, played this with that freshness of spirit so characteristic of Haydn.

The opening and closing selections were by Bach and transcribed by Busoni. The former consisted of two choral preludes, while the later was the familiar Chaconne fron. the unaccompanied Violin Sonata in D minor. Also of importance was the Variations and Fugue on a Bach theme, Op. 81, by Reger. At times the structure was not always clear in the Chaconne and Fugue. An Allegretto in E major by Schubert, Schostakowitch's Trois Danses Fantastiques, Op. 1, and Miss Castagnetta's own arrangement of the irresistible Polka from "Schwanda" were among the other numbers played. Miss Castagnetta is an exceptionally gifted young lady and should achieve notable success, especially in the realm of lighter music.

F. E. P.

* * *

Jan. 13/37 LOWELL COURIER-CITIZEN,

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters Mav Be Addressed at This Office.

Boston Programs.

The home concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge and in Symphony hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week will mark the return as guest conductor of Dimitri Mitropoulos, the young Greek musician, who made such a good impression last year. This time he will be heard also as pianist. The programs will include the Prelude and Final Air of Dido from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas"; arranged by the conductor; his settings for strings of the Beethoven String Quartet in C sharp minor; Respighi's Toccata for Piano and Orchestra, for the first time in Boston; the Second Suite from Casella's "Lan Donna Serpente."

Mr. Mitropoulos will also conduct the supplementary concert in Symphony hall next Monday evening when the program will include Schumann's Cello Concerto with the Spanish cellist, Gaspar Cassado, as the assisting artist.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

JAN 11 1937

3 A. M. "I'm persistent," Abner Silver confesses at the Sapphire Room. "The radio guys banned my song 'When a King Gives Up Everything for Love.' So I go to the big broadcasts and sing it to the studio audiences after the program is over. So I got a radio audience—but not over the air"..."No, I refuse to step foot on Billy Leeds's yacht any more," Pepino vows to Hildegarde at El Morocco. "The last time he invited me aboard for cocktails, I turned around and the ship was sailing. It took me around the world for six months—me, with no clothes on"...Galli-Curci, in a radiant mood, nods to Gloria Swanson at the Rainbow Room. Both, ex-queens in their professions and seeking comebacks, are the heaviest-jeweled of all the wealthy socialites present ...Harmon Nelson, Bette Davis's husband, stares at Lupee Velez and Johnnie Weissmuller. "Hollywood," he sighs, "and Bette. Ahhh!"...At Le Mirage, one of the match promoters whispers: "Bill Tilden will substitute for Vines against Perry."

4 A. M. "This famous comic, forsaken in love, turned on the gas at our apartment," Will Morrissey relates at Lindy's. "I caught him in time, and he pleaded: 'Aw, I got nothin' to live for.' So I socked him in the nose, and he chased me to sock me in return. 'Now, you so and so,' I told him, 'I've given you something to live for!'"...A picket parades in front of the Black Cat cafe. Five minutes later another sign-carrier, employed by the cafe, parades beside him—bearing a sign—"This guy next to me is a fake!"... "Oh, what a boner I pulled," Lew Lehr laments at Leon & Eddie's. "My brother's name is Robert S. Lehr. I read where this horse named 'Robert S.' is running and place $2 on the nag to show. It comes in at about 250 to 1, and I only collect $20"..."My band will play at the Butlers' Ball," Meyer Davis announces at Mon Paris. "And I've arranged it so that four of the music numbers will be conducted—by my butler!"

5 A. M. "Here's a tip," a Washingtonian assures at Dave's. "Schenley's new Public Relations Director will be Leo Sachs, the ex-Minister to Costa Rica"..."Look at this photo of my 19-year-old boy, Alfred," Hiram Bloomingdale exhibits. "He worked in mines to reduce. He's down to 224 lbs. now..."You should've been here earlier," Herman Stark relates at the Cotton Club. "Here's what happened: John Anderson, the critic, sat next to Louis B. Mayer, who asked him: 'What's the name of that guy sitting at the next table?' Anderson answered: 'That's Serge Koussevitzky's...Mayer replied: 'What does he do?' So Anderson told him...'Yeah?' Mayer returned. 'What lot is he on?' Anderson said: 'No lot. He's the famous conductor.' So Mayer said: 'Well, on your sayso—he's got a job with me, starting tomorrow'...Five minutes later Mayer turned to the embarrassed critic and said: 'That's what you expected a Hollywood producer to say, no? Well, I was kidding you. We went to see Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall last Thursday!'"

6 A. M. "...Yes, dear, I'm taking off the NRA label from my coat...What? Of course I believe in the NRA. I think Roosevelt should bring it back...But I've simply got to remove the label. Think I want people to know that I'm wearing last year's coat?"

IE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 16,

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT
By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 12th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dimitri Mitropoulos, guest conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Purcell—Prelude adn Final Air of Dido from "Dido and Aeneas," arranged for strings by Mr. Mitropoulos.
Beethoven—String Quartet in C sharp minor Op. 131, arranged for string orchestra.
Respighi—Toccata for piano and orchestra, Mr. Mitropoulos playing the solo part.
Castagnone—Preludio Giocoso.

We were certainly in no doubt last year that Mr. Mitropoulos was a remarkable musician, a conductor who could positively be described as great. It was then made evident that he had a searching insight into the score that the orchestra was to play and that, if necessary, he could embark on an interpretation of amazing penetration. We shall not soon forget his projection of the First Symphony of Mahler. A certain unconventionality in his gestures, a manner of nervous intensity, these were for some a stumbling block in the appreciation of the conductor's great talents. Yet it is the wiser course not to be disturbed by such trivialities, for Mr. Mitropoulos has so much to offer as a leader.

Mr. Mitropoulos is first of all a musician of infinite capacity for knowing the music itself, in detail and as a whole. Without this, of course, no conductor can achieve real fame in his profession. Thus Mr. Mitropoulos's ability as a pianist, so astoundingly demonstrated yesterday, is incidental and subordinate to this capacity. Obviously, he has a prodigious memory, so that he quite honestly has no need of the score at the actual performance. In the instance of some conductors this proclivity has been made a great deal too much of in the press, since the use of the score is no indication of lack of knowledge and is ordinarily advisable. We mention it only in Mr. Mitropoulos's case because his musicianship is above any suspicious circumstances of mere showmanship on that head.

The program yesterday was peculiar, but its peculiarity was justified. We shall have an opportunity after next Monday's concert to comment further on the first two numbers. So let the beauty and dignity of Purcell's music go for the moment by the board. As to the Beethoven Quartet, there must have been some lifting of eyebrows by devout lovers of chamber music. They could have saved themselves the worry. Mr. Mitropoulos can be a fearless transcriber when he wants to be, as in the Bach Organ Prelude and Fugue in G minor which he presented last year. But he has not laid desecrating hands on this work. His reason is that actually so few of the symphonic public ever hear the later quartets of Beethoven, which is perfectly true. Therefore, he felt that an edition for full string orchestra was a sensible idea.

No doubt, the Quartet loses something of transparency in the orchestral version. The lines are perhaps blurred. Yet a good performance—and yesterday's was unbelievably fine—can do much to minimize this defect. Less excellent strings than those of the Boston Symphony might make all the difference between success and failure in the experiment. On the other side the work gains in majesty and power. Beethoven so often transcended the limits of the medium which was supposed to play his music that a larger treatment of the same material is not only suggested but advisable.

Mr. Mitropoulos received an ovation for his conducting and playing the solo part in Respighi's Toccata, partly because a Boston audience, since Muck, has not been accustomed to the practice. There were a few slips on the soloist's part, but on the whole the performance was brilliant. As for the music itself, the adagio and finale are more interesting and more effectively worked out than the prelude. Finally, there was a delightfully witty Prelude by the young Italian composer—unknown here—Riccardo Castagnone, to end an unusual concert. The orchestra unquestionably responded to every demand that Mr. Mitropoulos made upon it.

Next week Mr. Mitroupoulos will also conduct Monday evening (when Casella's Suite, scheduled for this concert, will be played) and next Friday and Saturday. Malipiero's Piano Concerto will be played for the first time in America; Schumann's 2d Symphony and other works will be given.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

Holland Natives In Boston Orchestra Playing Here Today

With the Boston Chamber Orchestra, which will play in Portland High School Auditorium at 8 p. m. today under the auspices of the Portland Music Teachers' Association, are two natives of Holland, Jacobus C. Langendoen, cellist, and Huber Sauvet, violinist, who began their musical careers at an early age.

Mr. Langendoen, raised in South Africa, started his career with a home-made instrument, taking up the cello after hearing the great cellist Geradi. After studying at the Royal Conservatory in Holland, he came to this Country and for seven years has been solo cellist at "Pops." Mr. Sauvet, a member of a musical family, taught himself the violin and studied at the Conservatory in his native Holland. He played with the Dutch Opera Company in Amsterdam before coming to Boston in 1914 to become a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

ELIZABETH, N. J.
JOURNAL

JAN 13 1937

Club Meetings

Mrs. Mollie Holtz gave the first of a series of talks to the music appreciation group of the Council of Jewish Juniors on Monday evening at the Y. M.-Y. W. H. A. Mrs. Holtz spoke principally of the great metropolitan orchestras, including the New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony and Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, and of Arturo Toscanani and Leopold Stokowski, as two of the greatest living conductors. She also spoke briefly of Betty Janes, the 15-year-old soprano who recently sprang into fame through her radio broadcasts. Those present were Miss Ethel Solomon, Miss Esther Rice, Miss Rose Cohen, Miss Naomi Holpern, Miss Vivian Grossman, Miss Miriam Kuker, Miss Carolyn Spitzer, Miss Dorothy Farlowe and Miss Nettie Handsher.

The next lecture will be on January 25.

ME.
SS

18 1937

es hestra
e Today

mber Orches-
Portland High
p. m. today
the Portland
tion, are two obus C. Lan-
Huber Sauvet, their musical es in South reer with a taking up the great cellist at the Royal he came to ven years has

"Pops." Mr.
musical family,
n and studied in his native
th the Dutch erdam before 14 to become on Symphony

J.

937 ngs

the first of a appreciation wish Juniors
Y. M.-Y. W. incipally of hestras, inhilharmonic,
Philadelphia
d of Arturo tokowski, as conductors.
Betty Janes,
who recently
h her radio
t were Miss
r Rice, Miss Holpern, Miss iriam Kuker, iss Dorothy Handsher.
on January

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEW YORK JOURNAL

JAN 11 1937

Music in Review

By Henriette Weber

John Barbirolli's present regime with the Philharmonic Orchestra has come to an end. Little did anyone imagine when he arrived that ten weeks later he would sail away with a three-year contract in his pocket. But circumstances fortuitous for him, combined with his own artistic integrity worked the trick. He leaves but to return.

This last week's concerts were therefore a series of farewells which had their climax yesterday. There was a large audience which would have been still larger had the weather been fine. There was vociferous enthusiasm, and when the young British conductor came on the stage after the intermission, even the orchestra rose to do him homage.

The program was a good one for a Sunday broadcast. It commenced with a sonorous "trumpet voluntary" fashioned by Sir Henry Wood, the British conductor, from a melody by Purcell. Then Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson, English pianists and friends of the conductor, played in the delightful way they have made famous one of the Mozart Concertos for two pianos. The popular "Enigma" Variations by Elgar followed by some Wagner excerpts built a fine climax for the Barbirolli farewell.

Igor Stravinsky, Russian composer, will take over the baton of the Philarmonic this week.

* * *

MacDowell Honored

Concern with our own orcnestra cannot let us forget the noteworthy achievements of eminent visitors. Mr. Koussevitzky and his incomparable orchestra from Boston played at Carnegie again on Saturday. For this occasion the distinguished conductor chose to remind us of the 75th anniversary of the birth of a foremost American composer, Edward MacDowell. His second Piano Concerto was played brilliantly by the orchestra's regular pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma.

A further tribute to native genius came with a Suite for Strings by Arthur Foote, contemporary and friend of MacDowell. They were both of that coterie of young composers who in the nineties made Boston the hub of musical activity. Arthur Foote is still living, his career having spanned many important changes in our musical life.

* * *

Cassado in Recital

After Gaspar Cassado, the cellist, had made his debut with the Philharmonic, the word spread quickly that this young Spaniard was a star of the first magnitude. His solo recital at Town Hall but magnified this first impression.

He has the soul of a poet and the brilliance of a virtuoso, but one to whom mere showmanship is an unwanted quantity. He uses his phenomenal technic merely as a tool whereby to bring unforgettable beauty to his interpretations. As a cellist he is unsurpassed.

* * *

It seemed inconceivable that Town Hall should not have been crowded yesterday for the recital of the great French pianist, Robert Casadesus. All who can do so should profit by hearing him. He is so well-rounded as a musician, so well thought out are his interpretations, so sensitive is he to the implications of the composer, that every page he plays becomes a unique object lesson in the fine art of piano playing. His program naturally showed different phases of his powers as interpreter, since it ranged from eighteenth century classicism to modern French.

* * *

Ponselle as Carmen

Rosa Ponselle was in fine vocal trim on Saturday for her first appearance in opera this season, and she took the part she created last season, that of Carmen. Her idea of it was somewhat modified this year. It is more polished, more finished, though still the vigorous, forthright interpretation she has studied hard to present.

"Carmen" is of course always sure-fire entertainment, and the huge opera audience showered Miss Ponselle and all the principals with an uncountable number of curtain calls. Everyone there seemed to be having a good time.

* * *

A distinguished newcomer just arrived in this country, made his bow yesterday at the New Friends of Music concert. This was Karl Ulrich Schnabel, like his famous uncle, a pianist. He can be judged better as a performer when he plays a solo recital, but he gave every evidence of sound piano playing in a Brahms quintet with strings and the Sonata in D minor which he played with Jacques Gordon. The usual audience thronged Town Hall. The series is sold out.

ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD

JAN 3 - 1937

BOSTONIANS TO PLAY ON JAN. 7

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in one of its regular subscription concerts at Carnegie Hall, New York, on Thursday, Jan. 7, broadcast from 8:45 to 9:30 p. m., EST, over the NBC-Blue network. The first performance in New York of Alfredo Casella's revision of Clementi's Symphony in D will be given during the concert. Koussevitzky has programed Foote's Suite in E Major for string orchestra, opus 63, to open the broadcast. 4

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
LEADER

1/7/37

Famed Violinist Coming To Pabst Theater Jan. 11

Harold Bauer, world famous pianist, who long since won a place for himself in the heart of the American public, will be heard at the Pabst theater Monday night, Jan. 11, in a recital on the Arion Musical club's season course.

HAROLD BAUER

The concert, which the sponsors expect to appeal strongly to Milwaukee lovers of chamber music, will bring a double treat for, in addition to Mr. Bauer, the famous and popular Stradivarius String quartet will be heard. Mr. Bauer will play several Chopin and Debussy numbers on his program and he will accompany the quartet in its selections.

If art is to be measured at all by the breadth of its appeal, Mr. Bauer's should take a high place. He is a musician's pianist, but his large and enthusiastic audiences attest that he is a great deal more than that. He has played with equal success before a room full of red Indians in Arizona and the natives of Hawaii. He declared that the Indians—from the Indian school at Phoenix—were one of the most responsive audiences he ever played for.

A native of London, Mr. Bauer won acclaim all over Europe before he found time to make his debut as a pianist in his home city. His first appearance in America was in Boston, as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, in 1901. Since 1914 he has been steadily engaged in the United States each season.

Globe MUSIC Jan. 16/37

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Novelty in abundance has attended the return of Dimitri Mitropoulos as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the usual mid-season vacation of Dr Koussevitzky. In the first place he assembled for his initial program a most unusual list, half of which was unfamiliar to local audiences, and the other half new in the orchestral guise in which was presented. Secondly, he ventured the daring stroke of simultaneously conducting and playing the solo part in a complex modern score—the Toccata for piano and orchestra by the late Ottorino Respighi. Not since the days of Dr Muck has a conductor at a "regular" Symphony concert attempted this formidable undertaking.

The dynamic Athenian made himself known hereabouts a year ago. Then he made a highly favorable impression by the technical brilliance—of which clarity was a salient detail—and the musicianly qualities of his interpretations.

His first appearance on his second visit was made Thursday evening at Sanders Theatre in Cambridge. Yesterday's audience greeted him with more warmth than would have been the case with a stranger. Applause was hearty during the afternoon, and at the end of the Respighi, Mr Mitropoulos received that highest of public accolades, stamping and cheering. Now that he has revealed to us his gifts as conductor, pianist and orchestral transcriber, one hopes that he may see his way to producing an original composition, for he is also a composer. There is a Concerto Grosso of his which he has offered in Europe.

The afternoon began with Mr Mitropoulos' arrangement for strings of the Introduction and the air, "When I Am Laid in Earth," from the younger Henry Purcell's opera, "Dido and Aeneas." The present version is in the best of taste and affords to a wider public than heretofore opportunity for hearing one of the most simply poignant airs ever written. It was beautifully played.

Mr Mitropoulos also introduced his own editing for strings of the great C-sharp minor Quartet, Op 131, by Beethoven. If any had been perturbed at the thought that a masterpiece had been subjected to violent hands, they were reassured after listening to Mr Mitropoulos' laudable work. His procedure has been simple: he has introduced no extraneous matter, but has merely allotted to the massed string choirs each note originally written for individual violin, viola or 'cello, doubling the latter at times with the contra-basses. He has, to be accurate, emphasized a few notes in the first movement, not so designated by Beethoven. The departure is not important one way or the other, since it does not alter the continuity or the mood of the music.

Some have believed, this writer among them, that in certain later compositions for piano and small ensembles, the magnitude of Beethoven's conception required more eloquence than that afforded by a few instruments. In Mr Mitropoulos' edition, the Quartet proclaims with the puissance of many voices the magnificence of Beethoven's thought.

The performance was something to treasure in memory. The Boston strings were at their noblest; the conductor's reading was that of an apostle of faith. The exalted last movement, with its implication of apocalyptic vision, seemed a tonal embodiment of faith in things unseen.

After intermission came Respighi's quasi-archaic and displayful Toccata, music of fire and gusto, perhaps vulgar in the sense that lack of restraint is vulgarity, but effective as a medium of virtuosity. With it the conductor-soloist made brilliant show.

He may be thanked for giving us first hearing in this country of a "Preludio Giocoso," by Riccardo Castagnone, a 30-year-old Italian of whom little is known locally. Castagnone wished to capture in music something of the comedic spirit of the classic Italian dramatist, Goldoni, though he was not concerned with a specific play of Goldoni. No more than a choice object of decorative art, the "Preludio" is valuable for its unforced wit—not common to the tonal art, its brevity and clever orchestration.

Mr Mitropoulos had planned to include the second suite from the opera "La Donna Serpente," by Alfredo Casella, but the program would have been too long. It will instead be played Monday evening.

The program next Friday and Saturday will be as follows: Bach Organ Prelude and Fugue in B minor (orchestrated by Mitropoulos); Schumann: Second Symphony; Malipiero: Piano Concerto (Dimitri Mitropoulos, soloist); Ravel: "Spanish Rhapsody." C. W. D.

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR TAKES SOLO

Post Jan. 16/37

Mitropoulos at Piano in Respighi's Toccata

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When Dimitri Mitropoulos came to Symphony Hall, a year ago, to conduct our orchestra as guest, he came as one unknown and on trial. Yesterday he reappeared there in the same capacity, and was welcomed and acclaimed as one whose worth was already proven. And to his remarkable achievements of last season he added several more.

PLAYS SOLO HIMSELF

No doubt many in the audience were having their first view of this extraordinary figure: tall, gaunt, ascetic, who on first sight resembles a cross between a tonsured monk and an El Greco saint. For them it was something of a novelty to see him conduct without baton and without score and with his own peculiar blend of intensity and animation, of austerity and excitement. For the rest of us, the new experience came when he seated himself at the piano and, again with no music before him, bore the solo part in the first Boston performance of Respighi's Toccata for piano and orchestra, conducting now with a free hand or two, now with his head, and now with his eye.

Save for the final number, Riccardo Castagnone's Preludio Giocoso (after Goldoni), the programme, as it finally stands, with Casella's "La Donna Serpente" Suite put off until Monday evening, may be characterized as severe, quite lacking in the musical delights of the flesh. Yet the answering applause yesterday might have been prompted by one made up of the more lurid bits from the pens of Wagner, Tchaikovsky and Strauss.

Two of Own Arrangements

For beginning come two arrangements for string orchestra made by the conductor himself; the one of the Prelude to Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas," together with Dido's nobly sorrowful air, "When I am Laid in Earth"; the other that of Beethoven's most famous string quartet, Opus 131, in C-sharp minor. There follow then the pieces by the two Italians.

From Purcell's Prelude on through three and a half of the seven movements of Beethoven's Quartet, the concert yesterday proved for this listener a rare musical, emotional, and, with Beethoven, spiritual experience. Dido's air, composed probably in 1689, is still, after all the progress in that particular field, one of the most poignantly expressive pages in music and only in the others of the last five quarets of Beethoven, in more than one respect the crown and climax of his career, may one find music of an equally lofty and touching beauty. In the midst of the fourth movement, however, Beethoven suddenly descends from exalted musical speech to the more prosaic business of quartet-writing.

In time the serenely lovely chief theme of this Andante returns; the ensuing Presto, if again too long, is enlivening; and the two remaining divisions rise almost to the heights of the beginning. Save when Beethoven himself lets us down, the performance by the orchestral strings may be pronounced a success, even though such procedure is anathema to the chamber musician. Certainly Beethoven's thought in this quartet, as in the "Hammerklavier" Sonata, transcended the medium in which he chose to express it.

Conducts Four More Times

There are two, even more, Respighis. One of them is the composer of the trashy "Feste Romana," another is the wholly serious musician who wrote the Myxolydian Piano Concerto, which he himself once played here, and of the Toccata of yesterday, an homage to Frescobaldi, who preceded Bach by a mere hundred years, and a more than usually successful attempt to pour new wine into old bottles. The audience's reception of this music, or perhaps of the performance, has already been indicated.

Finally came the 30-year-old Castagnone, whose name is new to this country, writing brilliantly, exuberantly, piquantly, in the true style of the Goldonian comedy, and withal a modern composer who is content to make only agreeable sounds.

It may be added that our electrifying visitor from Athens conducts at Symphony Hall four times more, this evening, [illegible] Monday, Friday and Saturday [illegible] week.

SALEM, ORE.
CAPITAL JOURNAL

JAN 8 - 1937 /64

Rachmaninoff Gives United States Honor For Best Orchestra

The United States has today the best symphony orchestras in the world. This is the opinion of Sergei Rachmaninoff, famous Russian composer-pianist, who will play in Portland at the Paramount theatre January 22.

In America, according to the Russian composer, much larger sums are put at the disposal of symphony orchestras than in Europe, so naturally their personnel is of a higher order and their music better.

Rachmaninoff himself spent long terms as conductor of the noted Moscow private opera and the Moscow Symhony orchestra. He was once offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony. Not only has ~~he been~~ noted as a conductor but many of his compositions are orchestral. His first symphony, played by Glazounov with the Russian Symphony, however, was almost the beginning and the end of his career as a composer for orchestra. For though the piece has since been greatly successful, like many another work of art, it was a failure at its first hearing. This failure plunged the young composer into such depression that he vowed never more would he write another note. In order to raise his spirits a friend took him to Tolstoy for advice, but the great writer's admonitions to him were so severe that depression settled even more firmly down on Rachmaninoff. Ultimately, it was through the treatment of a physician, Dr. Dahl, who was also his friend, that Rachmaninoff recovered his confidence. When he had finished his second symphony he dedicated it to this friend.

RIVERSIDE, CALIF.
ENTERPRISE

JAN 7 - 1937

A billion dollars worth of stars from Paramount studios, Hollywood, will sparkle in one of the most impressive filmland programs ever heard, when the silver jubilee for Adolph Zukor, commemorating his twenty-fifth anniversary in the picture business, will be celebrated tonight by NBC and KFI at 9:15. Leopold Stokowski will conduct the Paramount symphony orchestra of 103 pieces. Cecil B. DeMille, ace director, and Jack Benny, comedian, among others will be heard on the air.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in a concert at Carnegie hall, New York, today at 5:45 p.m., over NBC and KECA.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

JAN 9 - 1937

Music and The Drama

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS GUEST CONDUCTOR

Boston, Jan. 8-AP-Dimitri Mitropoulos, Athenian conductor, arrived here today to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the next two weeks, during the mid-Winter vacation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

He was guest conductor of the orchestra a year ago also, becoming the first Greek to direct an American symphonic orchestra. He will begin rehearsals Monday, particularly of his new arrangements for a familiar air from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas," and Beethoven's string quartet in C-Sharp Minor.

An Editorial on Music by Redfern Mason

Trans. 165

What Use Is the "Critic"?

Jan. 9/37

What do you demand of a musical critic? Infallibility?

Absurd! The greatest composers have been guilty of critical blunders. What would you say if a scribe of today were to declare that Wagner could not write three consecutive bars grammatically? Yet that is what Robert Schumann said, although he had the grace to revise his judgment later on. Tschaikovsky said he could not keep awake during a performance of the later Beethoven quartets; Gounod damned the Cesar Franck Symphony with the remark that the composer had "raised incompetency to a dogma."

It is the same with all the arts. Remember how they treated Walt Whitman. When the newspapers' "ads" passed for verse, then Whitman's lines might be regarded as poetry. So declared the pundits. Remember Ruskin's scornful appraisal of Whistler.

To be sure, Shakespeare described the art of the actor in terms admirable alike for their truth and their clearness. He had the vision of a poet, though he seems to have been a mediocre actor.

It seems to follow that, if a man is great in a particular art or phase of that art, he is thereby incapacitated from judging fairly of the work of others in the same field. He is so absorbed in his own point of view; he so abounds in his own sense that he cannot breathe the atmosphere of a talent different from his own.

So we must remove infallibility from the prerequisites of the critic.

And if we left out the term "critic" itself, it would be an advantage. For the word signifies a judge. But a judge interprets a code, with specific articles and clauses, each defined with logical precision. But there is no such code for the art of music. It is too subjective. The rules which govern the musicians of one age are discarded by their successors. Consecutive fifths used to be held in abhorrence, till the Viennese trinity flirted with them for special effects. Later on Puccini, Debussy, Moussorgsky and the rest fairly revelled in them. What was formerly regarded as a blemish was now regarded as a beauty.

From Monteverdi to Wagner and our contemporaries, every composer who has succeeded in getting a lasting grip of the public has been regarded by many as a revolutionary. The heresy of yesterday is the orthodoxy of today.

Let us be honest with ourselves and admit that, in the strict sense of the term, there are no critics and never have been. There are only witnesses who bear testimony before the great anonymous tribunal which is the general public.

The good fellows who dare to hazard their opinions in print will often be wrong, and the more courageous they are, the more vision they possess, the more frequently they will be damned by those who accept the modish opinion of the times as part of the Holy Scriptures of good taste.

"Then what on earth is the critic good for?" the reader may demand. Let Anatole France render an answer. He describes his writings as the "history of his soul's adventures among masterpieces."

Music is not mere pattern weaving in sound; it is the record of a spirit "finely touched" by the mysteries of life and death.

Theorists who talk about "absolute music" will snort at this. But even their snorting is a kind of program music. For the truth is, as Richard Strauss said: "If music is good, it means something; if it means something it is program music."

To employ the figure of vision, music is a mirror in which you may contemplate the personality of the composer; you may sympathize with his feelings, divine his aspirations. Even inferior music has a meaning; it is the picture of a dull spirit and therefore quickly finds its way into the "dust and silence of the upper shelf."

"The house pre-exists in the mind of the architect," says St. Thomas of Aquin and the saying is true of music. The composer reflects the times in which he lives; his work is a document of the Time Spirit: his parentage, his upbringing, the company he keeps, his hopes and sorrows, all these things help to make his music what it is.

That the result is not translatable into words is true enough. "Cadence," as Herbert Spencer said, "is the comment of the emotions on the propositions of the intellect." Feeling is anterior to speech. Without that instinctive, improvisational melody that all men use, words would be almost dead things. Just as in his sleep every man is an artist, so in his use of language he is a musician.

The musical scribe gives his reactions to the music he hears. He may interpret Gluck in terms of sculpture; the "Walkurenritt" may stir him to a berserker mood; he may spiritually go down on his knees to Palestrina. To appreciate Berlioz he must love Goethe and Shakespeare. His soul must be a window open to all the airs of beauty. In a word, he must be an artist. Criticism is not fault finding; it is the appreciation of the myriad manifestations of beauty.

SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES

JAN 10 1937

Community Concert to Present Noted Pianist

Another outstanding affair on the social and cultural calendar of January is the Community Concert which will present Harold Bauer, famed pianist, who will be heard January 18 at 8:15 p.m., at the Byrd high school auditorium.

Interesting to Shreveporters is the fact that Ralph Squires, head of the piano department of Centenary, is a pupil of Mr. Bauer, who appeared here before at the Department club. Mr. Bauer was originally a violinist and on the advice of Paderewski became a pianist, scoring a huge success as soloist with the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra. He made his American debut with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

* * *

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE

JAN

BIG 'CELLIST TO BE HEARD NEXT WEEK

Piatigorsky Scheduled for Last Series Billed at Dixon Hall

The season's second concert in the Philharmonic Society's Dixon Hall series will be given at Dixon Hall Monday, January 18, with Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, as the artist. The Piatigorsky concert here a year ago was hailed as one of the year's outstanding musical events, and the huge Russian musician was given an ovation.

The society announced that the Dixon Hall series will be discontinued after this year. For that reason, tickets to the individual concerts, of which three remain on the schedule, will be sold separately.

Gregor Piatigorsky, the "Russian Casals," has recently been hailed as "great" by the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, by the famous composer, Richard Strauss, and by the dean of critics, Ernest Newman of the London Times.

Koussevitsky stated publicly: "Piatigorsky is the greatest 'cellist of our day. He combines high artistry with unlimited technical skill, great depths of feeling and poetry with the beauty of volume of ual."
r to Piati-
e more for xote; techerpretative-
he sake of y it wher-
ed under a

Newman said in the London Sunday Times: "Even in bad music Mr. Piatigorsky is a great 'cellist, while in good music he is equally great as a 'cellist and still greater as interpreter."

Monitor

Monday Symphony Concert

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Monday evening series took place last night. It was directed by the orchestra's guest conductor from Greece, Dimitri Mitropoulos. From the program of the regular concerts of the past week-end the conductor drew his arrangement for string orchestra of the prelude and the air, "When I am laid in earth," from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas," and Beethoven's C sharp minor String Quartet, Op. 131, performed by the orchestra's string section. In addition, the program was enlivened by the Boston début of the celebrated Spanish 'cellist, Gaspar Cassadó (in Schumann's Concerto), and by a performance of the second suite from Casella's opera (1932) "La Donna serpente."

Beyond recording the fact of yet another magnificent orchestral performance, little need be added to the critical comments which have already appeared in these columns concerning the first two items. But those members of the audience who are familiar with the Purcell recitative and air in their original form must have found the pace excessively deliberate.

Mr. Cassadó, an exuberant, volatile Spaniard, used Schumann's concerto as an excuse for the display of a light and agile technique, a tone of beautifully smooth and warm quality and some phrasing that was rich in saccharine, sentimental, and melodramatic mannerisms. A personable and restless young man, he delighted his audience also by the rapier-like flourish of the bow with which he ended bravura passages and, at the close of his performance by his repeatedly dragging the protesting conductor out from the wings to share (as he richly deserved) in the generous applause.

The work of an extremely intelligent and even inventive musician, Casella's suite from "La Donna serpente" is often interesting, constantly vivacious with that willfully eighteenth-century pastiche vivacity plus second-decade-of-the-twentieth-century cacophony that now begins to date, though it still seems obligatory among official Italian modernists. Brilliantly orchestrated, direct and confident in its utterance, its performance was no waste of time, though a repetition might well

S. S.

PORTLAND, MAINE
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

JAN 10 1937

In Music Circles

BY ELLEN F. BLODGETT

The outstanding musical event for this week will be the second concert in The Portland Music Teacher's Course, when the Boston Chamber Music Orchestra will be presented. This group is made up of players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra and indications are that the program will be very fine as well as interesting. Works of Mendelssohn, Schubert and Wagner are to be presented as well as some by modern Russian composers. There will be a group of Soviet tunes "Turkmanian Lullaby," Mossolov and "Soviet Sailors Dance," from the ballet "Red Poppy," Gliere, which promises to be very different. Mossolov is a young man, born in 1900 and so has felt Soviet influence from the first. "Turkmanian Lullaby," was originally written for an unaccompanied chorus. Turkmen live in Turkestan, a Soviet Republic in Asia. We should hear music that will have a definitely Oriental influence.

* * *

Gliere, composer of the ballet "Red Poppy" is a composer of the old guard of Russian composers, but has identified himself with the cause of Soviet music. He has attracted attention for his orchestral and chamber music works which give evidence of a remarkable inventive power and fine technical workmanship. His "Sailors Dance" is based on a song "Little Apple, Where Are You Rolling?" highly popular during the first days of the Revolution and is expressive of the sardonic and cruel fatalism of the exterior and interior wars of the period. Two other numbers that appear on the program which hold promise of interest are "Overture On Hebrew Themes," Prokofiev, and "Poloytzian Dances," Borodin. The first is reputed to contain at least one authentic Jewish motive while the second comes very much under the Oriental influence as the Plotvzi were a Mongolian tribe that invaded Southern Russia in the 13th century.

* * *

The Schubert number included in the program will be the first movement of the "Unfinished Symphony. I call this a very lovely number and it is continually a source of wonder to me that the individual instrumental parts are so simple in themselves but when played together can result in such beautiful harmonies. This fact was never fully realized by me until after I had had opportunity to take the score and study it.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

JAN 12 1937

Tchaikovsky Contest

Handsome prizes are being offered by Random House for the best letters answering one of three questions concerned with "Beloved Friend," the story of Tchaikovsky and Nadejda von Meck. The book, by Catherine Drinker Bowan and Barbara von Meck, will be published February 1.

Letters are limited to 300 words and may answer any one of the three following questions: One—What is the psychological explanation of Mme. von Meck's abrupt ending of her romantic relations with Tchaikovsky, and is there any clue to her decision in the revelations given as to her personality? Two—Was Mme. von Meck's infatuation solely with Tchaikovsky's music, as she thought, or was she really in love with him, in spite of the fact that she was careful never to speak to him or meet him? Three—Did Mme. von Meck's patronage of Tchaikovsky have, on the whole, a beneficial or a harmful effect upon the quality of his music?

The first prize for the best letter on any of the three subjects will be a Steinway grand piano. The second prize will be the recordings of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, his Fifth Symphony under the direction of Leopold Stokowski, his Sixth "Pathetique" Symphony under the baton of Eugene Ormandy, the "Andante Cantabile" played by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy, and the "Nutcracker Suite" played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Leopold Stokowski. The third prize will be the recordings of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto played by Mischa Elman and of the Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor, with Arthur Rubinstein as soloist and John Barbirolli as conductor.

All letters must be submitted by April 15 to the Contest Department, Random House, 20 East Fifty-venth Street, New York City.

SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES

JAN

HAROLD BAUER TO APPEAR IN PIANO CONCERT

Noted Musician Will Be Presented by Community Concert Group

The Shreveport Community Concerts association will present Harold Bauer, internationally-known pianist, in concert at 8:15 p. m., Sunday, Jan. 18, in Byrd high school auditorium.

Mr. Bauer was born in England into an intensely musical family. At five he entered upon his musical career, dividing his tender enthusiasms between piano and violin. But with time, the violin finally won over the piano. He became a child prodigy. At 10, he made his debut with orchestra, where his personal success put to rest any doubts as to a future career.

Later years found him touring England as a violin virtuoso. One day, a call came for a tour of Russia as assisting violinist to a singer. The little concert company had barely arrived in St. Petersburg, when the death of the czar threw the court into mourning. No concerts were allowed in the principal cities. They had to fall back on the small towns. With no accompanist available in these smaller places, Mr. Bauer was obliged to fill out the program with piano solos. When the ban of mourning for the czar was finally lifted, the manager decided that he played well enough to save the expense of an extra accompanist.

At the end of the tour. Mr. Bauer found difficulty in persuading people that he was not a pianist. Even Paderewski told him that he was one.

Thus it was chance that transposed Harold Bauer from the violin strings to the piano keys.

He set himself to serious study, giving himself three years in which to attain his purpose.

The years were not quite up when he was engaged for two orchestral appearances in Madrid. He was acclaimed He was reassured. The violin was laid aside.

Engagements with the Amsterdam orchestra under Willem Mengelberg and with the Vienna Philharmonic led by the great Hans Richter soon followed, all being highly successful.

Mr. Bauer has since played with all the important orchestras of the world. In 1900, at the invitation of Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony, he came to America to appear as soloist with that orchestra. On Dec. 18 of the same year, he made his first appearance in New York with the Kneisel quartet. Two days later he gave his first New York recital.

Every two years thereafter, until his world tour in 1914, he toured this country. Eventually he made his home in New York. In 1921, he became an American citizen.

In 1918, he founded the Beethoven association, that unique organization of musicians who give so generously of their services in the cause of music.

Thus, in all that pertains to the development of music and of musical appreciation in this country, the name of Harold Bauer has placed its ineffaceable imprint.

NEWARK, N. J.
CALL

In the Realm of Music

Cellist on Nelson Program

Gregor Piatigorsky, noted cellist, will be the artist at Mrs. William S. Nelson's Tuesday morning recital this week at the Hotel Suburban. Accompanied at the piano by Valentin Pavlovsky, the Russian musician will play the following program:

Sonata in D minor..Andrea Caporale
Largo, allegro, adagio, allegro deciso.
Suite in C major (for cello alone) Bach
Praeludium, allemande, courante, sarabande, bourree I, bourree II and gigue.
Sonatine in A major (Sicilienne) (Arr. by Piatigorsky) Weber
Theme and variations.
Toccata ....Castelnuovo-Tedesco
Introduzione—Aria and Finale
Sicilienne ....De Paradis
Allegretto grazioso ....Schubert
Prelude ....Debussy
Zapateado ....Sarasate

Piatigorsky will use an instrument nearly 200 years old. It is a Montagnana, made in 1739, which was presented to him in England a few years ago by Ernest B. Dane, treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and an old friend of the cellist. While on a concert tour in Europe, Piatigorsky had met his friend and lamented the fact his cello was "sick," that something always was going wrong with it. The following day Dane invited him to view a collection of some of the oldest instruments in the world, and when the Montagnana was brought out Piatigorsky began to play it. Hours later he looked around the room to find his friend gone; the dealer informed him Kane had bought the instrument as a gift for Piatigorski.

An Editorial on Music by Redfern Mason

Trans 165

What Use Is the "Critic"?

Eau. 9/37

What do you demand of a musical critic? Infallibility?

Absurd! The greatest composers have been guilty of critical blunders. What would you say if a scribe of today were to declare that Wagner could not write three consecutive bars grammatically? Yet that is what Robert Schumann said, although he had the grace to revise his judgment later on. Tschaikovsky said he could not keep awake during a performance of the later Beethoven quartets; Gounod damned the Cesar Franck Symphony with the remark that the composer had "raised incompetency to a dogma."

It is the same with all the arts. Remember how they treated Walt Whitman. When the newspapers' "ads" passed for verse, then Whitman's lines might be regarded as poetry. So declared the pundits. Remember Ruskin's scornful appraisal of Whistler.

To be sure, Shakespeare described the art of the actor in terms admirable alike for their truth and their clearness. He had the vision of a poet, though he seems to have been a mediocre actor.

It seems to follow that, if a man is great in a particular art or phase of that art, he is thereby incapacitated from judging fairly of the work of others in the same field. He is so absorbed in his own point of view; he so abounds in his own sense that he cannot breathe the atmosphere of a talent different from his own.

So we must remove infallibility from the prerequisites of the critic.

And if we left out the term "critic" itself, it would be an advantage. For the word signifies a judge. But a judge interprets a code, with specific articles and clauses, each defined with logical precision. But there is no such code for the art of music. It is too subjective. The rules which govern the musicians of one age are discarded by their successors. Consecutive fifths used to be held in abhorrence, till the Viennese trinity flirted with them for special effects. Later on Puccini, Debussy, Moussorgsky and the rest fairly revelled in them. What was formerly regarded as a blemish was now regarded as a beauty.

From Monteverdi to Wagner and our contemporaries, every composer who has succeeded in getting a lasting grip of the public has been regarded by many as a revolutionary. The heresy of yesterday is the orthodoxy of today.

Let us be honest with ourselves and admit that, in the strict sense of the term, there are no critics and never have been. There are only witnesses who bear testimony before the great anonymous tribunal which is the general public.

The good fellows who dare to hazard their opinions in print will often be wrong, and the more courageous they are, the more vision they possess, the more frequently they will be damned by those who accept the modish opinion of the times as part of the Holy Scriptures of good taste.

"Then what on earth is the critic good for?" the reader may demand. Let Anatole France render an answer. He describes his writings as the "history of his soul's adventures among masterpieces."

Music is not mere pattern weaving in sound; it is the record of a spirit "finely touched" by the mysteries of life and death.

Theorists who talk about "absolute music" will snort at this. But even their snorting is a kind of program music. For the truth is, as Richard Strauss said: "If music is good, it means something; if it means something it is program music."

To employ the figure of vision, music is a mirror in which you may contemplate the personality of the composer; you may sympathize with his feelings, divine his aspirations. Even inferior music has a meaning; it is the picture of a dull spirit and therefore quickly finds its way into the "dust and silence of the upper shelf."

"The house pre-exists in the mind of the architect," says St. Thomas of Aquin and the saying is true of music. The composer reflects the times in which he lives; his work is a document of the Time Spirit: his parentage, his upbringing, the company he keeps, his hopes and sorrows, all these things help to make his music what it is.

That the result is not translatable into words is true enough. "Cadence," as Herbert Spencer said, "is the comment of the emotions on the propositions of the intellect." Feeling is anterior to speech. Without that instinctive, improvisational melody that all men use, words would be almost dead things. Just as in his sleep every man is an artist, so in his use of language he is a musician.

The musical scribe gives his reactions to the music he hears. He may interpret Gluck in terms of sculpture; the "Walkurenritt" may stir him to a berserker mood; he may spiritually go down on his knees to Palestrina. To appreciate Berlioz he must love Goethe and Shakespeare. His soul must be a window open to all the airs of beauty. In a word, he must be an artist. Criticism is not fault finding; it is the appreciation of the myriad manifestations of beauty.

SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES

HAROLD BAUER TO APPEAR IN PIANO CONCERT

Noted Musician Will Be Presented by Community Concert Group

The Shreveport Community Concerts association will present Harold Bauer, internationally-known pianist, in concert at 8:15 p. m., Sunday, Jan. 18, in Byrd high school auditorium.

Mr. Bauer was born in England into an intensely musical family. At five he entered upon his musical career, dividing his tender enthusiasms between piano and violin. But with time, the violin finally won over the piano. He became a child prodigy. At 10, he made his debut with orchestra, where his personal success put to rest any doubts as to a future career.

Later years found him touring England as a violin virtuoso. One day, a call came for a tour of Russia as assisting violinist to a singer. The little concert company had barely arrived in St. Petersburg, when the death of the czar threw the court into mourning. No concerts were allowed in the principal cities. They had to fall back on the small towns. With no accompanist available in these smaller places, Mr. Bauer was obliged to fill out the program with piano solos. When the ban of mourning for the czar was finally lifted, the manager decided that he played well enough to save the expense of an extra accompanist.

At the end of the tour. Mr. Bauer found difficulty in persuading people that he was not a pianist. Even Paderewski told him that he was one.

Thus it was chance that transposed Harold Bauer from the violin strings to the piano keys.

He set himself to serious study, giving himself three years in which to attain his purpose.

The years were not quite up when he was engaged for two orchestral appearances in Madrid. He was acclaimed He was reassured. The violin was laid aside.

Engagements with the Amsterdam orchestra under Willem Mengelberg and with the Vienna Philharmonic led by the great Hans Richter soon followed, all being highly successful.

Mr. Bauer has since played with all the important orchestras of the world. In 1900, at the invitation of Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony, he came to America to appear as soloist with that orchestra. On Dec. 18 of the same year, he made his first appearance in New York with the Kneisel quartet. Two days later he gave his first New York recital.

Every two years thereafter, until his world tour in 1914, he toured this country. Eventually he made his home in New York. In 1921, he became an American citizen.

In 1918, he founded the Beethoven association, that unique organization of musicians who give so generously of their services in the cause of music.

Thus, in all that pertains to the development of music and of musical appreciation in this country, the name of Harold Bauer has placed its ineffaceable imprint.

NEWARK, N. J.
CALL

company dinners, family meals, noon teas or after bridge—at occasion at any time—this feather cake with fluffy mocha frosting und to be a hit. And it requires two eggs. Here is the recipe:

Feather Spice Cake.

cups sifted cake flour.

Gregor Piatigorsky, noted cellist, will be the artist at Mrs. William S. Nelson's Tuesday morning recital this week at the Hotel Suburban. Accompanied at the piano by Valentin Pavlovsky, the Russian musician will play the following program:

Sonata in D minor. . Andrea Caporale
Largo, allegro, adagio, allegro deciso.
Suite in C major (for cello alone) Bach
Praeludium, allemande, courante, sarabande, bourree I, bourree II and gigue.
Sonatine in A major (Sicilienne) (Arr. by Piatigorsky) Weber
Theme and variations.
Toccata ....Castelnuovo-Tedesco
Introduzione—Aria and Finale
Sicilienne ....De Paradis
Allegretto grazioso ....Schubert
Prelude ....Debussy
Zapateado ....Sarasate

Piatigorsky will use an instrument nearly 200 years old. It is a Montagnana, made in 1739, which was presented to him in England a few years ago by Ernest B. Dane, treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and an old friend of the cellist. While on a concert tour in Europe, Piatigorsky had met his friend and lamented the fact his cello was "sick," that something always was going wrong with it. The following day Dane invited him to view a collection of some of the oldest instruments in the world, and when the Montagnana was brought out Piatigorsky began to play it. Hours later he looked around the room to find his friend gone; the dealer informed him Kane had bought the instrument as a gift for Piatigorski.

SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES

JAN 1 193

Community Concert to Present Noted Pianist

Another outstanding affair on the social and cultural calendar of January is the Community Concert which will present Harold Bauer, famed pianist, who will be heard January 18 at 8:15 p.m., at the Byrd high school auditorium.

Interesting to Shreveporters is the fact that Ralph Squires, head of the piano department of Centenary, is a pupil of Mr. Bauer, who appeared here before at the Department club. Mr. Bauer was originally a violinist and on the advice of Paderewski became a pianist, scoring a huge success as soloist with the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra. He made his American debut with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

* * *

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE

JAN

BIG 'CELLIST TO BE HEARD NEXT WEEK

Piatigorsky Scheduled for Last Series Billed at Dixon Hall

The season's second concert in the Philharmonic Society's Dixon Hall series will be given at Dixon Hall Monday, January 18, with Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, as the artist. The Piatigorsky concert here a year ago was hailed as one of the year's outstanding musical events, and the huge Russian musician was given an ovation.

The society announced that the Dixon Hall series will be discontinued after this year. For that reason, tickets to the individual concerts, of which three remain on the schedule, will be sold separately.

Gregor Piatigorsky, the "Russian Casals," has recently been hailed as "great" by the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, by the famous composer, Richard Strauss, and by the dean of critics, Ernest Newman of the London Times.

Koussevitsky stated publicly: "Piatigorsky is the greatest 'cellist of our day. He combines high artistry with unlimited technical skill, great depths of feeling and poetry with the beauty of volume of tone that are without equal."

Strauss wrote in a letter to Piatigorsky: "Thank you once more for your wonderful Don Quixote; technically, musically and interpretatively a model. I wish for the sake of all of us you could play it wherever the work is performed under a good conductor."

Newman said in the London Sunday Times: "Even in bad music Mr. Piatigorsky is a great 'cellist, while in good music he is equally great as a 'cellist and still greater as interpreter."

Monitor

Monday Symphony Concert

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Monday evening series took place last night. It was directed by the orchestra's guest conductor from Greece, Dimitri Mitropoulos. From the program of the regular concerts of the past week-end the conductor drew his arrangement for string orchestra of the prelude and the air, "When I am laid in earth," from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas," and Beethoven's C sharp minor String Quartet, Op. 131, performed by the orchestra's string section. In addition, the program was enlivened by the Boston début of the celebrated Spanish 'cellist, Gaspar Cassadó (in Schumann's Concerto), and by a performance of the second suite from Casella's opera (1932) "La Donna serpente."

Beyond recording the fact of yet another magnificent orchestral performance, little need be added to the critical comments which have already appeared in these columns concerning the first two items. But those members of the audience who are familiar with the Purcell recitative and air in their original form must have found the pace excessively deliberate.

Mr. Cassadó, an exuberant, volatile Spaniard, used Schumann's concerto as an excuse for the display of a light and agile technique, a tone of beautifully smooth and warm quality and some phrasing that was rich in saccharine, sentimental, and melodramatic mannerisms. A personable and restless young man, he delighted his audience also by the rapier-like flourish of the bow with which he ended bravura passages and, at the close of his performance by his repeatedly dragging the protesting conductor out from the wings to share (as he richly deserved) in the generous applause.

The work of an extremely intelligent and even inventive musician, Casella's suite from "La Donna serpente" is often interesting, constantly vivacious with that willfully eighteenth-century pastiche vivacity plus second - decade - of - the - twentieth-century cacophony that now begins to date, though it still seems obligatory among official Italian modernists. Brilliantly orchestrated, direct and confident in its utterance, its performance was no waste of time, though a repetition might well be.

S. S.

PORTLAND, MAINE
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

JAN 1 193

In Maine Music Circles

By ELLEN F. BLODGETT

The outstanding musical event for this week will be the second concert in The Portland Music Teacher's Course, when the Boston Chamber Music Orchestra will be presented. This group is made up of players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra and indications are that the program will be very fine as well as interesting. Works of Mendelssohn, Schubert and Wagner are to be presented as well as some by modern Russian composers. There will be a group of Soviet tunes "Turkmanian Lullaby," Mossolov and "Soviet Sailors Dance," from the ballet "Red Poppy," Gliere, which promises to be very different. Mossolov is a young man, born in 1900 and so has felt Soviet influence from the first. "Turkmanian Lullaby," was originally written for an unaccompanied chorus. Turkmen live in Turkestan, a Soviet Republic in Asia. We should hear music that will have a definitely Oriental influence.

* * *

Gliere, composer of the ballet "Red Poppy" is a composer of the old guard of Russian composers, but has identified himself with the cause of Soviet music. He has attracted attention for his orchestral and chamber music works which give evidence of a remarkable inventive power and fine technical workmanship. His "Sailors Dance" is based on a song "Little Apple, Where Are You Rolling?" highly popular during the first days of the Revolution and is expressive of the sardonic and [illegible] fatalism of the exterior and interior wars of the period. Two other numbers that appear on the program which hold promise of interest are "Overture On Hebrew Themes," Prokofiev, and "Poloytzian Dances," Borodin. The first is reputed to contain at least one authentic Jewish motive while the second comes very much under the Oriental influence as the Plotvzi were a Mongolian tribe that invaded Southern Russia in the 13th century.

* * *

The Schubert number included in the program will be the first movement of the "Unfinished Symphony." I call this a very lovely number and it is continually a source of wonder to me that the individual instrumental parts are so simple in themselves but when played together can result in such beautiful harmonies. This fact was never fully realized by me until after I had had opportunity to take the score and study it.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

JAN 1 2 193

Tchaikovsky Contest

Handsome prizes are being offered by Random House for the best letters answering one of three questions concerned with "Beloved Friend," the story of Tchaikovsky and Nadejda von Meck. The book, by Catherine Drinker Bowan and Barbara von Meck, will be published February 1.

Letters are limited to 300 words and may answer any one of the three following questions: One—What is the psychological explanation of Mme. von Meck's abrupt ending of her romantic relations with Tchaikovsky, and is there any clue to her decision in the revelations given as to her personality? Two—Was Mme. von Meck's infatuation solely with Tchaikovsky's music, as she thought, or was she really in love with him, in spite of the fact that she was careful never to speak to him or meet him? Three—Did Mme. von Meck's patronage of Tchaikovsky have, on the whole, a beneficial or a harmful effect upon the quality of his music?

The first prize for the best letter on any of the three subjects will be a Steinway grand piano. The second prize will be the recordings of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, his Fifth Symphony under the direction of Leopold Stokowski, his Sixth "Pathetique" Symphony under the baton of Eugene Ormandy, the "Andante Cantabile" played by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy, and the "Nutcracker Suite" played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Leopold Stokowski. The third prize will be the recordings of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto played by Mischa Elman and of the Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor, with Arthur Rubinstein as soloist and John Barbirolli as conductor.

All letters must be submitted by April 15 to the Contest Department, Random House, 20 East Fifty-seventh Street, New York City.

The extra corrections below, [illegible] have been made for all later U.S. editions [illegible]

When Experts Meet at Symphony Hall—Music and Acoustics Fill the Air

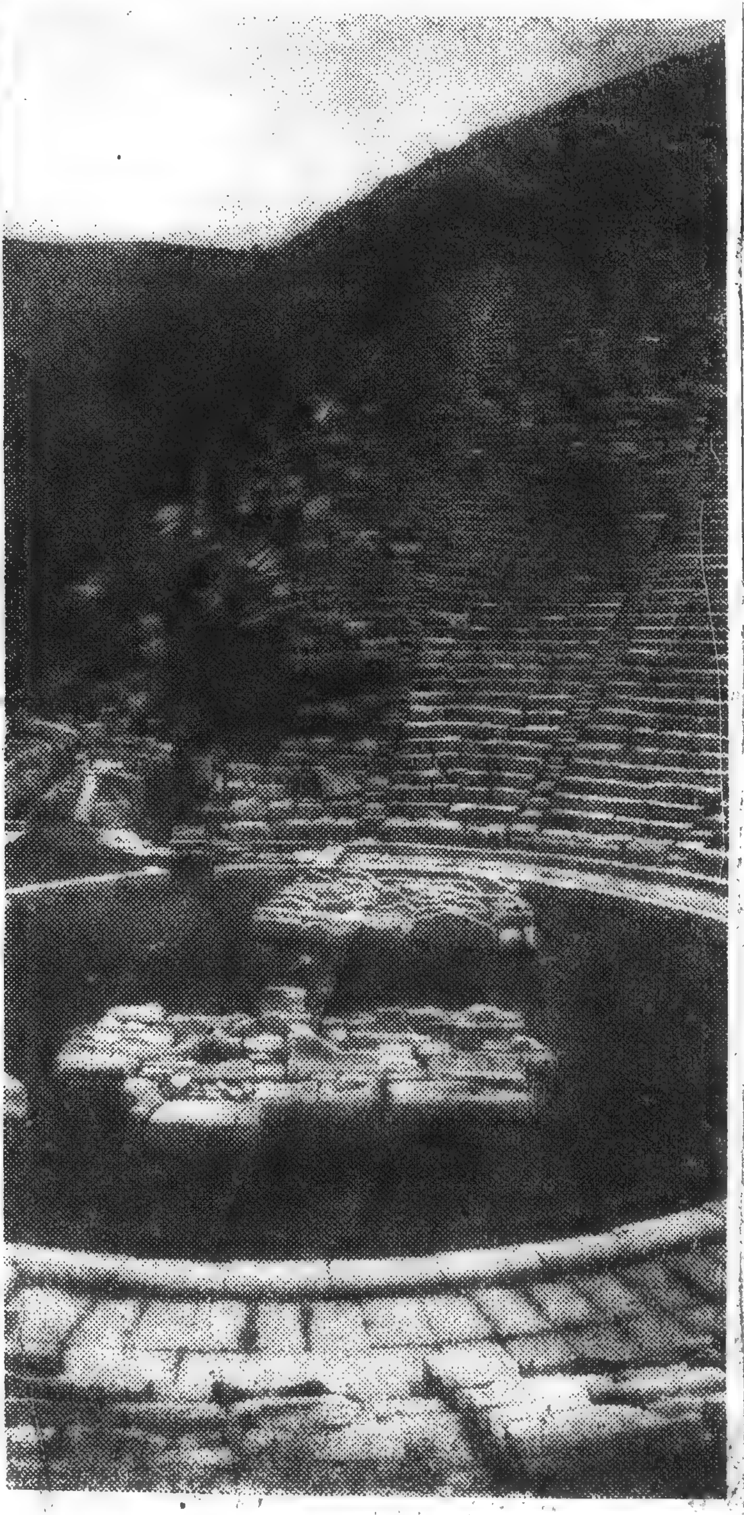
An orchestral conductor and an expert on sound discuss ancient Greek practices and modern experiments in their amphitheaters—All at a hide-and-seek luncheon in the presence of the press.

Courtesy Museum of Fine Arts, Boston; By a Staff Photographer

Theater of Herodes Atticus
Interior View of the Structure in Athens, Greece

Dimitri Mitropoulos
Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

W. R. Barss
Acoustical Expert and Sound En



Theater of Epidauros

When an eminent Greek orchestral conductor, who has experimented with the sound properties of ancient Greek amphitheaters, encounters an acoustical expert to explain these properties in the light of today's research in acoustics, the result is something of more than routine interest.

Just such a meeting occurred the other day between Dimitri Mitropoulos of Athens, now on his second visit here to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Dr. W. R. Barss of Cambridge, acoustics expert and builder of several outdoor concert shells, including the one on the Charles River Esplanade.

Interview Uncertain

At the outset, it seemed rather uncertain whether the interview was to be a meeting or a hare-and-hound chase, with Mr. Mitropoulos the unsuspecting quarry. For, immediately after a strenuous morning conducting his special transcription for string orchestra of the Beethoven C-sharp minor Quartet—to be presented on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—the small, amazingly energetic Greek disappeared from Symphony Hall without leaving so much as a trail of torn paper.

This left Dr. Barss, a reporter or two, a photographer and a slightly nonplussed publicity man feeling very much like the Chamber of Commerce welcoming committee whose guest of honor stayed on the train.

A telephone call, a quick dash through Boston traffic and Mr. Mitropoulos was run to earth in a hitherto quiet corner of the Athens Olympia, lunching with friends. After explanations and apologies, the conductor's host, Thomas Pappas, retiring president of the Greek Community in Boston, rose to the tradition of his race for solving problems in a philosophical manner.

"Wait a minute," he said, raising his hands in an expansive gesture and smiling at Mr. Mitropoulos's pursuers. "You've got to eat lunch anyway, haven't you? Stay here. Have your food. Mr. Mitropoulos will spend the first half with us, the last half with you. Right?"

The time of day, the tantalizing aroma and Mr. Pappas's hospitality were clinching arguments. Even the photographer, who had already lunched, slid into a seat at the table. Photographers are like that.

Greek Amphitheaters

Dr. Barss, who up to this point had not seemed too certain that he wasn't the victim of a shanghaiing, proved his good faith by launching into a description of Greek amphitheaters. Their auditoriums, he explained, were built in natural open air bowls and the name, "theater," meant really a place for seeing, not for hearing.

"The first theater co[illegible] tle more than a mar[illegible] in a hollow at the foot [illegible] located in a quiet site away from the noise of the city," he said. "The spectators stood on the hillside and watched the action on the cleared space. Later, this cleared space was developed into a circular orchestra which was the stage, two-thirds surrounded by concentric rows of benches which formed the auditorium.

"Later, a skene or raised platform was added behind the circular 'orchestra,'" he continued. "The skene served as a place for rest and recreation of the actors—all action taking place on the circular orchestra."

Dr. Barss was discussing the devices used by the Greeks to send out the actors' voices to as many as 20,000 auditors when—precisely as he had promised—Mr. Mitropoulos forsook his friends, bobbed around the wall of the adjoining booth and was ready to talk acoustics from the musician's point of view.

Experiments at Epidaus

First of all he looked at his watch.

"I have until 3 o'clock," he announced. "Then I must go back and practice for the ~~Casella~~ Respighi toccata which I am to conduct and play on Friday."

With a mental note taken, he launched with customary dynamic enthusiasm into his experiments conducted at Epidaus, the most famous shrine of Aesculapius. There Mr. Mitropoulos first presented the Beethoven C sharp minor quartet, augmented by a full string choir as he will conduct it in Boston.

"The sound in this place was terrible," said the conductor. As he pronounces the word, "terrible," Mr. Mitropoulos's expressive face takes on a "terrible" appearance and he rolls the r-r-r-r's with particular effect. When it is disclosed that, when rehearsing, his movements are athletic in the extreme, one can well imagine that the Greek musician is not a passive conversationalist.

Noise Like Megaphone

"A little sound like this," he said, tapping a saucer with his knife, "would make a noise like a megaphone."

His first experiment was with a double string quartet of eight musicians.

"The resonance was so strong that even when they turned their pages it made a terrible noise.

Having decided that musical programs were possible, however, Mr. Mitropoulos tried effects with a larger orchestra. He discovered that the "inside" parts of musical compositions—those which have no melodic interest—stood out just as prominently as the thematic parts. In other words, both the interesting and the uninteresting music was heard equally by the listeners.

"It was awful," he said, contracting his face and raising his powerful hands in horror.

Mozart Out of Doors

He found that the simple orchestrations of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven as well as quartets and orchestral compositions for strings, generally speaking, were ideal for outdoor performance. The early symphonies of Mozart, he discovered, were better in the open air than in a closed room.

"We played Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony on one occasion," said Mr. Mitropoulos. "The composer has here written music to imitate out-of-door sounds. The noise of the brook, for instance, heard in a closed room, sounds like a brook. There is a fusion of sounds. In the amphitheater, where everything sounds separately, there is nothing but a deep whir-r-r-r-r-r against a silly little beep-beep-beep-beep noise."

Mr. Mitropoulos then told of finding holes cut vertically into the walls of the amphitheater, the purpose of which mystified him. Dr. Barss explained that resonance was achieved by distributing a large number of bronze vessels fashioned into resonators at equally spaced levels, with 12 resonators in each horizontal range. These vases may have set into the holes. Or perhaps the holes sufficed without the vases.

Resonators Used

"The resonators," he said, "were carefully tuned to respond to the various notes of musical systems, and thereby would emphasize the more important frequency components of speech and music, and would particularly emphasize those musical notes which corresponded to the harmonic scales. Thus one was tuned to the enharmonic, another to the chromatic and a third for the diatonic system — the principal modes used by the Greeks."

He was asked whether the Greeks planned these devices when the amphitheaters were built.

"No," he replied with a rueful smile, "the Greeks were just like the modern builders. Accoustics was an afterthought with them."

The Greeks, to be sure, had a word for it, but Dr. Barss said that most of the musical and accoustic terms used today meant something quite different when employed by the patrons of Epidaus. Dissonance to them was the modern "destructive interference"; circumsonance was akin to our "reverberation"; resonance meant "echo"; consonance described what would be called "constructive interference" today.

"Electra" Produced

Mr. Mitropoulos, who had been listening intently, nodding now and then in silent agreement, told of producing a musical version of Sophocles's "Electra" in an amphitheater near the Acropolis. Because of the gargantuan nature of the production, he divided the orchestra into three sections—brass, strings and percussion—and had two conductors, each equipped with a pair of earphones.

"The music was very modern, very terrible," he said, half closing his hands as if he would have torn the "terrible" score apart. "It was not realist but stylized and I tried to have the music thematic not musically but rhythmically. There were about 20 different percussion instruments from the bottom to the top of the range, besides a full symphony orchestra. Everything that could give a particular sound I used and I made a scale of them."

In describing the instruments, Mr. Mitropoulos, whose English is remarkably good, began to founder a bit. With grimaces, gestures, and imitative noises he conveyed that some of the instruments included a tom-tom, tuned wood blocks and a whip which made a "swish" like a fly swatter.

Concerts in Open

The Greek conductor, who never remains too long on one subject, then turned to a general discussion of outdoor music. In his native Greece, he feels that the particularly beautiful surroundings should be used for concerts. Open-air concerts, properly planned, benefit from the atmosphere of the surroundings.

"I remember a program we gave once in a ravine," he said. "The audience was on one side and the orchestra was in the ravine itself. We were playing the "Euryanthe" overture by Weber. It was a lovely soft passage. The strings were sourdine—how do you say?—muted. Suddenly the leaves began to make a noise in the wind."

He shook his hands about his head to indicate leaves rustling.

"I was terrified. This awful noise, I thought, will ruin the music. But I was helpless. Finally we finished. The audience was delighted. They thought it was marvelous."

Return to Bach

Mr. Mitropoulos thinks that every writer today who is not a futurist is returning to Bach, to horizontal rather than vertical harmonies.

"Chromatic music after the style of Wagner is going out," he said. "The colors are there but they are being used separately instead of together. Their music is for the open air."

And then Mr. Mitropoulos looked at his watch.

"Ah, it is 3 o'clock. I talk too much."

But on the way back in the taxi, he continued to talk—interesting talk of Arnold Schoenberg, famed "atonal" composer, who once told Mr. Mitropoulos that some day he would confound his imitators by writing something in C major—"and he has done it too"—of the need for bringing string quartets into popularity by transcribing them for string orchestra—"Beethoven would not have been disturbed by this, he would have been glad"—of Wagner, whose operas should be performed in concert, an act at a time—"I, a musician cannot support a Wagner opera until the end, it is impossible, one hour is enough."

Yes, he would pose for one or two more photos.

"But, gentlemen, you understand that I must practice. And I am a little tired."

Soon Mr. Mitropoulos did another disappearing act, this time to emerge on the stage below. Dr. Barss, with several others, looked down upon the small figure at the immense grand piano. Except for the brightly illuminated stage, the auditorium was gray-dark. The acoustics of ancient Greek amphitheaters and the decibels which were filling the empty hall were forgotten as the conductor pianist thundered through a vibrant chordal passage or worried a staccato turn into submission.

fundamental tones of certain notes

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

JAN 7 - 1937

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY conducts the Boston Symphony orchestra at 8 o'clock tonight in one of its regular subscription concerts in Carnegie hall, New York.

* * *

167

Mitropoulos Conducts at Symphony

Trans Jan 16/37

By WILLIAM T. CHASE, JR.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, distinguished musician from Athens, was the guest conductor at the 12th of the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and had something of a field day for himself. He played the piano and conducted at the same time during the first Boston performance of Respighi's Toccata for piano and orchestra, thereby winning a tremendous ovation for this "stunt." He led the orchestra in his own arrangement for strings of Purcell's Prelude and Final Air of Dido, "When I am laid in earth," from the opera "Dido and Aeneas," and in his edition of Beethoven's String Quartet in C-sharp minor, opus 131, for strings. There was also the first playing in America of a Preludio Giocoso by Castagnone.

Obviously the afternoon belonged to Mitropoulos. And any one familiar with his tremendously dynamic way of conducting, with his musical taste and intelligence, would not hesitate a moment in granting him his full measure of credit. He made a great impression last year when he was here during Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's customary mid-season vacation. Yesterday he heightened this feeling to a considerable degree. As in the past he conducted from memory, demonstrating remarkable ability. And it was perfectly apparent that he did so because he felt that it was essentially right and not in any spirit of showmanship.

From the audience's point of view, certainly, the Respighi was the outstanding event of the program. Other conductors, Iturbi and Bruno Walter, for example, have appeared as soloist and leader at the same time. None the less Mr. Mitropoulos' performance in this capacity amazed those present and resulted in a prolonged ovation, with a great deal of stamping of feet and an occasional cheer. The very nature of the piece made it impossible to form an accurate opinion of his ability as a pianist. The interpretation was a brilliant one, especially the final portions of the work.

The opening half of the afternoon provided an exceptional opportunity to hear the string section at its best. The Beethoven String quartet, in the conductor's edition for string orchestra, followed the original almost exactly. Perhaps now and again there were passages less clear than if they had been played by four instruments. But the magnificent reading of the work more than justified the means taken. The Purcell excerpts from the opera "Dido and Aeneas" were likewise superbly played and proved surprisingly modern in conception.

For conclusion came the initial playing in the United States of Castagnone's Preludio Giocoso, a delightful and thoroughly amusing creation by an unfamiliar modern writer. Due to the length of the program the previously announced Second Suite from Casella's "La Donna Serpente," was necessarily omitted. The program will be repeated tonight. Mr. Mitropoulos will again conduct the orchestra next Monday night and on the following Friday and Saturday.

SECOND PROGRAM OF MITROPOULOS

With a concert in Symphony Hall on Monday night at 8:15 and a pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dimitri Mitropoulos will conclude his visit as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The soloist at the Monday evening Symphony concert will be Gaspar Cassado, the famous Spanish 'cellist who recently began in New York his first tour of America, appearing with the New York Philharmonic Society there and in recital. Mr. Cassado will appear with the orchestra in Schumann's concerto for violoncello. Mr. Mitropoulos will again present his arrangement for string orchestra of the introduction and final air of Dido, from the 17th century opera of Henry Purcell, "Dido and Aeneas"; also the Quartet of Beethoven in C sharp minor, opus 131. The Athenian conductor has edited this famous work of Beethoven's final year for performance by the amplified tone of the combined strings. He will also repeat the Preludio Giocoso of Castagnone (after the comedy style of Carlo Goldoni). The concluding number will be the Second Suite from Alfredo Casella's opera, "La Donna Serpente."

The Symphony upon the program of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be the second of Robert Schumann in C major. As an opening number, Mr. Mitropoulos will conduct his arrangement for full orchestra of the prelude and fugue for organ in B minor, by Bach. The conductor will again appear as pianist while conducting the orchestra in the first performance in this country of the pianoforte concerto of Malipiero. The concluding number will be Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole."

What's (

Monitor, Jan. 16/37

Mitropoulos at the Symphony

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Greek conductor who made successful guest appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago, returned to its podium this week for another fortnight. Again his energy captured the imagination of the Friday audience, which applauded him long and heartily.

The loudest and longest applause came at the close of a performance of Respighi's Toccata for piano and orchestra, with Mr. Mitropoulos playing the solo part while directing the orchestra. This stunt of a conductor's doubling as soloist always catches the popular fancy, whether it be done by Ethel Leginska or by Bruno Walter. And Respighi's Toccata, like the bulk of his music, lends itself to display.

But for all the excitement caused by this manifestation of a dual virtuosity, the high point of the afternoon musically was not the Respighi Toccata, but the Beethoven Quartet in C sharp minor, op. 131, transcribed for string orchestra by the versatile and indefatigable Mr. Mitropoulos.

This business of transcriptions is ticklish; it might well be argued that there are enough compositions written for the orchestra, and that it is unnecessary to borrow from other forms, and especially to tinker with one of the acknowledged masterpieces of music like the Beethoven op. 131.

On the other hand, it may be replied that these last quartets of Beethoven are heard by a very small audience at most, and that the transcriber renders a service by thus making them available to a larger public, just as the orchestral transcribers of Bach's organ music are said to do.

Perhaps the most important consideration is how the transcription has been done, and in this respect Mr. Mitropoulos may claim to have respected the original. He has not tried to improve upon Beethoven's composition. He has merely used the doublebasses to reinforce the cellos when this procedure seemed reasonable for the purposes of orchestral balance. Otherwise—so far at least as one can tell from listening—he has not tampered with the score. Moreover, the well-considered performance did no more violence to the quartet than is inevitable from increasing the volume. There were moments when one wished for the voices of the quartet only, but there were others when the full string choirs seemed to clarify the texture of the music.

The Quartet and the Toccata were the two central items of a program that was certainly original in its makeup. It opened with still another exhibition of Mr. Mitropoulos's talents, his arrangement for string orchestra of the Prelude and the Final Air of Dido, "When I Am Laid in Earth," from Purcell's opera, "Dido and Aeneas," and closed with a first American performance of Castagnone's Prelude Giocoso.

Mr. Mitropoulos was canny in making free use of the string sections of the Boston orchestra, whose like it would be difficult for him to find. For sheer beauty of sound, it might be said, these two transcriptions justified themselves in this performance.

Besides being a brilliant and versatile musician, Mr. Mitropoulos has as well the gift of showmanship, a necessary faculty, they say, for a conductor. He made full use of his strings, he allowed his own accomplishments to be seen and he chose a concluding number which could hardly fail to make its impression. Riccardo Castagnone, born in 1906, has not been known to Americans. By the testimony of this piece, he knows how to get his effects. The work is supposed to reflect the comedy style of Goldoni, without recalling any particular play, and it must be said that it succeeds in its bustling and amusing course.

Another work had been announced, but was dropped for want of time. This was Casella's Second Suite from his opera, "La Donna Serpente." That would have made quite an Italian holiday.

L. A. S.

HANOVER, PA.
SUN
JAN 7 - 1937

* * *

Boston Symphony On WJZ

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will broadcast from Carnegie Hall, New York over the WJZ network from 8:45 to 9:30 o'clock this evening. The program will consist of Suite in E major for string orchestra, Opus 63, Foote, and Symphony in D, Clementi.

* * *

Mitropoulos Conducts at Symphony

Am. Jan. 16/37

By RUTH MARSTERS

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the celebrated Athenian conductor, returned to America to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during a two-week engagement as guest, presented his first program in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to an enthusiastically appreciative audience.

Mr. Mitropoulos' arrangement for string orchestra of the prelude and final air of Dido, "When I Am Laid in Earth," from Purcell's opera, "Dido and Aeneas," and the Beethoven string quartet in C sharp minor, edited for full string orchestra by the conductor, formed the first part of a most unusual program.

The poetic significance which the deathless music of the seventeenth century composer achieved in the performance of Mr. Mitropoulos' arrangement is not to be conveyed in words. Of the performance it may be said that the orchestra responded with the utmost sensitiveness and beauty of tone to the rare interpretive genius of the conductor. The music itself, placed as it was, in juxtaposition with that great work of Beethoven's last year proved again to what fallacies the "historical approach to music" may lead.

* * *

In a recent article which appeared under this title in the Atlantic Monthly a Mr. Dent, apparently an authority in this sphere, in the course of establishing the fact the "music is of its essence a transitory art," stated further that "the doctrine of artistic immortality has been invented by museum directors."

This curious remark causes us to wonder as to the arts lost during the onrush of "civilization." This man who speaks so glibly of "the futile sense of reverence," does he have any conception of art of any kind? Is there any mystery, any magic, left for him in the entire universe? Is he able to dismiss eternity with a snub, perfunctorily tabulating it as the vain imagination of the deluded? Does he measure infinity then by his own timepiece with its neat ticking off the hours, days, centuries, made for his docetings? Why then does he not occupy himself with something within his understanding such as Napoleon's march on Russia or Caesar's conquest of Gaul.

As for music, Piatigorsky has designated only two categories—good, and bad. If it is good, it exists outside of time, if it is bad, time obliterates it gently but with finality. Modernity being a purely relative term it has little to do with it. In the sense of freshness of vitality, and present day significance, Purcell, is more "modern" than a great deal of contemporary writings.

* * *

The young Italian composer, Castagnone, whose work Mr. Mitropoulos introduced to Boston with the performance of his "Preludio Giocoso," proved to be among the contemporary composers of true worth.

Also performed for the first time in Boston was the Respighi Toccata for Piano and Orchestra in which Mr. Mitropoulos performed the dual role of pianist and conductor.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
JAN 8 - 1937

LARGE AUDIENCE AT ALUMNIN ORCHESTRA'S CONCERT ENCOURAGING

The much larger audience at the Alumni orchestra's concert in the Oliver school hall last Sunday evening, undoubtedly was due in large measure to the presence of Arthur Fiedler as guest conductor. Mr. Fiedler, who has conducted the Boston Symphony Pop concerts for the past half dozen seasons, imparted some of his zest and musical aptitude into the local group, with the result that the playing rose several degrees in musical quality and Mr. Sault is to be commended for this policy of bringing such experienced conductors to the city.

CAMBRIDGE SUN, JANUA

Jan 14/37

Greek Musical Genius to Lead For Koussevitsky

An exciting conductor, who leads from memory and without baton, and with unconventional gesture achieves most musicianly and soul-searching interpretations, Dimitri Mitropoulos arrived recently from his native Athens, Greece, to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the two weeks' annual Winter vacation of Serge Koussevitzky. The forty-year-old bald Athenian will appear in Symphony Hall not only as conductor, but piano virtuoso and composer.

GASPAR CASSADO

At Sanders Theatre, Thursday evening, January 14, and at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, January 15 and 16, Mitropoulos will be soloist in Respighi's "Toccata" for piano and orchestra, which he also will conduct. At the same pair of concerts, he will introduce the great C-Sharp Minor Quartet of Beethoven as a piece for the entire string section of the orchestra. As composer, he will present his arrangement for modern orchestra of two excerpts from "Dido and Aeneas,'" a remarkable opera composed by the Englishman, Henry Purcell, in 1688. Not to forget living fellow-composers, Mitropoulos will include a suite from the opera, "La Donna Serpente," of Alfredo Casella.

For the Monday evening concert of Jan. 18, the Athenian guest conductor will repeat his previous program, with the exception of the Toccata. This he will replace with Schumann's Violoncello Concerto. The soloist will be the Spaniard, Gaspar Cassado, who in his recent New York debut confirmed his advance reputation from Europe as a temperamentally fiery and technically dazzling artist. A cherished pupil of the long incomparable Pablo Casals, he has won the title of "The Younger Casals," with his teacher's approval.

G LEADER.

ATHENIAN TO CONDUCT THE HUB SYMPHONY

Dimitri Mitropoulos to Wield Baton for Two Weeks.

An exciting conductor, who leads from memory and without baton, and with unconventional gesture achieves most musicianly and soul-searching interpretations, Dimitri

---

AM—JANUARY 17, 1937

GREEK MUSICAL GENIUS LEADS FOR KOUSSEVITSKY

An exciting conductor, who leads from memory and without baton, and with unconventional gesture

---

Mitropoulos At Symphony

By Ruth Marsters

Music Editor

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS, in his first Symphony Hall appearances as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, presented, at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, a program which in design as in performance was unusual from many aspects.

Opening with Mr. Mitropoulos' own arrangement of the Prelude and Final Air of Dido, "When I am laid in earth," from Purcell's opera, "Dido and Aeneas," there followed Beethoven's great String Quartet in C sharp minor, which the conductor has edited for the complete string orchestra.

Later in the program the distinguished Athenian presented the Respighi Toccata for Piano and Orchestra, performing the dual role of soloist and conductor. This, as the "Preludio Giocoso," by the young Italian composer, Castagnone, was given its first American performance in this program.

* * *

MR. MITROPOULOS' personality as a conductor was the subject of so much analytical comment upon his first appearance as guest conductor of the orchestra last season, that repetition becomes unavoidable. But if the commentator may be guilty of this, it must be said at once that Mr. Mitropoulos himself is not. There is no vestige of the repetitive in the significance with which he imbues everything he touches to such a degree that the music seems, in fact, to be possessed of a new dimension.

While rhythmic intensity is an integral part of this vitalization process, it is perhaps even more the mercurial dynamic effects he achieves which are responsible for the singular results.

While his is an individuality that is truly magnetic, immediately electrifying the audience, his sincerity as a musician leaves no room for showmanship.

His technique of conducting is such that every motion carries weight in its demand upon the orchestra. As an interpreter, one feels that the final spontaneous performance is the result of the keenest intellectual analysis of the score. (As is his custom, Mr. Mitropoulos conducted without score or baton.)

* * *

INTELLECTUAL as his approach may be, this is fused with as great a poetic imaginativeness.

It was this latter quality which made the performance of the Purcell music a thing of profound and haunting beauty.

The orchestra responded to the conductor's interpretation with the greatest sensitiveness and pliability. Unfortunately, it did not measure up to its usual high standard in this respect elsewhere in the program. (This review is based on Friday afternoon's performance.)

This may have been due to the fact that Mr. Burgin was not present to make his customary sizeable contribution to the performance, as concert master. Especially were his services missed in the performance of the Respighi Toccata for Piano and Orchestra. As it was, there was evidenced a curious lack of precision and vitality on the part of the orchestra, in spite of and in contrast to the tremendous amount of intensity on the part of the conductor at the piano.

In the performance of the Castagnone "Preludio Giocoso," however, the orchestra reverted to its usual standards, with of course immensely plaudible results. The music itself is utterly delightful—vivacious in humor, brilliantly orchestrated.

* * *

THE SECOND SUITE from Alfredo Casella's opera, "La Donna Serpente," omitted from this program, will be performed at Monday evening's concert in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Mitropoulos will again present his arrangement for string orchestra of the Introduction and Final Air of Dido from Purcell's opera, "Dido and Aeneas," as well as the Beethoven C sharp minor Quartet in Monday's program.

Gaspar Cassado, the Spanish 'cellist who recently made his first American appearance in New York with the Philharmonic Society, will be the soloist on this occasion in the performance of Schumann's Concerto for Violoncello.

CLEVELAND, O.
NEWS
JAN 7 - 1937

- • Boston Symphony orchestra plays Casella's revision of Clementi's Symphony in D and Foote's Suite in E Major for String Orchestra, WGAR at 8:45.
- • • WHK broadcasts the Christmas service from St. Theodosius Russian Orthodox church at midnight tonight to 2 a. m., the Columbia net taking it from 12:30 to 1.
- • • March of Time presents impersonations of stars in the year's 10 best movies, WHK at 10:30.
- • • Senator Joseph C. O'Mahoney discusses "Congress and the Courts," WGAR at 8.

168

An Editorial on Music by Redfern Mason

Trans Jan. 16/37

Helping the American Composer

One day, during the Great War, when I was on welfare work in France, I ran into a young professor from the Middle West who was giving lectures on American literature to the young Frenchmen of the Sorbonne. He noticed that, whenever he discussed a book, they would ask him: "Is this American, or is it merely an English book written in the United States?" They wanted to be sure that they were listening to an American and not a provincial voice.

So he decided to try them with two characteristically American works. He chose "Leaves of Grass" and "Tom Sawyer." The effect was magical. "That is American," they cried; "no Englishman could write like that."

I strolled into the principal music store in Paris and asked if they had any American music. The clerk looked blank for a moment; then he began rummaging among a pile of sheet music and finally emerged with a copy of Neal Moray's "Hiawatha."

"Have you anything by Edward MacDowell?" I inquired; but the young man had never heard of him, nor of Horatio Parker, nor of Arthur Foote. Unfortunately Irving Berlin had not yet burst into flower. I am sure he would have known about him.

About that time Walter Damrosch came over and directed an orchestra. Now, I thought, the French will hear something American. Judge of my disappointment when he gave us such works as "L'apres midi d'un faune," and not one solitary American composition. What a chance he missed!

When Toscanini toured Europe with the New York Philharmonic he did not include a single American work in his programs.

The Boston Symphony has done its duty by the native composer. But the majority of the directors of our symphony orchestras are foreigners in their outlook, and their interest in the music of this country is apt to be rather forced than spontaneous. If our music does not conform to European standards, they think it is bad.

Yet the reverse is the truth. To be good, to be representative of the people of this country, our music must have a Yankee snap, a Southern drawl, a Western audacity.

Even our critics often turn to the East for inspiration, instead of praying to whatever gods may be on this side of the Atlantic. They scorn the original imp that grins with a Tenderloin malice in some of our jazz. Much of it is putrid, I confess; but a Mozart could find flashes of genius in the Singspiels of his day, and some of the best of Beethoven has a folk-song origin.

So it will be with American music. Not imitating Debussy and Schonberg is our destined way, but catching the American accent, the American way of feeling, the American habit of thought. There are as great potentialities of music on this side of the Atlantic as ever there were in Europe.

Before taking leave of this aspect of the subject, let me quote, with warm approval, some words that were written some years ago by Aaron Copland in "Modern Music":

"What we want, finally, is an American critic who will concern himself in the creation of an American music to the same degree as Edward Evans in English music, of Henri Prunieres in French music. Is that too much to ask? What we want is a newspaper critic of discrimination and authority who will not depend for his knowledge of American music on whatever a conductor may happen to choose to present to him, a critic who will seek out rather than avoid our music, even if it necessitates going to concert halls below Forty-second street or above Fifty-seventh street, a critic who will think it worth his while to travel even two hundred miles when he is given an opportunity to hear the works of nineteen representative men at a festival of American music, a critic who will have some curiosity to meet and to talk with the composers themselves. There is no doubt in my mind that this critic will soon be found. What we shall want from him is honest criticism, not chauvinistic criticism, and judgments which are based upon a sound knowledge and comprehension of the music itself."

But there is greater hope for the native composer today than there ever was before. The Federal Music Project has enlisted the Government in the cause of music. The great unplayed is being given a chance to be performed; the neglected composer has found interpreters. He is no longer writing for the waste paper basket, as he has done with broken heart for generations.

No two countries solve the aesthetic problem alike, and America is doing her own pathbreaking. I notice that Olin Downes of the New York Times has given the Forum Laboratory idea his enthusiastic support. Here a composer can hear his works performed and has to submit to a merciless questioning from the audience. This is excellent. It breaks down the traditional reserve between the music-maker and the public. It puts an end to the stupid superstition that the composer is a sort of Sphinx, who dwells in Egyptian solitude and visits the questioner with dire punishment.

Mitropolous in Threefold Capacity; Is Director, Arranger and Soloist

Plays Old English Music; Transmutes Beethoven, And Is Pianist in New Concerto of Respighi

By Redfern Mason

In the beginning there was a man named Henry Lee Higginson. He found a conductor; they created an orchestra, and last, but most important of all, there came into existence an audience so understanding, so sensitive, that H. G. Wells called it "the fine flower of American culture."

And that, if you please, is how what is probably the finest symphony orchestra in the world developed. Twenty years have elapsed since, with Karl Muck as director, I heard this great organization give a dozen concerts, one each day, in the Festival Hall of the San Francisco Exposition.

Yesterday afternoon it had a Greek accent, with Dimitri Mitropoulos as conductor. That was to be expected, for one of the signs by which you may know a good orchestra is its sensitiveness to the wand of the director. The previous day I saw the man rehearsing, and he was as eager, as dynamic, as one of the youths of the Parthenon frieze. Yesterday he was the god Pan in modern dress, with the double bass players as caryatides to support the organ, and the rest of the orchestra as responsive and as eloquent as the chorus of Euripides. True, he had not the horns of the god or the goat's legs; but he had that enthusiasm which, to the Greeks, was a sort of divine intoxication.

And that is one of the reasons why a rather unusual program drew from the audience varying manifestations of pleasure.

It began with the Prelude from the "Dido and Aeneas" of Henry Purcell and the glorious air, "When I am laid in earth." The director had arranged this music for strings, and many of us must have wondered whether the shade of the young composer, all too soon cut off in his early manhood, were permitted to visit this concert hall beyond the Atlantic to hear his music played so beautifully as he could only have imagined. For "Dido and Aeneas," the the "Athalie" of Racine, was composed for a young ladies' academy, probably with a dozen instrumentalists at most.

But compositions, like books, have their fortune, and today Purcell is recognized as one of the great ones of music. If Handel had not made England his home, the Britannic Muse might have sung her native idiom and not have been Germanized.

Mitropolous indulged his genial soul in giving us Beethoven's C sharp minor Quartet, arranged for the string orchestra. This work Beethoven wrote when he was setting deathward, a work abounding in beauties yet seemingly lacking in the direct urge, the sovereign unity of concepton, that inform the composer's greatest works.

But the director rejoiced in it. I think his idea was to bring out the latent orchestral virtues which Beethoven, writing for the string quartet, could not express. It was thrilling to sense the concentrated feeling of Mitropolous. If he was Pan, he was creating a new Arcadia. He senses the truth of the Nietzschean adage that "the beautiful always moves with light feet." Yet, "not too tame neither." He can unleash the Jovian thunders when he wants to; but he has reserve.

The audience was interested; but I think many of them thought the composition, like Charles the Second, "an unconscionable time a dying." It would be interesting, while we are in the vein, to hear the quartet in its original form and make comparisons.

From Germany, with its Hellenic interpretation, we turned to Italy and listened—the first time for Boston—to Respighi's Toccata for piano and orchestra, with the director at the clavier. It is a brilliant work, with echoes of the Monteverdi who thought in free arioso centuries before Wagner, a spirited, challenging composition.

Last of all came a Preludio Giocoso by Castagnone, music that bubbles a la Scarlatti, concluding the afternoon's music on a note of gaiety, just like the classic sonata.

Fashioning the Substance of Music

Transcript, Jan. 16/37 DIMITRI MITROPOULOS

Current Guest Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, Sketched in the Course of a Rehearsal

---

SECOND PROGRAMME OF MITROPOULOS

With a concert in Symphony hall on Monday night at 8.15, and a pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dimitri Mitropoulos will conclude his visit as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The soloist at the Monday evening Symphony concert will be Gaspar Cassado, the famous Spanish 'cellist who recently began in New York his first tour of America, appearing with the New York Philharmonic society there and in recital. Mr. Cassado will appear with the orchestra in Shumann's Concerto for Violoncello. Mr. Mitropoulos will again present his arrangement for string orchestra of the Introduction and Final Air of Dido, from the seventeenth century opera of Henry Purcell, "Dido and Aeneas"; also the quartet of Beethoven in C sharp minor, Opus 131. The Athenian conductor has edited this famous work of Beethoven's final year for performance by the amplified tone of the combined strings. He will also repeat the Preludio Gioccoso of Castagnone of Castagnone (after the comdey style of Carlo Goldoni). The concluding number will be the second suite from Alfredo Casella's opera, "La Donna Serpente".

The Symphony on the programme of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be the second of Robert Schumann in C major. As an opening number, Mr. Mitropoulos will conduct his arrangement for full orchestra of the Prelude and Fugue for Organ in B minor, by Bach. The conductor will again appear as pianist while conducting the orchestra in the first performance in this country of the Pianoforte Concerto of Malipiero. The concluding number will be Ravel's "Rapsodie Espangnole."

RIVERSIDE, CAL.
PRESS

1937

In Realm of Radio

Best Programs

A billion dollars worth of stars from Paramount studios, Hollywood, will sparkle in one of the most impressive filmland programs ever heard, when the silver jubilee for Adolph Zukor, commemorating his twenty-fifth anniversary in the picture business, will be celebrated tonight by NBC and KFI at 9:15. Leopold Stokowski will conduct the Paramount symphony orchestra of 103 pieces. Cecil B. DeMille, ace director, and Jack Benny, comedian, among others will be heard on the air.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in a concert at Carnegie hall, New York, today at 5:45 p.m., over NBC and KECA.

Silver anniversary of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra will be observed with a special program tonight via NBC and KFI at 8:15.

The nation's capital will be honored by Major Bowes in a program over CBS and KNX tonight at 6.

Alexander Woollcott, author, playwright, and radio's one and only "Town Crier," returned to the coast-to-coast CBS network via KNX tonight at 9:30, with a new series of programs.

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Post Jan. 17/37

Ancient Instruments at Recital

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE interest in ancient instruments, both as museum pieces and as actual factors in the performance of music, is steadily growing. Thanks to this cult, a fascinating field of music is being revealed to us. Boston now has its own Society of Ancient Instruments, composed of Paul Fedorovsky, quinton; Albert Bernard, dessus de viole; Alfred Zighera, viole de gambe; Gaston Dufresne, contre basse de viole, and Putnam Aldrich, harpsichord. This group, which has been rehearsing for a year, will make its first public appearance in Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening of this week. The programme, of promising interest, will be drawn from various masters of the 17th and 18th centuries: Louis de Caix d'Hervelois, J. S. Bach, Purcell, John Jenkins, Jacques Champion de Chambonnieres, Couperin, D. Scarlatti and Marin Marais.

* * * *

It is a great mistake for a composer to be his own apologist. If Wagner had not prated so long and so loudly about his theories of art, if he had confined himself to the writing of opera and left philosophy and aesthetics alone, the number of his detractors would have been less. The latest objector, who cannot see Wagner's music apart from the philosopho-dramatic scaffolding with which he surrounded it, is the Rev. Tyler Turner, who writes in the current issue of "Coronet" under the arresting caption, "Less Wagner, Please." Since the clergyman admits that he is a "rank amateur," it would be unkind to say that we would have guessed it anyway. One does not attack Wagner today through "Tannhauser" and "Lohengrin," while ignoring "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger" or even through The Valkyries Ride. In the meantime, try to procure a ticket for the present Wagnerian performances at the Metropolitan. The individual, said Weber, is an ass, but the voice of the people is the voice of God.

* * * *

The second half of Dimitri Mitropoulos' term as guest conductor of the Symphony Orchestra begins tomorrow evening. The programme to be offered is, in the main, that of the concerts of last week in Cambridge and in Boston: the excerpt from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas," the arrangement for string orchestra of Beethoven's Quartet in C sharp minor and the Preludio Giocoso of Castagnone. There will also be the Second Suite from Casella's "La Donna Serpente," omitted at the last moment from the Friday and Saturday programme and in place of Mr. Mitroupoulos ' performance of Respighi's Toccata for Piano and Orchestra, the Monday evening subscribers will hear the 'Cello Concerto of Schumann played by the eminent Spanish 'cellist, Gaspar Cassado.

For the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Mitroupoulos has prepared a programme more in the regular course. Its major item is the C major Symphony of Schumann, that of the romantic Adagio, unplayed here in its entirety for several seasons and a work to tempt the Greek conductor's exceptional powers. Mr. Mitropoulos will once more appear as transcriber in an orchestral version of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in B minor, a work little known in its original or in any other form, and as pianist in the first performance hereabouts of the Concerto of Malipiero. Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" will bring the end.

* * * *

Yet another concert of chamber music to be offered this week is that of the Boston Flute Players' Club this afternoon at the Hotel Vendome, when Robert Casadesus, distinguished French composer-pianist, will be the visiting artist. Six Pianoforte Sonatas of Domenico Scarlatti, a Sonata for flute and piano by Mr. Casadesus, written in 1934, de Severac's "Le Retour des Muletiers," Debussy's "La Soiree dans Grenade" and Ravel's Toccata are on the programme which concludes with Faure's Second Quartet, in G minor, for pianoforte, violin, viola and violoncello.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
NEWS

JAN 9 - 1937

* * *

"BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA," by Gerome Brush, (Merrymount Press, Boston, Mass., $1.50).

A COLLECTION of charcoal drawings and short, informal biographical sketches by Gerome Brush, privately printed for the members of the orchestra and their wide circle of admirers.

---

on a Pilgrimage

of this world, but continued proximity may have the unfortunate effect of altering one's sense of perspective. The fault is natural, closely bound to that mysterious force called human nature.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a priceless jewel of this city. To many of us it is a matter of personal pride that the locality recognizes its great treasure housed in the auditorium at Huntington and Massachusetts ~~avs.~~ Seven months of the year the orchestra provides great music greatly played for persons in this vicinity, and it ministers to another public on the various tours to New York, the Middle West and elsewhere. These thoughts are not novel, but they ought to be considered again and again.

To those of us who have merely to board subway or automobile for the 24 programs each in the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening series, Symphony-going is more or less a regulated matter.

Now great conductors and orchestras do not merely happen, nor can they be bought just by paying for them. They are the result of inspired genius and years of concerted effort under happy circumstances. No one, therefore, should permit himself to take the Boston Symphony as a matter of course. An excellent way to improve one's perspective is to hear the orchestra out of the city.

This writer was privileged to hear the Boston Symphony on its recent tour to Hanover, N. H. Hartford, Conn. New York city, and across the East River in Brooklyn.

Up in Hanover, where the mercury drops out of sight, Dartmouth College's Webster Hall—a small but attractive and highly resonant auditorium—was jammed to the rafters by students, townspeople and others who had to travel over the road to get there. They listened intently to Haydn, Richard Strauss, Wagner and Sibelius, venting their approval in no uncertain terms. This feeling was not for the music alone, but for the men who had played it, and for Richard Burgin, who conducted in the absence due to illness of Dr. Koussevitzky. To stand on the steps of the hall afterward and listen to the comments made by the departing audience was proof enough.

Bushnell Auditorium in Hartford was likewise crowded. An urban audience exhibited the same sort of enthusiasm.

But proverbially blase, hard-boiled New York was a revelation. Thursday night's concert was sold out to within 15 of the total number of standing places, according to a doorman. The orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky were in superlatively rare form, and their accounts of Clementi, Ravel and Brahms defied exact description. And when it was over the temporary occupants of Carnegie Hall rose to clap and cheer. Up this way it is usual to think of New Yorkers as hard to please, perhaps because so many concerts are given there from season to season, until the point of satiation is nearly reached. Let no one make the mistake of thinking that New Yorkers who attend the Boston Symphony concerts there do not properly esteem our orchestra.

Truth may be spoken, even if it treads on the toes of good manners. A concert of the New York Philharmonic, heard in the same auditorium less than 24 hours later, was a fair test for one pair of ears.

Smugness is not a New England characteristic, though tenacious belief in what seems to be the truth decidedly is. The foregoing paragraphs were not intended to flatter nor to be provincial in tone.

MUSIC

Her 19/37

MONDAY SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The third concert in the Monday series was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting, yesterday evening in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Gaspar Cassado, 'cellist. The program was as follows:

Purcell	Prelude and Final Air of Dido from "Dido and Aeneas," arranged by Mr. Mitropoulos
Beethoven	String Quartet in C sharp minor Op. 131, for string orchestra
Schumann	Concerto for 'cello and orchestra in A minor Op. 129
Casella	Second Suite from "La Donna Serpente"

A second performance of Beethoven's C sharp minor Quarter, as performed by the strings of the Boston Symphony and conducted by Mr. Mitropoulos, served to prove the validity of this experiment. Beethoven was one of those creative artists who was never content to stand on his achievements. He was continually reaching out in new directions and exploring new paths. It is for this reason that so many commentators have observed that the last piano works and the last quartets try, as it were, to burst the confines of the instrumental medium for which they were actually designed. The boring passages in the andante and variations are not banished by the orchestral version, which is nevertheless so close to the strict score of the quartet. But the work as a whole does triumphantly emerge and can, for once, be heard by more than the chamber music public.

Purcell's lovely music has been treated with the utmost dignity by Mr. Mitropoulos in the arrangement for string orchestra. The moving pathos of this music shows what a remarkable composer Purcell was and does suggest that more of his music might be given. Schumann's 'Cello Concerto is also beautiful music and one of the finest works in this particular form. Unfortunately, Mr. Cassado chose to play the solo part in so mannered and extravagant a style that the proper effect of the music was spoiled for us. Mr. Cassado's technique is no doubt exceptional; but his want of taste in the arrangements that he has made of Mozart's Horn Concerto and Weber's Clarinet Concerto was also carried over last night into his interpretation of Schumann's music.

Casella's Suite from his opera, "La Donna Serpente," has been highly praised in Paris, where it was performed in 1933. The opera has also received interesting comment; but, since our only operatic organization never can put on the modern European operas that have been commended, there is small chance that we shall hear it in its original form for some time. This is a pity, for Casella is an amazingly adroit composer. He never writes ineffectively or boringly. The more soulful among music-lovers may regret this accomplishment, but some of us will welcome it heartily in a less exalted spirit. The music is splendidly scored for a large orchestra and is thoroughly operatic. The march at the end, in the modern idiom, has as much to recommend it from a popular point of view as Verdi's march from "Aida." It may be averred that the latter is hackneyed; but it was certainly the work of a thoroughly skilled composer. Mr. Casella's music has this virtue, too. He has written a brilliant suite, with the slow prelude to act 3 as contrast; and we may be glad of the opportunity to hear it. The orchestra, under Mr. Mitropoulous, gave excellent performances of every number on this program.

MITROPOULOS AGAIN CHARMS

Conducts Symphony in Two New Pieces

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH.

One cannot accuse Dimitri Mitropoulos of taking things too easily during his present fortnight's leadership of the Symphony orchestra. Since last Thursday evening's concert in Cambridge he has now conducted four times, offering at last evening's concert in Symphony Hall a programme which contained two new numbers. A wholly new list, of course is in prospect for the concerts of Friday and Saturday.

The new pieces last evening, the second of them an actual novelty, were Schumann's Concerto for Violoncello and orchestra, in which Gaspar Cassado was the soloist, and the Second Suite from Casella's only full-length opera, "La Donna Serpente." Externally the work of Schumann served to introduce to Boston a notable 'cellist and to prove that Mr. Mitropoulos, who has thus far conducted everything from memory, continues to do so in the case of a concerto in which he is not the soloist.

The Spanish 'cellist, who is just this side of 40, proved himself last evening both a virtuoso and a musician of temperament. His tone is virile and masculine, but as his playing of the slow movement showed, it can be melting and tender as well. Only in this movement, by the way, is Schumann at anything like his best. Applause seems to be the rule at Symphony Hall just now, and Mr. Cassado came in for his share of it.

Alfredo Casella is surely the least Italianate member of his school. The music of "La Donna Serpente," so far as we can gather from three excerpts, owes far more to Stravinsky than to Verdi or Puccini. The first movement of this Second Suite, a Sinfonia from Act. I, has a hard brilliance; the Prelude to Act III which followed it is broadly songful, yet anything but sensuous in character, suggesting at the outset the Berceuse from the Russian composer's "Firebird." The bird division of the suite, "Battle and Finale," adds to an episode of ferocious din, actually quite unlike the battle-scene of Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," a March movement of almost rowdy exuberance. From this it must not be inferred that the music is not that of a masterhand: its extreme effectiveness was made everywhere evident by Mr. Mitropoulos, who seemingly interprets all composers sympathetically. . . . The musical climax of last evening's concert happened, however, to be the part repeated from the concerts of last Friday and Saturday, Mr. Mitropoulos' arrangements for string orchestra of the excerpts from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas" and of Beethoven's C-sharp minor quartet. Again the performances were something to be believed only by those who heard.

---

169 Jan 17/37

Cassado, Casadeus to Play Here;

Gaspard Cassado, Spanish 'cellist, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert tomorrow evening at Symphony Hall under Dimitri Mitropoulos, guest conductor.

Cassado at Symphony

Boston Debut of Spanish 'Cellist with Dimitri Mitropoulos Conducting

Jan 18

By Moses Smith

In his fourth appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in five days, Dimitri Mitropoulos presented last night in Symphony Hall a program the first half of which had been played at the three concerts last week—the "Prelude and Final Air of Dido from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas" and the Beethoven String Quartet in C-sharp minor. In both cases, it will be recalled, the music was arranged for string orchestra by the conductor. To end the program the conductor found place for the Second Suite from Casella's opera, "La Donna Serpente," which was cut out of the program of the week-end. The other number was Schumann's 'Cello Concerto, with the distinguished Spanish 'cellist, Gaspar Cassado, making his Boston debut in the solo part. The planned repetition of Castagnone's "Preludio Giocoso" was passed by. As it was the concert was a long one, requiring more than two hours.

Mr. Mitropoulos is evidently not disturbed by the passing of time when he is making music. Nor is the audience, when the performance is as arresting, stimulating and intense as it was last night under the Greek conductor's direction. If there were any doubts about the quality of the visitor after his two weeks of concerts last season they must have been dispelled during the last few days. Here is unquestionably a musician and executant of the first class.

One need not have been in perfect agreement with every nuance demanded of the musicians by the conductor last night to realize how superlatively able a musician and fine, conscientious an artist he is. On the basis of his conducting here last year we have already credited him with an extraordinary memory and a dynamic, flexible—if unorthodox—conducting technic. We had also noted his intensity of musical feeling, transferred somehow to the musicians before him. But the playing by the orchestra's entire string section of the Beethoven Quartet remained—after two hearings—something of a miracle. It was incredible how the conductor's conception of the music—almost as grand as the music itself—could be imparted to an orchestra in the relatively brief time available for rehearsals. The same comment, less emphatically, of course, may be made with regard to the performance of the poignant music of Purcell. Never—or so it seemed last night—have the Bostonian strings sounded more beautifully.

The adaptability of the musicianship of Mr. Mitropoulos was strikingly apparent during the playing of the Schumann Concerto. Here was a model accompaniment, with conductor and soloist in perfect accord on the principal essential—that Schumann be given voice. Mr. Mitropoulos was no more faithful in his concern for careful ensemble than was the soloist, an exceptionably conscientious virtuoso, who kept his eyes fixed on the conductor much of the time. Mr. Cassado was also a somewhat nervous soloist, making no secret of his desire that he and the conductor be in constant agreement as to tempo and dynamics. But the performance, far from suffering, gained in quality.

The version of the Concerto that we heard last night was, as might have been expected, Latin rather than Teutonic. What it lacked in breadth it contained in precision, refinement and suave lyricism. For those are the qualities that characterize Mr. Cassado's expert, distinguished playing. And Mr. Mitropoulos can evidently summon such qualities as the need arises. The 'cellist was demonstratively applauded at the end; but he eagerly insisted on sharing the applause with conductor and orchestra.

Casella's Suite turned out to be music of the theater—and rather obvious music. Perhaps subtlety is out of place in the opera house, the more so when it is a question of Italian opera. The second (slow) movement, which is the Prelude to the third act of the opera, had, it is true, a sort of Respighian lyricism. But the first and third, especially the latter, drew upon all the resources of a modern orchestra to achieve an almost ear-splitting brilliance.

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Post Jan. 17/37

Ancient Instruments at Recital

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE interest in ancient instruments, both as museum pieces and as actual factors in the performance of music, is steadily growing. Thanks to this cult, a fascinating field of music is being revealed to us. Boston now has its own Society of Ancient Instruments, composed of Paul Fedorovsky, quinton; Albert Bernard, dessus de viole; Alfred Zighera, viole de gambe; Gaston Dufresne, contre basse de viole, and Putnam Aldrich, harpsichord. This group, which has been rehearsing for a year, will make its first public appearance in Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening of this week. The programme, of promising interest, will be drawn from various masters of the 17th and 18th centuries: Louis de Caix d'Hervelois, J. S. Bach, Purcell, John Jenkins, Jacques Champion de Chambonnieres, Couperin, D. Scarlatti and Marin Marais.

* * * *

It is a great mistake for a composer to be his own apologist. If Wagner had not prated so long and so loudly about his theories of art, if he had confined himself to the writing of opera and left philosophy and aesthetics alone, the number of his detractors would have been less. The latest objector, who cannot see Wagner's music apart from the philosopho-dramatic scaffolding with which he surrounded it, is the Rev. Tyler Turner, who writes in the current issue of "Coronet" under the arresting caption, "Less Wagner, Please." Since the clergyman admits that he is a "rank amateur," it would be unkind to say that we would have guessed it anyway. One does not attack Wagner today through "Tannhauser" and "Lohengrin," while ignoring "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger" or even through The Valkyries Ride. In the meantime, try to procure a ticket for the present Wagnerian performances at the Metropolitan. The individual, said Weber, is an ass, but the voice of the people is the voice of God.

* * * *

The second half of Dimitri Mitropoulos' term as guest conductor of the Symphony Orchestra begins tomorrow evening. The programme to be offered is, in the main, that of the concerts of last week in Cambridge and in Boston: the excerpt from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas," the arrangement for string orchestra of Beethoven's Quartet in C sharp minor and the Preludio Giocoso of Castagnone. There will also be the Second Suite from Casella's "La Donna Serpente," omitted at the last moment from the Friday and Saturday programme and in place of Mr. Mitroupoulos ' performance of Respighi's Toccata for Piano and Orchestra, the Monday evening subscribers will hear the 'Cello Concerto of Schumann played by the eminent Spanish 'cellist, Gaspar Cassado.

For the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Mitroupoulos has prepared a programme more in the regular course. Its major item is the C major Symphony of Schumann, that of the romantic Adagio, unplayed here in its entirety for several seasons and a work to tempt the Greek conductor's exceptional powers. Mr. Mitropoulos will once more appear as transcriber in an orchestral version of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in B minor, a work little known in its original or in any other form, and as pianist in the first performance hereabouts of the Concerto of Malipiero. Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" will bring the end.

* * * *

Yet another concert of chamber music to be offered this week is that of the Boston Flute Players' Club this afternoon at the Hotel Vendome, when Robert Casadesus, distinguished French composer-pianist, will be the visiting artist. Six Pianoforte Sonatas of Domenico Scarlatti, a Sonata for flute and piano by Mr. Casadesus, written in 1934, de Severac's "Le Retour des Muletiers," Debussy's "La Soiree dans Grenade" and Ravel's Toccata are on the programme which concludes with Faure's Second Quartet, in G minor, for pianoforte, violin, viola and violoncello.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
NEWS

JAN 9 - 1937

"BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA," by Gerome Brush, (Merrymount Press, Boston, Mass., $1.50).

A COLLECTION of charcoal drawings and short, informal biographical sketches by Gerome Brush, privately printed for the members of the orchestra and their wide circle of admirers.

Globe 17/37

~~MUSIC AND MUSICIANS~~

Thoughts on a Symphonic Pilgrimage

"Custom does not really stale the finest things of this world, but continued proximity may have the unfortunate effect of altering one's sense of perspective. The fault is natural, closely bound to that mysterious force called human nature.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a priceless jewel of this city. To many of us it is a matter of personal pride that the locality recognizes its great treasure housed in the auditorium at Huntington and Massachusetts av. Seven months of the year the orchestra provides great music greatly played for persons in this vicinity, and it ministers to another public on the various tours to New York, the Middle West and elsewhere. These thoughts are not novel, but they ought to be considered again and again.

To those of us who have merely to board subway or automobile for the 24 programs each in the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening series, Symphony-going is more or less a regulated matter.

Now great conductors and orchestras do not merely happen, nor can they be bought just by paying for them. They are the result of inspired genius and years of concerted effort under happy circumstances. No one, therefore, should permit himself to take the Boston Symphony as a matter of course. An excellent way to improve one's perspective is to hear the orchestra out of the city.

This writer was privileged to hear the Boston Symphony on its recent tour to Hanover, N H, Hartford, Conn, New York city, and across the East River in Brooklyn.

Up in Hanover, where the mercury drops out of sight, Dartmouth College's Webster Hall—a small but attractive and highly resonant auditorium—was jammed to the rafters by students, townspeople and others who had to travel over the road to get there. They listened intently to Haydn, Richard Strauss, Wagner and Sibelius, venting their approval in no uncertain terms. This feeling was not for the music alone, but for the men who had played it, and for Richard Burgin, who conducted in the absence due to illness of Dr Koussevitzky. To stand on the steps of the hall afterward and listen to the comments made by the departing audience was proof enough.

Bushnell Auditorium in Hartford was likewise crowded. An urban audience exhibited the same sort of enthusiasm.

But proverbially blase, hard-boiled New York was a revelation. Thursday night's concert was sold out to within 15 of the total number of standing places, according to a doorman. The orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky were in superlatively rare form, and their accounts of Clementi, Ravel and Brahms defied exact description. And when it was over the temporary occupants of Carnegie Hall rose to clap and cheer. Up this way it is usual to think of New Yorkers as hard to please, perhaps because so many concerts are given there from season to season until the point of satiation is nearly reached. Let no one make the mistake of thinking that New Yorkers who attend the Boston Symphony concerts there do not properly esteem our [illegible].

~~Truth ma[illegible]poken, even if it treads on th[illegible] of good manners. A concert of the New York Philharmonic, heard in the same auditorium less than 24 hours later, was a fair test for one pair of ears.~~

~~This particula ir emerged wi the firm conviction that Boston more fortunate than New York.~~

~~Smugness is not a New England characteristic, though tenacious belief in what seems to be the truth decidedly is. The foregoing paragraphs were not intended to flatter nor to be provincial in tone.~~

MITROPOULOS AGAIN CHARMS

Conducts Symphony in Two New Pieces

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH.

One cannot accuse Dimitri Mitropoulos of taking things too easily during his present fortnight's leadership of the Symphony orchestra. Since last Thursday evening's concert in Cambridge he has now conducted four times, offering at last evening's concert in Symphony Hall a programme which contained two new numbers. A wholly new list, of course is in prospect for the concerts of Friday and Saturday.

The new pieces last evening, the second of them an actual novelty, were Schumann's Concerto for Violoncello and orchestra, in which Gaspar Cassado was the soloist, and the Second Suite from Casella's only full-length opera, "La Donna Serpente." Externally the work of Schumann served to introduce to Boston a notable 'cellist and to prove that Mr. Mitropoulos, who has thus far conducted everything from memory, continues to do so in the case of a concerto in which he is not the soloist.

The Spanish 'cellist, who is just this side of 40, proved himself last evening both a virtuoso and a musician of temperament. His tone is virile and masculine, but as his playing of the slow movement showed, it can be melting and tender as well. Only in this movement, by the way, is Schumann at anything like his best. Applause seems to be the rule at Symphony Hall just now, and Mr. Cassado came in for his share of it.

Alfredo Casella is surely the least Italianate member of his school. The music of "La Donna Serpente," so far as we can gather from three excerpts, owes far more to Stravinsky than to Verdi or Puccini. The first movement of this Second Suite, a Sinfonia from Act. I, has a hard brilliance; the Prelude to Act III which followed it is broadly songful, yet anything but sensuous in character, suggesting at the outset the Berceuse from the Russian composer's "Firebird." The bird division of the suite, "Battle and Finale," adds to an episode of ferocious din, actually quite unlike the battle-scene of Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," a March movement of almost rowdy exuberance. From this it must not be inferred that the music is not that of a masterhand: its extreme effectiveness was made everywhere evident by Mr. Mitropoulos, who seemingly interprets all composers sympathetically. . . . The musical climax of last evening's concert happened, however, to be the part repeated from the concerts of last Friday and Saturday, Mr. Mitropoulos' arrangements for string orchestra of the excerpts from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas" and of Beethoven's C-sharp minor quartet. Again the performances were something to be believed only by those who heard.

Her. Jan. 19/37

MUSIC

MONDAY SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The third concert in the Monday series was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting, yesterday evening in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Gaspar Cassado, 'cellist. The program was as follows:

Purcell.....Prelude and Final Air of Dido from "Dido and Aeneas," arranged by Mr. Mitropoulos
Beethoven..String Quartet in C sharp minor Op. 131, for string orchestra
Schumann....Concerto for 'cello and orchestra in A minor Op. 129
Casella.....Second Suite from "La Donna Serpente"

A second performance of Beethoven's C sharp minor Quarter, as performed by the strings of the Boston Symphony and conducted by Mr. Mitropoulos, served to prove the validity of this experiment. Beethoven was one of those creative artists who was never content to stand on his achievements. He was continually reaching out in new directions and exploring new paths. It is for this reason that so many commentators have observed that the last piano works and the last quartets try, as it were, to burst the confines of the instrumental medium for which they were actually designed. The boring passages in the andante and variations are not banished by the orchestral version, which is nevertheless so close to the strict score of the quartet. But the work as a whole does triumphantly emerge and can, for once, be heard by more than the chamber music public.

Purcell's lovely music has been treated with the utmost dignity by Mr. Mitropoulos in the arrangement for string orchestra. The moving pathos of this music shows what a remarkable composer Purcell was and does suggest that more of his music might be given. Schumann's 'Cello Concerto is also beautiful music and one of the finest works in this particular form. Unfortunately, Mr. Cassado chose to play the solo part in so mannered and extravagant a style that the proper effect of the music was spoiled for us. Mr. Cassado's technique is no doubt exceptional; but his want of taste in the arrangements that he has made of Mozart's Horn Concerto and Weber's Clarinet Concerto was also carried over last night into his interpretation of Schumann's music.

Casella's Suite from his opera, "La Donna Serpente," has been highly praised in Paris, where it was performed in 1933. The opera has also received interesting comment; but, since our only operatic organization never can put on the modern European operas that have been commended, there is small chance that we shall hear it in its original form for some time. This is a pity, for Casella is an amazingly adroit composer. He never writes ineffectively or boringly. The more soulful among music-lovers may regret this accomplishment, but some of us will welcome it heartily in a less exalted spirit. The music is splendidly scored for a large orchestra and is thoroughly operatic. The march at the end, in the modern idiom, has as much to recommend it from a popular point of view as Verdi's march from "Aida." It may be averred that the latter is hackneyed; but it was certainly the work of a thoroughly skilled composer. Mr. Casella's music has this virtue, too. He has written a brilliant suite, with the slow prelude to act 3 as contrast; and we may be glad of the opportunity to hear it. The orchestra, under Mr. Mitropoulous, gave excellent performances of every number on this program.

---

d New Films

ERALD, SUNDAY, JA

to Play Here;

17/37

Gaspard Cassado, Spanish 'cellist, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert tomorrow evening at Symphony Hall under Dimitri Mitropoulos, guest conductor.

Cassado at Symphony

Boston Debut of Spanish 'Cellist with Dimitri Mitropoulos Conducting

Jan. Her. 19

By Moses Smith

In his fourth appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in five days, Dimitri Mitropoulos presented last night in Symphony Hall a program the first half of which had been played at the three concerts last week—the Prelude and Final Air of Dido from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas" and the Beethoven String Quartet in C-sharp minor. In both cases, it will be recalled, the music was arranged for string orchestra by the conductor. To end the program the conductor found place for the Second Suite from Casella's opera, "La Donna Serpente," which was cut out of the program of the week-end. The other number was Schumann's 'Cello Concerto, with the distinguished Spanish 'cellist, Gaspar Cassado, making his Boston debut in the solo part. The planned repetition of Castagnone's "Preludio Giocoso" was passed by. As it was the concert was a long one, requiring more than two hours.

Mr. Mitropoulos is evidently not disturbed by the passing of time when he is making music. Nor is the audience, when the performance is as arresting, stimulating and intense as it was last night under the Greek conductor's direction. If there were any doubts about the quality of the visitor after his two weeks of concerts last season they must have been dispelled during the last few days. Here is unquestionably a musician and executant of the first class.

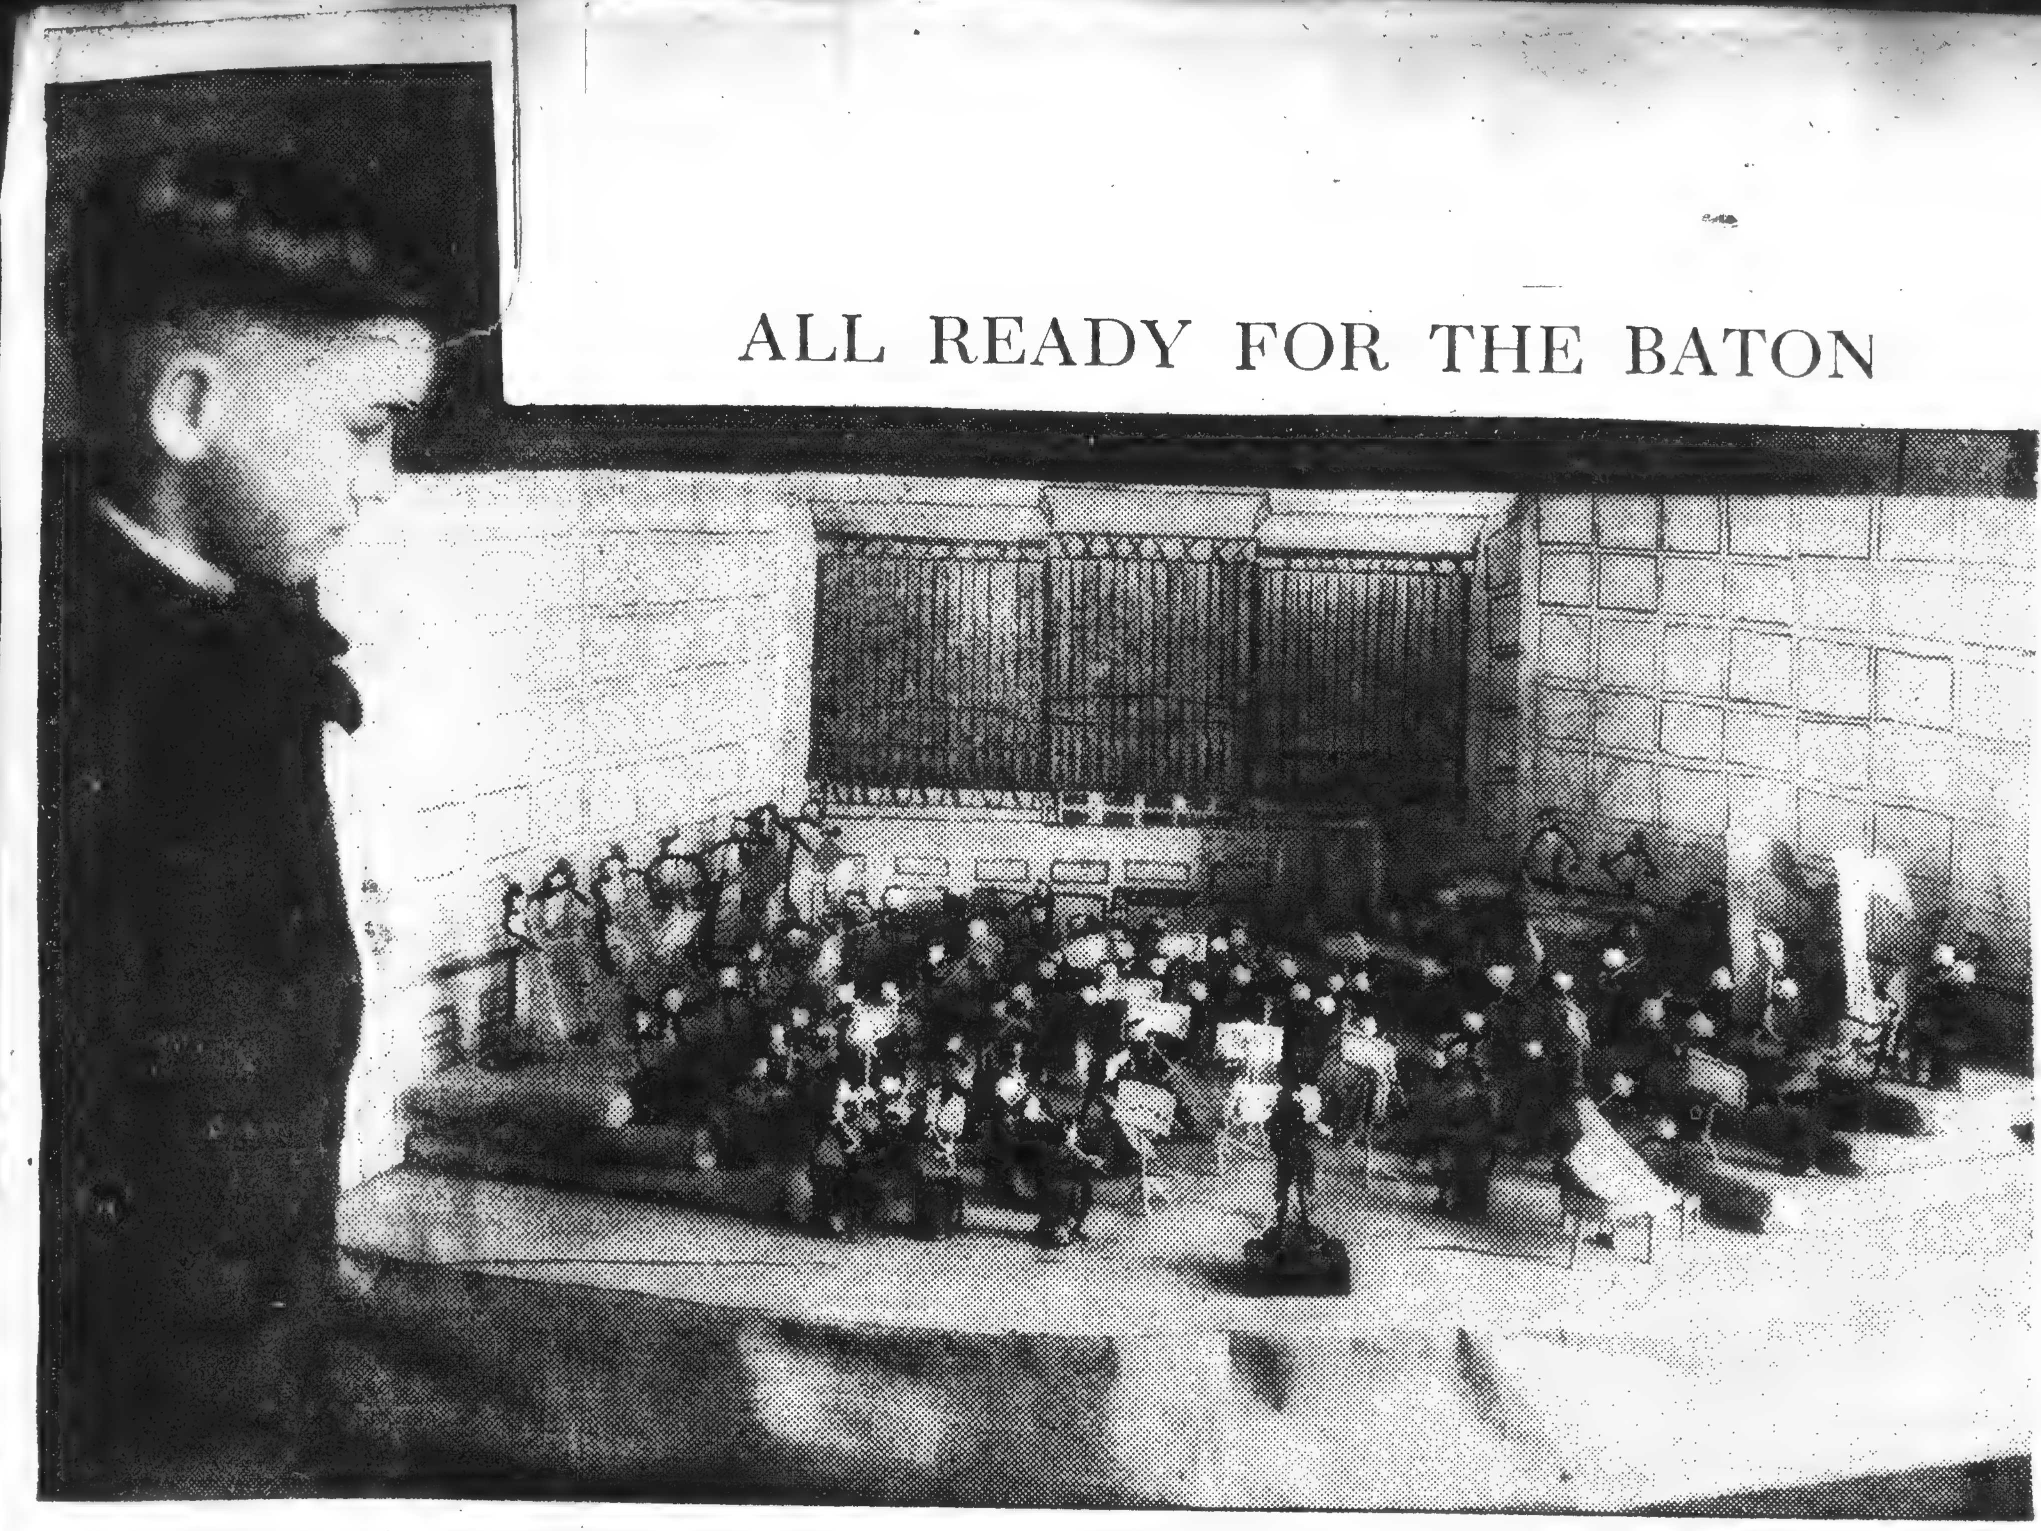
One need not have been in perfect agreement with every nuance demanded of the musicians by the conductor last night to realize how superlatively able a musician and fine, conscientious an artist he is. On the basis of his conducting here last year we have already credited him with an extraordinary memory and a dynamic, flexible—if unorthodox—conducting technic. We had also noted his intensity of musical feeling, transferred somehow to the musicians before him. But the playing by the orchestra's entire string section of the Beethoven Quartet remained—after two hearings—something of a miracle. It was incredible how the conductor's conception of the music—almost as grand as the music itself—could be imparted to an orchestra in the relatively brief time available for rehearsals. The same comment, less emphatically, of course, may be made with regard to the performance of the poignant music of Purcell. Never—or so it seemed last night—have the Bostonian strings sounded more beautifully.

The adaptability of the musicianship of Mr. Mitropoulos was strikingly apparent during the playing of the Schumann Concerto. Here was a model accompaniment, with conductor and soloist in perfect accord on the principal essential—that Schumann be given voice. Mr. Mitropoulos was no more faithful in his concern for careful ensemble than was the soloist, an exceptionably conscientious virtuoso, who kept his eyes fixed on the conductor much of the time. Mr. Cassado was also a somewhat nervous soloist, making no secret of his desire that he and the conductor be in constant agreement as to tempo and dynamics. But the performance, far from suffering, gained in quality.

The version of the Concerto that we heard last night was, as might have been expected, Latin rather than Teutonic. What it lacked in breadth it contained in precision, refinement and suave lyricism. For those are the qualities that characterize Mr. Cassado's expert, distinguished playing. And Mr. Mitropoulos can evidently summon such qualities as the need arises. The 'cellist was demonstratively applauded at the end; but he eagerly insisted on sharing the applause with conductor and orchestra.

Casella's Suite turned out to be music of the theater—and rather obvious music. Perhaps subtlety is out of place in the opera house, the more so when it is a question of Italian opera. The second (slow) movement, which is the Prelude to the third act of the opera, had, it is true, a sort of Respighian lyricism. But the first and third, especially the latter, drew upon all the resources of a modern orchestra to achieve an almost ear-splitting brilliance.

ALL READY FOR THE BATON



Vincent Revelli, a 6A pupil at Laurel Hill school, stands beside the miniature Boston Symphony orchestra, which his class and another 6A group constructed with pipe cleaners and wooden beads as part of a music project. There are 108 pieces in the orchestra.

Music Notes

Jascha Heifetz will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Dr. Koussevitzky returns from his mid-season vacation (spent in Florida) to take charge of the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 29 and 30. He will play the Mendelssohn Concerto, not the Beethoven Concerto, as announced before the season began. The rest of the program will consist of an Entr'acte from Taneiev's Opera, "Oresteia," the Third Symphony of Brahms and the Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome" by Strauss.

And this seems as good a time as another to report, on the basis of private word received some time ago, that the Sessions Violin Concerto will not be played this season after all. The work has been tentatively on and off the local symphonic repertory many times, but it seems to be pursued by an evil spirit. At any rate, the story goes that Albert Spalding, who was to have been the soloist in the first performance here, returned the work to Sessions.

It is also pertinent to convey the information that the Shaporin Symphony for voices and orchestra has arrived at the stage where preparation of the vocal parts has been begun by the Cecilia Society under Arthur Fiedler. The American premiere of the Soviet composer's work was announced for last season, it will be recalled, but it had to be postponed.

Pupils Create "Pipe-Cleaner Symphony"

Musicians, Instruments and Settings True in Detail

If musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would like to see themselves as school boys and girls interested in music imagine them, they should visit Laurel Hill avenue school in Providence.

As a part of the school term project in music, two 6A groups in Miss Louise E. Furlong's room have constructed with pipe cleaners and wooden beads a 108-piece orchestra, musicians and instruments. The little men and their instruments, all accurate in detail and in three dimensions, are set on a platform against a painted background which pictures the pipe organ usually seen in photographs of the Boston Symphony.

Before starting on its project the class wrote to several symphony orchestras in the country, asking for data and photographs. The Boston Symphony responded first.

The boys and girls have adhered faithfully to the photograph in every detail. All the tiny musicians are in their proper places.

Piano Sole Exception

The only instrument not made by the young craftsmen is the piano. One boy started a piano but illness and absence interfered with its completion. Pipe cleaners are used for the arms and legs of the musicians; round wooden beads are their heads. Bass violinists, the drummer, the conductor, those who stand, are supported by bodies of elliptical wooden beads. Spools serve as seats for the others.

The instruments are made of tiny pieces of wood, painted. Vincent Revelli was in charge of this part of the work.

The entire list is present for full orchestra, including two harps, chimes, zylophone, bass and kettle drums, organ and celesta. Each musician or pair of musicians has his music stand, on which is a little piece of music, cunningly inscribed with notes. The instruments are made of tiny pieces of wood, painted. Toothpicks make the bows which are in place on the strings of some instruments.

True to Detail

The orchestra platform is mounted on a curved piece of beaver board, 46 inches long, 27 across and 22 inches high. This is placed on top of several piles of old encyclopedias hidden beneath brown paper, on a table in the corner of the room. A list of the orchestra personnel was followed in making and seating the toy musicians.

These two groups of 6-A pupils know exactly what a bassoon looks like, and how double basses differ from 'cellos and recognize readily the various members of the various families of a symphony orchestra.

At the start of an activity program, it is customary in many schools, Laurel Hill among the number, to state, on wall charts, in large letters, "What we plan to do" and "What we want to know." These two groups have expressed their two purposes by using music notes in the treble clef in conjunction with printed letters.

For instance, among other things, they planned "to learn stories about musicians" and "to listen to one symphony program a week." These sentences may be read by visitors to the room who understand the music scale, from notes interspersed with letters.

Children Also Hear and Discuss Symphonic Programs

Hear Symphony Programs

The class has listened to symphony programs with growing interest through the term. Once a week over the school radio they hear the Damrosch program. Usually they listen to another at home. A large number of both groups went to the Providence Symphony concert for children sponsored by the Parents' League and the Rhode Island State Congress of Parents and Teachers. A small group accompanied Miss Furlong to a Boston Symphony concert.

The children have done considerable research on the lives of great musicians and composers and on the growth of musical instruments. With a collective set of eyes open for anything that concerned symphonic music, the class has garnered such interesting pictures and stories as the following: $27,500 worth of fiddle; Mr. Spaulding and his Stradivarius; master craftsmen of various instruments; pictures and their own drawings of harpsichord, clavichord and virginal to show the evolution of the piano; similar stories and pictures on the evolution of the woodwinds; and pictures of many famous conductors and composers of orchestra music.

Raymond Medici has modeled in plastacene four members of the string group. Many of the pupils have made folders in covers of their own design, which contain stories that tie up with the project. Spelling, literature and reading have benefited greatly, Miss Furlong feels, by this musical activity of these boys and girls.

TOLEDO, O.
NEWS-BEE

Musicians Get $1750 NBC Award

NBC Music Guild Awards totaling $1750 for new and original chamber music works by American composers will be announced by Lenox R. Lohr, president of NBC, in a special broadcast over the NBC-Red Network New Years Day, from 1:30 to 3:00 p. m. During the program the prize-winning works will be given their world premiere.

Frederick Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Harold Bauer, eminent concert pianist; Georges Barrere, flute virtuoso and noted chamber music artist; Adolfo Betti, first violinist of the former Flonzaley String Quartet; Oliver Strunk, chief of the Music Division of the Library of Congress, and Frank Black, general music director of the National Broadcasting Co., comprised the jury of experts who decided the awards.

After the NBC Music Guild announced the offer of these awards in a broadcast Sept. 3, 1935, more than 1700 American composers registered as entrants. After returning the many manuscripts which did not completely meet the terms and conditions announced, 286 compositions had qualified by Feb. 29, 1936, when this contest was announced to close.

The composer of the work receiving the highest rating by the seven judges will receive $1000, the second and third $500 and $250, respectively. The three prize-winning works will be played during the special New Years Day NBC Music Guild program by the Gordon String Quartet, the Musical Art String Quartet plus such additional artists as these scores may require.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

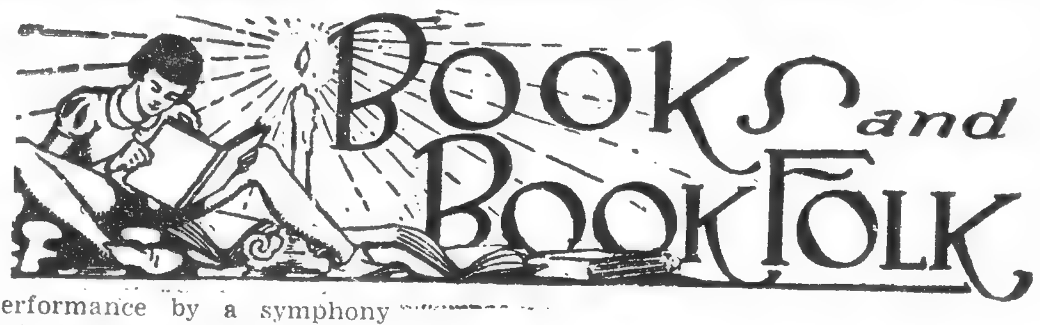
JAN 6 - 1937

Boston Symphony

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in one of its regular subscription concerts at Carnegie Hall, New York, which will be broadcast, Thursday at 8:45 p. m., over WCKY and the NBC Blue network. The first performance in New York of Alfredo Casella's revision of Clementi's Symphony in D will be given during the concert. Foote's Suite in E Major for String Orchestra, Opus 63, also has been programmed.

1/16 & 17/37 Portland, Me., Evening Express and State Edition of Sunday Telegram. (O.J.Magee, lit. ed.)

TELEPHONE DIAL 2-1911



BOOKS and BOOKFOLK

Any performance by a symphony orchestra must be judged by its ensemble effect and it is a fact that any orchestra can be only as good as its individual players. This is true of any orchestral group and is just as true of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra as of lesser organizations. The listener, hearing the orchestra execute some great composition, is conscious perhaps only of the artistry of the whole, but realizes the superb musicianship that must be that of the individual members. It is for this purpose, to make the individual members known to the public, that Gerome Brush, a well-known artist, has compiled a book on the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which does just this thing. (The Merrymount Press).

By means of a series of charcoal drawings, full-page size, Brush has succeeded in catching the individual players with their instruments, in informal pose, and on the facing page has written a thumbnail sketch of the player, thus "humanizing" the orchestra.

An appreciation has been written by Edward Weeks of the Atlantic Monthly in which he tells of the organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881 with 70 members, contrasting it with the perfect orchestra of today with its 109 members. The foreword is by Brush. To get the proper atmosphere for his drawings, the artist did his sketches in the tuning room, each musician playing his instrument in order to banish self-consciousness. The first sketch is of Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, and then follow the other members of the orchestra in alphabetical order.

It is a book written for the layman, rather than for the musician. It can be read in less than a hour, but will furnish enjoyment just so long as the Boston Symphony Orchestra retains its organization.

Greta Kerr.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Not often do the Symphony's Monday evening audience have the same opportunity as last night to hear both a significant work, new to Boston, and a first appearance before local audiences of a much heralded soloist. Both, however, were not simultaneous. The work was the Second Suite from Alfredo Casella's "La Donna Serpente"; the soloist was the eminent Spanish 'cellist, Gaspar Cassado, who was heard in the solo part of Schumann's concerto in A minor, op 129. Not least in interest was Dimitri Mitropoulos as guest conductor.

The evening's first half comprised two works, repeated from Mr Mitropoulos' week-end concerts—his own arrangement for string orchestra of the Prelude and Final Air of Dido from Henry Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas" and Beethoven's C-sharp minor Quartet, op 131. As in their previous performances, both fell with peculiar beauty and effectiveness upon the ear. One was struck with the variety of string tone Mr Mitropoulos is able to command, and with the sonority so much in excess of that usually expected from a string orchestra.

It was a little unfortunate for Mr Cassado, as soloist, that his music should seem the thinnest of the evening. Composing for a richly expressive instrument, one would have expected to find Schumann in a comparable mood. The result, disappointingly, is a concerto neither characteristic of the composer or particularly suited to the display of the solo instrument's possibilities. Mr Cassado is obviously an able cellist, and, in addition, a thorough musician, who knows exactly (too well, possibly, for the comfort of a conductor) what he wishes to do. His impetuous, robust style were appropriate to Schumann's measures, though in climaxes he was prone to exceed the agreeable tonal limitations of his instrument. It seemed that on the two lower strings, his tone tended to smallness, and one often felt that he might have achieved more compelling interpretative effects if he had actually transmitted to his music the vehemently romantic gestures with which he played.

The Casella Suite is of three parts: Sinfonia, which, in the opera, comes between the prologue and first act; the prelude to the third act, and a battle scene and a triumphal finale. Throughout, it is intensely interesting music, compelling keenest attention. Refreshingly, it harks to no particular operatic traditions, with repetitive motifs and set formulae. Only occasionally, in the allegro measures of the first movement, does one catch his half ironical use of the buffa style of an earlier day. This is mercurial music: when the mood changes, what has gone before swiftly disappears, never to be heard again. The last movement is colored by incredibly brilliant and original orchestration.

YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR

JA 7 - 193

Three Major Programs On KDKA This Evening

Music, Discussion and Jubilee Dinner on NBC-Blue Networks

KDKA and the NBC-Blue network will carry three programs of interest this evening. The first, from 8:45 until 9:30, will feature music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

Adolph Zukor

The second, for an hour beginning at 9:30, will be the "America's Town Meeting," which has been off the air during the holidays. During this program three notable speakers will discuss an amendment proposal providing a constitutional limit making the presidential office a single six-year term.

The third, from 11:45 p. m. until 12:45 a. m., will be the radio broadcast of Adolph Zukor's silver jubilee dinner. Leopold Stokowski will conduct the orchestra and entertainers and sketches will be featured. The program will come from Hollywood.

BEE

JAN 7 - 1937

The bill of fare for the music lover is a real treat as is evidenced by the following names seen in a glance at a page in the Sunday paper: Philharmonic Orchestra, Lily Pons, Bauer, Hoffman, the Russian Trio, Heifetz, Philadelphia Orchestra, Boston Symphony, Spalding, Chorus Schola Cantorum, then of course the Metropolitan Opera, to name familiar names among many newcomers. Collections of the Russian nobility can be seen at the Hammer Galleries, Malvina Hoffman's statues at Grand Central Galleries and enough others to keep one busy for weeks if art is the interest.

* * * * * *

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

JAN 9 - 1937

BOSTON, Jan. 8 (AP) — Dimitri Mitropoulos. Athenian conductor, arriced here today to be guest conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra for the next two weeks, during the mid-winter vacation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. He was guest conductor of the orchestra a year ago also, becoming the first Greek to direct an American symphonic orchestra. He will begin rehearsals Monday, particularly of his new arrangements for a familiar air from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas," and Beetthoven's string quartet in C-sharp minor.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE

JAN 10 1937

MUSIC NOTES

A new piano concerto by Leo Sowerby (Second, in E Major) was given its premiere performance recently by the Boston Orchestra, Koussevitsky conducting. The reviewer said of it, "Sowerby writes here from the heart (which is still unfashionable) and he writes tunes that can be whistled (which is almost more unfashionable). The piano is here treated principally as an instrument of song."

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

JAN 13 1937

Boston music critics hint that the Boston Symphony Orcehstra may be invited to make a transcontinental tour under the direction of its conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Efforts were made to arrange such a tour with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under the baton of a returned Arturo Toscanini but the Italian maestro had previous engagements. The tour would have followed the general lines of the one made by the Philadelphia Orchestra and Leopold Stokowski last year.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT

JAN 9 - 1937

THE Boston Symphony recently played "Epitaph," a new composition by Vladimir Dukelski. Dukelski is Vernon Duke, who wrote most of the music for "The Show Is On." . . . Theatrical press agents, most of whom never completed their grammar-school courses, are being invited by the University of Pennsylvania faculty to help map out theatrical courses for the young ladies there. . . . One of Broadway's famous and much-imitated dancers is destitute now. Only one season ago he was headlined in the very cafes he visits these nights borrowing half-dollars to sustain him from day to day.

TOPEKA, KAN.
CAPITAL

10 1937

"The Man with the Baton."

"The Man with the Baton" by David Ewen (Crowell) is the story of "Conductors and Their Orchestras" with an introduction by Serge Koussevitzky. More than 200 great conductors of yesterday and today are briefly sketched. He traces the history of all the leading symphony orchestras in America and Europe, as well as the development of conducting, and offers a keen analysis of what constitutes a good conductor. Too there are frequent illustrations. It is a fascinating volume of real informative worth.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

937

The 70th birthday of Jean Sibelius in 1935 occasioned world-wide festivities in honor of the distinguished Finnish composer. Both at that time and on numerous other occasions his works have been played before enthusiastic audiences throughout the western world. In this testimony of esteem Chicago has been backward. Three of his seven symphonies have never been publicly presented here. The symphonic poems "Tapiola" and "Pohjola's Daughter" elicited cheers when Serge Koussevitzky conducted them in Boston.

EVANSTON, ILL.
NEWS INDEX

JAN 14 1937

"Boston Symphony Orchestra" by Gerome Brush. 1936 (Privately printed for the orchestra) Boston. $1.50.

The graphic record of each of the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra is contained in this recent volume of charcoal drawings by Mr. Brush, whose career as a creative artist is entirely unknown in this part of the country.

Accompanying each drawing is a brief biographical notation on the musician which has good reference value. The portraits are nothing more than sketches and show little beyond the general facial appearance of the members of the group and the instrument each plays.

Mr. Brush has attempted to give enough information about each player in the written descriptions to supplement the serious, preoccupied attitudes of the drawings. This would make a useful accompanying volume to either a set of records by the famous Boston Symphony orchestra or to a copy of the Boston Symphony notes which have also been published recently.

KARL GASSLANDER

PORTLAND, ORE.
NEWS-TELEGRAM

JAN 8 - 1937

NEW BOOK WILL BE PUBLISHED

Mass of New Material to Be Included in "Beloved Friend;" Plan Contest

A mass of new material, important as musical history and as personal revelation, will be published for the first time on Feb. 1 in the book, "Beloved Friend," the story of Tchaikowsky and Nadejda von Meck, by Catherine Drinker Bowen and Barbara von Meck.

The strange romance between the Russian composer and his wealthy patroness, with whom he corresponded passionately for 14 years, but whom he never met, is a puzzling and fascinating tale, curious even in the annals of genius. From 1876 until 1890 letters flew back and forth between Tchaikowsky and Mme. von Meck, then ceased with an abruptness which biographers have never been able to explain.

Aware of the interest the book will have to the lay readers as well as to the music lover, the publishers of "Beloved Friend," Random House, Inc., are sponsoring a contest for the best letters of not more than 300 words on any one of the following three questions:

1. What is the psychological explanation of Mme. von Meck's abrupt ending of her romantic relations with Tchaikowsky, and is there any clue to her decision in the revelation given as to her personality?
2. Was Mme. von Meck's infatuation solely with Tchaikowsky's music, as she thought, or was she really in love with him, in spite of the fact that she was careful never to speak of him or meet him?
3. Did Mme. von Meck's patronage of Tchaikowsky have, on the whole, a beneficial or a harmful effect upon the quality of his music?

All entries must be submitted by April 15, 1937, and should be addressed to contest department, Random House, Inc., 20 E. 57th st., New York, N. Y. The committee of judges consists of four distinguished figures in the musical world: Jascha Heifetz, John Barbirolli, Lawrence Gilman and Deems Taylor, and Robert K. Haas, vice-president of Random House.

The first prize for the best letter on any of the three subjects will be a Steinway grand piano. The second prize will be the recordings of Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky; his Fifth Symphony, under the direction of Leopold Stokowski; his Sixth "Pathetique" Symphony, under the baton of Eugene Ormandy; the "Andante Cantabile," played by the Minneapolis symphony orchestra under Eugene Ormandy, and the "Nutcracker Suite," played by the Philadelphia orchestra under Leopold Stokowski.

The third prize will be the recordings of the Tchaikowsky Violin Concerto, played by Mischa Elman, and of the Piano Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor, with Arthur Rubinstein as soloist and John Barbirolli as conductor.

In addition to being eligible for any of the three main awards, accredited students in high schools, colleges, preparatory schools or registered music schools in the United States may compete for an extra student's prize.

This prize will consist of a collection of pocket scores of Tchaikowski's nine best known works, besides the complete vocal score of "Eugene Onegin." To be eligible for this extra prize, contestants should give on their entries, in addition to their own names, the name of the school in which they are registered.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

JAN 14 1937

Dimitri Mitropoulos conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two of his arrangements of classical compositions at 8 p. m.—WMAL . . . He is Athens' Conservatory of Music head. Program: Prelude and Final Air of Dido, "When I Am Laid in Earth" from "Dido and Aeneas," by Purcell; Beethoven's String Quartet in C Sharp Minor Opus 131.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

JAN 10 1937

Will Play Here This Week

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF, Russian composer-pianist (inset), will appear as soloist with the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra Friday night, playing his own C minor piano concerto with Leon Barzin as guest conductor. Erica Morini, Austrian violinist, will appear in recital on the University Artists course at Northrop auditorium Wednesday night.

This Week Will Outline Last as Attraction for Minneapolis Music Lovers

By VICTOR NILSSON

Music was quite attractive last week with three symphony programs by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. Yet the present will be even more interesting and active. Leon Barzin will hold forth in his highly appreciated engagement as guest conductor of the orchestra with Georges Grisez as soloist in today's popular symphony concert. Friday night Sergei Rachmaninoff, the giant Russian composer and pianist, will be the symphony soloist to appear in his own most beloved work, the C minor piano concerto.

There will be two fascinating violin recitals to attract the attention of music lovers in the Twin Cities and throughout this section of the country. Erica Morini, the Austrian violinist, known here from the days when she appeared as a youthful prodigy, will appear in the University of Minnesota artists course at Northrop auditorium Wednesday night, while the Schubert Club on Thursday night will present Georges Enesco, the Rumanian composer, conductor and violinist, in his first Twin City appearance in a violin recital at People's church in St. Paul.

Second of 'Super' Programs

Thursday Musical will resume its concert activities for the new year at the Alvin theater when Lota Mundy, violinist; Frances Kelly, pianist, and Grace Bronson Kuechle, soprano, will be the recitalists.

The second of the series of "super" Sunday afternoon programs arranged by Leo Barzin, the guest conductor, will see Georges Grisez featured as soloist today while next Sunday Frank Miller will be soloist and a combined chorus of voices from the St. Catherine and St. Thomas College will be heard.

Will Play Debussy Work

For the last of the Sunday concerts that will be conducted by Mr. Barzin, he is preparing a surprise that will bring not only a local soloist, but a nationally known figure to the Sunday afternoon concert stage. The special arrangement made for the choral group is in recognition of the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of St. Catherine's.

For today Mr. Grisez will be featured in the beautiful but difficult "Rhapsody for Clarinet," by Debussy. Mr. Grisez will have one great advantage over the harp and flute combination of last Sunday when a classical composition could not favor their instruments of a modern development which was not dreamed of in Mozart's day. There is considerable historical interest devoted to such a composition as Debussy's also because Mr. Grisez was the featured soloist when the Boston Symphony orchestra presented this number in a clarinet and piano version in order to introduce it to America in 1911, a short time after it had been composed. Mr. Grisez also played it in 1927. It calls for all the skill of a clarinet artist as Debussy wrote without consideration for mere technicalities. The rhapsody calls for divided strings and flutes and also for solos by violin, viola and cello, all muted.

Another fature of today's concert will be the first performance in this city of Lully's "String Concerto," arranged by Weingartner. After the Debussy number will follow a group of ballet numbers and the Hungarian march from "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz, while the ever welcome Dvorak "Symphony from a New World," will be brought on for its twenty-fifth performance by the Minneapolis orchestra in its home city.

Rumanian Violinist To Play Thursday

The Schubert Club of St. Paul will present Georges Enesco, Rumanian violinist, with Sanford Schluessel at the piano, in the third of the evening-concert series at the People's church Thursday at 8:15 o'clock.

Georges Enesco, composer-violinist-conductor, is frequently referred to as the master musician. His latest work is the opera, "Oedipus Rex," which was produced at the Paris Opera last year, when it created world comment.

During Mr. Enesco's eight weeks' visit to this country he will be one of the guest conductors of the Philharmonic orchestra in New York, and will appear as both soloist and conductor with the Detroit, Cleveland, Pittsburgh and Toronto orchestras, besides giving many violin recitals.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

37

Dimitri Mitropoulos, young Grecian conductor, will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two of his own arrangements of classical compositions at 8 p. m. over WEAN-WBZ. Mitropoulos, who has conducted world-famous symphony orchestras in Berlin, Paris, Russia and Italy, will feature his own arrangement of the Prelude and Final Air of Dido, "When I Am Laid in Earth," from the opera, "Dido and Aeneas," by Purcell. Beethoven's String Quartet in C-Sharp Minor, Opus 131, arranged for string orchestra, will complete the broadcast.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 14 1937

Boston Symphony

Dimitri Mitropoulos, young Grecian conductor, will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two of his own arrangements of class-

172

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

JAN 13 1937

MUSIC MISCELLANY

Opportunity for Singers

The opportunity to sing with the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will be given a selected group of men and women vocalists who succeed in passing audition tests before the Cecilia society in the parish house of the Arlington Street church, Wednesday evening at 9. Candidates will sing a solo to show quality and range of voice and they must also pass a sight-reading test.

A famous mixed chorus, this Cecilia society has the distinction of having sung in many important works with the Boston Symphony in Boston, Providence and New York. These singers volunteer their services. The music performed is drawn chiefly from leading contemporary composers of all nations. A symphony for orchestra with chorus, by the Russian composer Tschaporin, will be prepared. The society is non-sectarian. It rehearses each Wednesday from 7:30 to 9 in the parish house of Arlington Street church, under the conductorship of Arthur Fiedler, of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Athenian Conductor

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Athenian conductor, received with high favor last year when he conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra, will return as guest conductor for the programs of Jan. 15, 16, 22 and 23, of this same orchestra. Mr. Mitropoulos, a pianist as well as conductor, will play the solo part in the first Boston performances of a Toccata by Respighi.

National Piano Tournament

The fourth national piano playing tournament of the National Guild of Piano Teachers will be opened in Los Angeles in February and then continue serially in about 50 cities until it ends in April, in New York and Philadelphia.

Here and There

"The music of the future will be like that of the past, when the world is tired of its mud bath of jazz and similar perversions of the noblest of the arts, then we shall again have music."—Pietro Mascagni.

"Music gives tone to the universe; wings to the wind; flight to the imagination; a charm to sadness, gayety and life to everything."—Plato.

"The Tune's the Thing—So Away With the Swing"

This is the caption of an article in the Boston Globe that is of interest and from which the following paragraphs are taken:

"Swing music is swinging down and possibly out. Already the new year shows definite signs of the decline of this savage orchestral assault on the rhythmic tunes turned out in mass production quantities by Tin Pan Alley.

"Popular music runs in cycles, and the swing songs of the present day seem to have passed the crest of popularity. Musicians offer a number of reasons for this apparent trend. First of all, the desire for music that is pleasant to listen to has been inculcated in the hearts of millions because of the dozens of daily programs that feature the so-called better types of music."

Do You Know

That the "Bay Psalm Book of 1640" was the first music book; also the second book of any kind printed in America?

That the first mention of French horns in America was by Ben Franklin in 1756, when writing of the excellent music in the Moravian church at Bethlehem, Pa.?

That music was first taught in the public schools of America by Lowell Mason in Boston in 1838?

E. B. F.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

JAN 13 1937

Zimbalist Finds Americans Now Appreciate Good Music

BUFFALO, N. Y., Jan. 13 (AP)—Practicing in a hotel room here for his first concert of 1937, Efrem Zimbalist interrupted his fiddling, put down his violin and thought back over 25 years that have passed since he and an American audience first faced each other.

"American audiences today? Ah, they are more appreciative of an artist's work. Musically, they have progressed tremendously. I have seen an enormous change."

In 25 years Zimbalist, too, has changed. When America first knew him he was a young man of 25 Summers. He had played first violin for his father's symphony orchestra in Rostov, Russia, and had studied in St. Petersburg under Leopold Auer. Now he is greying.

Zimbalist, born in Russia, made his American debut in the Fall of 1911 when, as guest artist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he played Glazounoff's "Concerto in A Minor." Since then the world has known his music.

Now, he says, he finds "more pleasure in playing for an audience in any small town in the United States than in certain capitals of Europe."

'Which capitals?' He smiles amiably and continues as if he did not hear.

"When Americans go to hear a concert, their first impulse is to get pleasure and then, naturally, to express an opinion.

"But with Europeans the first impulse is to criticize and then enjoy it—if they can."

"What do Americans enjoy now? The same great classics as before."

EFREM ZIMBALIST

Efrem Zimbalist played in New Bedford in 1924 at the New Bedford Theater, in the first of a Steinert concert series which presented also Yolande Mero, famous Hungarian pianist, and the late Madame Schumann-Heink. He was heard again in the same theater three years ago—March 1, 1934, under auspices of Miss Esther Wollison's Three Arts Bureau. There were large audiences on both occasions.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 1[illegible] 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE JANUARY 26

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will make the third visit of the season to Providence for a concert in the Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday evening, Jan. 26.

Koussevitzky announces the following program: An Entr'Acte from the Incidental Music, which the Russian composer, Taneiev, wrote for the Greek drama cycle, "Oresteia"; the Symphony No. 3 of Brahms in F-major; and three Wagnerian excerpts —Prelude to "Lohengrin," "Forest Murmurs" from the third act of "Siegfried," and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

JAN 1[illegible] 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM ANNOUNCED

The program which the Boston Symphony orchestra will present when it makes its third appearance of the season in the Metropolitan theatre, Tuesday night, Jan. 26, was announced today.

Selections will include three Wagnerian excerpts—the prelude to "Lohengrin," "Forest Murmurs," from the third act of "Siegfried," and the overture to "Tannhauser." The opening number will be from the incidental music which the Russian composer, Taneiev wrote for the Greek drama cycle, "Oresteia." Brahms' third Symphony in F major will complete the program.

PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS

JAN 13 1937

Bartlett-Robertson Give Recital Tomorrow Night

NEW BRUNSWICK, Jan. 13—"They play with the skill of one and the imagination of two," was the manner in which a midwestern newspaper described a recent two-piano recital of Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson who will appear at New Brunswick tomorrow night in the third concert of the annual series presented by the Rutgers University department of music.

Behind the accomplishments of this couple, romantic tale which had its beginning when they both studied under Tobias Mathay in London. They fell in love and were married. Finding separate achievements incompatible with mutual happiness they decided to give joint concerts.

The first met with great acclaim and since then this couple has become internationally famous for its duo-piano recitals.

Their program for tomorrow includes:

With Laughter and Joy (from "Peasant" Cantata), Bach; Sheep May Safely Graze, Bach; Prelude in E Major, Bach; Variations on a theme of Beethoven, Saint-Saens; Noel, Balfour Gardiner; Polka, Lennox Berkeley; Malaguena, Lecuona; Study in Thirds, Saint-Saens; Romance, 9rensky, and The Blue Danube Waltz, Strauss-Echulz-Evler.

The concert will be presented in the university gymnasium on College avenue. On Feb. 25, the famed Vienna Choir Boys will appear in the fourth of the present series while in March the Boston Symphony will give its third concert in this city.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

JAN 16 1937

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will make the third visit of the season to Providence for a concert in the Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday evening, Jan. 26.

Koussevitzky announces the following program: An entr-acte from the incidental music which the Russian composer, Taneiev, wrote for the Greek drama cycle "Oresteia;" the Symphony No. 3 of Brahms in F major and three Wagnerian excerpts—Prelude to "Lohengrin," "Forest Murmurs" from the third act of "Siegfried," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

JAN 13 1937

ATHENIAN TO CONDUCT THE HUB SYMPHONY

Dimitri Mitropoulos to Wield Baton for Two Weeks.

An exciting conductor, who leads from memory and without baton, and with unconventional gesture achieves most musicianly and soul-searching interpretations, Dimitri Mitropoulos arrived recently from his native Athens, Greece, to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra during the two weeks' annual winter vacation of Serge Koussevitzky. The 40-year-old bald Athenian will appear in Symphony hall not only as conductor, but piano virtuoso and composer.

GASPAR CASSADO.
Soloist.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan 15 and 16, Mitropoulos will be soloist in Respighi's "Toccata" for piano and orchestra, which he also will conduct. At the same pair of concerts, he will introduce the great C-Sharp Minor Quartet of Beethoven as a piece for the entire string section of the orchestra. He does this to spread the acquaintance of the public with what he declares to be the marvelous beauties of this quartet, because more people are attracted to orchestral than to string quartet performances. As composer, he will present his arrangement for modern orchestra of two excerpts from "Dido and Aeneas," a remarkable opera composed by the Englishman, Henry Purcell, in 1688. Not to forget living fellow-composers, Mitropoulos will include a suite from the opera, "La Donna Serpente," of Alfredo Casella.

For the Monday evening concert of Jan. 18, the Athenian guest conductor will repeat his previous program, with the exception of the Toccata. This he will replace with Schumann's Violoncello Concerto. The soloist will be the Spaniard, Gaspar Cassado, who in his recent New York debut confirmed his advance reputation from Europe as a temperamentally fiery, and technically dazzling artist. A cherished pupil of the long incomparable Pablo Gasals, he has won the title of "The Younger Casals," with his teacher's approval, and was enthusiastically upheld in that title last season in 49 concerts in Italy, Belgium, Holland, Germany and England.

LEADER

Former Symphony Soloist Deceased

Prof. George Boetticher, 51, for eight years a well known player and soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at Rangsdorf, Germany, some time ago, it was learned here last week. While in Boston, Professor Boetticher and his family lived at 464 Huntington avenue.

An accomplished master of the brasses, Professor was called from Germany to carry solo horn parts with the Boston Symphony a little more than eight years ago. While here he was made a member of the New England Conservatory of Music. Last May he resigned from the Conservatory and the orchestra and returned to Germany to take a contract with the Radio Center there.

He leaves his wife, Elizabeth Boetticher, and a daughter.

WOBURN, MASS.
TIMES

JAN 16 1937

ART BOOKS

From Los Angeles your Library has secured a new book on "Public Library Buildings" by Dana Q. McComb, which may be of some help as a guide in further renovation. "Finger Painting" by Ruth Shaw is a reminder of the interesting exhibit here December 2--5 by Miss Josephine Dwerell of Melrose. Gerome Brush's charcoal drawings of the 109 members of "Boston Symphony Orchestra" will interest symphony goers. "Harvard Portraits" is a catalogue brought back as a souvenir of the Tercentary in September. Ditto applies to a square red-paper covered "Story of the Yard" reprinted from the Harvard Freshman Red Book of the Class of '35' published in 1932, but to the history of the institution and its educational aims and courses of study.

QUINCY, MASS.
NEWS

Greek Artist Is Guest Conductor At Symphony Hall

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS

An exciting conductor, who leads from memory and without baton, and with unconventional gesture achieves most musicianly and soul searching interpretations, Dimitri Mitropoulos arrived recently from

---

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JAN 16 1937

THEY'VE been digging things up around Carnegie Hall lately. Mr. Barbirolli unearthed a Vivaldi concerto for strings and a set of Pergolesi melodies which he arranged as an oboe concerto, and Mr. Koussevitzky arrived with a Clementi symphony, put into practical shape by Alfredo Casella. All of these restorations were pleasant things, although the Clementi symphony had to be good as well as historically "interesting" to win any applause from those of us who once battled with Clementt's notorious studies for people trying to develop piano technique.

Mr. Barbirolli's homemade oboe concerto was a hit for Bruno Labate, the Philharmonic's brilliant solo oboist, and for Mr. Barbirolli, who took four excellent melodies and transcribed them without any funny business. The Vivaldi concerto had a poetic slow movement, surrounded by a couple of bouncing divisions of a sort which Vivaldi probably could write while you waited. Still, he knew how to write them.

The enterprising Mr. Stassévitch introduced the Clementi-Casella symphony in C a little while ago, and there were complaints that Signor Casella had been too busy with the original. One can't kick much about the improvements in the symphony in D, produced by Mr. Koussevitzky, which didn't sound like a transcriber's clambake. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men from Boston played it for all it was worth (or more), which is the way of this fine conductor and his notable band. The Boston Symphony series is a model, from every angle.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

JAN 16 1937

Did you know that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra (at Woolsey hall March 10), was recently elected a member of the French Legion of Honor?

172

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

JAN 13 1937

MUSIC MISCELLANY

Opportunity for Singers

The opportunity to sing with the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will be given a selected group of men and women vocalists who succeed in passing audition tests before the Cecilia society in the parish house of the Arlington Street church, Wednesday evening at 9. Candidates will sing a solo to show quality and range of voice and they must also pass a sight-reading test.

A famous mixed chorus, this Cecilia society has the distinction of having sung in many important works with the Boston Symphony in Boston, Providence and New York. These singers volunteer their services. The music performed is drawn chiefly from leading contemporary composers of all nations. A symphony for orchestra with chorus, by the Russian composer Tschaporin, will be prepared. The society is non-sectarian. It rehearses each Wednesday from 7:30 to 9 in the parish house of Arlington Street church, under the conductorship of Arthur Fiedler, of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Athenian Conductor

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Athenian conductor, received with high favor last year when he conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra, will return as guest conductor for the programs of Jan. 15, 16, 22 and 23, of this same orchestra. Mr. Mitropoulos, a pianist as well as conductor, will play the solo part in the first Boston performances of a Toccata by Respighi.

National Piano Tournament

The fourth national piano playing tournament of the National Guild of Piano Teachers will be opened in Los Angeles in February and then continue serially in about 50 cities until it ends in April, in New York and Philadelphia.

Here and There

"The music of the future will be like that of the past, when the world is tired of its mud bath of jazz and similar perversions of the noblest of the arts, then we shall again have music."—Pietro Mascagni.

"Music gives tone to the universe; wings to the wind; flight to the imagination; a charm to sadness, gayety and life to everything."—Plato.

"The Tune's the Thing—So Away With the Swing"

This is the caption of an article in the Boston Globe that is of interest and from which the following paragraphs are taken:

"Swing music is swinging down and possibly out. Already the new year shows definite signs of the decline of this savage orchestral assault on the rhythmic tunes turned out in mass production quantities by Tin Pan Alley.

"Popular music runs in cycles, and the swing songs of the present day seem to have passed the crest of popularity. Musicians offer a number of reasons for this apparent trend. First of all, the desire for music that is pleasant to listen to has been inculcated in the hearts of millions because of the dozens of daily programs that feature the so-called better types of music."

Do You Know

That the "Bay Psalm Book of 1640" was the first music book; also the second book of any kind printed in America?

That the first mention of French horns in America was by Ben Franklin in 1756, when writing of the excellent music in the Moravian church at Bethlehem, Pa.?

That music was first taught in the public schools of America by Lowell Mason in Boston in 1838?

E. B. F.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

JAN 13 1937

Zimbalist Finds Americans Now Appreciate Good Music

BUFFALO, N. Y., Jan. 13 (AP)—Practicing in a hotel room here for his first concert of 1937, Efrem Zimbalist interrupted his fiddling, put down his violin and thought back over 25 years that have passed since he and an American audience first faced each other.

"American audiences today? Ah, they are more appreciative of an artist's work. Musically, they have progressed tremendously. I have seen an enormous change."

In 25 years Zimbalist, too, has changed. When America first knew him he was a young man of 25 Summers. He had played first violin for his father's symphony orchestra in Rostov, Russia, and had studied in St. Petersburg under Leopold Auer. Now he is greying.

Zimbalist, born in Russia, made his American debut in the Fall of 1911 when, as guest artist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he played Glazounoff's "Concerto in A Minor." Since then the world has known his music.

Now, he says, he finds "more pleasure in playing for an audience in any small town in the United States than in certain capitals of Europe."

'Which capitals?' He smiles amiably and continues as if he did not hear.

"When Americans go to hear a concert, their first impulse is to get pleasure and then, naturally, to express an opinion.

"But with Europeans the first impulse is to criticize and then enjoy it—if they can."

"What do Americans enjoy now? The same great classics as before."

Efrem Zimbalist played in New Bedford in 1924 at the New Bedford Theater, in the first of a Steinert concert series which presented also Yolande Mero, famous Hungarian pianist, and the late Madame Schumann-Heink. He was heard again in the same theater three years ago—March 1, 1934, under auspices of Miss Esther Wollison's Three Arts Bureau. There were large audiences on both occasions.

EFREM ZIMBALIST

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 16 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE JANUARY 26

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will make the third visit of the season to Providence for a concert in the Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday evening, Jan. 26.

Koussevitzky announces the following program: An Entr'Acte from the Incidental Music, which the Russian composer, Taneiev, wrote for the Greek drama cycle, "Oresteia"; the Symphony No. 3 of Brahms in F-major; and three Wagnerian excerpts—Prelude to "Lohengrin," "Forest Murmurs" from the third act of "Siegfried," and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

JAN 16 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM ANNOUNCED

The program which the Boston Symphony orchestra will present when it makes its third appearance of the season in the Metropolitan theatre. Tuesday night, Jan. 26, was announced today.

Selections will include three Wagnerian excerpts—the prelude to "Lohengrin," "Forest Murmurs," from the third act of "Siegfried," and the overture to "Tannhauser." The opening number will be from the incidental music which the Russian composer, Taneiev wrote for the Greek drama cycle, "Oresteia." Brahms' third Symphony in F major will complete the program.

PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS

JAN 13 1937

Bartlett-Robertson Give Recital Tomorrow Night

NEW BRUNSWICK, Jan. 13—"They play with the skill of one and the imagination of two," was the manner in which a midwestern newspaper described a recent two-piano recital of Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson who will appear at New Brunswick tomorrow night in the third concert of the annual series presented by the Rutgers University department of music.

Behind the accomplishments of this couple, romantic tale which had its beginning when they both studied under Tobias Mathay in London. They fell in love and were married. Finding separate achievements incompatible with mutual happiness they decided to give joint concerts.

The first met with great acclaim and since then this couple has become internationally famous for its duo-piano recitals.

Their program for tomorrow includes:

With Laughter and Joy (from "Peasant" Cantata), Bach; Sheep May Safely Graze, Bach; Prelude in E Major, Bach; Variations on a theme of Beethoven, Saint-Saens; Noel, Balfour Gardiner; Polka, Lennox Berkeley; Malaguena, Lecuona; Study in Thirds, Saint-Saens; Romance, Arensky, and The Blue Danube Waltz, Strauss-Echulz-Evler.

The concert will be presented in the university gymnasium on College avenue. On Feb. 25, the famed Vienna Choir Boys will appear in the fourth of the present series while in March the Boston Symphony will give its third concert in this city.

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

JAN 13 1937

ATHENIAN TO CONDUCT THE HUB SYMPHONY

Dimitri Mitropoulos to Wield Baton for Two Weeks.

An exciting conductor, who leads from memory and without baton, and with unconventional gesture achieves most musicianly and soul-searching interpretations, Dimitri Mitropoulos arrived recently from his native Athens, Greece, to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra during the two weeks' annual winter vacation of Serge Koussevitzky. The 40-year-old bald Athenian will appear in Symphony hall not only as conductor, but piano virtuoso and composer.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan 15 and 16, Mitropoulos will be soloist in Respighi's "Toccata" for piano and orchestra, which he also will conduct. At the same pair of concerts, he will introduce the great C-Sharp Minor Quartet of Beethoven as a piece for the entire string section of the orchestra. He does this to spread the acquaintance of the public with what he declares to be the marvelous beauties of this quartet, because more people are attracted to orchestral than to string quartet performances. As composer, he will present his arrangement for modern orchestra of two excerpts from "Dido and Aeneas," a remarkable opera composed by the Englishman, Henry Purcell, in 1688. Not to forget living fellow-composers, Mitropoulos will include a suite from the opera, "La Donna Serpente," of Alfredo Casella.

For the Monday evening concert of Jan. 18, the Athenian guest conductor will repeat his previous program, with the exception of the Toccata. This he will replace with Schumann's Violoncello Concerto. The soloist will be the Spaniard, Gaspar Cassado, who in his recent New York debut confirmed his advance reputation from Europe as a temperamentally fiery, and technically dazzling artist. A cherished pupil of the long incomparable Pablo Gasals, he has won the title of "The Younger Casals," with his teacher's approval, and was enthusiastically upheld in that title last season in 49 concerts in Italy, Belgium, Holland, Germany and England.

GASPAR CASSADO.
Soloist.

LEADER

Boston, Mass.
1/14/37

Former Symphony Soloist Deceased

Prof. George Boetticher, 51, for eight years a well known player and soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at Rangsdorf, Germany, some time ago, it was learned here last week. While in Boston, Professor Boetticher and his family lived at 464 Huntington avenue.

An accomplished master of the brasses, Professor was called from Germany to carry solo horn parts with the Boston Symphony a little more than eight years ago. While here he was made a member of the New England Conservatory of Music. Last May he resigned from the Conservatory and the orchestra and returned to Germany to take a contract with the Radio Center there.

He leaves his wife, Elizabeth Boetticher, and a daughter.

WOBURN, MASS.
TIMES

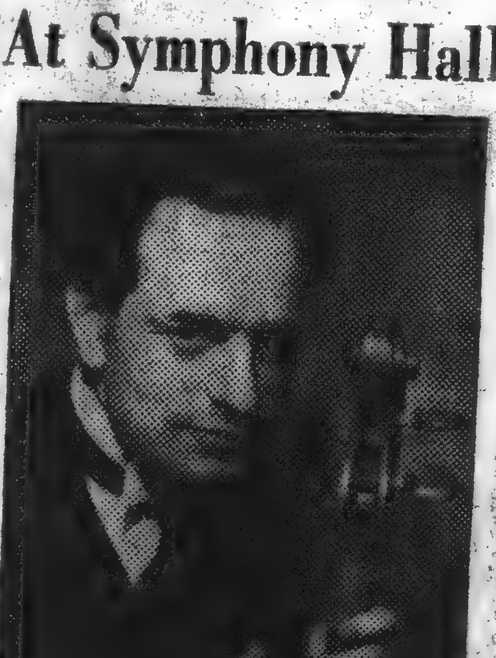
JAN 16 1937

ART BOOKS

From Los Angeles your Library has secured a new book on "Public Library Buildings" by Dana Q. McComb, which may be of some help as a guide in further renovation. "Finger Painting" by Ruth Shaw is a reminder of the interesting exhibit here December 2—5 by Miss Josephine Dwerell of Melrose. Gerome Brush's charcoal drawings of the 109 members of "Boston Symphony Orchestra" will interest symphony goers. "Harvard Portraits" is a catalogue brought back as a souvenir of the Tercentary in September. Ditto applies to a square red-paper covered "Story of the Yard" reprinted from the Harvard Freshman Red Book of the Class of '35' published in 1932, but to the history of the institution and its educational aims and courses of study.

QUINCY, MASS.
NEWS

Greek Artist Is Guest Conductor At Symphony Hall



DIMITRI MITROPOULOS

An exciting conductor, who leads from memory and without baton and with unconventional gesture achieves most musicianly and soul searching interpretations, Dimitri Mitropoulos arrived recently from

---

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JAN 16 1937

THEY'VE been digging things up around Carnegie Hall lately. Mr. Barbirolli unearthed a Vivaldi concerto for strings and a set of Pergolesi melodies which he arranged as an oboe concerto, and Mr. Koussevitzky arrived with a Clementi symphony, put into practical shape by Alfredo Casella. All of these restorations were pleasant things, although the Clementi symphony had to be good as well as historically "interesting" to win any applause from those of us who once battled with Clementt's notorious studies for people trying to develop piano technique.

Mr. Barbirolli's homemade oboe concerto was a hit for Bruno Labate, the Philharmonic's brilliant solo oboist, and for Mr. Barbirolli, who took four excellent melodies and transcribed them without any funny business. The Vivaldi concerto had a poetic slow movement, surrounded by a couple of bouncing divisions of a sort which Vivaldi probably could write while you waited. Still, he knew how to write them.

The enterprising Mr. Stassévitch introduced the Clementi-Casella symphony in C a little while ago, and there were complaints that Signor Casella had been too busy with the original. One can't kick much about the improvements in the symphony in D, produced by Mr. Koussevitzky, which didn't sound like a transcriber's clambake. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men from Boston played it for all it was worth (or more), which is the way of this fine conductor and his notable band. The Boston Symphony series is a model, from every angle.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

JAN 16 1937

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will make the third visit of the season to Providence for a concert in the Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday evening, Jan. 26.

Koussevitzky announces the following program: An entr-acte from the incidental music which the Russian composer, Taneiev, wrote for the Greek drama cycle "Oresteia;" the Symphony No. 3 of Brahms in F major and three Wagnerian excerpts—Prelude to "Lohengrin," "Forest Murmurs" from the third act of "Siegfried," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

JAN 16 1937

Did you know that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra (at Woolsey hall March 10), was recently elected a member of the French Legion of Honor?

MONROE, LA.
NEWS STAR

13

JAN 15 1937

BAUER GAVE UP VIOLIN STUDY

Noted Musician Changed To Piano At Age Of Thirty

Those familiar with the life of Harold Bauer, celebrated pianist, who will give a concert at the Ouachita Parish High school auditorium Tuesday, January 19, under the sponsorship of the Fine Arts club, declare he started his career with a formidable handicap. At the age of 30, he abandoned the violin for the instrument that has since made him famous.

Handicaps, however, had no place in the credo of this artist. When Paderewski, who had heard Mr. Bauer play the piano, persuaded him to think seriously of this instrument as a medium of self-expression, he applied himself to the task with such complete singleness of purpose that within three years he made his debut with the Berlin Philharmonic society, playing a Beethoven and a Saint-Saens concerto and the Liszt Hungarian Fantasy.

Today, he ranks among the few who have attained the Olympian heights of art—"a poet and a lyric rhapsodist," as Lawrence Gilman of the New York Herald-Tribune has so aptly described him.

Mr. Bauer made his American debut in 1901 as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra. Since then, he has appeared with every orchestra of note in this country and Europe, and his name alone is sufficient to conjure to the minds of thousands of music-lovers throughout the length and breadth of the land memories of his unforgettable art.

Of English parentage and born in England, Mr. Bauer has since identified himself with the musical life of this country, and has become an American citizen, merging his interests thoroughly with those of his adopted country.

As founder and continuous president of the Beethoven association of New York, an organization which he formed in 1918, he has given generously of his services in helping to further the appreciation of musical art and the fellowship of musicians in this country.

NEWS

JAN 15 1937

Greek Musical Genius Leads Boston Symphony

An exciting conductor, who leads from memory and without baton, and with unconventional gesture achieves most musicianly and soul-searching interpretations, Dimitri Mitropoulos arrived recently from his native Athens, Greece, to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the two weeks' annual Winter vacation of Serge Koussevitzky. The forty-year-old bald Athenian is appearing in Symphony Hall not only as conductor, but piano virtuoso and composer.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 15, 16, Mitropoulos will be soloist in Respighi's "Toccata" for piano and orchestra, which he will also conduct. At the same pair of concerts, he will introduce the Great C-Sharp Minor Quartet of Beethoven as a piece for the entire string section of the orchestra. He does this to spread the acquaintance of the public with what he declares to be the marvelous beauties of this quartet, because more people are attracted to orchestral than to string quartet performances.

For the Monday Evening concert of Jan. 18, the Athenian guest conductor will repeat his previous program, with the exception of the Toccata. This will rethe Spaniard Gaspar Cassado place with Schumann's Violoncello Concerto. The soloist will be who in his recent New York debut confirmed his advance reputation from Europe as a temperamentally fiery and technically dazzling artist.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 15 1937

Stravinsky Gives First Performance

Directs Philharmonic Symphony Concert in Carnegie Hall.

By PITTS SANBORN.

First of the guest composer-conductors promised for this winter by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, Igor Stravinsky directed last evening's concert of the Society in Carnegie Hall to the apparent satisfaction of a very large audience. Associated with him as soloist was the young American pianist, Beveridge Webster.

Mr. Stravinsky in his autobiography has been explicit about his admiration for Weber, a "prince of composers." Accordingly it was natural to find music by Weber heading the program (since this year Mr. Stravinsky's programs are not limited to his own works).

But what music? The overture and a march from incidental numbers that Weber as a young man composed for Schiller's play "Turandot" (derived from a play by Carol Gozzi), concerning that same ruthless Chinese princess of whom the world was forcibly reminded a few years ago by Puccini's posthumous opera.

* * *

Used Chinese Melody.

Weber, we are informed, employed for this score a Chinese melody that he had found in Rousseau's Dictionary of Music. Thus there is a faintly exotic tinge (which may have seemed less faint in the early years of the nineteenth century) to the overture and march, neither of which had figured on a program of the Society before. Indeed, their very existence must have been unsuspected by the great majority of those present.

These flutings and jinglings disposed of, a rarely performed concerto in G major for piano and orchestra (K. 453) by Mozart, brought Mr. Webster into the picture. This concerto proved to be quite worthy of Mozart's fame, including as it does one of the loveliest of his andantes.

Mr. Webster played his part in the performance with due continence and a proper shunning of even a hint of sentimentality. But he need not have been quite so cambric-tea about it all or quite so persistently staccato in his mildness.

His real metal emerged in Mr. Stravinsky's own Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, where his executive contribution was quite masterly. This piece, completed in 1929, was another "first time by the Society," though the Boston Symphony Orchestra had offered it in Carnegie Hall nearly seven years before. It is an engrossing work in its prestidigitatorial play with instrumental timbres and pulsing, diversified rhythms; its purposeful allusions even unto Chopin and Liszt.

Second Part All Stravinsky.

The second and last section of the program was given over entirely to compositions by Mr. Stravinsky, his orchestral fantasy of pin-wheels, Roman candles, sky-rockets, and all the rest, simply entitled "Fireworks," preceding the Capricco and the concert suite from "Petrouchka" following it.

Mr. Stravinsky, short, slim, professorial, unassuming yet authority incarnate, was cordially received. While conducting he showed a refreshing comradeship with the wide-open score.

BANGOR, ME.
COMMERCIAL

JAN 16 1937

REAL PEOPLE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Gerome Brush. 920.B83Sb.

Strikingly fine crayon drawings of each member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with brief paragraphs of biographical data.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 16 1937

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist, will give a concert for the benefit of its Pension Fund for the first time in New York on Wednesday evening, February 10, in Carnegie Hall. Serge Koussevitzky announces the following program for the occasion: Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 15 1937

Stravinsky Back After 12 Years, Directs First of Six Concerts

By Francis D. Perkins

Igor Stravinsky, returning to the podium of Carnegie Hall after a lapse of twelve years, conducted the first of his six concerts with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra last night in a program which, unlike those of his brief visit here in 1925, included non-Stravinsky as well as Stravinsky works, beginning with Weber's overture and march from his music for Schiller's "Turandot" and Mozart's piano concerto in G major (K. 453). The Stravinskian second half of the concert included "Fireworks" and the "Petrouchka" suite, which the composer had directed in his short 1925 sojourn with the Philharmonic, and the capriccio for piano and orchestra, which he could not have offered then, as he did not begin it until four years later.

The soloist in both the Mozart concerto and the Stravinsky capriccio was Beveridge Webster, a twenty-eight-year-old American pianist who is already known here as a recitalist and orchestral soloist, appearing instead of Samuel Dushkin, violinist, whose indisposition prevented the hearing of a Mozart violin concerto and Mr. Stravinsky's concerto, which had been introduced here a few years ago by the Philadelphians.

So far as the relative musical value of the works was concerned, the change of program brought no loss, as Stravinsky's capriccio is at least on a par with the violin concerto—while neither are among the most momentous of his more recent contributions—and the first hearing of the Mozart G major concerto in many years led not a few hearers to wonder why it has been neglected, considering the memorable, serious charm of the andante and the inventiveness and ingenuity of the finale. Mr. Webster gave it a highly skillful performance, clear in detail and subtle in its shading, while the orchestral interpretation also realized the essential atmosphere and appeal of the music. The still more unfamiliar Weber music, played for the first time in the Philharmonic's history, was interesting mainly as a curiosity, to show how an early nineteenth century composer went about obtaining an impression of Oriental color.

Mr. Stravinsky, who was welcomed by an applausive audience and by a standing orchestra as he began the program, has changed little in appearance in the last twelve years, and the general characteristics of his work with the baton are substantially the same as before—except, indeed, that he has been conducting quite often in many parts of the globe during the interval, and, as a result, has gained more assurance on the podium and evokes a wider range of interpretative color.

He can be regarded as a conductor in his own right, rather than as the composer-conductor directing his own works in order to give his hearers a chance to see their creator in person, as well as giving them a chance to note how he interprets them. His beat, as before, was definite and clear in intention, and his interpretative wishes were readily and clearly transmitted; the tricky rhythms of music such as the capriccio presented no apparent difficulties for the conductor, soloist or orchestra. He showed sympathy for and understanding of the Mozartian idiom, and there was considerable brilliance in the "fireworks," especially in the outburst of the "joyously triumphant bomb" at the close.

The reading of the "Petrouchka" music possessed much momentum and energy, and there was much to relish in the vigor and proclamativeness of the performance in the carnival scene. On the other hand, Carnegie Hall audiences have heard readings marked by more flexibility and dynamic nuance under other leaders; this one seemed, at a few moments, somewhat heavy-handed.

This difference may, of course, have reflected a difference of interpretative outlook. Meanwhile, the net impression was that Mr. Stravinsky is a conductor to be regarded with much respect, while not, at least thus far, to be ranked among the memorable geniuses of the field.

The piano capriccio was played here twice before by the Boston Symphony, on January 8 and February 7, 1931. Taking something over fifteen minutes to perform, it is aptly described by its title, as clever, chatty music, with many and various shifts of rhythm and occasional excursions into the outer borders of the realms of jazz. As far as the musical ideas are concerned, it is somewhat unsubstantial, and its cleverness and whimsicality, while still apparent, have paled to a noticeable extent since six years ago; there are moments when one is conscious of a sense of length. Mr. Webster did exceedingly laudable work in the exacting piano part, which is treated ah a co-ordinate part of the whole ensemble rather than as a primarily solo role, and all the participants received an ovation of unusual length.

Mrs. C. R. Holmes Gives Reception for Stravinsky

Russian Composer-Conductor Greeted by Hundreds

Mrs. Christian R. Holmes gave a large reception and buffet supper last evening at her home, 1107 Fifth Avenue, in honor of Igor Stravinsky, Russian composer and conductor. It followed his first appearance here in twelve years conducting the Philharmonic-Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall. There were several hundred guests representative of society and the musc world.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

ANY performance by a symphony orchestra must be judged by its ensemble effect and it is a fact that any orchestra can be only as good as its individual players. This is true of any orchestral group and is just as true of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra as of lesser organizations. The listener, hearing the orchestra execute some great composition, is conscious perhaps only of the artistry of the whole, but realizes the superb musicianship that must be that of the individual members. It is for this purpose, to make the individual members known to the public, that Gerome Brush, a well-known artist, has compiled a book on the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which [illegible] just [illegible] (The Merrymount Press).

By means of a series of charcoal drawings, full-page size, Brush has succeeded in catching the individual players with their instruments, in informal pose, and on the facing page has written a thumbnail sketch of the player, thus "humanizing" the orchestra.

An appreciation has been written by Edward Weeks of the Atlantic Monthly in which he tells of the organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881 with 70 members, contrasting it with the perfect orchestra of today with its 109 members. The foreword is by Brush. To get the proper atmosphere for his drawings, the artist did his sketches in the tuning room, each musician playing his instrument in order to banish self-consciousness. The first sketch is of Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, and then follow the other members of the orchestra in alphabetical order.

It is a book written for the layman, rather than for the musician. It can be read in less than a hour, but will furnish enjoyment just so long as the Boston Symphony Orchestra retains its organization.

Greta [illegible].

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 17 1937

A concert in memory of Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be given Wednesday night, Feb. 24, in Carnegie Hall, with Albert Spalding, violinist, and Harold Bauer, pianist, as soloists, under the auspices of Mailamm, the American Palestine Music Association, of which Leopold Godowsky is honorary president and Mischa Elman and Bronislaw Huberman honorary vice presidents. The concert has been arranged to raise the necessary funds for a grove of trees to be planted on Jewish National Fund land in Palestine as a memorial to the late pianist and conductor, according to a plan formulated by Mailamm. The program is being devised by a musicians' committee headed by Artur Bodanzky and Serge Koussevitzky. Mrs. Israel Goldstein is chairman of the committee sponsoring the enterprise.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 17 1937

The program at the special pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Feb. 10 will be devoted to Mendelssohn and Tchaikovsky. Jascha Heifetz will be the soloist in the Mendelssohn concerto. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony and the Russian's Fourth will round out the program. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

Mr. Koussevitzky is taking his midwinter vacation at the present time and the guest conductor of the Bostonians is the Athenian, Dimitri Mitropoulos.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 15 1937

STRAVINSKY LEADS AT CARNEGIE HALL

Makes His First Appearance as Guest Conductor With Philharmonic-Symphony.

HIS OWN WORKS ARE GIVEN

Beveridge Webster Is Soloist—Overture by Weber for Gozzi Fairy Tale Is Played.

By OLIN DOWNES

Igor Stravinsky made his first appearance as guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. He appeared on the platform in the business-like manner which characterizes him and turned immediately, after acknowledging hearty welcoming applause, to his business.

Mr. Stravinsky would not profess to be a virtuoso conductor. He is small of stature, but his eyes behind glasses are keen and steady and when he stands at the orchestra he is psychologically equal to the situation. On this occasion Mr. Stravinsky made no pretenses to acquirements that are not his, and he made not the slightest attempt to impress the gallery. At the same time he amply demonstrated the clarity of his thinking and his convictions as an artist.

A musical mind immediately shows itself, and is felt as soon as the first note is sounded. Mr. Stravinsky had clear intentions and definite tonal images in his consciousness. He knew what he wanted. This was recognized and put into effect. It was so, at least, with his own compositions.

Weber Overture Given

The program opened with the overture from the score which the youthful Carl Maria von Weber wrote to accompany Gozzi's fairy tale of the Princess Turandot. The piece was played for the first time by the society. One wonders what attracted Mr. Stravinsky to it, and the answer which takes form in the mind is that probably the linear and objective character of a Chinese musical theme which is employed intrigued him who is above all the apostle of objectivity and design in the tonal art.

This overture, for its material, is too lengthy, but the whole thing is rather remarkably apropos of Stravinsky—indeed, one would say, more apropos of Stravinsky than of the youthful and romantic Weber. The modern apostle of absolute music conducted the piece with a clear beat and consistency of pace that perfectly suited the composition.

Then Beveridge Webster, pianist, who had a hard evening before him, played the piano part of the Mozart G major concerto (Kochel 453), while Mr. Stravinsky directed the accompaniment. Mr. Beveridge played with much facility and a pleasing tonal quality. But here, in a ragged accompaniment, was evidence of Stravinsky's limited orchestral experience.

Pianist Plays Stravinsky Work

A more formidable test in point of sheer technique and rhythmical problems came when Mr. Webster played devotedly the very difficult piano part of Mr. Stravinsky's second piano concerto which he calls a "Capriccio," in three uninterrupted movements. The writer has no illusions whatever concerning critical infallibility, but is forced to go on record as remarking that he liked this "Capriccio" even less the second time he heard it than the first, when it was played here in 1931 by Jesus Sanroma with Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is to him ugly, tedious, irritating music.

Here Mr. Stravinsky was on his own ground, and the performance was better. But the salvos of the evening came last, after the glowing, pulsing score of "Petruchka." The other Stravinsky music of the evening was his early student piece, composed when he was still a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Fire-works," a short passage of brilliant instrumentation though arid of feeling, heard just before the concerto. This is to be remembered, and it is striking in the light of Mr. Stravinsky's chosen ground as an apostle of the absolute and not the romantic or programmatic or emotional aspects of the tonal art: his most vital scores, or at least those which the world continues to reckon as such, are those which he has composed for ballets or mimed dramatic spectacles. "Oiseau de feu," "Petruchka," "Sacre du printemps," "L'Histoire de Soldat"—these are emotional and dramatic expressions, and not mere acoustics.

Abstract logic in music has mightily intrigued this composer, but when he indulges pure musical form with no relation to poetical imagination or dramatic event the process seems to have sterilized his expression.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE
JAN 17 1937

Greek Bundle of Nerves

BOSTON, Jan. 16.—(AP)—A Greek bundle of nerves named Dimitri Mitropoulos is guest conductor of the Boston symphony for the second successive year—and therein lies a tale of achievement that rivals that of another new youngster, John Barbirolli, Briton, who at 36 recently signed a three-year contract to lead the New York Philharmonic.

When the bald headed 40-year-old bachelor from Athens took the podium here last year, he was the first of his nationality ever to lead a major symphony in this country.

His colorful mannerisms—he literally dances and skips in rhythm with the orchestra, which he conducts without score or baton—and his able musicianship quickly caught the fancy of Boston concert goers.

From here Mitropoulos goes west to be guest conductor of the Minneapolis symphony.

When asked to return to the hub this year for another two weeks, he became the first guest conductor in the orchestra's 56 years to be invited back within a year of his debut.

When he played the solo part of Respighi's toccata for piano and orchestra at the concerts yesterday and tonight, he became, too, the first man in the orchestra's history ever to conduct while playing.

Mitropoulous' achievements do not stop there, however. He will be heard here also in a third capacity—that of composer.

The slender Athenian is an able linguist. He speaks English, French, Spanish, German and Dutch in addition to his Greek.

The Dutch came in handy during one rehearsal. Unable to elucidate a technical point in English to one of the horn players, he sized up the musician:

"You're Dutch, aren't you?" he asked.

"Yes," came the surprised answer, and in that language the conductor explained how he wanted his music played.

Brimming with energy and good humor, Mitropoulos nevertheless is an exacting taskmaster. For precisely three hours at the first rehearsal, he drilled the Boston string section, rated by many as the finest in the world, in the first part of his presentation with string orchestra of the Beethoven quartet in C-sharp minor. And the next day he came back with three hours more work on the second part.

The rehearsal over, Mitropoulos settled before a piano to drill himself for the Respighi concerto.

Hours later a watchman at Symphony hall reported finding him still there, bringing to the musician the stern realization he had had no lunch and was an hour overdue for dinner.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

Singular Individual

Leaves Boston Symphony Stand After Successful Engagement—Sets Records And Precedents In Hub City—To Return.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

1937

Boston's Greek Conductor Gets Encore With Symphony

BY BERNARD FREEMAN

BOSTON, Mass., Jan. 16 (AP).—A Greek bundle of nerves named Dimitri Mitropoulos is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for the second successive year—and therein lies a tale of achievement that rivals that of another new youngster, John Barbirolli, Briton, who at 36 recently signed a three-year contract to lead the New York Philharmonic. When the bald-headed 40-year-old bachelor from Athens took the podium here last year, he was the first of his nationality ever to lead a major symphony in this country. His colorful mannerisms—he literally dances and skips in rhythm with the orchestra, which he conducts without score or baton—and his able musicianship quickly caught the fancy of Boston concert-goers.

From here Mitropoulos goes west to be guest conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony.

When asked to return to the Hub this year for another two weeks, he became the first guest conductor in the orchestra's fifty-six years to be invited back within a year of his debut.

When he played the solo part of Respigh's "Toccata" for piano and orchestra at the concerts yesterday and tonight, he became, too, the first man in the orchestra's history ever to conduct while playing.

Mitropoulos' achievements do not stop there, however. He will be heard here also in a third capacity—that of composer. The slender Athenian is an able linguist. He speaks English, French, Spanish, German and Dutch in addition to his Greek.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

1937

Greek Bundle of Nerves Leads Boston Symphony

By BERNARD FREEMAN

BOSTON, Jan. 16 (AP)—A Greek bundle of nerves named Dimitri Mitropoulos is guest conductor of the Boston symphony for the second successive year—and there-

---

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS

JAN 17 1937

GREEK CONDUCTS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mitropaulos Invited to Return for Second Successive Year

(By Associated Press)

BOSTON, Jan. 16.—A Greek bundle of nerves named Dimitri Mitropoulos is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for the second successive year—and therein lies a tale of achievement that rivals that of another new youngster, John Barbirolli, Briton, who at 36 recently signed a three-year contract to lead the New York Philharmonic.

When the bald headed 40-year-old bachelor from Athens took the podium here last year, he was the first of his nationality ever to lead a major symphony in this country.

His colorful mannerisms—he literally dances and skips in rhythm with the orchestra, which he conducts without score or baton—and his able musicianship quickly caught the fancy of Boston concert goers.

From here Mitropoulos goes West to be guest conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony.

When asked to return to the Hub this year for another two weeks, he became the first guest conductor in the orchestra's 56 years to be invited back within a year of his debut.

When he played the solo part of Respighi's Toccata for piano and orchestra at the concerts yesterday and tonight, he became, too, the first man in the orchestra's history ever to conduct while playing.

Mitropoulos' achievements do not stop there, however. He will be heard here also in a third capacity—that of composer.

The slender Athenian is an able linguist. He speaks English, French, Spanish, German and Dutch in addition to his Greek.

The Dutch came in handy during one rehearsal. Unable to elucidate a technical point in English to one of the horn players, he sized up the musician:

"You're Dutch, aren't you?" he asked.

"Yes," came the surprised answer, and in that language the conductor explained how he wanted his music played.

Brimming with energy and good humor, Mitropoulos nevertheless is an exacting taskmaster. For precisely three hours at the first rehearsal, he drilled the Boston string section, rated by many as the finest in the world, in the first part of his presentation with string orchestra of the Beethoven quarter in C-sharp minor. And the next day he came back with three hours' more work on the second part.

The rehearsal over, Mitropoulos settled before a piano to drill himself for the Respighi Concerto.

Hours later a watchman at Symphony Hall reported finding him still there, bringing to the musician the stern realization he had had no lunch and was an hour overdue for dinner.

DAYTON, O.
NEWS WEEK
JAN 16 1937

MUSIC: New York Hears 'New' Works, Perhaps by Old Masters

When long-lost manuscripts of a master are brought to light, it isn't always cause for rejoicing. In the last two weeks New Yorkers heard three such discoveries and gave a warm welcome to only one.

MYSTERY: Musicians were excited last year when Alfredo Casella, the Italian pianist-composer, announced he had completed arrangement of two Clementi symphonies. Muzio Clementi is music's mystery man. Acclaimed all over Europe in his day (1753-1832), he dropped into oblivion after his death. Not a single score of his symphonies could be found.

Equally inexplicable was the discovery in 1917 of about a thousand pages of Clementi manuscripts among the relics of an English musicologist. How they got there and why they were never made public are unknown. The Library of Congress bought the batch, and seventeen years later Casella started the herculean job of patching together parts of four different symphonies.

The first to be heard in New York was the C major, so incomplete in its original form that it was mostly Casella. Presented by Paul Stassevitch and his privately financed orchestra at Town Hall, it met with scant approval. Heavy orchestration and bombastic use of brasses robbed the piece of much of its eighteenth-century charm.

But Clementi's reputation was sustained last week with the performance of the D major symphony by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in their Carnegie Hall appearance. "It is marvelous, and very difficult to perform," said Koussevitzky. In this number Casella had been able to compile an almost complete work from miscellaneous scraps in the British Museum and the Library of Congress collection.

DISSENSION: A controversy sprang up around the performance of a supposedly newly discovered Handel work by Hans Lange and the Philharmonic-Symphony Chamber Orchestra at Town Hall. The concerto in E flat for oboe and strings won mixed notices. Reactions ranged from "a typical product of Handel's genius" to "largely prose and conventional stuff."

Jacob Maurice Coopersmith, director of the music library of the radio station WOR, expressed himself more emphatically: the work isn't Handel's at all. Theoretically written about 1710, the concerto "possesses primitive errors in counterpoint that Handel couldn't possibly have made." The master at that time was under the tutorship of a fanatically strict academician, Zachau, who would not have tolerated such slips. Further, said Coopersmith, its tone is hard, and the manuscript does not exist in holograph (autographed score in the composer's own writing).

Coopersmith, one of four students who have ever received a Ph.D. in music from Harvard, won his degree for work done on Handel.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN
JAN 17 1937 174

Opera Plans Are Growing In Hollywood

By GRENA BENNETT.

Serge Prokofieff, Russian composer-pianist, conductor, was among the arriving passengers on the S. S. Paris for his first visit to this country since 1933. He plans a short stay during which he will fill concert engagements as conductor and pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. As pianist the composer will play his own Third Concerto for piano and orchestra and will conduct among other things his new suite from "Romeo and Juliet."

The world premiere of a new concerto for orchestra and pianoforte by Vittorio Giannini, young American composer and Prix de Rome graduate, will be given by the National Orchestral Association under the baton of Leon Barzin, at that organization's March 22 concert at Carnegie Hall. Composer Giannini who completed his fourth year as a Fellow of the American Academy in Rome wrote the concerto during his last year in Italy. Written also last year, was his Requiem which the Friends of Music will present in Vienna this coming Spring.

* * *

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

CONDUCTOR DANCES IN LEADING ORCHESTRA

Dimitri Mitropoulos Sets Several Records With Boston Symphony.

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, Jan. 16.—Dimitri Mitropoulos, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for the second successive year, is the first Greek to lead a major symphony in this country.

His mannerisms — he literally dances and skips in rhythm with the orchestra, which he conducts without score or baton—and his able musicianship caught the fancy of Boston concertgoers.

From here Mitropoulos will go as guest conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony.

He is the first guest conductor in the orchestra's 56 years to be invited to return within a year of his debut.

When he played the solo part of Respighi's toccata for piano and orchestra recently he became, too, the first man in the orchestra's history to conduct while playing.

Mitropoulos will be heard here also in a third capacity—that of composer.

Greek Bundle of Nerves Leads Boston Symphony Second Year

By Associated Press

BOSTON, Jan. 16.—A Greek bundle of nerves named Dimitri Mitropoulos is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for the second successive year—and therein lies a tale of achievement that rivals that of another new youngster, John Barbirolli, Briton, who at 36 recently signed a three-year contract to lead the New York Philharmonic.

When the bald headed 40-year old bachelor from Athens took the podium here last year, he was the first of his nationality ever to lead a major symphony in this country.

Colorful Mannerisms

His colorful mannerisms—he literally dances and skips in rhythm with the orchestra, which he conducts without score or baton—and his able musicianship quickly caught the fancy of Boston concert goers.

From here Mitropoulos goes west to be guest conductor of the Minneapolis, Minn., symphony.

When asked to return to the hub this year for another two weeks, he became the first guest conductor in the orchestra's 56 years to be invited back within a year of his debut.

Conducts While Playing

And when he played the solo part of Respighi's Toccata for piano and orchestra at the concerts yesterday and tonght, he became, too, the first man in the orchestra's history ever to conduct while playing.

Mitropoulos' achievements do not stop there, however, he wll be heard here also in a third capacity—that of composer.

The slender Athenian is an able linguist. He speaks English, French, Spanish, German and Dutch in addition to his Greek.

Brimming with energy and good humor, Mitropoulos nevertheless is an exacting taskmaster.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE
JAN 17 1937

Greek Bundle of Nerves

BOSTON, Jan. 16.—(AP)—A Greek bundle of nerves named Dimitri Mitropoulos is guest conductor of the Boston symphony for the second successive year—and therein lies a tale of achievement that rivals that of another new youngster, John Barbirolli, Briton, who at 36 recently signed a three-year contract to lead the New York Philharmonic.

When the bald headed 40-year-old bachelor from Athens took the podium here last year, he was the first of his nationality ever to lead a major symphony in this country.

His colorful mannerisms—he literally dances and skips in rhythm with the orchestra, which he conducts without score or baton—and his able musicianship quickly caught the fancy of Boston concert goers.

From here Mitropoulos goes west to be guest conductor of the Minneapolis symphony.

When asked to return to the hub this year for another two weeks, he became the first guest conductor in the orchestra's 56 years to be invited back within a year of his debut.

When he played the solo part of Respighi's toccata for piano and orchestra at the concerts yesterday and tonight, he became, too, the first man in the orchestra's history ever to conduct while playing.

Mitropoulous' achievements do not stop there, however. He will be heard here also in a third capacity—that of composer.

The slender Athenian is an able linguist. He speaks English, French, Spanish, German and Dutch in addition to his Greek.

The Dutch came in handy during one rehearsal. Unable to elucidate a technical point in English to one of the horn players, he sized up the musician:

"You're Dutch, aren't you?" he asked.

"Yes," came the surprised answer, and in that language the conductor explained how he wanted his music played.

Brimming with energy and good humor, Mitropoulos nevertheless is an exacting taskmaster. For precisely three hours at the first rehearsal, he drilled the Boston string section, rated by many as the finest in the world, in the first part of his presentation with string orchestra of the Beethoven quartet in C-sharp minor. And the next day he came back with three hours more work on the second part.

The rehearsal over, Mitropoulos settled before a piano to drill himself for the Respighi concerto.

Hours later a watchman at Symphony hall reported finding him still there, bringing to the musician the stern realization he had had no lunch and was an hour overdue for dinner.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

JAN 17 1937

Singular Individual

Article ~~same as one~~ above

Leaves Boston Symphony Stand After Successful Engagement—Sets Records And Precedents In Hub City—To Return.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

JAN 17 1937

Boston's Greek Conductor Gets Encore With Symphony

BY BERNARD FREEMAN

BOSTON, Mass., Jan. 16 (AP).—A Greek bundle of nerves named Dimitri Mitropoulos is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for the second successive year—and therein lies a tale of achievement that rivals that of another new youngster, John Barbirolli, Briton, who at 36 recently signed a three-year contract to lead the New York Philharmonic. When the bald-headed 40-year-old bachelor from Athens took the podium here last year, he was the first of his nationality ever to lead a major symphony in this country. His colorful mannerisms—he literally dances and skips in rhythm with the orchestra, which he conducts without score or baton—and his able musicianship quickly caught the fancy of Boston concert-goers.

From here Mitropoulos goes west to be guest conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony.

When asked to return to the Hub this year for another two weeks, he became the first guest conductor in the orchestra's fifty-six years to be invited back within a year of his debut.

When he played the solo part of Respigh's "Toccata" for piano and orchestra at the concerts yesterday and tonight, he became, too, the first man in the orchestra's history ever to conduct while playing.

Mitropoulos' achievements do not stop there, however. He will be heard here also in a third capacity—that of composer. The slender Athenian is an able linguist. He speaks English, French, Spanish, German and Dutch in addition to his Greek.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

JAN 17 1937

Greek Bundle of Nerves Leads Boston Symphony

Like above

By BERNARD FREEMAN

BOSTON, Jan. 16 (AP)—A Greek bundle of nerves named Dimitri Mitropoulos is guest conductor of the Boston symphony for the second successive year—and there-

---

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS

JAN 17 1937

GREEK CONDUCTS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mitropaulos Invited to Return for Second Successive Year

(By Associated Press)

BOSTON, Jan. 16.—A Greek bundle of nerves named Dimitri Mitropoulos is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for the second successive year—and therein lies a tale of achievement that rivals that of another new youngster, John Barbirolli, Briton, who at 36 recently signed a three-year contract to lead the New York Philharmonic.

When the bald headed 40-year-old bachelor from Athens took the podium here last year, he was the first of his nationality ever to lead a major symphony in this country.

His colorful mannerisms—he literally dances and skips in rhythm with the orchestra, which he conducts without score or baton—and his able musicianship quickly caught the fancy of Boston concert goers.

From here Mitropoulos goes West to be guest conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony.

When asked to return to the Hub this year for another two weeks, he became the first guest conductor in the orchestra's 56 years to be invited back within a year of his debut.

When he played the solo part of Respighi's Toccata for piano and orchestra at the concerts yesterday and tonight, he became, too, the first man in the orchestra's history ever to conduct while playing.

Mitropoulos' achievements do not stop there, however. He will be heard here also in a third capacity—that of composer.

The slender Athenian is an able linguist. He speaks English, French, Spanish, German and Dutch in addition to his Greek.

The Dutch came in handy during one rehearsal. Unable to elucidate a technical point in English to one of the horn players, he sized up the musician:

"You're Dutch, aren't you?" he asked.

"Yes," came the surprised answer, and in that language the conductor explained how he wanted his music played.

Brimming with energy and good humor, Mitropoulos nevertheless is an exacting taskmaster. For precisely three hours at the first rehearsal, he drilled the Boston string section, rated by many as the finest in the world, in the first part of his presentation with string orchestra of the Beethoven quarter in C-sharp minor. And the next day he came back with three hours' more work on the second part.

The rehearsal over, Mitropoulos settled before a piano to drill himself for the Respighi Concerto.

Hours later a watchman at Symphony Hall reported finding him still there, bringing to the musician the stern realization he had had no lunch and was an hour overdue for dinner.

DAYTON, O.
NEWS WEEK
JAN 16 1937

MUSIC: New York Hears 'New' Works, Perhaps by Old Masters

When long-lost manuscripts of a master are brought to light, it isn't always cause for rejoicing. In the last two weeks New Yorkers heard three such discoveries and gave a warm welcome to only one.

MYSTERY: Musicians were excited last year when Alfredo Casella, the Italian pianist-composer, announced he had completed arrangement of two Clementi symphonies. Muzio Clementi is music's mystery man. Acclaimed all over Europe in his day (1753-1832), he dropped into oblivion after his death. Not a single score of his symphonies could be found.

Equally inexplicable was the discovery in 1917 of about a thousand pages of Clementi manuscripts among the relics of an English musicologist. How they got there and why they were never made public are unknown. The Library of Congress bought the batch, and seventeen years later Casella started the herculean job of patching together parts of four different symphonies.

The first to be heard in New York was the C major, so incomplete in its original form that it was mostly Casella. Presented by Paul Stassevitch and his privately financed orchestra at Town Hall, it met with scant approval. Heavy orchestration and bombastic use of brasses robbed the piece of much of its eighteenth-century charm.

But Clementi's reputation was sustained last week with the performance of the D major symphony by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in their Carnegie Hall appearance. "It is marvelous, and very difficult to perform," said Koussevitzky. In this number Casella had been able to compile an almost complete work from miscellaneous scraps in the British Museum and the Library of Congress collection.

DISSENSION: A controversy sprang up around the performance of a supposedly newly discovered Handel work by Hans Lange and the Philharmonic-Symphony Chamber Orchestra at Town Hall. The concerto in E flat for oboe and strings won mixed notices. Reactions ranged from "a typical product of Handel's genius" to "largely prose and conventional stuff."

Jacob Maurice Coopersmith, director of the music library of the radio station WOR, expressed himself more emphatically: the work isn't Handel's at all. Theoretically written about 1710, the concerto "possesses primitive errors in counterpoint that Handel couldn't possibly have made." The master at that time was under the tutorship of a fanatically strict academician, Zachau, who would not have tolerated such slips. Further, said Coopersmith, its tone is hard, and the manuscript does not exist in holograph (autographed score in the composer's own writing).

Coopersmith, one of four students who have ever received a Ph.D. in music from Harvard, won his degree for work done on Handel.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN
JAN 17 1937

Opera Plans Are Growing In Hollywood

By GRENA BENNETT.

Serge Prokofieff, Russian composer-pianist, conductor, was among the arriving passengers on the S. S. Paris for his first visit to this country since 1933. He plans a short stay during which he will fill concert engagements as conductor and pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. As pianist the composer will play his own Third Concerto for piano and orchestra and will conduct among other things his new suite from "Romeo and Juliet."

The world premiere of a new concerto for orchestra and pianoforte by Vittorio Giannini, young American composer and Prix de Rome graduate, will be given by the National Orchestral Association under the baton of Leon Barzin, at that organization's March 22 concert at Carnegie Hall. Composer Giannini who completed his fourth year as a Fellow of the American Academy in Rome wrote the concerto during his last year in Italy. Written also last year, was his Requiem which the Friends of Music will present in Vienna this coming Spring.

* * *

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

JAN 17 1937

CONDUCTOR DANCES IN LEADING ORCHESTRA

Dimitri Mitropoulos Sets Several Records With Boston Symphony.

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, Jan. 16.—Dimitri Mitropoulos, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for the second successive year, is the first Greek to lead a major symphony in this country.

His mannerisms — he literally dances and skips in rhythm with the orchestra, which he conducts without score or baton—and his able musicianship caught the fancy of Boston concertgoers.

From here Mitropoulos will go as guest conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony.

He is the first guest conductor in the orchestra's 56 years to be invited to return within a year of his debut.

When he played the solo part of Respighi's toccata for piano and orchestra recently he became, too, the first man in the orchestra's history to conduct while playing.

Mitropoulos will be heard here also in a third capacity—that of composer.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 17 1937

Greek Bundle of Nerves Leads Boston Symphony Second Year

By Associated Press

BOSTON, Jan. 16.—A Greek bundle of nerves named Dimitri Mitropoulos is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for the second successive year—and therein lies a tale of achievement that rivals that of another new youngster, John Barbirolli, Briton, who at 36 recently signed a three-year contract to lead the New York Philharmonic.

When the bald headed 40-year old bachelor from Athens took the podium here last year, he was the first of his nationality ever to lead a major symphony in this country.

Colorful Mannerisms

His colorful mannerisms—he literally dances and skips in rhythm with the orchestra, which he conducts without score or baton—and his able musicianship quickly caught the fancy of Boston concert goers.

From here Mitropoulos goes west to be guest conductor of the Minneapolis, Minn., symphony.

When asked to return to the hub this year for another two weeks, he became the first guest conductor in the orchestra's 56 years to be invited back within a year of his debut.

Conducts While Playing

And when he played the solo part of Respighi's Toccata for piano and orchestra at the concerts yesterday and tonght, he became, too, the first man in the orchestra's history ever to conduct while playing.

Mitropoulos' achievements do not stop there, however, he wil be heard here also in a third capacity—that of composer.

The slender Athenian is an able linguist. He speaks English, French, Spanish, German and Dutch in addition to his Greek.

Brimming with energy and good humor, Mitropoulos nevertheless is an exacting taskmaster.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 17 1937

MUSIC Of Today and Tomorrow

By
Walter W. Farmer

THE Worcester Philharmonic Orchestra, under the direction of Walter Howe, will give its first concert this season Thursday evening in Mechanics Hall. An interesting program has been announced that will include in addition to the orchestral music, choral numbers sung by members of the Women's Auxiliary of the orchestra. Perhaps the most important composition listed is Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, a work that may be considered the most popular symphony since Beethoven.

In spite of some purists who enjoy abstractions more than reality, and who believe that symphonic music should refer to nothing outside itself, not a few composers have provided descriptive titles for some of their symphonic works. Other works in this form have become known traditionally by such adjectives as appear in the following titles: Haydn's "Surprise," "Farewell," and "Military"; Beethoven's "Heroic" and "Pastoral"; Schumann's "Rhenish," and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic." While Franck gave no title to his work, it may be thought of as a "mystical" symphony, for the reason that in it, the soul of the devout and gentle Franck seems to be striving toward communion with the spiritual forces that are imminent in the universe. "His music is a bridge from the turmoiled present to some rarer, larger, better plane."

Those who find it interesting to trace similarity or identity in the themes of the masters will notice that the first three notes of the symphony with their anxious questioning, are paralleled by the same motive that appears in Beethoven's string quartet Op. 135, where the composer has labelled his theme "Muss es sein?" ("Must it be?"). In the words of Paul Rosenfeld "The Symphony is an unbroken curve, an orderly progression by gentle and scarcely perceptible stages from the darkness of an aching, gnawing introduction into the clarity of a healthy, exuberant close."

This conception has been more poetically expressed by Charles Wharton Stork:—

"Who breathed this prayer? A man who lived alone
With his pure dream of beauty, in a dim
Old organ loft. His night of doubt was long,
For in the world of Time he died unknown
But now the pain-dark passion of his hymn
Thrills of the daybreak of eternal song."

RUBIN GOLDMARK, the American composer, tells the story of an occasion on which one of his works was performed in Carnegie Hall. Following the performance, in response to the applause of the audience, he arose in his box and acknowledged the acclaim. A woman was heard to say to her neighbor: "Who is that bowing?" Upon being told it was "the composer," she replied in astonishment, "Why, I thought all the composers were dead."

AN exciting conductor, who leads from memory and without baton with unconventional gestures, Dmitri Mitropoulos, arrived recently from his native Athens, Greece, to be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the two weeks' annual Winter vacation of Serge Koussevitzky. The forty-year-old Athenian will appear in Symphony Hall not only as conductor, but piano virtuoso and composer.

At the Symphony concerts last week, Mitropoulos was the soloist in Respighi's "Toccata" for piano and orchestra, which he also conducted. At these concerts, he introduced the great C sharp minor Quartet of Beethoven as a piece for the entire string section of the orchestra. His purpose was to acquaint the public with what he declares to be the marvelous beauties of this quartet because more people are attracted to orchestral than to string quartet performances. As a composer, he will present his arrangement for modern orchestra of two excerpts from Purcell's opera, "Dido and Aeneas." Not to forget living composers, Mitropoulos will include a suite from the opera, "La Donna Serpente," by Alfredo Casella.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

JAN 17 1937

GUEST LEADER OF SYMPHONY GRIPS BOSTON

Mitropoulos Conducts as He Plans—Needs No Score Himself

BY BERNARD FREEMAN

BOSTON, Jan. 16. (AP)—A Greek bundle of nerves named Dimitri Mitropoulos is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for the second successive year—and therein lies a tale of achievement that rivals that of another new youngster, John Barbirolli, Briton, who at 36 recently signed a three-year contract to lead the New York Philharmonic.

When the bald headed 40-year-old bachelor from Athens took the podium here last year, he was the first of his nationality ever to lead a major symphony in this country.

His colorful mannerisms—he literally dances and skips in rhythm with the orchestra, which he conducts without score or baton—and his able musicianship quickly caught the fancy of Boston concert goers.

From here Mitropoulos goes west to be guest conductor of the Minneapolis, Minn., symphony.

Invited Back Within Year

When asked to return to the Hub this year for another two weeks, he became the first guest conductor in the orchestra's 56 years to be invited back within a year of his debut.

And when he played the solo part of Respighi's Toccata for piano and orchestra at the concerts yesterday and tonight, he became, too, the first man in the orchestra's history ever to conduct while playing.

Mitropoulos' achievements do not stop there, however. He will be heard here also in a third capacity—that of composer.

The slender Athenian is an able linguist. He speaks English, French, Spanish, German and Dutch in addition to his Greek.

The Dutch came in handy during one rehearsal. Unable to elucidate a technical point in English to one of the horn players he sized up the musician:

"You're Dutch aren't you?" he asked.

"Yes," came the surprised answer and in that language the conductor explained how he wanted his music played.

Brimming with energy and good humor Mitropoulos nevertheless is an exacting taskmaster. For precisely three hours at the first rehearsal he drilled the Boston string section rated by many as the finest in the world, in the first part of his presentation with string orchestra of the Beethoven quartet in C-sharp minor. And the next day he came back with three hours' more work on the second part.

Drills Self Sternly

The rehearsal over, Mitropoulos settled before a piano to drill himself for the Respighi concerto.

Hours later a watchman at Symphony hall reported finding him still there, bringing to the musician the stern realization he had had no lunch and was an hour overdue for dinner.

Mitropoulos' feat of conducting from memory has been matched only once in the Boston orchestra's history—by Sir Thomas Beecham, English guest conductor.

The Greek maestro does keep, however, a score at hand during rehearsal, but then only because he requires it to tell his men the number of the section he wants practiced.

As with Barbirolli, the score is placed on the left and the conductor's stand in front is removed, leaving, Mitropoulos says, "nothing between me and the music—so I can really let go."

Tomorrow evening, the above program will be repeated with the exception of the Toccata which will be replaced by Schumann's Violincello Concerto. This will be played by the Spanish cellist, Gaspar Cassado, whose reputation was successfully established in Europe last season in a tour of 49 concerts.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 17 1937

HUB SYMPHONY HONORS GREEK

Mitropoulos Invited to Return Within Year Of His Debut

GUEST CONDUCTOR

First to Lead Famous Orchestra While Playing Instrument

By BERNARD FREEMAN

BOSTON, Jan. 16 (AP)—A Greek bundle of nerves named Dimitri Mitropoulos is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for the second successive year—and therein lies a tale of achievement that rivals that of another new youngster, John Barbirolli, Briton, who at 36 recently signed a three-year contract to lead the New York Philharmonic.

When the bald-headed 40-year-old bachelor from Athens took the podium here last year, he was the first of his nationality ever to lead

'Bundle of Nerves'

Int'l. News Photo.
DIMITRI MITROPOULOS

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 17 1937

Boston Symphony in Benefit Feb. 10 for Pension Fund

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will give a special concert for the benefit of its pension fund at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday night, February 10, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist in the Mendelssohn violin concerto. The program will also include Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony. The orchestra's regular Carnegie Hall concerts will be held on the following Friday night and Saturday afternoon, February 12 and 13.

MEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

JAN 18 1937

Here Is Your Chance To Sing

Men singers who feel as though they could cut quite a caper in choral work, instead of confining their efforts to bathtub warbling, may now step up.

Basses, baritones and tenors have a chance to get an audition at 9 o'clock Wednesday night in the parish house of the Arlington Street Church, where the Cecilia Society will look over new talent.

The society is a non-sectarian mixed chorus and it performs at times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Applicants are asked to bring along a solo in which they "feel comfortable," so that the judges can see what kind of pipes they have.

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

JAN 17 1937

'CONDUCTOR'S MANNERISMS CATCH FANCY

Mitropoulos, Greek Bundle of Nerves, Leads Symphony at Boston For Second Consecutive Year.

By Associated Press.

Boston, Jan. 16.—A Greek bundle of nerves named Dimitri Mitropoulos is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for the second successive year—and therein lies a tale of achievement that rivals that of another new youngster, John Barbirolli, Briton, who at 36 recently signed a three-year contract to lead the New York Philharmonic.

When the bald headed 40-year-old bachelor from Athens took the podium here last year he was the first of his nationality ever to lead a major symphony in this country.

His colorful mannerisms—he literally dances and skips in rhythm with the orchestra, which he conducts without score or baton—and his able musicianship quickly caught the fancy of Boston concert goers.

○ ○ ○

Will Go West.

From here Mitropoulos goes West to be guest conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony.

When asked to return to the Hub this year for another two weeks, he became the first guest conductor in the orchestra's 56 years to be invited back within a year of his debut.

When he played the solo part of Respighi's tocata for piano and orchestra at the concerts yesterday and tonight, he became, too, the first man in the orchestra's history ever to conduct while playing.

Mitropoulos' achievements do not stop there, however. He will be heard here also in a third capacity—that of composer.

The slender Athenian is an able linguist. He speaks English, French, Spanish, German and Dutch in addition to his Greek.

○ ○ ○

Dutch Comes in Handy.

The Dutch came in handy during one rehearsal. Unable to elucidate a technical point in English to one of the horn players, he sized up the musician.

"You're Dutch, aren't you?" he asked.

"Yes," came the surprised answer, and in that language the conductor explained how he wanted his music played.

Brimming with energy and good humor, Mitropoulos nevertheless is an exacting taskmaster. For precisely three hours at the first rehearsal, he drilled the Boston string section, rated by many as the finest in the world, in the first part of his presentation with string orchestra of the Beethoven quartet in C sharp minor. And the next day he came back with three hours more work on the second part.

The rehearsal over, Mitropoulos settled before a piano to drill himself for the Respighi concerto.

Hours later a watchman at Symphony Hall reported finding him still there, bringing to the musician the stern realization he had had no lunch and was an hour overdue for dinner.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 17 1937

THE ORCHESTRAS

IGOR STRAVINSKY continues as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra during the coming week at Carnegie Hall. Beveridge Webster, young American pianist, will reappear as soloist this afternoon in Mozart's concerto in G major (K. 453), and Mr. Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra.

The composer-conductor also will offer his "Fireworks" and suite from "Petrouchka" and two other Russian works, Glinka's overture to "Russian and Ludmilla" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic poem, "Sadko," which he composed in 1867 and revised later. Still later he used the material of the work for his opera "Sadko," which was produced at the Metropolitan in 1930. The symphonic poem, or "tone picture," was last played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra in February, 1934.

Mr. Stravinsky's last program, to be played next Thursday night and Friday and Sunday afternoons, January 21, 22 and 24, includes his own "Le Sacre de Printemps" and "Fire Birl" suite and Tchaikovsky's little known third symphony, in D major, which is described in Mr. Gilman's leading article in this section. "Le Sacre du Printemps" has not figured on a Philharmonic-Symphony program since December, 1930, but was played here by the Boston Symphony last January.

The third concert of the young people's series, under Ernest Schelling's direction next Saturday morning, January 23, in Carnegie Hall, will have a French program with Balbina Brainina, a young Russian pianist, who is a protege of Mr. Schelling and Ignace Jan Paderewski, as soloist in Saint-Saens's G minor concerto. The program begins with "Le Tambourin de Triomphe," by Destouches, a Parisian (1672-1749), who turned to music when twenty-five after an earlier career, including service as a sailor and later as a "mousquetaire du roi."

Georges Enesco will begin his fortnight as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony with the concert of Thursday night, January 28.

Women's Symphony Campaign

The New York Women's Symphony Orchestra, which gives its second concert of the season under Antonia Brico's direction Tuesday night, February 22, at Carnegie Hall, will open a campaign for its establishment on a permanent basis on Thursday, February 4, at a luncheon in the Hotel Biltmore with Miss Brico as guest of honor. Headquarters for the campaign will be at 485 Madison Avenue.

THE MICROPHONE
BOSTON, MASS.

J 29 1937

Community Fund Radio Program

Symphony Will Play for Drive

Greater Boston's 1937 Community Fund Drive launches its radio campaign on Monday, January 25, with an hour's program over stations WBZ and WBZA, beginning at 8.30 P. M.

The program will feature music played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, and speeches by CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, former Secretary of the Navy, by W. J. CAMERON, speaker on the FORD Sunday Evening Hour, and by ROBERT CUTLER, General Chairman of the 1937 Community Fund Campaign.

Extensive use of radio will be made during the two weeks of the Drive, JOHN NAGLE, Radio Director for the Community Fund Campaign, told The MICROPHONE.

"All radio stations in Boston are cooperating with us to the utmost," Mr. NAGLE said.

"Outside of the inaugural program on the 25th, however, we do not plan any elaborate 'special feature' radio programs. But stations have signified their willingness to allow many of their sustaining features to be 'sponsored' by the Community Fund."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

JAN 17 1937

TCHAIKOVSKY AND STRAVINSKY

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

IT IS an extraordinary fact that a symphony by Tchaikovsky, virtually unknown to the present generation, will be heard in New York for the first time in more than half a century from a major orchestra when Mr. Stravinsky conducts it at this week's Philharmonic-Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall. The symphony in question is Tchaikovsky's Third (in D major). Its famous successor, the Fourth, we have ever with us; but the Third, composed only two years earlier—in 1875, in Tchaikovsky's thirty-fifth year, when he had already produced such works of indisputable strength and originality as the B-flat minor piano concerto (1874) and "Romeo and Juliet" (1869-'70)—this symphony will be unfamiliar music to those who listen to it next Thursday, Friday and Sunday under Mr. Stravinsky's baton.

* * *

Why?

IT MAY be granted at once that Tchaikovsky's Third Symphony has not the vitality and drive and salience of its successor, the perennially popular Fourth. Yet the Third is anything but a negligible work. There are pages in it that transcend in distinction and fineness of texture anything in the Fourth; and it is worth recalling that when this Third Symphony was played at St. Petersburg a year after its completion, the eminent Russian critic, Hermann Laroche, wrote of it that "the importance and power of the music, the beauty and variety of form, the nobility of style, the originality and rare perfection of technique, all contribute to make this symphony one of the most remarkable musical works produced during the last ten years. Were it to be played in any musical center in Germany, it would raise the name of the Russian musician to a level with those of the most famous symphonic composers of the day."

To be sure, Laroche was an intimate friend of Tchaikovsky's; but honesty is not an utterly unknown virtue in critics, even when they are friends of those whom they discuss. It would not be true to say that Tchaikovsky's Third Symphony is as telling a score as his Fourth, his Fifth, or his Sixth. It isn't. Yet it is a work of charm, of feeling, of refinement, of invention and ingenuity. Some of it is banal. (Tchaikovsky is always, at some point, banal. But what do you expect of any composer, except, of course, the incomparable Three—at their greatest?)

This score of Tchaikovsky's is, indeed, so much more effective than certain often-played symphonies by other men that its neglect remains a mystery. It would be easy to name a dozen symphonies in the current concert list which cannot hold a candle to the forgotten Third of Peter Ilyich. Why, then, do we almost never hear it? Probably there is no answer save that which Tristan makes to a certain question of Isolde's in Act I of Wagner's music-drama—"Fragt die Sitte!"

* * *

Three Symphonic Orphans

I SOMETIMES fancy that it is vaguely supposed by many unlettered music lovers that Tchaikovsky wrote only three symphonies, known, for some eccentric reason, as "No. 4," "No. 5," and "The Pathetic" [No. 6]. That supposition is excusable. For those three symphonies are virtually the only ones by Tchaikovsky that most music lovers ever hear. They are, to be precise, the only ones that the Philharmonic has played at its regular subscription concerts for twenty-five years. They are the only ones by Tchaikovsky that the Philadelphia Orchestra has ever played. The Chicago Symphony Orchestra has not, in all its forty-six years, played Tchaikovsky's First or Third Symphonies. Until its fifty-third season, the Boston Symphony had never played Tchaikovsky's First Symphony. Yet all these orchestras have played symphonies by fletiferous bores and mediocrities beside whom the Tchaikovsky of the First, Second and Third Symphonies burns like a pillar of flame. Which one of our conductors who has never given his audiences a chance to hear these early works of Tchaikovsky would be willing to put his hand on his heart and aver that the public was more clearly entitled to hear the symphonic deliverances of the following composers, chosen at random from the repertoires of two of our greatest orchestras?—d'Albert, Bischoff, Cowen, Duvivier, Ferroud, Gernsheim, Kaun, Klughardt, Rabaud, Trapp, Urack, Volbach? Doubtless the Third Symphony of Tchaikovsky is not a masterpiece of the highest rank. But if it isn't a better symphony, and one with an infinitely greater musical news-value than the symphonies of Messrs. Cowen, Klughardt and Volbach, some of us will cheerfully eat our opera hats.

* * *

"Must Be Taken Seriously"

TCHAIKOVSKY composed his Third Symphony in less than two months. He began it on June 5th, 1875, at Ussovo, and completed it on the following August 1st, at Verbovka. The first performance was on November 7th of that year, at Moscow. The first performance in America was by the Philharmonic Society of New York, under Adolph Neuendorff, at the Academy of Music, February 8, 1879 (Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini" had been introduced to America by the Philharmonic seven weeks before that).

Tchaikovsky had finished his B-flat minor Piano Concerto the winter before he composed the Third Symphony. After the completion of the Symphony he began work on his ballet, "The Swan Lake," and the following year he sketched his symphonic fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini."

When the Third Symphony was played at St. Petersburg, under Napravnik's bâton, in 1876, César Cui wrote that at the end of the performance "the composer was enthusiastically recalled." "This symphony," Cui declared, "must be taken seriously. The first three movements are the best. The only charm of the fourth movement is its sonority. . . . The fifth movement, a polonaise, is the weakest. On the whole the new symphony shows talent." . . . Laroche, as I have noted above, was better pleased. Tchaikovsky wrote Mrs. von Meck from Clarens in March, 1878: "Hans Richter, the Bayreuth conductor, wished this season to do my Third Symphony at a Philharmonic concert in Vienna; but after one rehearsal, the Philharmonic directors pronounced the work 'too Russian,' and it was unanimously rejected."

Tchaikovsky's most passionate musical enthusiasm at this time was "Carmen" When he heard the opera at Paris, in company with his brother Modeste, he was so carried away that his brother "became quite embarrassed." Later Tchaikovsky attended the Bayreuth Festival of 1876, where he was astonished to find himself received as a distinguished visitor. "It appears," he wrote home, "that I am not so unknown in western Europe as I thought." His days in Bayreuth were "one long confusion of hospitality." But Tchaikovsky did not take to the music of the "Ring." After the final note of "Götterdämmerung," he wrote, "I felt as if freed from poison." The delicately perceptive Mme. von Meck seems to have shared his feelings. "How can Wagner . . . compare with you?" she wrote Tchaikovsky in the following year. "He profanes the art." But Mrs. von Meck admitted that Wagner had "great talent." "It is lucky," she added, "that we are not Germans. . . . We can say with impunity, 'Thank God, we have no Wagner, but we have Peter Ilyich.'"

Cont. above R

* * *

Stravinsky's Tribute

LET not that dwindling organization, the Society of the Little Brothers of Igor, be agitated with vexed wonderment because their idol has chosen to place on his New York programs a work by the despised Tchaikovsky, whom none of the haughy little Igorians would deign to recognize by even the most distant of musical nods. Perhaps the Igorians don't know—or perhaps they have chosen to forget—that Stravinsky has frequently taken occasion to pay tribute to that most esthetically disreputable of all composers, Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky. In his latest literary publication, the engrossing Autobiography which appeared last year, Stravinsky refers to Tchaikovsky as a composer "for whom my admiration has continued to grow with the development of my musical consciousness." Later, he alludes to him as "the great Russian composer," for whom he has "great admiration." "It is true," he remarks elsewhere in the Autobiography, "that Tchaikovsky could not escape Germanic influences. But, though he was under the influence of Schumann, that did not prevent him from remaining Russian, any more than Gounod, for example, was prevented from remaining French. Both profited by the purely musical discoveries of [Schumann]. . . . They borrowed his phraseology and his distinctive idioms without adopting his ideology."

Later, speaking of his own "Baiser de la Féc," Stravinsky says: "I received from Mme. Ida Rubinstein a proposal to compose a ballet for her repertoire. . . . The idea was that I should compose something inspired by the music of Tchaikovsky. My well known fondness for this composer, and, still more, the fact that November, the time fixed for the performance, would mark the thirty-fifth anniversary of his death, induced me to accept the offer. It would give me the opportunity of paying my heartfelt homage to Tchaikovsky's wonderful talent. . . .

"For my subject, I turned to a great poet with a gentle, sensitive soul whose imaginative mind was wonderfully akin to that of the musician [Tchaikovsky]. I refer to Hans Christian Andersen. . . . I chose as my theme his very beautiful story known to us as 'The Ice Maiden,' and worked out my scenario on the following lines: A fairy imprints her magic kiss on a child at birth, and parts it from its mother. Twenty years later, when the youth has attained the very zenith of his good fortune, she repeats the fatal kiss, and carries him off to live in supreme happiness with her ever afterward. As my object was to commemorate the work of Tchaikovsky, this subject seemed to me particularly appropriate as an allegory, the Muse having similarly branded Tchaikovsky with her fatal kiss: and the magic imprint has made itself felt in all the musical creations of this great artist."

Thus Stravinsky paid his tribute to Tchaikovsky—a tribute which he will repeat, in another way, when he sets before us this week the almost unknown Third Symphony of the Russian master.

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

19 1937

Greek Conductor's Career Is Highly Colorful

Boston — (AP) — A Greek bundle of nerves named Dimitri Mitropoulos is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for the second successive year — and therein lies a tale of achievement that rivals that of another new youngster, John Barbirolli, Briton, who at 36, recently signed a three-year contract to lead the New York Philharmonic.

When the bald-headed, 40-year-old bachelor from Athens took the podium here last year, he was the first of his nationality ever to lead a major symphony in this country.

His colorful mannerisms — he literally dances and skips in rhythm with the orchestra, which he conducts without score or baton —and his able musicianship quickly caught the fancy of Boston concert-goers.

From here, Mitropoulous goes west to be guest conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony.

He's Composer, Too

When asked to return to the Hub this year for another two weeks, he became the first guest conductor in the orchestra's 56 years to be invited back within a year of his debut.

And when he played the solo part of Respighi's Toccata for piano and orchestra at the concerts Friday and last night, he became, too, the first man in the orchestra's history ever to conduct while playing.

Mitropoulos' achievements do not stop here, however. He will be heard here also in a third capacity —that of composer.

The slender Athenian is an able linguist. He speaks English, French, Spanish, German and Dutch, in addition to his Greek.

The Dutch came in handy during one rehearsal. Unable to elucidate a technical point in English to one of the horn players, he sized up the musician:

"You're Dutch, aren't you?" he asked.

"Yes," came the surprised answer, and in that language the conductor explained how he wanted his music played.

An Exacting Taskmaster

Brimming with energy and good humor, Mitropoulos nevertheless is an exacting taskmaster. For precisely three hours at the first rehearsal, he drilled the Boston string section, rated by many as the finest in the world, in the first part of his presentation with string orchestra of the Beethoven quarter in C-sharp minor. And the next day he came back with three hours' more work on the second part.

The rehearsal over, Mitropoulos settled before a piano to drill himself for the Respighi concerto.

Hours later a watchman at Symphony Hall reported finding him still there, bringing to the musician the stern realization he had had no lunch and was an hour overdue for dinner.

Mitropoulos' feat of conducting from memory has been matched only once in the Boston orchestra's history — by Sir Thomas Beecham, English guest conductor.

The Greek maestro does keep, however, a score at hand during rehearsal, but then only because he requires it to tell his men the number of the section he wants practiced.

As with Barbirolli, the score is placed on the left and the conductor's stand in front is removed, leaving Mitropoulos says, "nothing between me and the music — so I can really let go."

DANVILLE, VA.
REGISTER

JAN 17 1937 176

GREEK IS NAMED GUEST CONDUCTOR

Dimitri Mitropoulos Achieves Honor for Second Successive Year

BOSTON, Jan. 16.—(AP)—A Greek bundle of nerves named Dimitri Mitropoulos is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for the second successive year—and therein lies a tale of achievement that rivals that of another new youngster, John Barbirolli, Briton, who at 36 recently signed a three-year contract to lead the New York Philharmonic.

When the bald-headed 40-year-old old bachelor from Athens took the podium here last year, he was the first of his nationality ever to lead a major symphony in this country.

His colorful mannerisms—he literally dances and skips in rhythm with the orchestra, which he conducts without score or baton—and his able musicianship quickly caught the fancy of Boston concert goers.

From here Mitropoulos goes west to be guest conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony.

When asked to return to the Hub this year for another two weeks, he became the first guest conductor in the orchestra's 56 years to be invited back within a year of his debut.

When he played the solo part of Respighi's Toccata for piano and orchestra at the concerts yesterday and tonight, he became, too, the first man in the orchestra's history to conduct while playing.

The slender Athenian is an able linguist. He speaks English, French, Spanish, German and Dutch in addition to his Greek.

The Dutch came in handy during one rehearsal. Unable to elucidate a technical point in English to one of the horn players, he sized up the musician:

"You're Dutch, aren't you?" he asked.

"Yes," came the surprised answer, and in that language the conductor explained how he wanted his music played.

Brimming with energy and good humor, Mitropoulos nevertheless is an exacting taskmaster. For precisely three hours at the first rehearsal, he drilled the Boston string section, rated by many as the finest in the world, in the first part of his presentation with string orchestra of the Beethoven Quartet in C-Sharp Minor. And the next day he came back with three hours' more work on the second part.

Hours later a watchman at Symphony Hall reported finding him still there, bringing to the musician the stern realization he had had no lunch and was an hour overdue for dinner.

BAYSIDE, N. Y.
WEEKLY TIMES

JAN 21 1937

World of Music

By John Selby
Associated Press Music Critic

BOSTON—(AP)—A Greek bundle of nerves named Dimitri Mitropoulos is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for the second successive year—and therein lies a tale of achievement that rivals that of another new youngster, John Barbirolli, Briton, who at 36 recently signed a three-year contract to lead the New York Philharmonic.

When the bald-headed 40-year-old bachelor from Athens took the podium here last year, he was the first of his nationality ever to lead a major symphony in this country.

His colorful mannerisms — he dances and skips in rhythm with the orchestra, which he conducts without score or baton—and his able musicianship quickly caught the fancy of Boston concert goers.

From here Mitropoulos goes west to be guest conductor of the Minneapolis, Minn., symphony.

* * *

WHEN asked to return to the Hub this year for

Etc. like article at left.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

JAN 19 1937

Only one concert event is listed for the immediate vicinity this week. That one will be a program by the Boston Sinfonietta, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, and scheduled for Chapin auditorium, Mt. Holyoke college.

The Sinfonietta is a group of prominent members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who were organized by Mr. Fiedler four years ago. He wanted to form a small orchestra for many years, since he felt, and still feels, that a small group of players can present many compositions which large symphony orchestras are unable to play. The Sinfonietta has appeared with great success in many New England cities and town and its concerts in Boston have received high praise from the critics and public.

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Sinfonietta, is well known to many New Englanders as the conductor of the pop concerts and concerts on the Boston Esplanade. He was born in Boston and his father was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Fiedler himself joined the Boston Symphony in 1915, after graduating from the Boston Latin school. He served in the American army during the World War, after which he returned to his career in music. Mr. Fiedler plays various instruments in the orchestra,—violin, viola, organ, piano and celesta. In addition to his other activities he had conducted the annual concerts at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts since their inception.

One of the outstanding numbers on The Sinfonietta program Thursday is "Finlandia," by Sibelius, the Finnish composer whom Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony's conductor, has so highly praised. "Finlandia," is a brief tone-poem which so aptly captures the essential spirit of the composer's native land that it has often been assumed that the melodies are folk-songs. The fact is, according to Sibelius, that there is not a note but that is original with him.

It has been said that the Finns were wont to become so aroused when they heard the music that its public performance had to be prohibited. Certainly it touches the extremes of emotion, from quiet prayerfulness to exultant, brilliant triumph.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 22 1937

STRAVINSKY WINS STIRRING OVATION

Conducting of Philharmonic in 'Sacre du Printemps' Thrills Large Audience

NEW QUALITIES ARE NOTED

Composer Brings Fresh Values in His Masterpiece—Early Tchaikovsky Item Given

By OLIN DOWNES

Certain disadvantages, or let us say, rather, technical shortcomings of the composer-conductor who is not a professional orchestra leader, were noticed in these columns when Igor Stravinsky conducted his first program of this season with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra a week ago. Last night in Carnegie Hall Mr. Stravinsky gave a triumphant demonstration of the strength of the composer-conductor when he interpreted music of which he is the creator, and it was a revelation. His performance of "Sacre du printemps" came close to being the most thrilling interpretation of the work that we have heard in this city.

This takes account of the magnificent reading of the score when Pierre Monteux created a furor with its first performance here, of the brilliant and extremely effective reading of Serge Koussevitzky, both performances superior in technical detail and perhaps in virtuoso effect to Mr. Stravinsky's, and many other readings. The music as it sounded last night had a grip, an authenticity and a power of proportion which more than reinstated it in the esteem of one individual who had come to doubt its permanency. It is neither necessary nor desirable at this point to assume the rôle of a dubious prophet, and predict how long the "Sacre" will last. But Mr. Stravinsky impressed one thing indelibly upon us: it is indubitably a masterpiece.

Elemental Sweep of Music

No doubt familiarity with the music is responsible for the observation of detail that only gradually grows upon the listener, but it is not inaccurate to state that there were some new balances and emergence of certain effects which had not been heard before. Then there was the utterly elemental sweep of the thing, when a ferocious power sprang from the very depths of the orchestra, and shook it, and the sound, suddenly sinking to a whisper, would sweep over everything and swell with the hum and the furious approaching clamor of a tornado.

Again—and no modern score has puzzled us so much, or aroused in us such different and conflicting reactions—it appeared as music of an astonishing elementality. Fierce cries of pain and of parturition come from the instruments. A swirling caldron of cross-rhythms and of clashing tonal bodies seems to suck everything into its maw, to absorb and destroy and throw forth again in some new form of energy. One also grasped the amazing architecture of these rhythmic and polyharmonic developments. It is a structural plan such as no school of composition had before evolved. All that is safe and established is dismissed, and the foundation for something new discovered in the midst of apparent chaos.

The triumph of Mr. Stravinsky's conducting lay in two things: his capacity to crack an invisible whip

---

Foreword to New Malipiero Concero

The program to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening will begin with an orchestral transcription of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in B minor by Dimitri Mitropoulos, who will be making the final appearances in his two weeks of guest conducting here. The conductor will also bring forward the Second Symphony in C major by Schumann, Ravel's "Spanish" Rhapsody and, for the first times in America, Malipiero's Piano Concerto. As in the case of Respighi's Concerto at last week's concerts, Mr. Mitropoulos will both direct the performance of the Malipiero Concerto and play the piano solo part in it.

The Malipiero Concerto was completed in Asolo, Italy, on June 10, 1934, according to a note in the composer's hand at the end of the score (published the same year by Ricordi). The score is dedicated to Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge. It was first performed in Rome in 1935. The instrumentation consists of a piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, timpani, bass drum, snare drum, bells and string quintet.

The Concerto is not long. There is considerable dialogue between the orchestra and the piano, the solo instrument not being regarded merely as an important member of a symphonic ensemble. In the first movement the piano is treated fairly brilliantly, in a style sometimes approaching that of the old toccata. There are rapid scale-like passages, arpeggios and incipient trills. The other instruments largely accompany or imitate the piano.

In the second movement, which is an andante, the piano begins by being the accompanying instrument, but soon takes an equal part in the dialogue. The style is often highly ornamental. The last movement is marked allegro. Here again the piano is treated in the percussive manner of the old keyboard instruments. There is a longish cadenza, and in general the virtuoso style is employed.

A rapid glance at the score indicates that the harmonic and melodic style is in Malipiero's customary eclectic vein. His compositions that will be recalled from recent performance at the Boston Symphony concerts are the Symphony of the Four Seasons (in four movements) and the Violin Concerto, with Viola Mitchell as soloist. Both works were performed here in the fall of 1934.

M. S.

Famous Violinist

Jascha Heifetz, who will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

JASCHA HEIFETZ—Soloist
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
FRIDAY and SATURDAY

When Dimitri Mitropoulos completed his final rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday he was greeted with an unusual demonstration of applause by the musicians. The conductor, visibly moved, beat a hasty retreat after indicating his appreciation. The applause, which included cheers, continued until Mr. Mitropoulos returned to acknowledge it again.

